A There cannot be anything more vague than the allegation of fraud that is to be found in the pleadings, and what my noble and learned friend has most justly observed is a principle of the highest importance to be kept in view in proceedings in equity—for the security of the court against imposition upon it—for the keeping straight and clear the principle upon which its jurisdiction is to be exercised—for the safety of the characters of the parties—and for common justice. My noble
 B and learned friend has next observed that where fraud is to be the ground of the proceeding and is made the principle on which the relief is sought at the hands of the court, that fraud must be clearly and distinctly alleged, and, if so alleged, must equally be clearly and distinctly proved, if it is the ground on which parties seek the assistance of the court for equitable relief. That fraud, in this case, is clearly alleged there can be no doubt whatever, because we find in the bill this
 C allegation :

“that the said Augusta D'Este, that is to say, the defendant, at the time of the sale to the plaintiff, well knew that the said deed poll had been made and executed by her mother, the said Lady Augusta De Ameland, that is to say, well knew, that the said liberty-way so claimed in the township of Ramsgate and the parish of St. Lawrence was included within the premises so sold to D your orator as aforesaid.”

That is distinctly alleged, but nothing of the kind has been proved. Has anything been adduced as a substitute for that proof? Nothing of the kind. It is no question of constructive notice, for, as my noble and learned friend has well observed, constructive notice merges in actual knowledge. Constructive notice is only where
 E actual knowledge is not alleged, and here there is actual knowledge alleged, and thus no question as to constructive notice can arise.

Though it may not have been proved that the defendant actually knew of the deed poll, though, on the contrary, it may have been proved that she had not actual knowledge of it, yet by way of substitute for the first allegation, they as much as say : “If we cannot charge you with knowledge of the concealment of the F deed poll, we will charge you indirectly, we will charge you by inference.” In the next paragraph of the bill they go on to state :

“That the said Augusta Emma D'Este had, in fact, by her agents, regularly paid the nominal rent reserved to the said township of Ramsgate and parish of St. Lawrence by the said deed poll, as an acknowledgment of their right to re-open the said liberty way, for several years prior to the said sale to your
 G orator, that is to say, paid by her agents two shillings and sixpence in respect of the way for several years prior to the said sale to the plaintiff.”

In the first place, it is not proved that the accounts in which it is said the two shillings and sixpence paid by the agent was entered, ever did contain that entry, for the accounts were not produced. In the next place, it is not proved that she had
 H that knowledge. Therefore, in order to prove her knowledge, you must assume three things, first, that she knew of the accounts, which she did not know, but the contrary; secondly, that the accounts contained the entry; and thirdly, in order to make it the least available to the case towards proof of knowledge and suppression of that knowledge, you must go a further step, and prove that the accounts, if produced, and if seen by her, did contain, not only the entry of the pay-
 I ment of two shillings and sixpence by the agent, but also an entry that the two shillings and sixpence was paid in respect of that right of way to the parish of St. Lawrence. It is ridiculous to suppose that you can make all these assumptions in a court where the foundation of the whole claim is fraud, alleged by the concealment of a fact well known.

In Edwards v. M'Leay (1), both the learned judges, SIR WILLIAM GRANT, and LORD ELDON, went on the fact that there was direct knowledge brought home to the party. That case, therefore, does not help the plaintiff in this case. It does not apply here, but the case which my noble and learned friend happened to light upon, which had not been mentioned at the Bar, does apply. I do not remember, A in the course of my experience, ever to have seen two cases more nearly alike than that case and the present, though I must observe that it did not require a case of this sort to enable us to arrive at the conclusion at which we now arrive. In the present case there is, first, a total failure in proof of the case alleged; and secondly, the case which is proved is totally insufficient to support the claim. B

 It is singular to observe how very different the view taken here of the proof of fraud and of the import of it, and its tendency towards a remedy is from that which is taken in the Courts of Common law in the celebrated case of Pasley v. Freeman (3), but particularly Haycraft v. Creasy (4). There you find that the knowledge was never alleged, but if you look at that case—which is celebrated by its having shown a rarely occurring difference of opinion between the learned Chief Justice, LORD C KENYON, and the three puisne judges, they having decided against LORD KENYON that the action would not lie—it is singular how clearly you find that the plaintiffs did not allege a scienter there. They allege things which might be supposed to amount to a scienter, but they never dared to allege a scienter. They said that Creasy had given intimation to Haycraft that his opinion was that Miss Robertson, who turned out to be a swindler, was perfectly solvent, and that he of his own knowledge asserted in words that she was solvent and that she might safely be D trusted to any reasonable amount with goods. So it was argued that there was a scienter; but the pleader, who drew the declaration, knew a little better than that.
 He was afraid that that would be held only to be a scienter of an opinion, and that it amounted only to an opinion, and so the court held. They said we must have knowledge alleged of a fact, and what the party was talking about was not a fact, but merely of an opinion, viz., the solvency of the lady. The pleader was E quite aware that that objection would be raised against him, and, accordingly, he took special care not to allege the scienter. It is expressly stated in the report that no knowledge was alleged in the declaration, but it was only alleged that the party had given a false representation. What would have been the consequence if he had alleged knowledge? He would have done what the pleader in equity has done in this case in the passage which I have read to your Lordships. He would F have alleged that the said Creasy well knew the same, but then he would have been obliged to prove that, and, as he could not prove it, he would have been nonsuited. He, therefore, took care not to allege it, and he left it to be a matter of implication.

I am, therefore, clearly of opinion that there has been as great a miscarriage of justice in this case in the court below as I have ever seen. The decree cannot G stand, but must be reversed with all the costs below.

LORD CAMPBELL.—After the very attentive and anxious consideration which this case has received, I have come to the clear conclusion that the decree appealed against ought to be reversed.

If there be, in any way whatever, misrepresentation or concealment which is H material to the purchaser, a court of equity will not compel him to complete the purchase, but where the conveyance has been executed, I apprehend, my Lords, that a court of equity will set aside the conveyance only on the ground of actual fraud. There would be no safety for the transactions of mankind if, upon a discovery being made at any distance of time of a material fact not disclosed to the purchaser of which the vendor had merely constructive notice, a conveyance I which had been executed could be set aside.

Counsel for the respondent acquiesced in the view that this was to be considered as if it were an action of deceit, but they argued that an action of deceit might be maintained without proof of actual fraud. From that position I entirely dissent. If you mean by fraud, an intention to injure the party to whom the representation is made or to benefit the party who makes the representation, there may be an action of deceit without fraud, but there must be falsehood, there must be an assertion of that which the party making it knows to be untrue.

- A The scienter must either be expressly alleged, or there must be an allegation that is tantamount to the scienter of the fraudulent representation, and this allegation must be proved at the trial. If your Lordships will examine the cases that have been referred to, Foster v. Charles (5), Polhill v. Walter (6), and Corbett v. Brown (7), you will find the judges uniformly lay down the rule that there must be a falsehood stated and proved. If that falsehood is stated without any view of
- B benefiting the person who states the falsehood or of injuring the person to whom the falsehood is stated, in one sense of the word you may say it is not fraudulent, but it is a breach of a moral obligation; it is telling a lie; and if a lie is told whereby a third person is prejudiced, although there may be no profit to the person who tells it, and although no injury was intended to the party to whom it is told, but a benefit to a third person, it is clearly a breach of moral obligation, and is a fraud
- C which will support an action of deceit.

- What evidence is there in the present case to support such an action? The bill is framed, I may say, ex delicto, not ex contractu; but it asserts, in the most positive manner (and that is the foundation of the relief which is prayed), that the defendant, at the time of the sale, not only knew of the deed of 1820, but knew of the direction of the "liberty way," and knew that "liberty way" came upon the
- D ground which was sold to the plaintiff. My two noble and learned friends who have preceded me, in the clearest manner have shown that there is not a particle of evidence to support that allegation, and I do not mean to trouble your Lordships by again going through the evidence. Indeed, there has been every desire to conduct a case of this sort with the courtesy and respect to the parties which were indicated in the court below and at the Bar here. I will not strictly interpret the disclaimer
- E at the Bar, but the learned judge below, judicially, more than once said that he acquitted the parties of all fraud, and, therefore, the notion of this bill being supported on the ground of personal fraud committed by the defendant must at once be dismissed. That being the case, in the shape in which the bill is presented before us, the case of personal fraud committed by her entirely fails, and we are not at all called upon to consider whether Cornfoot v. Fowke (8) in the Exchequer
- F was rightly decided or not, a case in which the judges were divided as to whether the fraudulent representation of an agent was equivalent to a fraudulent representation by the principal. Here the case alleged is a fraudulent representation by the principal, and not by an agent.

- In the first place, there is no evidence to which we are at liberty to pay attention to prove that the witness Wightwick, in making the representation at the time of
- G the sale, was the agent of Lady Wilde, and if he was the agent, there is no evidence whatever that he, in the course of the agency acquired any knowledge, or at any time had any knowledge of the direction of the road, and on that the whole turns, because the mere knowledge of the liberty way is nothing, and the mere knowledge of the deed of 1820 is nothing, unless he in the course of his agency acquired a knowledge of the direction of the liberty way, and knew that part of the liberty way
- H extends within the wall which was erected by the plaintiff. The knowledge then amounts to nothing; he had no knowledge which would show that he was guilty of any fraudulent misrepresentation. Therefore, my Lords, in the light in which I view this case, it seems to me that the decree cannot be supported.

- With regard to Edwards v. M'Leay (1), I most reverentially regard it. I think there is no case of higher authority to be found in our law books. It was decided
- I by SIR WILLIAM GRANT, on the most unexceptionable principles, and it was supported by LORD ELDON, and he in the most pithy manner states the principle on which he proceeded. This is the principle on which he acts (2 Swan. at p. 289):

"If one party makes a representation which he knows to be false, but the falsehood of which the other party had no means of knowing, this court will rescind the contract."

This is the first case that we have cited before us, or to be found, of a bill in equity to set aside such a transaction, and we have as yet no authority to go further than Edwards v. M'Leay (1). That is the guide on one side; what is the guide on the other? The case decided by LORD MANNERS, a judge of very great experience and very great intelligence, whose opinion on such a question is to be regarded with high respect—that case is the guide on the other side, to show you what you ought to avoid. You may go so far as Edwards v. M'Leay (1), but then you are told how far you are not to go by the warning in the other case.

For these reasons, I am clearly of opinion that this bill ought to have been dismissed, with costs.

Appeal allowed.

BLAKE v. SHAW

[Reported John. 732; 2 L.T. 84; 8 W.R. 410; 70 E.R. 615]

Will—Plant—Bequest of goodwill and plant—Plant—Exclusion of stock-in-trade and materials.

A testator by his will “gave and bequeathed unto his foreman B. the goodwill of his business in Aldersgate Street, and also the plant and £1,000 sterling for his use and benefit.” The testator had been a wholesale clothier in London, and at the time of his death was possessed of stock-in-trade, ready-made clothes, cloth and other materials, and household furniture, etc.

Held: the word “plant” did not embrace the stock-in-trade, ready-made clothes, cloth and other similar materials, and, consequently, they did not pass to the legatee.

Notes: Considered: Re Rhagg, Easten v. Boyd, [1938] 3 All E.R. 314. Applied: Re Betts, Burrell v. Betts, [1949] 1 All E.R. 568. Referred to: Re Henton, Henton v. Henton (1882), 30 W.R. 702.

As to gifts of plant, business or goodwill, see 39 HALSBURY'S LAWS (3rd Edn.) 1019; and for cases see 44 DIGEST 692-694.

Case referred to in argument:

Churton v. Douglas (1859), John. 174, 28 L.J.Ch. 841; 33 L.T.O.S. 57; 5 Jur.N.S. 887; 7 W.R. 365; 70 E.R. 385; 36 Digest (Repl.) 604, 1650.

Bill filed by the plaintiff Thomas Blake, who had for several years been foreman to the testator Haven Kaye, in his trade or business of a wholesale clothier in Aldersgate Street, in the City of London, against the executors of his will, to have his (the plaintiff's) interest in the testator's estate and effects, by virtue of the bequest to him of the goodwill of the testator's business in Aldersgate Street, and also the plant, ascertained and declared, and the property, if necessary, assigned to him.

Haven Kaye, the testator, of Newington Green, and of No. 129, Aldersgate Street, at the date of his will and of his decease, carried on the trade or business of a wholesale clothier at No. 129, Aldersgate Street, of which premises he was tenant at rack rent for a term still unexpired at the decease of the said Haven Kaye. The plaintiff was, and for many years previously had been, the foreman of the said Haven Kaye. Haven Kaye, by his will, dated Mar. 1, 1859, after directing payment of all his just debts and funeral and testamentary expenses, gave and bequeathed unto the plaintiff (therein called William Thomas Blake) the goodwill of his business in Aldersgate Street aforesaid, and also the plant and £1,000 sterling for his use and benefit, and after giving an annuity and certain legacies, the testator

A gave the residue of his estate as therein mentioned, and appointed the defendant William Shaw and William Robinson executors of his will.

The testator died on Mar. 6, 1859; and his will was duly proved by the defendants, who possessed themselves of the personal estate of the testator, more than sufficient to pay and satisfy his debts and funeral and testamentary expenses, and the annuity and legacies given by his said will, including the plaintiff's legacy of B £1,000, which they had not paid, although they had assented to the bequest thereof. The defendants alleged that they had not assented to the bequest to the plaintiff of the goodwill of the testator's business in Aldersgate Street, and the plant. Shortly after the death of the testator, on Mar. 7, 1859, the defendant William Robinson informed the plaintiff of the tenor of the testator's will, and added, that all the property of the testator at the time of his decease in and about No. 129, C Aldersgate Street, belonged to him (the plaintiff), and advised him to take possession. The plaintiff accordingly took possession of the leasehold premises, and the stock-in-trade, ready-made clothes, cloth and other materials, a part of the ready money, and the household furniture, plate, linen, etc., and he had since resided on the said premises, and continued the trade and business. He had also received some debts due to the testator.

D The stock-in-trade, ready-made clothes, cloth and other materials, were of very considerable value—it was said about £5,500; and the question was what part of the testator's personal estate passed to the plaintiff as legatee under the will of the testator.

Willcock, Q.C., and F. T. White for the plaintiff.

E Daniel, Q.C., and Hitchcock for the defendants, the executors, were not called on to argue.

PAGE-WOOD, V.-C.—I am clearly of opinion that plant cannot be held to mean stock in trade. There is no special reason in this will why I should so hold. When a testator gives the goodwill of his business and £1,000 to his foreman, it may well be imagined that the object of this bounty will be able to carry on the business and obtain the necessary capital for the purpose. In most cases the word "plant" F is used to describe something which, if not in direct contrast to stock, is at any rate of an entirely different nature. All the matters permanently used for the purposes of a trade, as distinguished from the fluctuating stock, are commonly included in the term "plant." It consists sometimes of things which are fixed, as, for example, counters, heating, gas, and other apparatus and things of that G kind, and in other cases of horses, locomotives, and the like, which are in this sense only fixed that they form a part of the permanent establishment intended to be replaced when dead or worn out, as the case may be. Therefore, I cannot treat either the stock or the household furniture as part of the plant.

My only doubt has been as to the interest in the house, which is proved to be of no intrinsic value apart from the goodwill. It is only upon the terms of this H particular will, and the circumstances of the case, that I can hold this interest to pass, on the ground that the testator, in making a gift of plant and goodwill, did not mean the plant and goodwill to be severed from the place where the business was carried on. Therefore, I think that the gift of plant and goodwill, in which each word aids the other, may properly be taken to pass the leasehold house, which the testator must have known to have no value except as an adjunct I of the business. It is only upon the grounds I have stated that I can come to this conclusion.

There will be a declaration that, according to the true construction of the will, and regard being had to the circumstances of the leasehold house in Aldersgate Street having been held at a rack-rent and only for the purposes of the business in Aldersgate Street, the same passed by the bequest of the plant and goodwill; and a declaration that the stock in trade and household furniture did not pass.

Declaration accordingly.

BEACHEY v. BROWN

[COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH (Sir Alexander Cockburn, C.J., Crompton and Hill, JJ.), February 15, 1860]

[Reported E.B. & E. 796; 29 L.J.Q.B. 105; 1 L.T. 479; 24 J.P. 518;

Breach of Promise—Defence to action—Failure by plaintiff to disclose to defendant prior engagement to marry another—Unchastity.

The fact that the plaintiff in a breach of promise action was, at the time of her engagement to marry the defendant, already engaged to another and failed to disclose this fact to the defendant, does not constitute a defence to the action, even though the defendant, had he known of the previous engagement, would not have agreed to marry the plaintiff.

Per SIR ALEXANDER COCKBURN, C.J.: There are a great many things a man might desire to have communicated to him, and yet the non-disclosure of such circumstances—such as debts owing, excitability of temper, and other things which a man might desire to be acquainted with—would not form a ground for the non-completion of the contract. . . . Immorality, unchastity, etc., are sufficient to excuse.

Contract—Rescission—Misrepresentation—Non-disclosure of material fact—Need to prove fraud—Distinction between circumstances showing or not showing fraud—Active or passive concealment.

Per CROMPTON, J.: To make the non-disclosure of a material fact an excuse for the non-performance of a contract, fraud must be distinctly alleged. . . . The real distinction as to circumstances showing or not showing fraud is between active and passive concealment.

Demurrer by the plaintiff in an action by which she claimed damages for breach of promise of marriage; the defendant pleaded that the plaintiff failed to disclose that, when she agreed to marry him, she was already engaged to marry another; and the plaintiff demurred to this plea.

The declaration alleged a breach of promise to marry. The defendant pleaded that before and at time of the plaintiff and the defendant so agreeing, the plaintiff and one Charles Yeates had agreed to marry one another, which said agreement was then subsisting and in full force, and the plaintiff was then actually engaged to marry the said Charles Yeates, as she then well knew, but of which the defendant was then wholly ignorant, and that though the plaintiff ought to have fully disclosed the same to the defendant before the making of the agreement in the declaration mentioned, and though the defendant would not have made the said

A agreement had the same been disclosed to him by the plaintiff before the making thereof, yet the plaintiff at the time of making of the said agreement withheld and concealed the same from the defendant, and procured the defendant to, and the defendant did, make the said agreement on his part while he was wholly ignorant of the same. Demurrer and joinder in demurrer.

B T. Jones for the plaintiff in support of the demurrer.
Beresford for the defendant.

SIR ALEXANDER COCKBURN, C.J.—I am of opinion that our judgment should be for the plaintiff. This plea is no sufficient ground of defence. If the old law had continued to exist, and the fact of a pre-contract had the effect of making void a subsequent marriage, it might have been a good answer and a sufficient reason for declining to carry out the contract; but that law being abrogated, since the power of the ecclesiastical court in this respect is taken away by the statute 26 Geo. 2, c. 33, s. 13, and the Marriage Act, 1823, s. 27 [both repealed], this plea does not set forth any state of things which can have any effect upon the contract itself, or show any good reason why it should not be carried out. There are a great many things a man might desire to have communicated to him, and yet the non-disclosure of such circumstances—such as debts owing, excitability of temper, and other things, which a man might well desire to be made acquainted with—would not form a ground for the non-completion of the contract. It may be morally right that such things should be communicated to him, but he cannot excuse himself for a non-completion of the contract on such grounds. Immorality, unchastity, etc., are sufficient to excuse him, and for good reasons; but there is nothing of that sort here. Here the defence relied on is simply that the plaintiff had been engaged to another man; there is no imputation on her virtue, and nothing is disclosed in the plea to bar her right to recover.

CROMPTON, J.—I am of the same opinion. To make the non-disclosure of a material fact an excuse for the non-performance of a contract, fraud must be distinctly alleged. We cannot take this as a case of fraud, and, therefore, it is no answer. Here neither on one side nor the other was there any fraud. The real distinction as to circumstances showing or not showing fraud is between active and passive concealment. There may be other cases, such as moral turpitude, incompetency to perform the obligations of matrimony, that may be answers to such an action as this, but this plea does not show anything of the kind. The plaintiff may not have been to blame; it is not stated that she knew that the defendant was ignorant of the previous engagement, and one can suppose many cases in which it would not be incumbent on her to disclose such a fact. It is alleged by the plea that, as a matter of law, she was bound to communicate this circumstance to the defendant, but I see nothing in the case before us to prevent the plaintiff entering into this engagement with the defendant. We might come to cases like those in French law where if a man is disappointed in the amount of fortune the lady brings him, it would be a good defence, but it would be very dangerous to extend such defences; there would be no knowing where to draw the line; it might be said, if a lady apparently had a fine head of hair or good teeth, and the one or the other turned out to be false, that that would be an answer—it would be very dangerous.

H Then as to the pre-contract, the case is not brought by this plea within any such rule as has been referred to; and, as at present advised, this does not seem to me the sort of pre-contract contemplated by the statutes. I think, if looked into, they mean really a contract de præsenti or de futuro of a regular marriage; but does this pre-contract, as it has been called, prevent the defendant making good his marrying with the plaintiff? I think it clear this is not the sort of pre-contract contemplated here. The plaintiff promised to marry, and she was under no such pre-contract as created an obstacle to such marriage.

I HILL, J.—I am of the same opinion. The plea does not allege fraud, and fraud cannot be proved. It shows no disability on the part of the defendant or the plaintiff to enter into an engagement and carry it out. Without entering into the earlier statutes, I think that since the statutes 26 Geo. 2, c. 33, and the Marriage Act, 1823, on this subject, there was here no disability and no such pre-contract as could be enforced in the ecclesiastical courts. The plea sets up no such defence; it also fails in showing any concealment of such circumstances as the plaintiff was bound to disclose. It is possible that the defendant might have induced the plaintiff to break off her first engagement; and, if so, it would be rather hard that he should be allowed to set up her so doing as a defence in answer to this action. The circumstance referred to may have an influence on the damages, but I think the plea is bad in law, and the plaintiff entitled to judgment.

Judgment for the plaintiff.

WRIGHT v. CALLENDER

[COURT OF APPEAL IN CHANCERY (Lord Cranworth and Knight-Bruce, L.J.J.), July 10, 1852]

16 Jur. 647; 42 E.R. 1027]

Annuity—Deficiency of income—Annuity charged on special fund—Right of annuitant to have deficiency made good out of capital.

A testator directed his executors to invest a sufficient portion of his personal estate in the public funds to produce an income of £2 a week, to be paid by them to his son J. for life. After J.'s death the sum so invested was to fall into and become part of the testator's personal estate. After dividing freehold and leasehold property among all his other children, the testator directed that, as soon as the youngest should attain twenty-one, the executors should divide the residue among all his children except J. equally. In like manner, he directed, on the decease of J. that the sum to be invested to produce and pay his annuity of £2 a week, should be divided unto and among all his other children who should be then living, or the issue of such of them as might be dead, share and share alike. The testator's residuary personal estate, when invested, was not sufficient to produce an income equal to the annuity given to J.

Held: the annuitant was entitled to have the deficiency raised from time to time, by the sale of part of the capital of the fund invested for the purpose of paying the annuity.

Appeal from a decision of KINDERSLEY, V.-C., upon the construction of a will.

D The testator, William Wright, after giving a pecuniary legacy, and directing his debts and funeral and testamentary expenses to be paid out of his personal estate, directed his executors to get in such personal estate, and to stand possessed thereof, upon trust to invest a sufficient portion thereof in the public funds of Great Britain, or upon other government securities, to produce an income of £2 a week, to be paid by his executors to his son James Wright, during the term of his natural life, to and for his own use and benefit, for his support and maintenance; the said annuity to be in bar and satisfaction of all claim, right, or title to the testator's real and personal estate, or any part thereof; and from and after the decease of his said son James, the sum so invested to fall into and become part of the residue of the testator's said personal estate. The testator then, after a recital in his will that he was seised and possessed of certain freehold and leasehold estates particularly mentioned, gave the same, in certain specified shares, to his other children, Thomas, Isaac, Rebecca, F and Hannah, absolutely, at the age of twenty-one respectively; and he added :

G "And whereas, when and as soon as the youngest of my said children shall attain that age, upon trust that my said executors do and shall pay and divide my said residuary estate (all of such parts of which as do not already consist of public stocks, funds, and securities, I direct may in the meantime be invested in the public funds or on government securities), after deducting the several payments aforesaid, and all due allowances to my said executors, unto and amongst all and every my said children, except my said son, James Wright, share and share alike, to and for their own absolute use and benefit, and in like manner I direct, that, upon the decease of my said son James, the sum to be invested to produce and pay his annuity of £2 a week, shall be divided H unto and amongst all my other children who shall be then living, or the issue of such of them as may be dead, share and share alike."

I The testator died on July 20, 1841, and his executors proved the will, paid the debts and funeral and testamentary expenses, and the pecuniary legacy. They then invested the whole of the testator's residuary personal estate in the purchase of £2,200 17s. 6d. three per cent. consolidated bank annuities; the dividends of the stock were regularly applied in payment of the annuity of £2 a week to the testator's son James, until January, 1852, the executors from time to time making up the deficiency of such dividends by payment of the annuity out of the capital. The executors then refused to pay more in respect of the annuity than the dividends of the £2,200 17s. 6d. whereupon the testator's son James filed this claim, praying that a sufficient sum might be set apart out of the personal estate of the testator, and invested in the public funds, or upon government securities pursuant to the terms of the will; or otherwise to have the annuity valued, and the sum at which the same should be valued paid to the annuitant out of the testator's personal estate. A

The claim came on to be heard before KINDERSLEY, V.-C., who was of opinion that there was not a specific gift of the annuity charged upon the whole personal estate of the testator, since the fund upon which it was secured was given over, on the death of the annuitant, to a different class of persons to those entitled to the residue. His Honour, therefore, held that the testator's son James was only entitled to be paid the annual dividends of the fund arising from the investment of the testator's residuary personal estate. From this decision the plaintiff appealed. B

LORD CRANWORTH, L.C.—I cannot but feel doubtful when expressing an opinion differing from that of KINDERSLEY, V.-C., but it is not to be wondered at that different minds should arrive at different conclusions upon the construction of a will so obscurely worded as this is. C

The view which I take is this. By the will the testator has in effect given an annuity of £104 per annum to his son James, and has directed that the annuity should be secured by means of a fund to be set apart, out of which it should be paid. The testator at his death did not leave sufficient assets to raise a fund out of the dividends of which the full annuity could be paid. The question is, What is to be done under the circumstances? It has hardly been attempted to be controverted, that if the fund had merely been directed to fall into the residue, the annuitant would be entitled to the annuity in full. The vice-chancellor, however, has proceeded upon this distinction, that according to the true construction of the will, the fund to be appropriated to secure the annuity, though directed by the will to fall into the residue of the testator's estate, is by a subsequent clause of the will given to a different class of persons from those who are to have the residue. D

Whether that is the proper construction to be put upon the will, I do not think it material to decide. I am disposed, however, to think that it is. But what then? The testator intended £104 a year to be paid to James, and gives him that annuity. How is the case varied by his saying that after the death of the annuitant the fund set apart to answer the annuity is given over? If there had been anything in the terms of that gift over, showing that the testator intended the fund to be continued in its integrity during the life of the annuitant, and in that state to go over, the argument might be well founded. But the direction to set apart the fund does not denote the object of the testator, but merely the means by which that object was to be secured. E F G

I do not see any substantial distinction between this case and May v. Bennett (1). There, as in the case before the Court, the question arose between the annuitant and the residuary legatee. The testator in that case having directed his executors to lay out in what government security they pleased, as much money as would produce £54 12s. per year, and having given that annual interest to his wife during her life in case she did not marry again, the executors invested in the £5 per cents. a sum which yielded dividends exactly equal to the specified income. Eighteen years afterwards those dividends were diminished by the conversion of the £5 per cents. into £4 per cents., and became therefore insufficient to meet the annuity. LORD GIFFORD held that the setting apart the fund was only a means to the end, and that if that means failed the intention was that the actual amount of the annuity should be made up out of the other assets. What LORD GIFFORD, M.R., said was this (1 Russ. at p. 373): H I

"If there is any difficulty in making good the difference out of the general estate of the testator, she must have the deficiency raised from time to time by the sale of parts of the appropriated stock."

That is, in my opinion, the equity and the only equity which the annuitant has. For I see no principle in saying that where the question is between the annuitant

A and those entitled to the residuary estate, the annuitant is entitled to have the annuity valued and to be paid the amount of the valuation in respect of his annuity. In all the cases which have been cited in support of that view, the question has arisen between the annuitant and pecuniary legatees, and not between the annuitant and the residuary legatee. But as between an annuitant and pecuniary legatees the court holds that there must be an abatement pari passu in case of deficiency of assets, and knows of no other way of dealing with the subject, or of making the requisite abatement than by means of a valuation.

B No such question arises here, where all that can be asked is payment of the annuity, and an investment of the fund by way of security, and in the event of the dividends of that fund being insufficient to meet the annual payments in respect of the annuity, then to have the deficiency made good from time to time, either
C by a sale of portions of the appropriated stock, or out of any other part of the residue which could be made available. It may happen certainly that by this means the whole appropriated fund would in the end be exhausted if the annuitant lived long enough. In that case the annuitant would be in the situation of any other person to whom a testator bequeaths a benefit without leaving assets to provide for it.

D KNIGHT-BRUCE, L.J.—It is sufficient to show this to be a case of difficulty, that LORD CRANWORTH, L.J., and KINDERSLEY, V.-C., differ in their views of it. In electing between the two constructions that have been put upon the language of the will before us, my conclusion is in conformity with the judgment which has just been pronounced. The opinion formed by me when I first read the will has continued unchanged during the argument; it is that the plaintiff is entitled to have
E the will read as if he had been named in it simply and merely as a legatee of an annuity of £2 per week for life. I am certainly not disposed at present to direct that the annuity should be valued, or to do more than allow the annuitant from time to time to break into the capital of the appropriated fund for the purpose of making good any deficiency in the dividends to pay his annuity. If the parties
F cannot agree upon the mode of raising the deficiency, the case may be again mentioned to the court.

[The order ultimately made declared that the plaintiff was entitled to be paid his annuity in full, and to have the arrears then due, as well as any deficiency in the dividends of the appropriated fund to meet the future payments, raised by sale from time to time of part of the capital of such fund.]

Easement—Right of way—Assignment—Need for right to be for the benefit and enjoyment of land granted.

A grant of a right of way "for all purposes" to A. and the occupiers for the time being of certain land over a road in a close occupied by B. was interpreted by the court on its true construction as extending to using the road for purposes other than those connected with the enjoyment of the land.

Held: the right purported to be granted, not being connected with the occupation of the land, could not be annexed to or incident to it, and so was incapable of assignment.

Demurrer in an action of trespass, for breaking and entering a close of the plaintiff in the parish of Bradford, in the county of York (describing it by abutments), and by feet and walking, and with horses, carts, and carriages, damaging and spoiling the grass, etc.

The defendants, in their plea, stated that long before and at the time of committing the alleged trespasses in the declaration mentioned, and at the time of making the release and grant hereafter mentioned, there was and henceforth hitherto has been and still is, and at the several times was in and upon the said close, in which, etc., a certain road, running between another road, called the Bradford turnpike road, and a lane, called Lagrane Lane; and that long before and at the time of making the indenture of release and grant hereafter mentioned, to wit, on Sept. 27, 1837, one E. C. Lister was seised in his demesne as of fee, as well of the soil of the road in this plea first mentioned as of and in the close in which, etc., and that before the time of committing the trespasses the said E. C. Lister was also seised in his demesne as of fee of and in the lands, tenements, and hereditaments and premises hereinafter next named, and being so seised in, etc., he, by lease and release, conveyed to John Smith and his heirs, to the use of him and his heirs and assigns for ever, a certain close and plots and parcels of land; and the said E. C. Lister did in and by the said last-mentioned indenture grant to the said John Smith, his heirs and assigns, that he and they respectively, being owners and occupiers for the time being of the said closes, so released as aforesaid, and all other persons having occasion to resort thereto, should have the right and privilege of passing and re-passing with or without horses, cattle, carts, and carriages, for all purposes, in, over, along, and through a certain road running between the Bradford turnpike road and Lagrane Lane, or in, over, and through some other road in the same direction, formed by and at the expense of the said plaintiff, his heirs and assigns, such other road, nevertheless, passing the said last corner of the said villas of the said plaintiff, he, the said J. Smith, his heirs, and assigns, paying to the said plaintiff, his heirs, and assigns, a proportional part of such expense of repairing the said road, according to the use thereof by him or them, not exceeding the actual damage done to the road by the wear and tear thereof by the said J. Smith, his heirs and assigns.

The plea then deduced a title in Samuel Smith, who had a life interest in one moiety of the lands and tenements, hereditaments, and appurtenances, and in Thomas Smith, to an estate in fee in the other moiety thereof, and alleged possession before and at the material time. And the said defendants, being so seised as owners as aforesaid, and being in and having such possession and occupation as aforesaid, and having occasion for their own purposes to use the road, or privilege in that behalf, granted and conveyed in and by the indenture of release and grant in such plea first mentioned, did on foot, and with their horses, etc., at the said several times, etc., pass and re-pass, for the purposes of them, the defendants, in, over, and along, and through the road in this plea first mentioned, so being, as aforesaid, in and upon the said close, in which, etc., as they lawfully might.

The plaintiff prayed over of the deed, which was a deed between the plaintiff of the first part, Richard Tolson of the second part, E. C. Lister (to whom the plaintiff had mortgaged the premises) of the third part, Samuel Smith and Thomas Smith of the fourth part, and John Smith of the fifth part. The plaintiff was the mortgagor, and, as well as Lister, was made a conveying, granting, and covenanting party, and that is the reason why it is stated in the plea that the plaintiff granted the privilege mentioned that the plea set up as an answer to the action. Then he set out the deed on oyer, and demurred, assigning for causes, among others, that the plea did not show that the trespasses justified were committed in going to or from the premises conveyed, or that they were in any way connected with the enjoyment of such premises. Joinder in demurrer. A

Tomlinson, for the plaintiff, supported the demurrer.

T. F. Ellis for the defendants. B

June 24, 1850. CRESSWELL, J., delivered the following judgment of the court, in which, after stating the pleadings as above, he proceeded.—In support of the demurrer it was contended, first, that the way granted was only for purposes connected with the occupation of the land conveyed, and, therefore, was not sufficient to support the justification pleaded; and, secondly, if the grant gave to the grantee a right of using the road for all purposes, although they might not be in any way connected with the enjoyment of the land, it would not pass to the assignee of the land, and, therefore, that the defendant could not claim as under a conveyance of the land with the appurtenances. On the other hand, it was contended that the right of way created by the deed might be assigned by deed together with the land, and was ample enough to maintain the justification pleaded. C

Upon consideration, we have come to the conclusion that the plaintiff is entitled to our judgment on the demurrer. If the right corresponding with the deed set out was only to use the road in question for purposes connected with the occupation and enjoyment of the land conveyed, it does not justify the acts confessed by the plea; but if the grant was more ample, and extended to using the road for purposes other than purposes connected with the enjoyment of the land, and this, we think, is the true construction of it, it becomes unnecessary to decide whether the assignee of the land and appurtenances would be entitled to it. In Keppel v. Bailey (1), the subject of covenants running with the land was fully considered by LORD BROUGHAM, L.C., and the leading cases on the subject are collected in his judgment. He there says (2 My. & K. at p. 537): D

"The covenant [that is, such as will run with the land] must be of such a nature as 'to inhere with the land,' to use the language of some cases; or 'it must concern the demised premises, and the mode of occupying them,' as is laid down in others: 'it must be quodam modo annexed and appurtenant to them,' as one authority has it; or, as another says, 'it must both concern the thing demised and tend to support it and support the reversioner's estate.'" E

The privilege or right in question does not inhere to the land; it does not concern the premises conveyed or the mode of occupying them. It is not appurtenant to them. A covenant, therefore, that such a right should be enjoyed, would not run with the land. Upon the same principle, it appears to us that such a right, unconnected with the enjoyment or occupation of the land, cannot be annexed to and incident to it; nor can it, while appendant to the house or land, be conveyed away or enjoyed in gross, for no one can have such a way but he who has the land to which it is appendant. BROOKE'S ABRIDGEMENT, "Grant," 130. If a way is granted in gross it is personal only, and cannot be assigned. So common in gross sans nombre may be granted, but cannot be granted over: per TREBY, C.J., in Weekly v. Wildman (2). It is not in the power of the vendor to create any rights not connected with the use or enjoyment of the land and annexed to it, nor can the owner of the land render it subject to a new species of burthen, so as to bind it in the hands of an assignee. "Incidents of a novel kind cannot be devised and attached to property at the fancy or caprice of any owner": per LORD BROUGHAM in Keppel v. Bailey (1). G

The principle is sufficient to dispose of the present case. It would be a novel incident annexed to the land that the owner and occupier should, for purposes H

A wholly unconnected with the land, and merely because he is owner and occupier, have a right of road over other land, and it seems to us that a grant of such a privilege or easement can no more be annexed, so as to pass with the land, than a covenant for any collateral matter.

The defendants, therefore, as assignees, cannot avail themselves of the grant to John Smith, and our judgment must be for the plaintiff.

Judgment for plaintiff.

Contract—Breach—Damages—Liquidated damages or penalty—Sum fixed for breach of agreement—Damage provided against uncertain.

Where a contract contains a provision for the payment of a specified sum for the breach of a covenant or covenants therein and the damage provided against is altogether uncertain the sum specified is to be taken as liquidated damages.

Contract—Illegality—Restraint of trade—Restraint on exercise of profession—Solicitor—Covenant not to practice within specified distance, nor solicit clients of covenantee—Breach—Liquidated damages.

By a deed for the dissolution of partnership between the plaintiff and the defendant the defendant covenanted that he would not at any time thereafter within the next seven years, either by himself or in co-partnership with another, carry on the business of an attorney or solicitor within a distance of fifty miles from a named place, nor interfere with, solicit, or influence the clients of the late co-partnership, and that, if he should in any respect infringe that covenant, he should immediately thereon pay to the plaintiff the sum of £1,000, as and for liquidated damages, and not by way of penalty:

Held: on the construction of this covenant this sum of £1,000 was to be considered as liquidated damages and not as a penalty.

Application by the defendant for a rule nisi to set aside a verdict for the plaintiff given by POLLOCK, C.B., and a jury and enter a nonsuit, in an action on a covenant.

The deed for the dissolution of a co-partnership between the plaintiff and the defendant as attorneys and solicitors, dated June 19, 1841, contained the following covenant and proviso :

"And the said John Strutt doth hereby covenant, promise, and agree to and with the said John Galsworthy, that . . . John Strutt shall not nor will, at any time or times hereafter within the next seven years, directly or indirectly, either by himself or in co-partnership with another or others, carry on the said practice, profession, or business of an attorney or solicitor within the distance of fifty miles from Ely Place aforesaid, (save as hereinafter mentioned), nor interfere with, solicit, or influence the clients of the said late co-partnership; and if . . . John Strutt shall in any respect infringe the present covenant, then and in such case he . . . shall immediately thereupon pay to the said John Galsworthy, his executors, or administrators, the sum of £1,000, as and for liquidated damages, and not by way of penalty : provided always, nevertheless, that . . . John Strutt shall not be prevented from transacting any matter of business, or being concerned for any person or persons, not being a client or clients of the said co-partnership, and upon his remaining properly qualified as an attorney and solicitor, through or by means of the said John Galsworthy as his agent, upon the usual terms, and upon the like charges and costs as are usually paid and allowed by attorneys and solicitors to their agents."

The declaration contained an averment of general performance on the part of the plaintiff, and concluded that the defendant, after the making of the indenture, and before the commencement of the suit, on various occasions within seven years following the date of the indenture, and before the commencement of the suit, carried on the practice, profession, or business of an attorney or solicitor within the distance of fifty miles from Ely Place namely, in Westminster, otherwise than through or by means of the plaintiff, as the defendant's agent; and that, although the defendant had infringed his covenant, he had not paid the sum of £1,000. To this breach the defendant pleaded payment into court of £50. The plaintiff replied damages ultra, and on this replication issue was joined.

At the trial before POLLOCK, C.B., no evidence was offered by either party, but it was contended by the plaintiff that by the terms of the deed he was entitled to the full sum of £1,000 therein specified. A verdict by consent was thereon entered for the plaintiff for £950, leave being reserved to the defendant to move to enter a nonsuit.

Jervis, Q.C., for the defendant, moved for a nonsuit.—The simple question is, whether, on the true construction of this covenant, the sum of £1,000 mentioned in it is to be taken as a penalty, or by way of liquidated damages. The defendant contends for the former construction, as being the correct one.

PARKE, B.—I entertain no doubt in the present case that the rule ought to be refused. It is an action brought on a covenant to pay one sum of £1,000, on the result of each of several events, one of which is that the defendant should set up in business or practise as an attorney within fifty miles of Ely Place, at any time or times within the space of seven years. Another event is that he should at any time interfere with or solicit the clients of the late co-partnership. Then follows the stipulation that the defendant should, in either of those cases, pay one sum of £1,000.

- A I take it to be clear that, on the true construction of this covenant, the defendant would not be bound to pay more than £1,000, that is, in case he should violate either of those two or three matters mentioned in the covenant. These matters are each of them incapable of exact estimation. It cannot be said what damage a person may sustain by another setting up in business within a limited period of time or distance, nor how much he may be injured by the loss of one of his clients.
- B The loss may be either great or small and, therefore, in order to avoid all dispute, the parties are content to fix a certain sum, namely, the sum they have mentioned in express terms in their agreement.

There is much good sense in what LORD MANSFIELD said in Lowe v. Peers (1) (4 Burr. at pp. 2228-9):

- C "And upon this distinction they proceed in courts of equity. They will relieve against a penalty upon a compensation. But where the covenant is to pay a particular liquidated sum, a court of equity cannot make a new covenant for a man; nor is there any room for compensation or relief. As in leases containing a covenant against plowing up meadow, if the covenant be 'not to plow,' and there be a penalty, a court of equity will relieve against the penalty, or will go even farther than that (to preserve the substance of the agreement): but if it is worded, 'to pay £5 an acre for every acre plowed up,' there is no alternative, no room for any relief against it, no compensation; it is the substance of the agreement. Here the specified sum of £1,000 is found in damages. It is the particular liquidated sum fixed and agreed upon between the parties, and is, therefore, the proper quantum of the damages. . . . It is, therefore,
- D clear, that where the precise sum is not the essence of the agreement, the quantum of the damages may be assessed by the jury; but where the precise sum is fixed and agreed upon between the parties, that very sum is the ascertained damage, and the jury are confined to it."

- E It is perfectly competent to parties to make a stipulation to pay a fixed sum for the breach of a covenant, the damage arising from which it is extremely difficult to ascertain; and I think that it is not an unreasonable stipulation which the defendant has made, that he should pay £1,000 in the event of either of the matters mentioned in this agreement.

- F It is said, however, that we are bound by the law, as laid down in Kemble v. Farren (2), to hold that where a sum is to be paid on the event of several different matters, to none of which the sum mentioned is precisely fixed, the sum is to be taken as a penalty, and the words "liquidated damages" are to be rejected. We have certainly always abided by the doctrine there laid down and I do not think it interferes with our opinion in the present case. TINDAL, C.J., in delivering the judgment of the court in that case says (6 Bing. at pp. 147, 148):

- G "It is undoubtedly difficult to suppose any words more precise or explicit than those used in the agreement, the same declaring not only affirmatively that the sum of £1,000 should be taken as liquidated damages, but negatively also, that it should not be considered as a penalty, or in the nature thereof; and if the clause had been limited to breaches which were of an uncertain nature and amount, we should have thought it would have had the effect of ascertaining the damages upon any such breach at £1,000. . . . In many cases such an agreement fixes that which is almost impossible to be accurately ascertained; and in all cases it saves the expense and difficulty of bringing witnesses to that point. But in the present case the clause is not so confined; it extends to the breach of any stipulation by either party. If, therefore, on the one hand, the plaintiff had neglected to make a single payment of £3 6s. 8d. per day; or, on the other hand, the defendant had refused to conform to any usual regulation of the theatre, however minute or unimportant, it must have been concluded that the clause in question in either case would have given the stipulated damages of £1,000. But that a very large sum should become immediately payable, in consequence of the non-payment of a very small sum, and that the former should not be considered as a penalty, appears to be a contradiction in terms." A

He then afterwards says (ibid. at p. 148):

"It has been argued at the Bar that the liquidated damages apply to those breaches of the agreement only which are in their nature uncertain, leaving those which are certain to a distinct remedy by the verdict of a jury. But we can only say, if such is the intention of the parties, they have not expressed it; but have made the clause relate, by express and positive terms, to all breaches of every kind. We cannot, therefore, distinguish this case, in principle, from that of Astley v. Weldon (3)." B

I take that to be the correct exposition of the rule. It would be competent for the parties to make a stipulation to pay a certain sum on the non-performance of a covenant to pay a smaller sum but they must do so in express terms; and if that be done, I do not see how the courts can avoid giving effect to such a contract. The rule is correctly laid down in Kemble v. Farren (2); and I said in Horner v. Flintoff (4) and Beckham v. Drake (5), that we were bound by that decision. In the more recent case, Green v. Price (6) I said (13 M. & W. at p. 701): C

"The principle is, that, although the parties may have used the term 'liquidated damages,' yet if the court can see, upon the whole of the instrument taken together, that there was no intention that the entire sum should be paid absolutely on non-performance of any of the stipulations of the deed, they will reject the words, and consider it as being in the nature of a penalty only." D

"But where the damage is altogether uncertain, and yet a definite sum of money is expressly made payable in respect of it, by way of liquidated damages, those words must be read in their ordinary sense, and cannot be construed to import a penalty." F

The law is correctly laid down in that case.

Here a sum of money is to be paid by the defendant for setting up in business within certain limits and within a certain time. The damage incurred may be very different, according to the time when the defendant sets up in business, whether it be near the beginning or end of the time. Parties are bound by their contracts, if those contracts be clearly made. It is clear that the defendant stipulated to pay £1,000 for the breach of any one of the conditions mentioned; and they are such that the damage arising from the violation of any of them cannot be exactly estimated beforehand. It is entirely a question of construction, and for the court to ascertain the intention of the parties and the meaning of the words they have used. G

ALDERSON, B.—I am of the same opinion. It seems to me that on looking at the several cases which have been decided on this subject, the rule is clear, although perhaps it may not have been so distinctly expressed as could be wished. It is entirely a question of construction. The rule seems to be that where there are many and different stipulations in an agreement, the breach of any of which gives rise to a definite amount of damage, and for which a disproportionate sum is annexed, it is not reasonable to hold that the parties intended the whole amount to be paid. In Kemble v. Farren (2), it was not reasonable to suppose that the parties intended that £1,000 should be paid on the non-payment of £3 6s. 8d. only. So in Beckham v. Drake (5), it was not reasonable to infer that the amount assigned as liquidated damage should be awarded for a breach of covenant of which the actual amount, as apparent on the face of the instrument itself, was only £3 3s.; and, therefore, the court, in that case, construed the sum to be a penalty and not liquidated damages. H

Where, however, the damage cannot be ascertained, what absurdity is there in a party saying there shall be a fixed sum? Therefore, in such case, the courts I

A may give the words their plain and ordinary meaning. The amount of damage which a person might sustain by another's practising within fifty miles for the period of seven years, would not be the same in amount as if he were to practise within forty miles or next door, nor the same if he had set up in business in the first, second, or sixth year. In one case the damages might be small, and in the other large; but the parties have agreed to a certain fixed sum in order to prevent the necessity of being at the expense of procuring the attendance of witnesses for the purpose of giving evidence on those matters.

B If, in Kemble v. Farren (2), it had been stipulated that for the breach by the non-payment of the agreed amount, there should be £1,000 paid as liquidated damages, I am not prepared to say that the party would not have been bound to that precise sum. Green v. Price (6), which was followed by Rawlinson v. Clarke C (7), in which the same principle was acted on, is not distinguishable from the present.

PLATT, B.—I am of the same opinion; and I concur with PARKE, B., in the limitations he has applied to this case. If all the damages are uncertain and general, there is no reason to alter the distinct words of the contract entered into D by the parties. Here it is clear that the covenant, on the breach of which this sum is to be paid, was to protect the plaintiff's business from the interference of the defendant. It is clear that such is the substance of the intention of the parties; and it was, therefore, agreed that in the event of any one of the acts stipulated against being done by the defendant, then he should be liable to pay the sum of £1,000 as liquidated damages. I am unable to distinguish this case from Rawlinson v. Clarke E (7). I think, therefore, that the sum recovered was right, and that there ought to be no rule.

POLLOCK, C.B.—I entirely agree with the rest of the court. I think that this matter has already been decided. Kemble v. Farren (2) is a direct authority that where the injury provided against is altogether uncertain, the sum specified F is to be taken as liquidated damages. The rule is correctly laid down by TINDAL, C.J., in that case; and I think that the present falls entirely within the principle there laid down. I concur with the rest of the court in thinking that there ought to be no rule.

Rule refused.

Shipping—Stoppage in transitu—Bill of lading—Transfer—Bona fide transferee—Title to cargo—Right of unpaid vendor of cargo to stop in transitu.

The bona fide transferee for value of a bill of lading endorsed by the shipper or his consignee and put into circulation by the authority of the shipper or his consignee has an absolute title to the cargo free from the equitable right of the unpaid vendor to stop in transitu as against the purchaser.

Case Stated in an action of trover for a cargo of wheat. Pleas, not guilty and not possessed. At the trial before LORD CAMPBELL, C.J., a verdict was found for the plaintiffs, with damages £3,725, subject to the opinion of the court on a Case.

The plaintiffs, during the transactions hereinafter mentioned, carried on business in London, under the firm of Overend, Gurney & Co., as money-dealers; and it was part of their usual business to make advances to merchants and others on the security of bills of lading and other documents representing value. The defendants were at the same time merchants at Dantzic, carrying on business under the firm of T. Behrend & Co. Coventry & Sheppard were at the same time corn-factors in the city of London. The plaintiffs had, for a considerable time previously to Jan. 8, 1853, been in the habit of making advances to Coventry & Sheppard, on the security of bills of lading of cargoes of corn; and the course of business generally

A adopted with reference to those advances, was for Coventry & Sheppard to submit to the plaintiffs, for approval, a note of the securities together with the securities themselves on which the advance was required; and, if approved by the plaintiffs, the advance was made, the plaintiffs calculating from the value of the cargo, as appearing from the bill of lading, the sum they could prudently advance on the proposed security. The defendants were the shippers of the wheat. (A copy of the bill of lading was inserted in the Case, but there was nothing special in the terms of it.) On the approval by the plaintiffs of the bill of lading so handed to them as aforesaid, they advanced to Coventry and Sheppard the sum of £3,400, and obtained from them an acknowledgment or borrowed note, as they were in the habit of doing on like occasions. The money was paid by the plaintiffs' cheque on Jan. 8 in favour of Coventry & Sheppard. The advance was made by the plaintiffs on the bill of lading in the ordinary course of their business, and was such as they had been in the habit of making to Coventry & Sheppard. The plaintiffs had ever since held the bill of lading as a security for their advance. The Ernte arrived in the Thames on Feb. 2, 1853, when the wheat was taken possession of in the ship by the defendants before any other person had taken possession of it; they paid the freight, obtained delivery from the captain, and kept the wheat and refused to deliver it up to the plaintiffs—which was the conversion complained of.

Mr. Robert Ferdinand Pries was, for some years previously to and during the transactions hereinafter mentioned, a corn-merchant in a very large way of business in London, in the habit of receiving large shipments of wheat from abroad, and was in good credit down to the evening of Jan. 8, 1853, when he was arrested on a criminal charge not connected with the bill of lading in question. He never resumed business, and was shortly afterwards made bankrupt. Coventry & Sheppard had been employed for many years by Pries as his factors, and as such had very large transactions with him, and were in the habit, in the usual way of their business, of making him advances from time to time on receiving bills of lading deposited at the time, or on his promise to deposit further bills of lading of expected cargoes when they arrived. The cargoes, as they came forward, were from time to time disposed of by them, and the proceeds were placed to Pries's credit less commission and expenses. Coventry & Sheppard were in the habit, on receiving the bills of lading, of getting advances from the plaintiffs on deposit.

On Nov. 26, 1852, Coventry & Sheppard were promised by Pries bills of lading of the Johannes and the Diana, and on that day they advanced £3,000. On Dec. 16 they were promised the Kleine Marie, and thereupon advanced £3,000. On Dec. 20 G they were promised the bill of lading of the Martha, and thereupon advanced £3,500. On Dec. 22, 1852, Pries deposited with Coventry & Sheppard bills of lading of cargoes by the four vessels, viz., the Martha, Johannes, Diana, and Marie, covering about 2,800 quarters of corn, which had previously been promised on advances made, and stated that he expected a cargo of wheat from Dantzic by the Ernte, then in the course of shipment, and also five other cargoes by other vessels, and that Coventry & Sheppard should have the bills of lading of such wheat when they were received; and he then applied for a further advance. At the same time Pries handed to Coventry & Sheppard, in the usual way, a slip, stating the particulars of the cargo of the ship Ernte, for the purpose of their getting it assured, which they thereupon did.

On the faith of Pries's promise to deposit the said six bills of lading on arrival, I Coventry & Sheppard on Dec. 22, 1852, made him a further advance of £7,000. Between Dec. 22, 1852, and Jan. 8, 1853, Pries handed over to Coventry & Sheppard four of the bills of lading promised to them on Dec. 22, but not the Ernte's; and during that period he obtained further advances from Coventry & Sheppard to the amount of £49,300 on similar securities. On Jan. 8, 1853, Pries handed to Coventry & Sheppard the bill of lading of the Ernte, bearing the endorsement of the defendants as already set forth; and at the same time he applied for a further large advance, and thereupon obtained from Coventry & Sheppard a further advance of £600, they declining further to increase their advances without additional security.

Coventry & Sheppard on the same day (Jan. 8, 1853) took the bill of lading of the Ernte to the plaintiffs, and obtained from them the advance already mentioned. A

It appeared at the trial that Coventry & Sheppard's advances to Pries had not been paid, and that their securities had not been realised, and that it was uncertain whether they would realise enough to cover what was due to them by Pries. The cargo was bought of the defendants by E. Werthemann, a merchant of Amsterdam. Werthemann, in point of fact, bought the corn for Pries; but that fact was unknown to the defendants. They only knew Werthemann in the transaction, and payment of the price, at the rate of 40s. per quarter was to be made in the manner stated in the following letters. Collmann & Stolterfoht, mentioned in these letters, were a firm in a large way of business in London, as merchants and commission-agents, who had had very large dealings with Pries during the time he was in business. B

On Dec. 31, 1852, Werthemann wrote and sent the following letter to Collmann & Stolterfoht: C

"Messrs. Collmann & Stolterfoht, London.

Amsterdam, Dec. 31, 1852.

By order and for account of Mr. Robert F. Pries, I beg to inform you that I have opened a credit with your house in favour of Messrs. Th. Behrend & Co. for £10,000—Ten thousand pounds. I, therefore, request you to favour the drafts at 2 m—d. of said Dantzic friends for this amount against bills of lading of wheat at the rate of 40s. per quarter, and to debit Mr. Robert F. Pries for them. D E. WERTHEMANN."

On Jan. 4, 1853, the defendants forwarded the bill of lading of the Ernte to Collmann & Stolterfoht, in the following letter: E

Dantzic, Jan. 4, 1853.

According to instructions from Mr. E. Werthemann, Amsterdam, we have the pleasure of handing you enclosed bill of lading of 9,200 scheffels of wheat, with 200 bags and 700 mats, by the ship Ernte, Captain Zielcke, to that port, and request you to follow the instructions of said Amsterdam friend respecting these documents by whose order and for whose account we have today taken the liberty of valuing on you £3,418 2 m—d. R. Warschaw & Co., which drafts we recommend to your kind protection for account of Mr. E. Werthemann. F

TH. BEHREND & Co."

This letter was received by Collmann & Co. (with the bill of lading) on Jan. 7, and they replied to it on Jan. 8 by the following letter: G

"Messrs. Th. Behrend & Co., Dantzic.

London, Jan. 8, 1853.

"Your favour of 4th inst. came to hand with b.l. 9,200 scheffels of wheat, shipped by order of Mr. E. Werthemann in Amsterdam, to this port, per Ernte, Captain Zielcke, with which document we shall follow the orders of said friend. H

Your draft on us against this shipment, amounting to £3,418 2 m—d. will be promptly protected on presentation for account of Mr. E. Werthemann.

COLLMANN & STOLTERFOHT."

On the same day, Jan. 8 (a Saturday), the defendants' drafts for £3,418, drawn conformably to the letters, were left by the defendants' agents, Hambro' & Son of London, at the counting-house of Collmann & Stolterfoht for acceptance, according to the usual and ordinary custom in cases where bills of exchange are left for acceptance. On the morning of Monday, Jan. 10, in accordance with the custom in such cases, a clerk of Hambro' & Son called at the counting-house of Collmann & Stolterfoht for the bills of exchange, when they were handed to him dishonoured, and without even having been accepted. On the bills of exchange being returned to Hambro' & Son, dishonoured, on Monday, Jan. 10, they demanded of Collmann & Stolterfoht the return of the bill of lading also; but it was not then, or at any time I

A afterwards, returned to them, or to the defendants. It appeared in evidence at the trial that the bill of lading was in Collmann & Stolterfoht's possession on the morning of Saturday, Jan. 8. On Jan. 10 Coventry & Sheppard had notice from Collmann & Stolterfoht that they, Collman & Stolterfoht, claimed the bill of lading. On the same Jan. 10 Collmann & Stolterfoht stopped payment; Werthemann also stopped payment. The defendants had never been paid any part of the price of the wheat.

B The question for the opinion of the court was whether the plaintiffs were entitled in this action to recover the value of the wheat, less the freight and charges paid by the defendants. If they are, then the verdict was to stand for the plaintiffs for £3,725; otherwise a nonsuit or verdict for the defendants was to be entered, as the court might direct.

C Willes for the plaintiffs.
Bramwell for the defendants.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 3, 1854. LORD CAMPBELL, C.J., delivered the following judgment of the court.—We think that the only question in this case is whether the defendants had a right to stop in transitu the cargo of the Ernte on Feb. 2, when they took possession of it. We cannot doubt that, subject to the right of stopping in transitu, the property vested in the vendee when the cargo had been loaded at Dantzic and the endorsed bill of lading had been sent off by the defendants to Collmann & Stolterfoht; nor does there seem to us to be any ground for contending that the defendants afterwards continued in possession of the cargo. They had chartered the ship, that is, they had entered into a contract with the captain that he would carry the cargo in the ship from Dantzic to London; but the ship was not theirs, and he, the captain, was bailee of the cargo, and it was in the possession of the captain. There can be no lien without possession; and the claim of the defendants to lien, as unpaid vendors, is quite unsupportable. From such considerations the equitable right of an unpaid vendor to stop in transitu took its origin; this right would have been wholly unnecessary if the goods while in transitu could be considered in the possession of the vendor.

F Prima facie, the defendants had a right to stop the wheat on Feb. 2, for it was still in transitu, and they were unpaid vendors. The onus lies on the plaintiffs to prove that they had become the owners, and that the right to stop in transitu was gone. For this purpose it is not enough that they had become bona fide holders of the endorsed bill of lading for valuable consideration. A bill of lading is not, like a bill of exchange or promissory note, a negotiable instrument which passes by mere delivery to a bona fide transferee for valuable consideration, without regard to the title of the parties who make the transfer. Although the shipper may have endorsed in blank a bill of lading deliverable to his assigns, his right is not affected by the appropriation of it without his authority. If it be stolen from him or transferred without his authority, a subsequent bona fide transferee for value cannot make title under it against the shipper of the goods. The bill of lading only represents the goods; and in this instance the transfer of the symbol does not operate more than a transfer of what is represented.

H We are, therefore, to inquire whether this bill of lading is to be considered as having come into the possession of the plaintiffs before the stoppage in transitu with the authority of the defendants; and this depends entirely on whether Collmann & Stolterfoht had authority from the defendants to deliver it to Pries. We think it is as clear that Collmann & Stolterfoht delivered it to Pries, as that Pries delivered it to Coventry & Sheppard, and Coventry and Sheppard to the plaintiffs. But if this delivery to Pries was a misapplication of the bill of lading, the rights of the defendants will be the same as if it had remained in the hands of Pries or of Collmann & Stolterfoht until Feb. 2, in which case the stoppage in transitu would have been right.

I It is contended on the part of the defendants that Collmann & Stolterfoht had no authority to part with the bill of lading, until they had accepted the bill of exchange drawn for the price of the wheat. If this be so, they certainly exceeded their authority, for their promise to accept, which was not treated by the agent of the defendants as an acceptance, would not have been a performance of the condition on which the right to part with the bill of lading depended. The defendants might easily have imposed a condition if they suspected the solvency of the parties with whom they were dealing. But, looking to the correspondence set out in the Special Case, and to all the circumstances of the transaction, we are of opinion that no such condition was imposed, and that as soon as Collmann & Stolterfoht received the bill of lading, they were at liberty to hand it over to Pries so as to make the result the same as if by the bill of lading Pries had been the consignee, and the defendants had remitted it to him, and he had endorsed it before handing it over to Coventry & Sheppard. There was nothing on the bill of lading itself to indicate that it is not to be transferred until the bill of exchange has been accepted. In the defendant's letter of Jan. 4 no such condition is to be found; and on the contrary, they desire Collmann & Stolterfoht to follow the instructions of Werthemann respecting the bill of lading, Werthemann being the agent of Pries, and having purchased the cargo for him. They go on to say they have drawn a bill of exchange for the price, but merely recommend it to protection, without saying anything that can be construed as a direction that this protection shall be given before the instructions of Werthemann are followed respecting the bill of lading. There seems no reason to doubt that the defendants would have been perfectly satisfied with the answer written to them on Jan. 8, in which Collmann & Stolterfoht first say that they will follow the directions they had received respecting the bill of lading, and afterwards, in a separate sentence, add that they would protect the bill of exchange on presentation.

The circumstances in the transaction, instead of raising the supposed condition by implication, are rather inconsistent with it. While the bill of lading is forwarded to Collmann & Stolterfoht the bill of exchange is sent to Hambro' & Son. The bill of exchange happened to be left for acceptance on Jan. 8; but, ab initio, being dissevered from the bill of lading, it might have been negotiated at Dantzic and circulating over the north of Europe; it might not have been presented to the drawees for a month afterwards. Would Collmann & Stolterfoht be bound to keep the bill of lading in their hands during the whole of this time? On the contrary, we think that Pries, having lodged the credit according to his undertaking was immediately entitled to have the bill of lading delivered up to him on producing an order to that effect from Werthemann; and he could not be made to run the risk of a fall in the market in the interval elapsing before the bill was presented for acceptance.

If the language of the letter of Jan. 4 were equivocal, the construction to be put on it ought rather to be against the party who placed an endorsed bill of lading in the hands of third persons, and enabled them to deal with others as if they had complete control over it. But in this case we think the language of the defendants expressly and clearly authorises the unconditional transfer of the bill of lading to the purchaser. No decision or dictum was cited in the argument which at all conflicts with the view we have taken of this case, and we conceive that it is in entire conformity with the various decisions relied on by the plaintiffs. These we abstain from commenting on, as they appear to be in harmony with each other, and we entirely approve of them.

Ever since the great case of Lickbarrow v. Mason (1), the law has been considered to be that the bona fide transferee for value of a bill of lading endorsed by the shipper or his consignee, and put into circulation by the authority of the shipper or consignee, has an absolute title to the goods, free from the equitable right of the unpaid vendor to stop in transitu as against the purchaser. We believe it to be of essential importance to commerce that this law should be upheld—and for these reasons we give judgment for the plaintiffs.

Judgment for plaintiffs.

I Demurrer in an action for damages against the defendants for wrongfully and maliciously obstructing the plaintiff in his business of an omnibus proprietor.

By his declaration the plaintiff stated that, at the material time, he carried on the trade and business of a carrier of passengers for hire in certain public streets, roads and highways, between the Queen's Elms, Chelsea, in the county of Middlesex, and the White Lion Inn, in Clerkenwell, and also between the Rising Sun, Fulham, and the London Bridge railway, Southwark, by means of certain omnibuses of the plaintiff, drawn by horses, and driven and conducted by the servants of the plaintiff, for the profit and benefit of the plaintiff, and which omnibuses had full liberty and right to run between the points above mentioned, to stop for a reasonable time at all points and places on and along the said streets, roads and highways, for the purpose of taking up and putting down passengers, and at certain points and places where numerous passengers were accustomed to enter the omnibuses passing such points and places, the plaintiff's omnibuses and all other omnibuses passing that way were, by the police regulations then lawfully enforceable, permitted to wait for four minutes, to look for passengers, etc., unless by their so doing any actual obstruction of the thoroughfare, or nuisance to the inhabitants near the places, was caused thereby. A B

That the defendants well knowing the premises, but contriving and intending to injure, impoverish and ruin the plaintiff, and to prevent him from carrying on his business, at divers times before this suit, wrongfully, vexatiously and maliciously placed and drove, on the public streets, roads and highways aforesaid, certain other omnibuses and carriages just before and just behind the plaintiff's omnibuses, while the same were plying for passengers for hire, in the public streets, and with which the plaintiff was then carrying on his business, in such a manner as to hinder and prevent, frighten and deter great numbers of passengers from entering the plaintiff's omnibuses and becoming passengers therein for hire, as they otherwise might and would have done, and so as to hinder and prevent the plaintiff from having the free use of the said highways with his omnibuses and horses in so large and ample a manner as he otherwise might and would have done, and so as to retard, delay and stop the plaintiff's omnibuses, and so as greatly to obstruct and encumber the highway, to the nuisance of the Queen's subjects then lawfully using the same. C D

Further, that the defendants wrongfully, vexatiously and maliciously drove and placed, on the public streets, roads and highways, certain other carriages and omnibuses on and against the plaintiff's omnibuses and horses and on and against the plaintiff's servants then conducting the same, while the omnibuses, with the plaintiff's horses harnessed to the same, and the plaintiff's servants conducting the same, were plying and waiting for passengers for hire in the public streets, roads and highways aforesaid, and with which the plaintiff was then carrying on his business in such a manner as thereby to bruise, damage and injure the omnibuses and horses and to prevent the doors of the omnibuses from being opened, and to obstruct and block up the access of passengers into the plaintiff's omnibuses, and to hinder and disable the plaintiff's servants from freely and fully performing their duties to the plaintiff in the conduct and management of the omnibuses and whereby they were then so hindered and disabled as aforesaid. E F

Further, that the defendants also wrongfully, vexatiously and maliciously, in the public streets, roads and highways, thrust and pushed themselves, and caused their servants to, and they did, thrust and push and place themselves between the plaintiff's omnibuses while plying and waiting for passengers, in the way of the plaintiff's business and divers persons who were desirous to enter the same as passengers for hire, so as to obstruct the entrance and access of such passengers into the plaintiff's omnibuses, and to hinder, deter and prevent them from entering the same or becoming passengers therein or thereby. G H

Further, in continuation of this count, the plaintiff said that the defendants wrongfully, vexatiously and maliciously caused and directed their servants to, and their servants did, insult, hiss, assault, beat and ill-treat the plaintiff's servants in the public streets, roads and highways, while they were employed in driving, managing and conducting the omnibuses in the way of the plaintiff's business, and were plying and waiting for passengers in the public streets, roads and highways; and, further, that the defendants, well knowing the points and places on the respective roads at which the plaintiff's omnibuses, by the police regulation above mentioned, were permitted to remain for four minutes, wrongfully, vexatiously and maliciously, and for the express purpose of annoying the plaintiff, and causing such an obstruction of the thoroughfares at the points and places aforesaid, as would induce and oblige the police there stationed to order the plaintiff's omnibuses from the points and places for the said space of time which by the police regulations I

A they were permitted to remain, and thereby prevent passengers who, if the plaintiff's omnibuses had so remained, would have come and entered the plaintiff's omnibuses, from so doing, and caused one or more of their (defendants') omnibuses, drawn by their horses and driven and conducted by their drivers and conductors, to precede and follow each omnibus of the plaintiff, as such omnibus approached near to and arrived at each and all of the points and places as aforesaid, in such a manner as to cause such an obstruction to the thoroughfares at such points and places as would induce and oblige, and which did induce and oblige, the police there stationed to order that the plaintiff's omnibuses should move off from the said points and places as aforesaid, before they had remained there for the space of time which, but for the defendants' wrongful continuance and conduct, they otherwise might and would have done. Thereby the defendants prevented numerous passengers from entering and riding on the plaintiff's omnibuses for hire, as they otherwise might and would have done, by reason of which several grievances in this count respectively mentioned, great numbers of persons were hindered, deterred and prevented from becoming passengers for hire by the plaintiff's omnibuses, as they otherwise might and would have done; and the plaintiff's omnibuses and horses were greatly broken, injured, wasted and destroyed, and the plaintiff was greatly damaged, prejudiced, hindered and obstructed in carrying on his business in the public streets, roads and highways, and the receipts, gains and profits of the plaintiff in and by the business were much reduced and diminished, and the plaintiff was otherwise injured and damaged; and the plaintiff claimed £2,000. The defendants denied liability, and further said that the declaration was bad in substance. One of the matters of law intended to be argued was that the defendants were a corporation, and that the declaration disclosed no cause of action maintainable against a corporation; that a corporation could not be guilty of the malicious intention alleged in the declaration. As to the defendants' demurrer, the plaintiff contended that the declaration disclosed a good cause of action, for which the defendants were liable.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 18, 1859. ERLE, C.J., delivered the following judgment of the court.—
 G In this case we are of opinion that the judgment ought to be for the plaintiff.

This was an action brought against the defendants for interfering with the rights of the plaintiff, by driving their omnibuses in such a manner as to molest him in the use of the highway. The declaration sets out various grievances that fall under that general description. There is a demurrer to that declaration, and on that demurrer we are called on to give our opinion whether the action lies. The ground of the demurrer relied on by the defendants is that the charge is a charge of a wilful intentional wrong, and that a corporation cannot be guilty of a wilful, wrongful intention and, therefore, that the action does not lie. I should, however, state that the whole of the acts that are charged against the defendants are acts connected with the driving of their vehicles, and the object of this incorporation was for the purpose of driving omnibuses. It is the "London General Omnibus Co." incorporated for that purpose and, therefore, the actual things done by the defendants are acts within the purpose of their incorporation, and unless they had been wrongfully done, of course there could be no ground of complaint, but, they being wrongfully done, we think clearly the action lies, and that there is an abundance of authorities to show that under those circumstances the action would lie.

I take the whole tenor of authorities from Yarborough v. Bank of England (1) down to an action of defamation, viz., Whitfield v. South Eastern Rail. Co. (2)—in reality against the Electric Telegraph Co., for a wrong in the way of taking away character. I take the whole tenor of those authorities to show that an action for a wrong does lie against the corporation where the act of the corporation—the thing done—is within the purpose of the incorporation, and that it has been done in such a manner as to constitute what would be an actionable wrong if done by a private individual. A

The doctrine that was relied on by counsel for the defendants is rather more of a quaint than a substantial form, that, because a corporation has no soul, therefore it is incapable of intentional malice. The reason has been assigned; and we do not in the smallest degree interfere with the tenor of the decisions that have been uniformly established, but are only a little within the limits of the long tenor of authorities beginning with Yarborough v. Bank of England (1), that being by no means the first. It is a well-considered and elaborate judgment, going over all the authorities, and from Yarborough v. Bank of England (1), down to Whitfield v. South-Eastern Rail. Co. (2), there have been numerous authorities on the principle on which we rely. I add, in confirmation of that, that we dwell the less on the ground that counsel for the defendants so clearly pressed on us, from the inconvenience to the public that would arise if these companies incorporated for the purpose of trade, being in reality a partnership for the purpose of carrying on that trade, had a restricted limitation put on their liability by reason of incorporation; and extreme difficulty, it seems to me, would follow, if we were to hold they were exempted from being responsible because they intentionally wrong persons who were their fellow-subjects. We think it extremely important, if they do admit that they have in fact intentionally committed a wrong, that the public should have a remedy against them, and not have a remedy against their servants and others who they have employed, many of whom may be entirely incapable of giving the recompense that the law awards. We are, therefore, of opinion that the judgment of the court should be for the plaintiff. B C D E

A bailiff holding a warrant to distrain for arrears of rent has implied authority to receive rent and costs when tendered, notwithstanding that he has been expressly directed by the landlord not to receive them. H

Notes. As to how the right to distrain may be lost, see 12 HALSBURY'S LAWS (3rd Edn.) 118 et seq.; as to levying distress, see ibid., pp. 126 et seq; and for cases see 18 DIGEST (Repl.) 312 et seq. I

Application by the defendant for a rule nisi for a new trial, in an action of trover for goods and chattels in which the defendant pleaded that the plaintiff was tenant of the defendant Hale; that £5, half a year's rent, was in arrear; and that Hale in his own right, and Collins and Tickler, the other defendants, as his bailiffs, took the goods as a distress for rent due. Replication.—That after the taking and before the impounding of the distress the plaintiff made a tender of £5 3s. (the rent and costs of the distress) to the defendant, Collins, who was duly authorised to receive the same. Rejoinder.—That Collins was not duly authorised to receive the money. Issue thereon.

- D At the trial before ERLE, J., at Hampshire Assizes, it appeared that in November, 1849, £5, half a year's rent, was due from the plaintiff to the defendant Hale, and that Hale, through the medium of his attorney, employed Collins to distrain. The words of the warrant were, to distrain "for the arrears of rent, and to proceed for the recovery thereof as the law directs." The warrant was placed in the hands of Collins by Hale's attorney, who desired him on no account to receive the money if tendered, but to refer the plaintiff, or whoever tendered it, to Hatch or the attorney. After the distress was taken, but before it was impounded, the plaintiff tendered to Collins £5 3s. (the arrears of rent and the cost of the distress), which Collins declined to accept, referring him to Hatch or the attorney, neither of whom were present at the distress being taken. The judge directed the jury that the warrant given by Hale to Collins was an express authority to him to receive the rent as well as to distrain. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, and awarded £11 18s. damages.
- E if tendered, but to refer the plaintiff, or whoever tendered it, to Hatch or the attorney. After the distress was taken, but before it was impounded, the plaintiff tendered to Collins £5 3s. (the arrears of rent and the cost of the distress), which Collins declined to accept, referring him to Hatch or the attorney, neither of whom were present at the distress being taken. The judge directed the jury that the warrant given by Hale to Collins was an express authority to him to receive the rent as well as to distrain. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, and awarded £11 18s. damages.
- F £11 18s. damages.

Serjeant Kinglake now moved for a new trial on the ground of misdirection. A mere warrant to distrain is not of itself an authority to receive money, although under certain circumstances it may be evidence of it. (Pilkington's Case (2)). [ERLE, J.—That was a distress for damage feasant, where the bailiff might not know the amount of damage done.] A landlord may limit the authority of the bailiff to whom he delegates his powers. (Browne v. Powell (3); Smith v. Goodwin (1); Ladd v. Thomas (4)). Here the evidence was distinct that the authority was limited. Moffat v. Parsons (5), which was cited at the trial, cannot be supported, because any principal may disauthorise his general agent for some particular purpose. (Bingham v. Allport (6)).

- H LORD CAMPBELL, C.J.—I think there should be no rule. My own opinion is that the law which authorises a landlord to appoint a bailiff does not allow of the exercise of that power unless where the bailiff impliedly has authority to receive the rent if tendered. Such is a very reasonable state of the law with reference to the extraordinary powers and remedies which a landlord possesses, and there has been no authority cited which calls that state of the law in question. In this case, besides the general authority of the bailiff, there is the special authority "to proceed for the recovery of the rent as the law directs," so that the bailiff was clearly bound to accept a tender on the premises.
- I

PATTESON, J.—In Smith v. Goodwin (1), the contention was strong that the tender of rent under such circumstances must be to the broker by reason of the tender being insufficient, unless it included the broker's charges. We thought a tender to the landlord was also good, but it was never argued or suggested that the tender might not be to the broker. If a landlord takes the law into his own hands, and sends a bailiff to distrain, he necessarily gives him authority to receive the rent if tendered. A

WIGHTMAN, J.—The person whom the landlord employs as bailiff is virtute officii the person to receive the rent if tendered. The inconvenience of any other state of law would be so monstrous that it need hardly be pointed out. The old and wholesome rule, that a tender before distress taken makes the taking tortious, and after the taking, but before impounding, makes the detainer wrongful, might be evaded by the landlord forbidding the broker to accept the rent when tendered. B

ERLE, J., concurred.

Rule refused. C

TANCRED AND ANOTHER v. LEYLAND

Distress—For rent—Claim made for more rent than due—Legality of distress.

The defendant distrained the plaintiff's goods for arrears of rent which he claimed to be due. Only part of the amount alleged to be due was, in fact, due. In an action for wrongful distress,

Held: as some rent was due and an unreasonable quantity of goods had not been taken, the distress was not illegal and the action failed. F

Distress—For rent—Duty of landlord to inform tenant amount of rent for which distress made.

Per Curiam: There was no duty cast on a landlord at common law to inform the tenant what was the amount of rent for which a distress was made. G

Appeal by the defendants from a decision of the Court of Queen's Bench (LORD CAMPBELL, C.J., PATTESON, WIGHTMAN and ERLE, JJ.), reported 16 Q.B. 664, in an action for wrongful distress.

- E The declaration contained two counts. The first count of the declaration was in case, and alleged that whereas the plaintiff, before and at the time of the committing of the several grievances thereafter next mentioned, held a certain messuage and premises, with the appurtenances, as tenant thereof to the defendant, Charles Tancred, at a rent payable by the plaintiff to the defendant Charles Tancred.
- F The defendants, Tancred and Armitage had contrived to injure the plaintiff and had wrongfully and injuriously seized and taken in and upon the said messuage and premises divers goods and chattels of the plaintiff of the value of £80 as a distress for certain arrears of rent, amounting to £45, then claimed and pretended by the defendants to be due and in arrear to the defendant, Charles Tancred, for the said messuage and premises. The defendants under that pretence wrongfully sold
- G the goods and chattels as distress for the alleged arrears of rent, and the costs and charges of the said distress and of the appraisement and sale of the said goods and chattels. Whereas in fact at the time of the making the said distress, and during all the time aforesaid, a small part only, namely, £17 10s. of the said alleged arrears of rent so distrained was in arrear to the defendant, Charles Tancred, in respect of the said messuage and premises. The second count was in trover. To the first
- H count the defendants pleaded payment into court of 1s. and no damages ultra.

At the trial before ROLFE, B., at the York Assizes, 1850, the jury found for the plaintiff upon that issue, with £40 damages; and the judgment was that the plaintiff should recover the sum of £40 and £71 for his costs. Upon that judgment error was brought, and the following points for argument were stated: that the first count of the declaration disclosed no cause of action, for that no legal injury or damage was shown to have been sustained by the plaintiff below. The only cause of action alleged being that at the time of the making the distress the defendants said, or, in the terms of the declaration, pretended that more rent was due than was in fact due. It would be contended, therefore, that as the declaration admitted that a tenancy existed, and that at the time of the seizure and sale of the goods therein mentioned to have been distrained some rent was due, and that as it nowhere appeared that the said seizure was excessive as a distress, or that the goods so seized were sold for more than the amount admitted to be due, such distress, seizure, and sale were lawful acts. The declaration did not state that the act complained of, if, indeed, any act is complained of, was wilfully or maliciously done.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 1, 1851. PARKE, B., delivered the following judgment of the court. On the argument before us, it was contended that the first count in the declaration was bad, inasmuch as it disclosed no cause of action, as no legal injury was shown to have been committed by the plaintiff. The first count alleges as the cause of action: first, that the defendant took certain goods as a distress for certain arrears of rent then claimed and pretended by the defendant to be due to him, whereas part only of the rent was due; and, secondly, that they wrongfully sold the said goods as such distress for the alleged arrears of rent and costs. As some rent is admitted to have been due at the time of the distress, the distress itself was not a wrong to the plaintiff below. There is no allegation that an unreasonable quantity of goods were taken, such as to constitute an excessive distress; and the only question is whether the fact of the making of the distress for rent, some rent being due, is rendered illegal by being accompanied by a claim or pretence by the defendant that more was due than really was due, or by being followed by a sale of the goods distrained for, for these pretended arrears, in the manner described in the latter part of the first count.

It cannot be disputed that an untrue claim or pretence may give a cause of action, as all false and untrue statements may, if all the circumstances should concur in respect to it which are necessary to make a false representation actionable, and, amongst others, if it had been followed by any special damage; as if, for instance, the tenant had been prevented thereby from obtaining sureties to join in a replevin bond, some friends being ready to join in the bond to secure the true amount, who would not join in one to secure the amount claimed; nor can it be disputed, if a larger quantity of goods be taken than was sufficient to raise the amount of the rent in arrear and the legal costs, and had been subsequently sold, such excessive sale would have been illegal and actionable. But it is contended for the defendant that, putting the construction the most favourable to the plaintiff that can be put on the allegation in the first count as to the sale, it has really no such import.

We agree that every intendment is to be made for the plaintiff, and that the declaration is to be construed to contain a sufficient cause of action, after pleading over, if it be reasonably capable of such a construction; but we think this allegation cannot be reasonably so understood. The argument is simply that the goods distrained were sold for the said arrears and costs, that is, for the purpose of satisfying the said arrears and costs, not for a sum equal to the said arrears and costs, or as and for arrears due. There is no express or implied averment that more goods were sold than were necessary to raise the amount of the arrears actually due and costs, and all that need have been proved if that allegation had been traversed, was that he sold the goods seized for the purpose of paying the arrears, and consequently by the plea nothing more is admitted.

That being so, the only question is whether the simple fact of making the distress accompanied by an untrue claim or pretence that more was due than really was due, is actionable? It is said it is so at common law, and the argument, therefore, is founded on the supposition that the common law casts the duty on a landlord distraining to inform the tenant what is the arrear of rent for which he distrains. We think that the common law casts no such obligation on the distrainer. It has been expressly laid down:

"If the lord distrains for rent or services, he has no occasion to give notice to the tenant for what he distrains, for the tenant by intendment knows what things are in arrear for his land."

A That is cited from ROLLE'S ABRIDGEMENT, title "Distress" (S), 674, and the authority for this is the YEAR BOOK, 45 Edw. 3, 9, where the Chief Justice of the Common Pleas (FYNCHEDE, C.J.), in answer to an argument that the lord, on taking a distress, ought to give notice to the tenant what the cause of taking is, says:

B "It is not so, for the tenant is always held by common intendment to know what things are in arrear for his land, as rent and service"; and this is adopted by GILBERT, C.B., in his treatise on DISTRESSES (Edn., 1757), p. 48.

The defendant, however, relied on the decision on a similar question by the Court of Queen's Bench in Taylor v. Henniker (1), in which it was laid down that a distress under a pretence that more was due than really was due was unlawful in its inception, the sale being only a matter of aggravation. We do not think that case was well decided. We do not see on what legal principle it can be supported. No authority was cited in favour of the decision, and those above referred to in ROLLE'S ABRIDGEMENT and the YEAR BOOK were not brought before the court. Some nisi prius authorities which were cited were in favour of the defendant; that of LORD TENTERDEN in Avenell v. Croker (2), in particular; but that of LORD ABINGER, in Crowder v. Self (3) was not cited. We are not satisfied with the decision of the Queen's Bench, and, therefore, think it should be overruled. The judgment, therefore, in the present case must be reversed.

Appeal allowed.

Undue influence—Landlord and tenant—Lease—Lease granted by young woman on advice of father's executor—Fiduciary relationship—Lessees including son of executor—No independent legal advice.

H

A lease granted on the advice of a person standing in a fiduciary relationship to the lessees one of whom is the son of that person, the lessees having knowledge of the advice, should be set aside unless it be shown that the transaction was entirely proper. Where, therefore, a young woman who had just attained her majority, without professional advice and on the persuasion of a friend of her late father, who was the acting trustee under his will, and in whom she placed great confidence, granted a lease of mineral lands part of which were in possession and the other part in reversion, and the lessees afterwards took the adviser into partnership to work the mines, and the terms of the lease were disadvantageous to the lessor, the court set the lease aside and ordered the defendants to pay the costs of the suit.

Case referred to in argument:

Duke of Leeds v. Earl of Amherst (1846), 2 Ph. 117; 16 L.J.Ch. 5; 10 Jur. 956; 41 E.R. 886, L.C.; 21 Digest (Repl.) 451, 1539.

Bill praying that the lease of certain mineral lands granted by the plaintiff to the A defendants be set aside.

Elizabeth Grosvenor, the plaintiff, on the death of her father, became entitled in possession to a certain estate at Newchapel, in Staffordshire, and also became entitled for an estate of fee-simple in reversion, immediately expectant on the death of her mother, to a certain other estate in the same county. After her father's B death, and until the plaintiff attained her age of twenty-one years, which took place on April 30, 1856, the defendant, Henry Sherratt, as the acting trustee and executor of her father's will, managed the whole of the property and acted as her guardian in respect thereof. He also continued after she obtained her majority to advise her in all matters of business, and in particular with regard to the granting of the lease in question. Relying on his representations, and believing his statements as to the value of the mineral land to be correct, the plaintiff reluctantly consented C to grant a lease of the mines to the defendant, Thomas Sherratt, who was the son of Henry Sherratt, and who married one of the plaintiff's sisters, and the defendant
John Batteley (who was an uncle of the plaintiff).

On Mar. 15, 1857, the defendant Henry Sherratt informed the plaintiff that the draft lease was prepared, but the plaintiff alleged that she did not understand and did not read it. The engrossment of the lease was executed by her on the follow- D ing day. This lease, dated Mar. 18, 1857, was a demise by the plaintiff Elizabeth Grosvenor (then Elizabeth Wilshaw) to the defendants Thomas Sherratt and John Batteley, their executors, administrators and assigns, of the mines and minerals lying under that part of the property to which the grantor was entitled in possession, for the term of twenty-five years, and of the mines and minerals under that part of the property to which the grantor was entitled in reversion, for the term E of twenty-one years from the death of her mother, the tenant for life, the lessees paying for every ton of coal or cannel (allowing 120 lbs. to every cwt., and 22 cwt. to every ton) the sum of 8d., and for the other minerals raised the respective rates in the said lease mentioned; the minimum rent to be £200 per annum. The lease also contained a clause, giving the lessees power to determine the term of twenty-five years : F

“Provided always, and it is hereby agreed and declared between and by the said parties to these presents, that if the said lessees, their executors, administrators, or assigns, shall be desirous of determining the said term of twenty-five years hereby granted at the end of the second year, or of any subsequent year thereof, and of such their desire shall give to the said lessor, her heirs, or assigns, or her or their agent or steward, not less than twelve calendar months' G notice in writing previous to the end of such second or subsequent year thereof, and if the said lessees, their executors, administrators, or assigns, shall, at or before the expiration of such second or subsequent year, as the case may be, pay and discharge the several rents hereinbefore reserved, and which shall have become payable, and perform and fulfil the several covenants, conditions and agreements hereinbefore on their parts contained up to that time, then and in H such case at the end of such second or subsequent year as the case may be, the said term hereby granted shall cease and determine.”

A few weeks after the lease was granted the defendant, Henry Sherratt, entered into a partnership with the defendants Thomas Sherratt and John Batteley for working the mines, and they had continued in partnership ever since. On Oct. 21, I 1858, the plaintiff married her present husband. The bill which was filed on Mar. 23, 1859, alleged that the plaintiff had no separate solicitor or legal adviser on the occasion of the preparation or execution of the lease; that the lease contained many improper and unusual clauses to the disadvantage of the lessor, which ought not to have been inserted therein, and that many proper clauses were omitted, and that the lease was granted at an undervalue, inasmuch as much larger royalties and rents could have been obtained from other persons. The bill prayed that the lease might be set aside, and delivered up to be cancelled; that the defendants might be

A decreed to deliver up possession of the mines to the plaintiff; and for an account of the rents and profits made by the defendants in working the said mines. The defendants by their answer denied liability.

It appeared from the evidence in support of the plaintiff's case, that before the granting of the lease in question, the defendant Henry Sherratt personally, and through his son the defendant Thomas Sherratt, received two offers from the owners or managers of adjacent mines to take the mines at Newchapel and work them on very liberal terms. Mr. Andrew, one of such mineowners, stated in his affidavit that in answer to his offer Henry Sherratt replied that the plaintiff was under age, and that the mines could not be let until her majority, when his (Andrew's) firm would be allowed an opportunity of treating for them with other persons, but that no communication had been made by the defendant to him when the plaintiff attained her majority, and that no opportunity had ever been given his firm of treating for such mines, which they were very desirous of taking, and for which they could have afforded to give a liberal mine rent, and would have been willing to have paid a minimum rent of £400 per year, rather than have missed them. Mr. Andrew also stated that if the mines had been advertised to be let by tender or competition, as was usual in such cases, a higher mineral and minimum rent would readily have been obtained, and the mines would have been let on much more advantageous terms in favour of the lessor than those contained in the defendants' lease; that the proviso contained in the lease authorising the defendants to abandon the mines on giving twelve months' notice, was very unusual and unfair towards the lessor, inasmuch as it enabled the lessees to get all the top mines, and such as might be dry and worked with little expense, and leave the deeper mines which could not be worked without a much greater outlay.

Other mining agents also stated that they had applied for information respecting the mines, and had been willing to give higher rents than those reserved by the lease; that it was most unusual to allow twenty-two cwts. to the ton; that the provision for cesser of the twenty-five years' lease was most unfair and unusual, and that mining leases invariably contained a proviso against assigning or underletting, except with the consent of the lessor, but that no such proviso was contained in the lease in question. In answer to one of these applications for information the defendant T. Sherratt, on Aug. 9, 1854, wrote as follows :

"As to the mines under the Bent and Mrs. Litchfield's holding, the property is so secured as to prevent any party interfering for many years to come. In fact they cannot be let."

R. Palmer, Q.C., and Jessel for the plaintiff.
Lloyd, Q.C., and Southgate for the defendants.

SIR JOHN ROMILLY, M.R.—I entertain no doubt, after reading the evidence in this case, as to the decree I ought to make. The plaintiff, a young lady of twenty-two, was entitled in fee-simple to certain property in possession, and to certain other property in fee-simple in reversion. She was persuaded by Henry Sherratt, a friend of her father's, and one of the executors of his will (in whom she placed the greatest confidence) to grant a lease to Thomas Sherratt (the son of Henry Sherratt) and John Batteley her uncle, of certain minerals for two terms of twenty-five years and twenty-one years respectively. The evidence shows that she knew nothing about the mines, that she consulted nobody, that she placed implicit reliance in Henry Sherratt, and that a month after she became dissatisfied and complained of the terms on which the lease was granted; that she, again relying on Henry Sherratt, took no steps to set aside the lease; that Henry Sherratt got Wood, a friend of his, to look at the lease and say that the clauses were fair, and that she was, consequently, persuaded to let the matter rest. It is clear that these lessees might have obtained any terms which they thought fit, but I am bound to say that they intended to act fairly by her, and that they took the leases on what they believed to be fair and reasonable terms as between herself and her executors.

This, however, was not sufficient; she was entitled to the utmost that any person A would give for the lease.

The defendants brought forward a great number of witnesses to show that the terms of the lease were fair, and that it contained only the usual covenants; but this amounts to nothing, for the plaintiff produces two persons who said that they would have given more. What makes the matter worse is, that before the lease was granted to these lessees, offers of better terms had been made to the defendants and had been repelled by them, without their informing the plaintiff that such offers had been made. That the lease was taken merely as a profitable speculation on the part of the defendants is shown by this circumstance that the lessees were not miners, and were not cognisant of the business of mining, and that in less than six months after the granting of the lease they took into partnership with them, for the purpose of working this mine, the very gentleman who, by reason of the unbounded confidence placed in him by the plaintiff, had obtained the grant of the lease for the defendants. There really appears to be no ground of defence to this bill. It is clear that the lease, so far as it applies to the property in reversion, cannot stand, if the plaintiff declines to be bound by it, any more than a sale could stand, for a lease is a sale pro tanto. B C

One defence made for the defendants was, that the plaintiff confirmed the lease by the transaction with Wood. But Wood's share in the transaction only makes the matter worse. The plaintiff was dissatisfied with the terms of the lease; and thereupon the defendants obtained Wood, a friend of theirs, to say, what no doubt he believed to be true, that in his opinion the terms of the lease were reasonable. But this was a very different matter from saying that no one would give more, and which was well known not to be the fact. If the plaintiff had stood by till the mines had turned out to be profitable, and had then come forward to endeavour to set the lease aside, the position of the defendants might have been very different. But this was not so; she was dissatisfied throughout, and within two years after the lease was granted the present bill was filed. As usually happens in such cases, the bill was filed a few months after marriage, when the plaintiff had become independent of those who had formerly controlled her. The bill was filed before the reversionary part of the property comprised in the lease had been worked at all, and before the other portion had been worked profitably. D E F

Persons who act like the defendants put themselves in a position which, in a court of equity, makes it almost impossible for them to succeed. In such cases the onus lies on them to prove that the grantor acted with full knowledge of all that could be known on the subject; that she had separate and independent advice, and that she deliberately and with full knowledge made the grant. Here the plaintiff knew nothing about it. She did not know that other offers had been made, or what terms adjoining lessees were willing to give for the mines; she was also ignorant of the effect of the lease on her reversionary interest, and of its rendering her incapable to come to any terms for working the mines during her mother's lifetime. In fact she knew nothing, except that she placed implicit confidence in Henry Sherratt, who obtained, without any intention to defraud her, this lease to be granted. The lease, therefore, must be set aside, and delivered up to be cancelled. The defendants must account for any profits made by working the mines, and the plaintiff must give credit for the rent paid by the defendants, who must be allowed for permanent improvements. They must be allowed to remove all the moveable stock on the premises, or be paid for it at a valuation. The defendants must also pay the costs of the suit. G H I

Solicitor—Termination of employment—Client's right to documents—Letters to solicitor from client—Copies of letters written by solicitor on client's behalf.

On the termination of the employment of an attorney his client claimed delivery of all original letters addressed to him as her attorney and relating exclusively to her business, and also all copies of letters written by him on her behalf.

Held: the client was entitled to an order for delivery of all the original letters, but not of the copies, which were made by the attorney for his own protection at his own expense; she was, however, at liberty to have copies delivered to her at her expense.

Notes. As to the liability of solicitors to deliver up client's papers, see 36 HALSBURY'S LAWS (3rd Edn.) 206; and for cases see 43 DIGEST (Repl.) 357.

Petition to obtain the delivery to the petitioner, by Benjamin James Thomson, her late attorney, of all original letters addressed to the said B. J. Thomson as such attorney of the petitioner, relating exclusively to the business of the petitioner, and now in the custody or power of Thomson; and also all copies of letters written by Thomson, as such solicitor, on the business of the petitioner, now in the custody or power of Thomson.

The petitioner, Mrs. Lowe, had discharged Thomson from being her attorney, and had paid him his bill of costs, but he had refused to deliver up to the petitioner, with the other papers in his possession belonging to her, the original letters received by him, and the copies of letters sent by him, relating to her business, as being contrary to the practice of the profession, but he offered to make copies of them at the expense of the petitioner, which she declined. The copies of the letters written by Thomson had been made in a general letter-book, which contained copies of letters relating to the business of other clients.

Waller for the petitioner.

G. Osborne Morgan, for Thomson, contended that the original letters received by the attorney were his private property: Pope v. Curl (1); Gee v. Pritchard (2). [SIR JOHN ROMILLY, M.R.—The letters were received by the attorney as the agent of the client.] The letters and copies of letters were retained by the attorney for his protection, as evidence that he had discharged his duty. The copies of letters were made by the attorney for his own convenience. He was not bound to make them, and the client was not charged for them; they were mixed up with the copies of letters referring to other matters. The practice of the profession was not to deliver them up.

Waller, in reply, submitted that the copies made of letters written by the attorney were included, by inference, in the charge made for writing the letters. How could the business of the client be properly conducted by the attorney without copies of the letters written by him?

SIR JOHN ROMILLY, M.R., said he would consider the question, but his present impression was, clearly, that the original letters were the property of the client, and must be delivered up; but he thought that the copies made of the letters written by the attorney were so made for his own security and benefit; that he was not bound to make such copies; and that the copies were not charged to the client; and, therefore, that the attorney was entitled to retain them. A

Cur. adv. vult.

May 30, 1855. SIR JOHN ROMILLY, M.R., said his opinion remained unchanged as to both points; and he made an order for the delivery of all original letters written by third parties to the attorney relating exclusively to the business of the petitioner; and that any copies of such letters required by Thomson were made by him at his own expense; and he refused to order the delivery of the copies made of letters written by Thomson, relating to her business, but gave her liberty to have copies delivered to her at her own expense. He made no order as to costs. B

Demurrer in an action against a lodging-house keeper for damages for the negligent loss of the lodger's goods.

- B The first count of the declaration stated that the plaintiff, at the request of the defendant, hired of the defendant, at and for a certain price in that behalf, certain furnished apartments in the house of the defendant, and brought into the same certain personal luggage, chattels and effects of the plaintiff; yet the defendant, neglecting his duty in that behalf did not take such due and proper care of his house as a prudent owner would take, by means whereof certain dishonest persons
- C in the house entered and obtained access to the apartments so hired, who converted, took and carried away the luggage, chattels and effects of the plaintiff, and the same were wholly lost to the plaintiff. In the second count the plaintiff alleged that he was in possession of certain furnished apartments hired by him of the defendant in the house of the defendant, and had therein certain personal luggage, chattels and effects of him the plaintiff, and was shortly about to quit
- D and yield up the apartments to the defendant, and the defendant was then desirous of procuring another lodger to hire the apartments after the same should have been yielded up by the plaintiff, and the plaintiff alleged that in such case it was the usage for the landlord to have licence, whether his tenant were present or absent, to enter and show the apartments to any person or persons proposing to become the future tenant or tenants thereof. The plaintiff alleged that the defendant had
- E such licence to enter and show, and did in the absence of the plaintiff enter and show the apartments to divers persons in that behalf for the purpose aforesaid; and, therefore, it became and was the duty of the defendant to use due and proper care to prevent any of the said persons from injuring or carrying away any of the luggage, chattels, and effects of the plaintiff. Nevertheless the defendant, neglecting his duty, did not use such due and proper care, by means whereof the goods and chattels of the plaintiff then in the apartments were taken and carried away
- F by a certain person to whom the apartments in the plaintiff's absence were shown by the defendant, and were wholly lost to the plaintiff.

The defendant demurred to each of these counts on the ground that the first clause, not alleging the defendant to be a common innkeeper, or any contract of insurance against loss or any personal bailment to defendant, did not disclose any

G duty or liability on the part of the defendant to take care of plaintiff's goods.

Archibald for the plaintiff.

J. Thompson for the defendant.

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that our judgment should be for the defendant. On the first count the plaintiff claims to recover on the mere relation of a lodger in the defendant's house, and it is assumed that the law creates a duty in the landlord to take care of the goods of his lodger. Is there any such duty created by law? It is clear that no court or judge has decided in the affirmative.

H

According to the first proposition of Calye's Case (1) the liability for the safe keeping of the property of a guest is confined entirely to innkeepers keeping common inns for the use of wayfarers, and the judges distinctly laid it down that a lodging-house keeper is under no such liability, if the goods of his lodger are stolen in his house by a lodger, or a member of his family, much less if abstracted by a stranger. The reason of the law making an innkeeper liable is, that a wayfarer, who may be a complete stranger in the neighbourhood, has no means of knowing the character of those with whom he may be brought into contact at the inn and, therefore, the law imposes on the innkeeper the obligation of protecting the goods of his guest. But this reason for the law has no applicability to the case of a lodging-house keeper.

It is not contended that there is an absolute duty cast on the keeper of a lodging-house to protect the lodger's goods, but the allegation is that he did not take such due and proper care of his house as a prudent man would take, by means whereof certain dishonest persons were admitted into the house and stole the plaintiff's goods. I am most averse to affirm the proposition that the lodging-house keeper is bound to take due and proper care of his lodger's goods, as the greatest mischief might be done by imposing on him undefined duties, the result of which no man can foresee. Looking at the character of the different persons taking up their abode at lodging-houses or frequenting them, if the landlords of such houses were to be held liable to them under such circumstances, it would to my mind be affirming a most pernicious evil. The risk at lodging-houses must vary according to circumstances. Near the seaside it would be most inconvenient and objectionable that the door should be kept locked all day; so also in a port where the lodgings are taken at short notice, and the lodgers continually moving in and out. The lodger staying in such houses must take care of his goods in like manner as of valuables on his person when he walks the streets. I regard Calye's Case (1) as the fons juris on the point; and it is an authority directly against counsel for the plaintiff. The whole tenor of my judgment in Dansey v. Richardson (2) is that the law imposes no such liability on the lodging-house keeper, and goes to the unreasonableness of making people liable for the loss of goods of which they never had the custody.

As to the second count, that alleges that the plaintiff being in the occupation of and about to quit apartments hired by him of the defendant, and having personal luggage therein and the defendant being desirous of procuring another lodger, the plaintiff averred it was the usage for the landlord to have licence to enter and show the apartments to any person in the absence of the plaintiff; that he did enter and show the apartments to certain persons, and that it was his duty to prevent any of the said persons from injuring or carrying away any of the luggage, goods and effects. Is there any such duty imposed by law upon the defendant? I am of opinion there is not. The lodger had given the lodging-house keeper licence to show the apartments, and I think it was the lodger's duty to put his valuables and goods out of the way. Greater evil would ensue were we to hold otherwise, for the lodger might conspire with an accomplice to steal the goods, and they might have joint benefit of the theft, while the landlord would be liable to the lodger for the goods so abstracted. There is no precedent whatever for such a liability. There is no guarantee by the lodging-house keeper that the persons whom he introduces to see and take the lodgings shall do nothing wrong.

This judgment does not interfere with the liability of the landlord who has by gross misconduct, or wilful negligence, conduced to the loss of the goods. In the present case the landlord has done his best, and he must not be held liable for a loss, in the happening of which he was not in fault.

BYLES, J.—I am also of opinion that the defendant is entitled to judgment on both counts of the declaration. In both there has been an attempt made to remove the ancient landmarks of the law; it being clear from the decision in Calye's Case (1) that an innkeeper is, and a lodging-house keeper is not, liable for the loss of goods of a guest or lodger. LORD COKE, C.J., defines the original writ "to be the ground of the common law, and that by it all such cases may be decided; for, first, it ought to be a common inn, for if a man be lodged with another (who is not an innholder), upon request, if he be robbed in his house by the servants of him who lodged him, or any other, he shall not answer for it," for the words are "hospitatores qui com' hospitia tenent," etc. This seems to me consistent with principle as well as authority. There is no contract here between the parties that the defendant shall take care of the plaintiff's goods, nor can it be pretended there was any bailment. There is no precedent to be found for such an action. The allegation that the defendant did not take such due and proper care of his house as a prudent man would is not sufficient to fix him with liability,

A for if that were so a lodging-house keeper might be held liable for any loss whatever in his house.

The distinction between the liability of an innkeeper as contradistinguished from that of a lodging-house keeper is well marked and proper. If you are at an innkeeper's there is a duty on the innkeeper to protect your goods, and he is liable for their abstraction; if you are at a lodging-house there is no such duty on the landlord and you must take care of your goods yourself. If I have chambers in one of the Inns of Court, or at a university, and my goods are stolen, can I sue the Benchers or the authorities at the university if they do not take the precaution of keeping a proper watch? Certainly not.

Then as to the second count, it seems to me not so strong as the first count, and all the objections urged to the one apply also to the other. For these reasons
C our judgment must be for the defendant.

KEATING, J.—I am of opinion that the defendant is entitled to judgment on both counts of the declaration. The first count has not been supported by any authorities; but on the contrary, it is opposed to what has always been laid down as law, from Calye's Case (1) down to the present time. In Parker v. Flint (3), D LORD HOLT, C.J., laid it down, that,

"If one come to an inn and make a previous contract for lodging for a set time, and do not eat and drink there, he is no guest, but a lodger, and as such is not under the innkeeper's protection; but, if he eat and drink there, it is otherwise; or if he pay for his diet there, though he do not take it there."

E So that there may be a case where a man at an inn may be unprotected, the law regarding him as a lodger. After the remarks made by ERLE, C.J., in Dansey v. Richardson (2), it will be evident that it does not apply here.

The second count is, as it were, a modification of the first count. The licence to show the apartments is stated in a very peculiar way; it was alleged that it was the usage that the landlord should have leave to enter and show the apartments in the absence of the lodger, and that pursuant to such usage he entered but
F did not take care of the goods and they were stolen.

In truth, there was no duty on the defendant to protect the plaintiff's goods; the duty of so doing lay in the plaintiff himself, so that in reality the second count places the plaintiff in no better position than was given him by the first count.

A testator by his will gave his son the right to purchase for £450 certain portions of his real estate, this right to be exercisable after the death of the testator's widow who was tenant for life of the whole estate. If the son did not exercise the right the land in question was to be held on trust for sale with the remainder of the estate. Before the death of the widow the land was purchased by a railway company under an Act passed in 1847, for the sum of £700 which was paid into court. On the death of the widow, the surviving executor petitioned for payment out of this sum for the general benefit of the testator's estate.

Held: the purchase money was substituted for the land and was subject to all the rights affecting it, but it was unaffected by the railway company's Act; and, therefore, the son was entitled to payment of the sum of £700, subject to the payment by him of £450 for the general benefit of the estate.

Appeal from a decision of STUART, V.-C.

The testator, a market-gardener, by his will made on Jan. 27, 1827, gave all his real and personal estate to his executrix and executors, namely his wife Hannah Cant, his son George Long Cant, and his son-in-law James Wright, upon trust to permit his said wife to receive the income of the real and personal estates respectively during her life; and within six months after her decease, he directed his executors, or the survivor of them, to sell his real and personal estate, and to divide the proceeds of such sale into ten equal parts; and one of such equal parts be paid to each of his ten children.

The testator further directed by his will that his executors, before proceeding to a sale of two pieces of garden land, forming part of his real estate, and which had been used by him in carrying on his business as a market-gardener, should offer both of the said pieces of land to his [the testator's] son Charles Cant, for the sum of £450; and he provided that if Charles Cant should be desirous of purchasing the two gardens at and for the price mentioned, he should give to the executors of the testator three calendar months' notice in writing of such his desire to purchase the same, and on payment by Charles Cant of the aforesaid purchase-money at the expiration of the notice, the testator directed his executors to stand possessed of the two pieces of garden land upon trust to convey the same to his son Charles Cant. In the event of their not receiving such notice from his son Charles, his executors were to stand possessed of the gardens in trust for sale as above mentioned.

The testator died on July 13, 1828, survived by Hannah Cant his wife, who died on Jan. 27, 1859.

In 1853 the Eastern Union Rail. Co., requiring the pieces of land, purchased

A them under their statutory powers of compulsory purchase, exercised under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1844, and the Eastern Union and Harwich Railway and Pier Act, 1847. The purchase-money was fixed at £700, and that sum was paid into court by the company.

B Upon the death of the widow, Charles Cant was living, and he claimed to be entitled to the right of pre-emption given him by the will, notwithstanding the conversion of the garden ground. This right was denied by some of the parties interested, and accordingly the surviving executor of the testator presented this petition, praying for the payment to him of the sum paid into court by the company. The question in issue was whether the testator's son, Charles Cant, was entitled to the difference between the sum of £450, the price at which the testator gave him the option of purchasing the two pieces of ground, and the sum of £700, C at which they had been sold to the railway company.

The petition was heard by STUART, V.-C., who stated that the right of pre-emption was to arise only on the execution of the trust for sale, and that, as that trust could not now come into operation, the right itself was gone. The right of pre-emption depended only upon the trusts for sale and conversion, and these could not be carried into effect. His Honour, therefore, ordered that the fund in D court should be paid to the petitioner, as the testator's surviving executor. From this decision Charles Cant appealed.

G. M. Giffard, Q.C., and F. C. Miller for the appellant.

Shebbeare (with him Bacon, Q.C.) for the respondent.

D Henry F. Shebbeare for other parties interested in the testator's estate adversely to the appellant.

E KNIGHT-BRUCE, L.J.—By a contract of purchase under the powers of a railway Act, a sum of money was substituted for land, and became subject to all the rights which affected the land. The land was devised by the testator to his wife for life together with other property, and after her death all was to be sold, and the testator in effect said this: "As to a particular portion, namely, the land now F in question, one of my sons shall have it if he chooses to be charged with £450 as between himself and my estate." This right remains unaffected by the Act, and the son was entitled to take the purchase-money, whether it is worth hundreds or hundreds of thousands, on paying the sum which the testator has specified in his will, just as he would have been entitled to the land itself, if it had not been taken by the railway company.

G TURNER, L.J.—The whole argument of the respondents rests on this, that the testator only intended to benefit his son Charles in the event of his continuing to be a gardener. The true test of this argument is whether, if he had ceased to be a gardener in his father's lifetime, he would still have been entitled to the land. This question admits of no doubt, and the only consideration then is, whether, if the H right remained at the death of the testator, the fact of a subsequent Act of Parliament passing can affect the rights of the parties. I am of opinion that it cannot. The order of the court below must, therefore, be reversed.

I The order was that, on Charles Cant's paying £450 to the credit of the general estate of the testator, he should be declared entitled to the purchase-money of £700 paid into court by the railway company. The costs of all parties on the appeal petition to be borne by the general estate of the testator.

Water—Domestic purposes—Use for cleaning horse and carriage.

Under a local Act the use of water for domestic purposes was charged for at a different rate from water used for other purposes. The appellant, who paid a water rate for domestic purposes, used the water for cleaning his horse and carriage. On his appeal against his conviction for using water for other than domestic purposes,

Held: the use of water for washing a horse and carriage was use for a private purpose and as such should be construed as a use for domestic purposes, and the appeal would be allowed.

Appeal from conviction by justices.

In this case the opinion of the court was sought as to the construction of ss. 31 and 33 of the Chesterfield Waterworks and Gaslight Company's Act, 1855. By s. 31 of that Act it was provided that "the company shall furnish to the owner or occupier of any house who shall be entitled to demand a supply of water for domestic use, including water-closets, a sufficient supply thereof at the following annual rates or prices, according to the poor-rate assessment of such houses for the time being, that is to say:—"

Then followed the scale of charges. By s. 33 it was provided that a supply of water for domestic purposes shall not include a supply of water for machinery, railways, or for any trade or business whatsoever, or for watering gardens, or for fountains, or for any ornamental purposes whatsoever. The company were empowered by s. 34 to take a different rate of payment for the supply of water for other than domestic purposes.

The appellant occupied a house, to which a stable and coach-house were attached, being rated to the poor, however, separately upon the rental of the house. He was accustomed to use the water of the company, not only for his domestic purposes in the house, for which he was charged according to the scale of the poor-rate upon the house, but also for the purpose of cleaning his horse and carriage, having entered into no agreement with the company under s. 34 of the Act. Upon an information laid against him for using the water for other than domestic purposes the justices convicted him.

Pashley, Q.C., for the appellant.

Macnamara, in support of the conviction, argued that this was not such a use of the water for domestic purposes as was contemplated by the Act, and that the stable could not be considered as a part of the premises, for which the appellant had the supply of the water. [CROMPTON, J.—Surely the stable must be considered as part of the premises.] But washing horses and carriages cannot be deemed

A domestic purposes; they come rather within the operation of s. 34. In so using it a very great waste may be the consequence.

LORD CAMPBELL, C.J.—Considering that this water when used for washing the carriage and horse of the occupier is for a private purpose, I think it must be construed as being used for domestic purposes. Whether it is used for a carriage
B for the appellant or a go-cart for his children, it is just the same. No fear need be entertained of an undue use of the water, and if two parts of premises are separately rated, I think the company are entitled to make a charge upon the aggregate rental.

ERLE and CROMPTON, JJ., concurred.

Appeal allowed.

The plaintiffs, who were brewers, sent two consignments of porter in casks to a customer on the terms that the empty casks were to be returned to them at the customer's expense and risk within six months from the date of the contract or paid for at invoice price at the option of the plaintiffs. The defendant seized and sold, under a fi. fa. against the customer, 800 of the casks which were lying empty in the customer's cellar.

Rule Nisi to enter a verdict for the plaintiffs in an action for trover for a quantity of porter casks, tried before ERLE, J.

The plaintiffs, who were porter merchants in Dublin, were accustomed to supply one John David, of Laugharne in Wales, with porter. The course of dealing was to consign the porter to David twice a year in half-barrel casks with an invoice, charging nothing for the casks which were returned by him to the plaintiffs when empty. In April, 1848, the plaintiffs sent to David a quantity of porter, with a bill of lading in the usual form, and the following invoice, dated April 13, 1848:

"Invoice of butts, hhds., brls., 440 half-brls. porter (Irish measure), shipped by order and for account, risk, and to address of John David, Laugharne. The empty casks to be returned to Dublin at his expense and risk within six months from date hereof, or paid for at invoice price, at the option of the shippers."

The invoice then stated the price of the porter; and there was a note at the foot: "Value of the barrels 7s. 6d. each." In June, 1848, the plaintiffs consigned sixty more half-barrels of porter to David, with a similar invoice, dated June 24. In August, 1848, the defendant, who was sheriff of Carmarthenshire, seized and sold, under a fieri facias against David, 300 of these casks which were lying empty in his cellar.

On Oct. 26, 1848, the plaintiffs commenced an action for trover of the 300 casks, more than six months after the date of the first invoice, but less than six months after the date of the second. ERLE, J., was of opinion that, under this contract, the plaintiffs had not a sufficient possession to maintain trover, and he directed a verdict for the defendant on the plea of not possessed, reserving leave for the plaintiffs to move to enter a verdict for them for £112 10s., being the value of the 300 casks at 7s. 6d. each, if the court should be of opinion that they had sufficient possession to enable them to maintain the action. The plaintiffs obtained a rule nisi accordingly.

Davison and Willees supported the rule.

PARKE, B.—I am of opinion that the rule ought to be absolute. Gordon v. Harper (1), which must now be considered as settled law, shows that, if a person has an interest in goods for a certain time by agreement with the owner, the latter, during the time that he is not in possession, cannot maintain trover against a wrongdoer who takes the goods. That case might, with propriety, have been differently decided in the first instance; but it has been followed by others, and the Court of Common Pleas somewhat extended the rule in Bradley v. Copley (2). There it was held that, where a person in possession of goods had an uncertain interest determinable by the owner, until that event happened the owner could not maintain trover, although, according to a passage in SHEPPARD'S TOUCHSTONE, p. 272, a contract of that description with respect to real estate would not prevent the owner from recovering in ejectment.

The question is, In what condition was David under this contract? Had he a certain interest at the time of the sale, or an uncertain interest determinable at

- A the option of the plaintiffs so as to bring the case within the principle of Bradley v. Copley (2)? That depends on the terms of the invoice, which gave him some right to the casks. The contract must be construed with reference to the course of trading between the parties—the vendor in Dublin selling porter to a person in Wales. The object was to put the vendee in possession of the porter, and he was to have the casks for keeping the porter until he had an opportunity of disposing of it.
- B Then what was his situation as soon as the porter was emptied from the casks? Was he more than a mere bailee during pleasure, the plaintiffs having a right to say “You have no longer any claim to the possession of the casks; that was determined when they were emptied, and we insist on their being delivered to us”? That being so, the plaintiffs are entitled to maintain trover against a stranger who seizes the casks, and the sheriff is in that position.
- C The true construction of the contract is to give David an interest only until the casks were empty. I agree with counsel supporting the rule that, in this contract, every stipulation is for the benefit of the vendors, not the vendee. The latter is to incur all risk; he is under the obligation of sending the empty casks to Dublin at his own expense and before the end of six months from the date of the contract; if not, there is an option for the benefit of the vendors of calling on him
- D to purchase the casks at a fixed price. Those stipulations show that the interest of the vendee was never meant to extend beyond the right to keep the casks until the porter was consumed. Possibly, he might within the six months have transferred the porter in the casks to a sub-vendee, but as soon as the casks were emptied the right to them reverted to the vendors. According to the true construction of this contract, I am satisfied that it was never intended that David should
- E have the casks for any other purpose than keeping the porter. Indeed, I do not see what advantage there could be in his right of possession continuing after the casks were empty; for, during the residue of the six months, he could neither let them to anyone else nor make any further use of them himself without being a wrongdoer and, at the end of the six months, he was bound to return them.
- So soon as the casks were empty, the right of property and the right of possession
- F reverted to the plaintiffs, and David was in the situation of a mere bailee during pleasure. No proposition can be more clear than that either the bailor or the bailee of a chattel may maintain an action in respect of it against a wrongdoer; the latter by virtue of his possession, the former by reason of his property. This is laid down in 2 ROLLE'S ABRIDGMENT, p. 551, pl. 22, 30 COMYNS' DIGEST “Tresspass” (B. 4), and in other authorities. The verdict must, therefore, be entered
- G for the plaintiffs for the price of the casks.

ALDERSON, B., and PLATT, B., concurred.

Rule absolute.

PURVIS AND OTHERS v. TRAILL

[COURT OF EXCHEQUER (Pollock, C.B., Parke, Alderson and Platt, BB.), January 19, 1849]

[Reported 3 Exch. 344; 3 New Mag. Cas. 88; 3 New. Sess. Cas. 459; 18 L.J.M.C. 57; 12 L.T.O.S. 379; 13 J.P. 219; 154 E.R. 876]

Rates—Exemption—Scientific and literary society—Exclusive use of premises by society—Acquisition and diffusion of useful knowledge—Parts of premises used for public meetings, exhibitions, and auction sales.

A society was instituted for the acquisition and diffusion of useful knowledge, and had obtained the certificate required by s. 1 of the Scientific Societies Act, 1843. It was supported in part by annual voluntary subscriptions and did not distribute any dividend, gift, division or bonus in money among its members. On a number of occasions the lecture hall of the society's premises was let for public meetings, exhibitions, and sales by auction, the money received from such lettings amounting to about one fourth of the society's whole income and being applied to the purposes of the society.

Held: the premises of the society were not being used solely for the purposes for which the society was originally instituted, and, accordingly, it was not entitled to have them exempted from rates.

Notes. The Scientific Societies Act, 1843, has been repealed by the Rating and Valuation Act, 1961, but reduction or revision of rates may now be granted by s. 11 (4) (b) of the Act of 1961 (41 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 950).

Action for trespass for breaking and entering certain premises of the plaintiffs, in the parish of Greenwich in the county of Kent, and carrying away certain cushions, etc., of the plaintiffs.

The parties agreed to state the following Special Case for the opinion of the court. The plaintiffs were the trustees of a society called "The Greenwich Society for the Acquisition and Diffusion of Useful Knowledge." The defendant was a justice of the peace for the county of Kent, and one of the Metropolitan Police magistrates. The question was as to the liability of the plaintiffs to be rated to the poor and highway rates, under certain local Acts of Parliament, in respect of the buildings and premises of the said society, or whether they were exempt under the Scientific Societies Act, 1843, s. 1. Prior to Jan. 18, 1844, a society was instituted at Greenwich, for the purposes of science and literature exclusively (unless the court should come to a contrary conclusion), by the name of "The Greenwich Society for the Acquisition and Diffusion of Useful Knowledge." On Jan. 18, 1844, the

A barrister gave to the society a certificate of exemption from rates, pursuant to s. 2 of the Act of 1843. The other provisions of the Act had been complied with. Among the rules of the society were the following :

"8. The whole of the property and effects belonging to the society shall be invested in the names of three trustees, who shall be elected by the society at a special meeting.

"19. No dividend, gift, division, or bonus in money, shall or may, on any account, be made from the funds of the society unto or between any of its members in respect of such membership.

"20. In the event of a dissolution of the society, the property shall not be divided amongst the members, nor appropriated to their private use, but shall be given to such public association or associations for the promotion of knowledge as may be deemed by the members at their last meeting to be most deserving."

On Jan. 30, 1846, the churchwardens, overseers, etc., of Greenwich made a poor and highway rate, whereby the plaintiffs were assessed in respect of the lecture-hall and rooms of the society. The plaintiffs having refused to pay the rates, the defendant issued summonses, and eventually warrants of distress, under which the goods of the society were seized.

The society was instituted for the acquisition and diffusion of useful knowledge (unless the court, from the facts of the case, should come to a contrary conclusion), and was constituted and governed by certain rules and byelaws. The premises belonging to the society, which were vested in the plaintiffs as trustees, and in respect of which they were rated as aforesaid, consisted of a lecture hall, library and reading-rooms, which were open to the use of the members of the society, and a librarian attended daily on the premises, but no person resided there; and, subject as hereinafter mentioned, the premises were used and occupied by the society for the transaction of its business, and for carrying into effect its purposes. The society was supported in part by annual voluntary contributions, and did not in fact make any dividend, gift, division or bonus in money unto or between any of its members. Since the society had possessed the lecture hall, it has issued public printed announcements in the following terms :

"The lecture hall, capable of holding nearly 1,000 persons, and several classrooms, may be hired for public meetings, lectures, concerts, etc. For terms apply to the librarian."

In consequence of this, and in conformity therewith, the lecture hall of the society, being a part of the premises of the society, and occupied by it as aforesaid, had on several occasions, as well before as since the making of the rates in question, been used by and let to other persons unconnected with the society, for other purposes, but with the consent of the society and the trustees; and the lecture hall had been used by and let to such other persons as often as application had been made for its hire, when the trustees thought fit so to let and allow the use of the same, and had been always to be let, according to the terms of the announcement, to such persons as the trustees thought fit. Among other things, it had been let and used for meetings relating to the payment of the church rates, the corn laws, the navigation of the river Thames, a meeting to adopt a petition for the return of Frost, Williams, and Jones, which was held on Feb. 18, 1846, and one to petition for the People's Charter, which was held on Nov. 18, 1846, and for exhibitions of various kinds; as, for instance, of a celebrated dwarf, certain North American Indians and conjurers.

Other parts of the same premises of the society had been also let and used for sales by auction, and meetings of tradesmen's protection and building societies; and on the occasion of such lettings, the use of the lecture hall, or other parts of the premises of the society, had been agreed to be given for the purpose for which the respective lettings took place, sometimes for a few hours only, sometimes for two or three hours in the morning, and for a similar period in the afternoon, and for a similar period in the morning, and again in the afternoon and the evening of one day, or two, or three successive days. One of the rooms of the premises, not being the lecture hall, had been let for a sale by auction of pictures, when such room was let for the daytime only of successive days, and was used on the evenings of such days by the society for its own purposes.

On the occasions of such lettings, sums of money had been paid in gross to the trustees on behalf of the society by the parties requiring such temporary use of such part of the premises of the society, which sums were received by the trustees on behalf of the society, and applied by them to the purposes of the society, in common with their other funds. The receipts of the society, by such letting of the lecture hall and the parts of their premises, had been found to amount to one fourth of the whole income of the society. On many of the occasions on which the lecture hall had been so let and used by persons other than the society, before and since the making of the rates, sums of money had been received and taken at the doors by and for such persons, and applied by them partly in payment of the use of the hall, and partly for their own use; and on some occasions the members of the society had in fact been admitted on payment of half the price of admission paid by other visitors, but without any agreement having been made to that effect or for that purpose.

It was contended on the part of the defendant and the parish of Greenwich that, by reason of the aforesaid use of the premises, the society and the plaintiffs were not entitled to the exemption provided by the Scientific Societies Act, 1843. The court was to be at liberty to draw any conclusion from those facts which a jury might.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether the plaintiffs were or were not entitled to the exemption provided by the Scientific Societies Act, 1843. If the court should be of opinion that the plaintiffs were entitled to such exemption, judgment was to be entered for them, with £20 damages and costs; otherwise for the defendant.

By s. 1 of the Scientific Societies Act, 1843 [repealed] :

“ . . . No person or persons shall be assessed or rated, or liable to be assessed or rated, or liable to pay, to any county, borough, parochial, or other local rates or cesses, in respect of any land, houses, or buildings, or parts of houses, or buildings, belonging to any society instituted for purposes of science, literature, or the fine arts exclusively, either as tenant or as owner, and occupied by it for the transaction : of its business, and for carrying into effect its purposes, provided that such society shall be supported wholly or in part by annual voluntary contributions and shall not, and by its laws may not, make any dividend, gift, division, or bonus in money unto or between any of its members, and provided also that such society shall obtain the certificate of the barrister-at-law or lord advocate, as hereinafter mentioned.”

Crowder for the defendant.

POLLOCK, C.B.—The defendant is entitled to judgment. The institutions of a country mean the laws by which it is regulated at the time we are speaking. If a society is instituted for literary purposes, it becomes a new institution when used for other and different purposes.

PARKE, B.—I agree that the defendant is entitled to our judgment. The term “institution” does not mean merely the original institution on the first establishment of a society, since that may be altered, as many institutions have been, but the purposes to which it is applied at the present time. By the original constitution of this society, the lecture rooms were to be used for lectures only, and not in the discussion of party or political purposes. That has been changed by somebody;

A and, if the alteration was made by competent authority, it is clear that the society would have ceased to be instituted for its original purposes. The Case does not find how the alteration took place, and we are not at liberty to draw any inference that it was done by competent authority. The meaning of s. 1 of the Scientific Societies Act, 1843, is not merely that the society should be instituted for the purposes mentioned in it, but that it should occupy its rooms solely for those purposes. It is true that the statute does not use the word "solely"; but it never could have been the intention of the legislature to allow a society who let its rooms for other purposes than those mentioned in the Act to be exempt from rates because there was no beneficial occupation, inasmuch as the funds were applied to the purposes of the society. On the true construction of this statute, there can be no exemption, if the society occupy for a purpose foreign to its original institution.

ALDERSON, B., and PLATT, B., concurred.

Judgment for defendant.

Bastardy—"Single woman"—Married woman mother of illegitimate child.

By s. 2 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1844 [see now Affiliation Proceedings Act, 1957, s. 1 (37 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 37)], a "single woman" who had been delivered of a bastard child might apply to a justice for a summons to be served on the man alleged by her to be the father of the child.

Rule Nisi calling on justices of the borough of Abingdon to show cause why a writ of certiorari should not issue to bring up an order in bastardy made by them, for the purpose of having it quashed. A

On Oct. 7, 1847, Mary Ann Rance, the wife of George Rance, who had been delivered of a male bastard child within the previous twelve months, applied for an affiliation order to be made on the alleged father, John Huggins. The justices having heard her evidence on oath, together with corroborating evidence, adjudged John Huggins to be the putative father and ordered him to pay to her 1s. 6d. a week until the child attained the age of thirteen years or should die, "or the said George Rance shall again live and cohabit with his said wife . . . or the said [wife] shall marry again after the decease of her said husband." Cur. adv. vult.

July 12, 1848. LORD DENMAN, C.J., delivered the following judgment of the court.—The single question is whether a married woman becoming the mother of an illegitimate child is within the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1844, which authorises the justices to make an order of bastardy. The language of s. 2 of that Act applies in terms only to single women; so did the language of the Bastard Children Act, 1733, s. 1. Yet LORD ELLENBOROUGH and the whole court in R. v. Luffe (1), held that an order might be made on the putative father of the bastard child of a married woman, who was to be considered single under the existing circumstances and for that purpose. The Act last named is repealed, indeed, by that now in force; but the authority and the reason of the decision remains unimpaired, and the law, differently interpreted, would fail to reach a very large proportion of illegitimate children. We, therefore, think that we must hold the order good. D

The plaintiff, at the defendant's request, lent £150 to T., less three months' interest at 20 per cent., and also drew a joint and several promissory note, directing T. to sign it and to obtain the defendant's signature as surety. The note, dated Mar. 23, 1858, was returned by T. to the plaintiff, signed by the defendant as maker. When the note became due on June 26, 1858, and again on Sept. 28, T. paid the plaintiff a further three months' interest, the plaintiff agreeing not to enforce payment for the note. These payments of further interest were made without the knowledge or consent of the defendant who knew nothing of the matter until October, 1858, when T. became insolvent. In an action by the plaintiff to recover the amount of the note from the defendant.

Held: the doctrine of equity that when a surety was prejudiced by time given to a principal debtor, relief should be given to the surety applied and judgment should be given for the defendant.

F Appeal by the plaintiff from a decision of the Court of Queen's Bench (SIR ALEXANDER COCKBURN, C.J., WIGHTMAN, CROMPTON and HILL, JJ.), reported 2 E. & E. 424, in an action to recover £150 interest alleged to be due on a promissory note, dated Mar. 23, 1858, made by the defendant, whereby the defendant promised to pay to the plaintiff £150 three months after the date, but the defendant did not pay the same; and also for money found to be due on accounts stated between the plaintiff and defendant.

G By his first plea, the defendant pleaded that the promissory note was the joint and several promissory note of the defendant and of one William Titterington, and was made and signed by the defendant as surety only of and for Titterington, to secure a sum of £150 advanced by the plaintiff to Titterington, and save as aforesaid there never was any value or consideration for the making of the note by the defendant; that the note was delivered to the plaintiff on the terms that the defendant should be liable thereon as surety only for Titterington, and that the plaintiff at the time the note was made had notice and knowledge of the same having been so made by the defendant as surety, and of all the material facts; that the plaintiff while the holder of the note on June 26, 1858, without the knowledge or consent of the defendant, in consideration of £7 10s. paid by Titterington to the plaintiff as interest at the rate of 20 per cent. per annum, for the period of the next three months, agreed to, and did give to Titterington time for the payment of the note for the period of three months, and forebore to enforce payment of the same note during that time, and that if the plaintiff had not given such time payment could and would have been obtained from Titterington of the note and of all moneys due thereon. And the defendant claimed that he was wholly discharged from all liability to pay the amount of the note, or any part thereof. By his second plea to the first count that the note was such a note, and was so made, and on the same terms and considerations, and the plaintiff had such notice thereof that the defendant was wholly discharged from all liability to pay the amount of the note or any part thereof. Third plea to the second count—that he never was indebted as alleged. On these pleas the plaintiff took issue, and also demurred to them, and the defendant joined in demurrer. A

The action was tried before WILLES, J., at Lancashire Assizes, and a verdict was found for the plaintiff for £152 10s. damages, and 40s. costs, subject to the opinion of the court on a Case Stated, the material facts of which are as follows :

One Titterington requiring a loan of £150, applied to the defendant who wrote to the plaintiff a letter requesting him to call on Titterington, which the plaintiff did. Titterington then asked the plaintiff to lend the £150 to him. The plaintiff drew a cheque for the money, less three months' interest, at the rate of 20 per cent., and gave it to Titterington, and it was duly paid. He also drew out a joint and several promissory note, and gave it to Titterington, telling him to sign it, which he did, and to obtain the defendant's signature to it as his surety, and then to return it so signed to him the plaintiff. This Titterington did, and the plaintiff received the said note accordingly signed by the defendant as maker. When the note became due, Titterington paid to the plaintiff another three months' interest at the rate of 20 per cent., and in advance, and received from the plaintiff the following receipt : B

"£7 10s. June 26, 1858. Received from Mr. Titterington £7 10s. for interest due Sept. 26 next, on his joint note. D
JOS. GREENOUGH."

On the expiration of that period, Titterington paid to the plaintiff another three months' interest at the rate of 20 per cent., and in advance, and received from the plaintiff the following receipt :

"£7 10s. Sept. 28, 1858. Received from Mr. Titterington £7 10s. for renewal of his joint note to Dec. 26 next. E
JOS. GREENOUGH."

These payments were made without any consent or knowledge of the defendant, and defendant was not informed, nor did he know of them, until the latter end of October, when Titterington became insolvent.

The jury found that the defendant was surety as between himself and Titterington, and that plaintiff knew that fact, but that he did not agree, nor did the defendant stipulate that he should be considered or treated by the plaintiff as surety, or otherwise than as maker. The question for the court was whether these facts prove the first and second pleas of the defendant, or either of them. The Court of Queen's Bench gave judgment for the defendant on the Special Case, and on the demurrers. The plaintiff appealed. F

Sir William Atherton, Q.C. (Mellish with him), for the plaintiff. G

Crompton Hutton (Edward James with him) for the defendant were not called on to argue.

WILLIAMS, J.—We are all of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench ought to be affirmed. There can be no doubt that we are called on to deal with this case as if we were sitting in a court of equity, and that we ought to decide it according to the doctrines of a court of equity. So dealing with the case, we have no doubt that the defendant is discharged from liability, on the ground that the plaintiff had knowledge, at the time when he received the promissory note and entered into a binding agreement to give time to Titterington, that the relation of principal and surety existed between Titterington and the defendant. It appears on the facts that the jury found H

"that the defendant was surety as between himself and Titterington, and that plaintiff knew that fact; but that he did not agree, nor did the defendant stipulate, that he should be considered or treated by the plaintiff as surety, or otherwise than as maker." I

Therefore, if the case had occurred before the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, and if, instead of there being this equitable plea, there had been a plea simply on the common law principle, according to Manley v. Boycott (2), the plea would have

A been bad on the finding of the jury that there was no stipulation, at the time of making the note, that the defendant was to be treated by the plaintiff as surety only.

The question now is, What view would courts of equity have taken of this subject? Have they treated it as essential that it should be agreed, at the time of the making of the note, that a party to it was to be looked at as a surety only, and so dealt with? No doubt at one time, in courts of common law, relief would not have been granted on this ground. The difference, it is said, between the legal and equitable doctrine depended on this, that the common law courts adhered to the language of the original contract, whereas courts of equity took a more enlarged view, and disregarded the strict language of the original contract. It is plainly a mistake to suppose that courts of equity acted on that view.

C LORD COTTENHAM, in Hollier v. Eyre (1), expresses very clearly what principle the doctrine in equity proceeded on. He said (9 Cl. & Fin. at p. 45):

D "The question whether the plaintiff, as between himself and the grantees, was a principal in the grant of the annuity, or only a surety for the payment of it, must be ascertained by the terms of the instruments themselves; no extraneous evidence is admissible for that purpose. . . . Although all the grantors were principals as between them and the grantees, yet, as between themselves, some of them might be sureties for others; and if it was established that such was the case as between the plaintiff and Lynch, and that the grantees knew that such was the case, they might, by their dealing, have raised an equity in favour of the plaintiff, entitling him to the protection of a court of equity against the legal consequences of the instruments he joined in executing. This distinction is well settled, and is the ground of many of the decisions."

E So LORD COTTENHAM puts it on this ground, that, although the courts of common law and equity agree that it must be ascertained from the instrument whether the parties stand in the relation of principal and surety, yet in courts of equity, the surety being prejudiced by time given to the principal debtor, an equity arises in that circumstance which entitles the surety to relief in equity. TURNER, L.J., also, in the latter part of his judgment in Davies v. Stainbank (3), says (6 De G.M. & G. 696):

F "This court, as I apprehend, has at all times exercised jurisdiction in cases of this nature. It is, in the eye of this court, a fraud in a creditor to proceed at law against a surety after he has agreed with the principal debtor to enlarge the time for payment of the debt, and this court relieves against the fraud."

G This is, therefore, settled beyond all doubt, not that a court of equity any more than a court of law will vary the terms of the instrument, but the courts of equity have established a doctrine of equity that, when a surety is prejudiced by time given to a principal debtor, then relief shall be given to the surety in equity. At common law there was some difficulty in arriving at such a doctrine. It was urged that there was nothing illegal in a surety agreeing to submit to all the obligations of a principal, and that such a fact arises on the face of the instrument. These considerations, however, have been disregarded in equity, and the above rule established there, and this court, therefore, is bound now to treat it as established and bound, therefore, to concur in the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench in Pooley v. Harradine (4).

I It is true that, on the facts, Pooley v. Harradine (4) is not very strongly applicable to this case, because there the plea stated that the notes were delivered to plaintiff and taken by him on an agreement that defendant should be liable as surety only, and with notice that he was surety only; whereas here there was no such agreement at the time of delivering the note. However, the Court of Queen's Bench, having reviewed all the cases in the course of its judgment, conclude their judgment by saying (7 E. & B. at p. 444):

"We give our judgment for the defendant on the present plea, on the ground that it appears to us sufficiently to state that the relation of principal and surety existed between the defendant and the principal debtor inter se, and that the plaintiff had knowledge of that fact when the notes were made and received by him, and when he entered into a binding agreement to give time to the principal debtor."

Those two facts exist in the present case and, therefore, the principle is expressly applicable to it, and ought to be binding. When it is once established that law and equity agree in regarding the contract as binding, you violate that rule if you allow the question to be treated as one arising on the original contract, whereas it must be put on the principle of equity. In that point of view we all agree that the defence in this case was made out, and that the judgment must be affirmed.

Appeal dismissed.

COOPER v. WILLOMATT

[COURT OF COMMON PLEAS (Tindal, C.J., Coltman, Maule and Cresswell, JJ.), May 23, 1845]

Bill of Sale—Assignment of goods—Agreed use by assignor of goods assigned—Bona fide purchase by third party—Right of assignee to recover.

Under an agreement for the bailment of certain chattels, the bailee allowed the bailor to use the chattels on payment of a rent of 6s. a week, and subject to a condition that the bailor would not dispose of them without the consent of the bailee. In breach of the agreement the bailor sold the chattels to the defendant who believed him to be the owner.

Held: the plaintiff was entitled to maintain an action in trover for the value of the chattels, notwithstanding that the defendant had purchased them honestly and in good faith.

B Rule Nisi obtained by the plaintiff to enter a verdict in an action in trover to recover the value of certain furniture, which had come into the possession of the defendant, a furniture broker, in the following circumstances.

The original owner of the furniture, Parry Savage, having become involved in pecuniary difficulties, assigned the same by bill of sale to the plaintiff as a security for the sum of £100. An agreement, dated April 24, 1844, was then entered into

C between the plaintiff and Savage, which, after reciting such assignment, proceeded as follows:

"It is hereby agreed between the said parties, that the said Parry Savage shall have the use of the said household furniture, goods, chattels, utensils, and effects, he, the said Parry Savage, paying unto the said Edward Cooper the rent or sum of 6s. by the week, for the rent or hire of the same. The first weekly payment to become due and be made by the said Parry Savage on the 27th day of April instant. And the said Parry Savage hereby agrees to pay the said rent or sum of 6s. by the week during so long a time as he shall be allowed by the said Edward Cooper to have the use of the said household furniture, goods, chattels, utensils, things and effects; and the said Parry Savage hereby agrees that he will not alter or dispose of the same or any part thereof without the license or consent of the said Edward Cooper, his executors, administrators, or assigns, for such purpose had and obtained in writing; and that he will pay for or replace such articles or things that may be broken or damaged; and that he will deliver up the said household furniture, goods and chattels, utensils, things, and effects, in as good state and condition as they now are, on demand being made for the same by the said Edward Cooper, his executors, administrators, or assigns."

The agreement then gave to the plaintiff a right of entry on the house of Savage to remove the furniture without being subject to any action; and that if any action should be brought for so doing, the agreement might be pleaded in bar thereto. At the time of making this agreement, a written authority was given by the plaintiff to the wife of Savage to hold possession of the furniture in behalf of the plaintiff, with a direction not to allow Savage to dispose of the same without the consent in writing of the plaintiff.

Savage afterwards removed the furniture to the house of his father-in-law, and there sold the same to the defendant, who bought it, bona fide, believing Savage to be the owner. A demand was made to the defendant by the plaintiff for the property to be delivered up to him, but the defendant refused to comply with the demand.

On these facts being proved at the trial, ERLE, C.J., nonsuited the plaintiff, but gave him leave to move to enter a verdict for the amount of £27 if the court should be of opinion that, in the circumstances, he was entitled to recover. The plaintiff obtained a rule nisi accordingly.

I Serjeant Talfourd showed cause against the rule.
Serjeant Shee (Bovill with him) supported the rule.

TINDAL, C.J.—It appears to me, that, if the transaction between Cooper and Savage is assumed (as perhaps it may be) to be a demise of the goods to the latter, it is such a demise as might at any time be put an end to at the will of the former. Also, if Savage put the goods into the possession of another, meaning to give to that other a larger interest in them than he himself possessed, he must, at all events, be held to have parted with the limited interest he did possess. The demand upon the defendant, therefore, as much put an end to the tenancy of Savage as if the demand had been made upon Savage himself. A

But, supposing the tenancy not to have been determined, I cannot get over the authority of Loeschman v. Machin (1). There, the hirer of certain pianos having sent them to the defendant, an auctioneer, for sale: in an action against the auctioneer, ABBOTT, J., ruled (2 Stark. at p. 312) that,

“if goods be let on hire, although the person who hires them has the possession of them for the special purpose for which they are lent, yet, if he send them to an auctioneer to be sold, he is guilty of a conversion; and that, if the auctioneer afterwards refuse to deliver them to the owner, unless he will pay a sum of money which he claims, he is also guilty of a conversion.” B

That is a position I am not prepared to dispute. I, therefore, think the rule for entering a verdict for the plaintiff in this case must be made absolute. C

COLTMAN, J.—It seems to me also that Loeschman v. Machin (1) is a satisfactory authority for us to act upon. Isaack v. Clark (2) is likewise very applicable to the present case.

MAULE, J.—I do not think we are called upon, by any of the authorities that have been cited, to hold that this action is not maintainable. Loeschman v. Machin (1) is not, in my judgment, to be distinguished from the present case: and it has been approved of in subsequent cases. If, however, there were no authority to support our view, I should still come to the same decision. It occurred to me, in the course of the argument, that Savage might still be liable to the weekly rent of 6s., notwithstanding the recovery of the value of the goods by the plaintiff in this action. That may be so: but still I do not think it by any means shows that the plaintiff may not set up the tortious conversion. D

There seems to be no doubt that the transaction was an honest and bona fide one on the defendant's part; and one cannot but regret that he should lose his money. Much property of this kind is, however, entrusted to persons who have no right to sell it; and yet the trade of a furniture-broker seems to be one that may be profitably carried on. The law, therefore, has not been found to be productive of any inconvenience; and, if it had, that would make no difference, seeing that it is not at all doubtful. I think the plaintiff is clearly entitled to enter a verdict for the sum agreed on. E

CRESSWELL, J.—Two points were relied upon by counsel showing cause against the rule. The first, he founded upon Gregg v. Wells (3), where it was held that the owner of goods who stands by and allows another to treat them as his own, whereby a third person is induced to buy them bona fide, cannot recover them from the vendee. That case differs essentially from the present; for, there the owner of the goods was present when the person to whom he had entrusted them affected to deal with them: here, however, the plaintiff did not hold out Savage as a person having authority to deal with the goods. The authority given by Cooper to Mrs. Savage to hold possession of the goods on his behalf, did not make her his agent for the purpose of assenting to the disposition of them by her husband. Then comes the question whether a person entrusted with goods in this manner, can, by selling them, be guilty of anything less than a conversion. Upon the authority of Loeschman v. Machin (1), as well as upon principle, I think, that, where a party acts so in contravention of the authority given to him, he can confer no right upon another by his wrongful act. For these reasons, I am of opinion that this action is maintainable. F

Rule absolute. G

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. CHAMBERS AND OTHERS

[COURT OF APPEAL IN CHANCERY (Lord Chelmsford, L.C.), January 29, 31, April 30, 1859]

5 Jur.N.S. 745; 7 W.R. 404; 45 E.R. 22]

Sea—Recession—Alluvion added to pre-existing dry land—Gradual and imperceptible accretion—Ownership.

Where the sea recedes gradually and imperceptibly from the land with the result that land by alluvion is added to the pre-existing dry land the accretion belongs to the owner of that dry land, whether it has been caused by natural or by artificial means, provided that it is not the result of deliberate reclamation.

Easement—User by which prescriptive right established—Acts of ownership on property of another—Effect dependent on acts themselves and nature of property on which exercised—Sufficiency of user to establish right.

The effect of acts of ownership on the property of another depend partly on the acts themselves and partly on the nature of the property on which they are exercised. If cattle are turned on enclosed pasture ground and placed there to feed from time to time, it is strong evidence that it is done under an assertion of right, but where the property is of such a nature that it cannot be easily protected against intrusion and it would not be worth the trouble of protecting it, the mere user is not sufficient to establish a right, but it must be founded on some proof of knowledge and acquiescence by the party interested in resisting it, or by perseverance in the assertion and exercise of the right claimed in the face of opposition.

Informations filed by the Attorney-General to establish the rights of the Crown upon the seashore in the parishes of Llanelly and Pembrey, in the county of Carmarthen.

The Solicitor-General (Sir Hugh Cairns), W. M. James, Q.C., and Hanson for the Crown.

Roundell Palmer, Q.C., and G. M. Gifford, Q.C., for the defendant Lewis.

Rasch for the defendant Rees.

LORD CHELMSFORD, L.C.—These cases arise on informations filed by the Attorney-General. The defendant Lewis is a party to both the informations, as the owner of lands in both the parishes of Llanelly and Pembrey. The defendant Rees is a party only to the information which relates to the parish of Pembrey. The prayer of each petition is the same, mutatis mutandis:

"That the right of Her Majesty to the seashore below high-water mark may be established and declared, and that any leases or licences to embank or build upon, or to dig or raise coal or culm [anthracite] from, the seashore may be declared null and void: that the boundary or mark to which the sea flowed at high water at ordinary high tides upon the seashore, before certain embankments and buildings were erected thereon, and also those portions of the works or mines from which coal or culm is gotten which lie under the land of Her Majesty, may be ascertained and distinguished; and that, if necessary, a commission may issue for the purpose of ascertaining and distinguishing the same."

The question then arose: What was the true boundary of the seashore, the defendants Lewis and Rees contending that the utmost limit of the Crown's right was the line of high-water mark of ordinary neap tides. For the purpose of determining this question, it was arranged, as to the defendant Lewis, that the cause should be set down on further directions, and by consent of the Lord Chancellor should be heard by him in the first instance, assisted by two common law judges. The question was accordingly argued before LORD CRANWORTH, L.C., ALDERSON, B., and MAULE, J., and on July 15, 1854, they pronounced their judgment

"that the landward boundary of the seashore, or litus maris, around England and Wales, is the medium line of high water of all tides occurring in the ordinary course of nature throughout the year."

Having thus obtained a definition of the boundary of the rights of the Crown on the seashore, the next thing to be done was to ascertain and lay down the line so defined on such parts of the seashore as were adjacent to the lands of the defendants Lewis and Rees, and on the petition of the Attorney-General, by an order of the Lord Chancellor of May 1, 1857, Mr. George Parker Bidder, a civil engineer, was appointed to make the plans, and ascertain and lay down the medium line of high water directed to be made and ascertained and laid down. Mr. Bidder made his report on July 3, 1858, by which he states that he had ascertained and laid down, upon a plan annexed, so much of the shores of the rivers Bury and Lougher as was adjacent to the land of the defendant David Lewis, or his lessees in the parish of Llanelly. He continues:

"I have ascertained and laid down upon the same plan, the present medium line of high water upon those parts of those shores, of all tides occurring in the ordinary course of nature throughout the year."

Then he made a special report, saying:

"I report specially to the court that, in my judgment, the natural line of high water between [two specified] points on the said plan has been more or less

A varied by the direct or indirect operation of artificial causes; and I particularly call attention to the fact, that the present medium line of high water, as laid down upon the said plan hereto annexed, does not, in my judgment, represent the medium line as existing previous to the construction of the South Wales Railway. And further, that at [another point] the natural medium line of high water has heretofore been and still continues affected by the gradual accretion of a sand bank by the indirect operation of artificial causes; and further that the natural medium line of high water has been varied and still is continually affected by the direct operation of artificial causes at [certain] points in the harbour of Llanelly."

C Upon this report of Mr. Bidder the Crown claims to have the line of medium high tide ascertained and laid down as it would have existed at the time of filing the information but for the artificial causes to which he refers. This proposed limitation of the inquiry to the period of the filing of the information will exclude the consideration of the effects produced by the South Wales Railway mentioned in Mr. Bidder's report, which was not in existence at the time when the information was filed.

D The claim now made on the part of the Crown involves a question of novelty and of some difficulty, which may be stated in general terms to be when the well-known rule of law as to the right of land gained from the sea is applicable to a case where the alluvion or dereliction has not been the result of merely natural causes. I will take the allegations in the information which relates to Mr. Lewis's land in Llanelly. It states that certain pieces of land which are mentioned about on the seashore of the Bury river,

E "and that about thirty years ago there were erected, without any licence or consent of Her Majesty's predecessors, partly upon that piece of land which is called Penrhose Fach Farm, and partly upon the seashore in front thereof, lying within the harbour of Llanelly, extensive buildings and works, in and at which there has been and is now carried on the business of copper smelting by the former and present members of a co-partnership, in whose occupation the said buildings and works now are, and who carry on the said business under the name of Sims & Co., which said firm or co-partnership consists of the following members."

F It then mentions their names, all of whom are defendants. Then it says :

G "Subsequent to the erection of the said copper works, the said firm of Sims & Co., without the licence and consent of Her Majesty, or of Her Majesty's predecessors, raised or caused to be raised on the seashore in front of the said pieces of land called respectively, Penrhose Fach Farm, Penrhose Fawr Farm, Borth Morfa Ddu and Bryn Farm, a very extensive embankment, formed principally with the slag and rubbish produced by their copper works, and upon the said embankments the said Messrs. Sims & Co. have constructed a wharf, H coalyards, a large chimney, stock, storehouses and other buildings connected with their copper works, and also a considerable extent of railway adjoining and leading to a dock formed in or by the said embankments of slag and rubbish. That the said embankment of slag, by reason of its being carried out a considerable way into the harbour of Llanelly, and thus impeding the former run and score of the tides, has caused a considerable silting up of the parts of the I harbour which lie adjacent to it on either side, and portions of the shore of the said Bury river adjoining the land which was formerly covered by the sea at ordinary high tides have in consequence thereof become either permanently dry land, or only covered at extraordinary high tides."

It then charges that the embankment formed by Sims & Co., by throwing out slag and rubbish, was an encroachment on, and nuisance in, the port of Llanelly,

"and that, owing to the said slag embankment projecting far into said port, and the other encroachments upon said seashore, by and under the pretended title or authority of the said defendants respectively, the sea has been prevented flowing and re-flowing over many parts of the said shore, over which it had antecedently to such encroachments flowed and re-flowed from time immemorial, and should have continued to flow and re-flow if such encroachments had not been made."

Then it charges that

"such portions of alluvial land so formed by, or gained from, the sea have not been added to the adjoining mainland by the gradual and imperceptible projection of soil or silt upon the seashore, arising from the operation of natural causes; but that the same have been produced by the works and artificial embankment raised by, and by leave and licence of, the defendants respectively."

It is charged that all

"such additions to the mainland as have been produced by or caused by illegal erections of embankments or other projections upon the seashore belong to Her Majesty, and do not belong to the owners of the adjacent lands, but belong to Her Majesty."

The defendant Lewis, by his answer, after submitting that the right of the Crown does not extend beyond high watermark of ordinary high tides, goes on:

"And does not extend to or embrace any alluvion, the same being of gradual formation, whether the same shall have been produced by natural or unknown causes, or by cuttings or embankments lawfully made, or other lawful artificial means."

Then he denies that such portions of the land so formed on the seashore as in the information was mentioned, if any such land there were, had not been added to the adjoining mainland by natural alluvion; he denies that the same, if any such there were, had been produced by the works and artificial embankments raised by, and by licence from, the defendant or the other defendants, or any of them, but whether the same land, if any such there were, had or had not been produced by such works and artificial embankments, yet, inasmuch as such works and embankments were lawfully made, and as to all or some of them under the authority of an Act of Parliament, the defendant submits that the same do not belong to Her Majesty but to the owners of the adjoining land. He further says:

"According to the best of his knowledge and belief (but he cannot answer as to his belief or otherwise, whether the other defendants to said amended information do or do not allege), the said pieces of land so formed upon the said seashore, if any such there be, have been added to the adjoining land by gradual and imperceptible projection or subsidence of soil or silt, and that the same were produced by natural causes; and that, even although such pieces of land may have been produced by the operation of artificial causes, or by embankments by cutting channels, yet the same belong to the defendants, the owners of the adjacent lands; and that such portions of alluvial land so formed by or gained from the sea, have been added to the adjoining mainland by the gradual and imperceptible projection of soil or silt upon the seashore arising from the operation of natural causes, and that the same have not been produced by the works and artificial embankments raised by, or by leave and licence of, the defendants."

I think, therefore, that the information and answer, taken together, raise the issue as to the right of the Crown to alluvion produced by artificial causes.

The fact of the line of high water having been materially raised upon parts of the shore adjoining to some part of the defendant's lands, is, I think, clearly proved by several witnesses, and may be assumed, upon the report of Mr. Bidder, to have been the result of the operation of artificial causes. These causes appear to have been partly the copper works of Sims & Co. in 1804 and 1805, and the buildings

A which were subsequently added, but principally the embankment formed by throwing slag and rubbish on the seashore by Sims & Co., by which the mainland has been raised or has silted up, and considerable portions of what was formerly seashore have been added to the mainland. This embankment appears to have extended as far as some of the land of the defendant Lewis, namely to Penrhose Farm, as stated by the witnesses Dankin and Garret, and to Bryn Farm, as shown by B David Griffith, and to have indirectly affected the line of high water upon the shore adjoining other lands belonging to him. The embankment I collect from the evidence to have been the ordinary spoil bank always produced by the regular and accustomed operations of copper works.

It will be necessary, before I consider the rights of the Crown upon the facts just stated, to clear the case of all that relates to Stradey marsh. The defendant C Lewis claims the seashore in front of this part of his property, upon the ground of uninterrupted enjoyment for sixty years. During the course of the argument I intimated a strong opinion that the acts of ownership upon which the defendant relies are quite insufficient to prove actual possession. They consist merely of turning out upon the marsh the cattle of the defendant which crossed the invisible line of boundary separating the marsh from the seashore, the cattle being allowed D thus to stray without interruption. The effect of acts of ownership must depend partly upon the acts themselves and partly upon the nature of the property upon which they are exercised. If cattle are turned upon enclosed pasture ground and placed there to feed from time to time, it is strong evidence that it is done under an assertion of right, but where the property is of a nature that it cannot be easily protected against intrusion, and if it could it would not be worth the trouble of E protecting it, there mere user is not sufficient to establish a right, but it must be founded upon some proof of knowledge and acquiescence by a party interested in resisting it, or by perseverance in the assertion and exercise of the right claimed in the face of opposition. The defendant's rights in the seashore opposite Stradley marsh will not, therefore, be different from those which he is entitled to in respect of his other lands, and the claim of the Crown to all accretions produced by artificial causes may be considered with reference to all the defendant's lands without distinction. F

There is very little authority to guide us upon the question, which, so far as I can discover, is now raised for the first time. None of the cases cited in the course of the argument throws much light upon it. Indeed, with the exception of R. v. Lord Yarborough (1); Re Hull and Selby Rail. Co. (2), and, perhaps, G Scratton v. Brown (3), there is not one which bears at all upon the point of slow and insensible accretions on the seashores, whether naturally or artificially produced. In Smart v. Dundee Magistrates (4), which was the case of a grant of premises on the seashore described as bounded on the south by the sea flood, it was held that the grantee had no right to follow the sea or to have the land acquired from it or left by it where it had receded, but the claim of the grantee was not to follow H the sea which had receded slowly and insensibly; he insisted that, his property being described as bounded on the south by the sea flood, he was entitled both by the special terms of the grant and by the common law to take in ground from the sea by embankments and other operations of the same kind opposite to his property. Todd v. Dunlop (5), which was decided upon the authority of Smart v. Dundee Magistrates (4) was, as far as can be collected from the short statement of I the facts, not a case of gradual and imperceptible accession, but of such acquisitions of additional land by the operations of the trustees of the River Clyde. It, therefore, differed from Scratton v. Brown (3) where the advance of the sea had been gradual and imperceptible, the high and low water mark had varied in the same degree, and it was held that the freehold of the grantee of the shores and sea grounds shifted as the sea receded or encroached.

There is nothing, however, in any of the cases, or in the few text-writers upon the subject, which hints at the distinction now sought by the Crown to be established between effects produced by natural and by artificial causes. In order to determine whether there is any ground for this distinction, it is essential to discover, A if possible, the principle upon which the right to maritima incrementa depends.

The law is stated very succinctly by BLACKSTONE, vol. 2, p. 261, in these words :

"And as to lands gained from the sea, either by alluvion, by the washing up of sand and earth so as in time to make terra firma, or by dereliction, as when the sea shrinks back below the usual water-mark—in these cases the law is held to B be that, if this gain be by little and little, by small and imperceptible degrees, it shall go to the owner of the land adjoining. For de minimus non curat lex; and, besides, these owners being often losers by the breaking in of the sea, or at charges to keep it out, this possible gain is, therefore, a reciprocal consideration for such possible charge or loss. But if the alluvion or dereliction be sudden and considerable, in this case it belongs to the King, for the King C is lord of the sea."

I am not quite satisfied that the principle de minimus non curat lex is the correct explanation of the rule on this subject, because, although the additions may be small and insignificant in their progress, yet, after a lapse of time, by little and little, a very large increase may have taken place, which it would not be beyond D the law to notice, and of which, if the party who has the right to it can clearly show that it formerly belonged to him, he ought not to be deprived. I am rather disposed to adopt the reason assigned for the rule by ALDERSON, B., in Re Hull and Selby Rail. Co. (2), viz.: "That which cannot be perceived in its progress is taken to be as if it never existed at all." As LORD ABINGER said in the same case :

"The principle as to gradual accretion is founded on the necessity which exists for some such rule of law for the permanent protection and adjustment of E property."

It must always be borne in mind that the owner of land does not derive benefit alone, but may suffer loss from the operation of this rule, for if the sea gradually steals upon the land, he loses so much of his property, which is thus silently transferred by the law to the proprietor of the seashore. If this be the true ground of F the rule, it seems difficult to understand why similar effects, produced by a party's lawful use of his own land, should be subject to a different law, and still more so if these effects are the result of operations upon neighbouring lands of another proprietor.

Whatever may be the nature and character of those operations, they ought not to affect a rule which applies to a result, and not to the manner of its production.
Of course an exception must always be made of cases where the operations upon G the party's own lands are not only calculated, but can be shown to have been intended, to produce this gradual acquisition of the seashore, however difficult such proof of intention may be. If, then, it had been clearly proved or admitted in this case that the additions to the seashore in the parishes of Llanelly and Pembrey were of gradual and imperceptible progress, so as to compel me to express my H opinion upon the distinction taken by the Crown between accretions produced by natural and artificial causes, I should have been prepared to repudiate the distinction and to refuse any further inquiry to ascertain the original medium line of high water, as I consider this proceeding is closely analogous to a bill to ascertain the boundaries, in which it is necessary for the plaintiff to establish, by the admission of the defendant or by evidence, a clear legal title to some land in the possession of I the defendant.

In this case, although the allegation in the information

"that the alluvial land has not been added to the adjoining mainland by the gradual and imperceptible projection of soil and silt upon the seashore, arising from the operation of natural causes" is ambiguous, and may either amount to a denial of the gradual and imperceptible nature of the accretions or of the cause by which they were produced, yet the witnesses for the Crown say that the alluvial land has not been added to the mainland

A gradually and imperceptibly, but rapidly. If by the word "rapidly" the witnesses mean "perceptibly," then the Crown and not the defendant would be entitled to these accretions. But if the witnesses merely mean that at the expiration of some period of time they could perceive the changes which had taken place, although they could not discern them in their progress, then I think another important question may arise, and may call for determination—whether circumstances may

B not exist in which, though the changes were produced, yet the original limits of the Crown's right and of that of the owners of the adjoining land are now capable of being distinctly ascertained. If there is no clear line of demarcation between the mainland and the seashore by the gradual encroachment or recession of the tide, all trace of the distinction between them will be completely obliterated, and there will be full scope for the rule of alluvion to operate. But suppose that the

C separation between the mainland and the seashore is distinct, and suppose that the landholder put up a wall to prevent the encroachment of the sea upon him, and the effect of the wall is to produce a gradual and insensible accretion, which cannot be perceived from day to day, but at the end of some long period is distinctly to be seen; ought this to become the property of the landowner?

LORD TENTERDEN, in R. v. Lord Yarborough (1) seems to think that it ought, D for he says (3 B. & C. at pp. 106, 107):

"An accretion extremely minute, so minute as to be imperceptible, often by known antecedent marks or limits, at the end of four or five years, may become, by gradual increase, perceptible by such marks or limits at the end of a century, or even of forty or fifty years. For it is to be remembered, that if the

E limit on one side be land, or something growing or placed thereon, as a tree, a house, or a bank, the limit on the other side will be the sea, which rises to a height varying almost at every tide, and of which the variations do not depend merely upon the ordinary course of nature, at fixed and ascertained periods, but in part also upon the strength and direction of the winds, which are different almost from day to day. . . . Considering the word 'imperceptible' in this issue

F as connected with the words 'slow and gradual,' we think it must be understood as expressive only of the manner of the accretion, as the other words undoubtedly are, and as meaning imperceptible in its progress, not imperceptible after a long lapse of time."

This, however, is not in accordance with the great authority upon this subject—LORD HALE. He says, on p. 28 of his book, DE JURE MARIS.

G "This jus alluvionis, as I have before said, is de jure communi, by the law of England, the King's, viz., if by any marks or measures it can be known what is so gained, for if the gain be so insensible and indiscernible, by any limits or marks, that it cannot be known, idem est non esse et non appare, as well in maritime increases as in the increases by inland rivers."

H LORD HALE here clearly limits the law of gradual accretions to cases where the boundaries of the seashore and adjoining land are so indiscernible that it is impossible to discover the slow and gradual changes which are, from time to time, occurring; and when, at the end of a long period, it is evident that there has been a considerable gain from the shore, yet the exact amount of it, from the want of some mark of the original boundary line, cannot be determined. But where the

I limits are clear and defined, and the exact space between these limits and the new high-water line can be clearly shown, although from day to day, or even from week to week, the progress of the accretion is not discernible, why should a rule be applied which is founded upon a reason which has no existence in the particular case?

In the present state of the evidence it is impossible for me to direct any inquiry to ascertain and lay down the former line of medium tide, because it could lead to no practical result. I want information on a variety of points, which is not supplied by the evidence. With respect to the slag embankment, to which the accretions are principally attributed, I cannot discover satisfactory proof whether it is formed on the present seashore, or upon the land occupied by Sims & Co.; whether it extends before the defendant's lands, or merely produces effects upon the line of high water opposite to them, there being some discrepancy in the evidence on this last point; whether there were originally any bounds or marks by which the seashore could be clearly distinguished from the adjoining lands; and whether the accretions which have taken place were imperceptible in their progress, or could be perceived from time to time as they were going on—upon all of which subjects the evidence is at present extremely defective and unsatisfactory. I think it will be absolutely necessary for me to direct issues to be tried for the purpose of ascertaining the following facts: (i) whether by the direct or indirect operation of the acts of the defendant, or of any other person or persons, and by what acts, the natural line of high water before the defendants' lands in the parishes of Llanelly and Pembrey has been varied; and if so, to what extent; (ii) whether the variation (if any) in the natural line of high water has been slow, gradual and imperceptible, or otherwise; (iii) whether there are, or were, any marks or bounds by which the natural line of high water can now be ascertained and laid down. Until these facts are determined, it is not in my power to dispose of the important questions which these informations involve, although I have thought it right not to withhold my opinion upon some of the questions which were raised in the course of the argument.

Evidence—Document—Parol evidence as to effect—Evidence to identify property mentioned in deed—Intention of parties—Use and enjoyment of property.

Parol evidence is generally admissible to apply the words used in a deed and to identify the property comprised in it. One cannot show that the words were intended to include a particular piece of land, but facts can be proved from which may be collected the meaning of the words used so as to include or exclude a portion of land where the words are capable of either construction: per LORD CHELMSFORD, L.C.

The construction of a deed is always for the court, but, in order to apply its provisions, evidence is admissible of all material facts existing at the time of the execution of the deed so as to place the court in the position of the grantor. The state of the subject at the time of execution may always be inquired into, and as, with respect to ancient deeds, the state of the subject at their date can seldom, if ever, be proved by direct evidence, modern usage and enjoyment for a number of years is evidence to raise a presumption that the same course was adopted from an earlier period, and so to prove contemporaneous usage and enjoyment at the date of the deed. When the evidence of all material facts is exhausted and there is still ambiguity, no parol evidence of the grantor's intentions, as distinguished from extrinsic facts, can be admissible except in the single case of there being two subjects or two objects to which the terms of the instrument are equally applicable: per LORD WENSLEYDALE:

E Appeal from a decision of the Court of Exchequer Chamber in Ireland in an action of trespass for breaking and entering lands of the plaintiff called Scartnaglowrane or Tincurry, in the Barony of Iffa and Offa, in the county of Tipperary, with dogs and guns, hunting and searching for game.

By the consent of the parties, an issue was directed (under the Common Law F Procedure Amendment (Ireland) Act, 1853, to be tried,

"whether, under the lease of Jan. 9, 1704, and the several derivative and renewal leases under which the defendant's title is acquired, the defendant is, as against the plaintiff, entitled to the right of sporting over the lands in the plaint mentioned."

G The parcels in the lease are thus described:

"All that and those the lands, tenements and hereditaments in Scatany, containing by estimation 94 acres; Gannyroane, containing by estimation 104 acres; and the village of Scartnaglowrane and part of Whitechurch and Tincurry, containing by estimation 148 acres—as fully and amply as the same was demised and granted to Sir Richard Pyne by the corporation for making hollow sword blades, now and of late in the occupation of Thomas Travers, gentleman, and his under-tenants, lying and being in the parish of Whitechurch, in the barony of Iffa and Offa, and county of Tipperary, with all the rights, members and appurtenances to the said lands and premises belonging or in anywise appertaining, excepting and always reserving mines, minerals, and all other royalties whatsoever, with liberty of ingress and egress to dig, cut, and carry away the same with horses, carriages and otherwise, with liberty of fishing, fowling, hunting and hawking, which the said Sir Richard Pyne doth hereby reserve to himself, his heirs and assigns, in and upon all and singular the premises, and also excepting always unto Thomas Travers, gentleman, and his assigns, tenants of the lands of Burgess, to Richard and John Beer, gentlemen, and their assigns, tenants of the lands of Ballyhohane, Ballygirrane and Tirbud, to Edmund Daniel, gentleman, and his assigns, tenants of the lands of Rugsagh, free liberty of commonage, and cutting of turf on the mountain of Tincurry."

I

On the trial the defendant began, and, after putting in the lease of 1704, he proved by witnesses possession of the mountain land in question by his tenants for the space of more than twenty years; that portion of it had been reclaimed, and that the tenants, who occupied this reclaimed land, had paid rent for it to the defendant and his father from the year 1826; and that the defendant and his father had sported over the lands, though from what period did not appear. It was also proved in the defendant's case that some tenants of the defendant had cut turf upon the mountain. At the close of the defendant's case, the plaintiff called upon the learned judge to withdraw the case from the jury, and to direct a verdict for him, on the ground that upon the construction of the lease of 1704 the 1,700 acres of mountain did not pass to the lessee. This, however, the judge refused to do, and the plaintiff thereupon went into evidence to show disputes between him and the defendant as to the ownership of Scartnaglowrane, and to prove instances of the defendant having been warned off, though these were carried back only a very few years, and it was not shown that the defendant went off upon being warned, but the only evidence was that he "did not and would not go off." The plaintiff's witnesses also gave a description of the village of Scartnaglowrane.

When the case was on both sides closed, the learned judge stated that before directing the jury as to what verdict they should find, which he stated it was his intention to do, he would, in order, if possible, to save further expense, take their opinion on a question of fact, whether, under the terms of the lease of Jan. 9, 1704, the 1700 statute acres of wild mountain land passed under the words "the village of Scartnaglowrane" in the lease contained. His lordship having charged them upon that question, the jury stated that they found that the 1700 statute acres of mountain did pass by the lease of January, 1704, under the words "village of Scartnaglowrane" in the lease mentioned. His Lordship thereupon being of opinion that, on the true construction of the lease of 1704, the mountain did not pass, directed the jury to find a verdict for the plaintiff. Thereupon the defendant's counsel excepted and placed upon record five exceptions to the judge's direction. These having been argued before the Court of Queen's Bench in Ireland, that court overruled all the exceptions, and gave judgment for the plaintiff. But, upon error being brought, a majority of the judges of the Court of Exchequer Chamber were of opinion that the exceptions ought to have been allowed. The judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench was, therefore, reversed, the verdict set aside, and a venire de novo awarded. Against this judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber the plaintiff appealed.

Sir Fitzroy Kelly, Q.C., and Prentice for the appellant.

Macdonough, Q.C., Butt, Q.C., and Hemphill for the respondent.

At the conclusion of the argument the House put to the learned judges the following question:

"Was there evidence given by the defendant for the purpose of proving that the mountain of Scartnaglowrane or Tincurry was comprehended within the terms 'village of Scartnaglowrane,' in the lease of 1701, which the judge ought to have submitted to the jury in support of the affirmative of the issue?"

The learned judges, viz., WIGHTMAN, WILLIAMS, and CROMPTON, JJ., and MARTIN, BRAMWELL and WATSON, BB., answered in the affirmative.

July 12, 1859. The following opinions were read.

LORD CHELMSFORD, L.C.—The exceptions raised in this case to the ruling of the learned judge seem to me to raise sufficiently the real question, which is whether there was evidence which ought to be submitted to the jury to show that the mountain of Scartnaglowrane was parcel of the premises comprised in the lease of Jan. 9, 1704, or whether the language of the lease was so clear that it required and admitted of, no explanation, and was the subject merely of judicial construction.

- A In support of the opinion of the learned judges who thought that parol evidence was inadmissible to explain the lease, it must be contended that the words used could not by possibility apply to and include the mountain land. Parol evidence is generally admissible to apply the words used in a deed and to identify the property comprised within it. You cannot indeed show that the words were intended to include a particular piece of land, but you may prove facts from which
- B you may collect the meaning of the words used so as to include or exclude a portion of land where the words are capable of either construction. The judges, therefore, who decided that there was no question of fact to be left to the jury, must have been of opinion that the language of the lease was not capable of receiving a construction which would embrace the 1,700 acres of mountain land. They must have considered that the mountain land could not pass by the words "village of Scartnaglowrane," whatever evidence of enjoyment of it by the lessee might have been produced. It appears to me that it was sufficient for the defendant, in order to enable his case to reach the jury, to show that the word "village" was not a word of such limited and confined meaning as to be incapable of comprehending a large tract of country; but the learned judge could not have withdrawn the question from them, and taken it upon himself to decide, without being of opinion
- D that the word "village" was of such precise and definite application as to exclude ex vi termini any such large extent of land as the mountain land in question.

I think your Lordships will be of opinion that, so far from the word "village" being a word which any one can precisely define, so as to be able at once to say what is and what is not comprehended within it, it is difficult, if not impossible, to find what was its exact meaning and extent at the time when the lease of 1704 was made.

- E That its modern popular meaning is different from its ancient signification is sufficiently apparent from the various authorities which were referred to in the course of the argument from FORTESCUE, COKE, SHEPPARD and other authors. None of the passages referred to from all these writers assists in fixing any certain meaning to the term, but they will tend to establish what is sufficient for the present purpose, that it is a word which was formerly at least of extensive signification and might have comprehended within it a district as large as the mountain of Scartnaglowrane. It is quite unnecessary to go further, because, if the word "village" was capable of this enlarged meaning, then the defendant's case ought to have been submitted to the jury, not for the purpose of then deciding on the terms of the question of fact, upon which their opinion was taken by the learned judge, whether under the terms of the lease of Jan. 9, 1704, the 1,700 statute acres of wild mountain land passed
- G under the words "the village of Scartnaglowrane," which in that form was a question for him, and not for them, but whether the defendant's evidence did not show an enjoyment of the mountain and as lessee under the lease of 1704, and as parcel of that lease.

It is unnecessary to consider the nature and effect of the defendant's evidence, and perhaps it would not be right to do so, as it must be submitted to another jury.

- H I think the learned judge ought not to have decided the case himself upon his construction of the lease, but ought to have left the evidence to the jury. Therefore, the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber ought to be affirmed, and a venire de novo awarded.

- LORD CRANWORTH.—Concurring, as I do, entirely in the view which has been taken of this case by my noble and learned friend, I might have satisfied myself by merely giving a silent acquiescence, but I think that would be hardly respectful to the learned judges in Ireland, who appear to have been nearly equally divided upon the point for our decision. I shall, however, make but very few observations.

The only point for our decision is whether the learned judge at the trial was right in treating the question as one entirely of law, and not at all of fact—in other words, whether he was right in treating the description of the parcels as insufficient, in point of law, to include the mountain. It is certain that, where parcels are described in old documents by words of a general nature or of doubtful import, we may—indeed, we must—recur to usage to show what they comprehend. Where, indeed, A words have a clear and definite meaning, no evidence can be admitted to explain or control them. Thus a demise of my messuage at Dale could not by any parol evidence be shown to have been meant to describe not a messuage, but a sheet of water. The distinction is obvious. Here I agree with the opinions of the learned judges whose assistance we have had in this house, that the words of the deed were sufficient to include the mountain, and that there was some evidence (I do not speculate as to its weight), to show that, under the demise, the lessees have had the enjoyment of the mountain. The passage referred to from SHEPPARD'S TOUCHSTONE, at p. 92, is thus:

"This word 'village' or 'town' is of large extent also, and by the grant of it a manor, land, meadow and pasture land, and divers such like things may pass."

The passage shows that the word "village" is of a most comprehensive character; and though it does not refer specifically to a mountain as something which it may include, yet it makes express mention of a manor which certainly might include in it a waste mountain. If "village" might have been intended to include the mountain, is there any evidence to show that it was so intended? I think clearly there was on the face of the deed. The reservation to the lessee of the right of sporting might, perhaps, have been made with reference only to the lands under cultivation, but I can hardly understand the reservation to tenants of other lands of the right to cut turf on the mountain, if the mountain was not supposed to be included in the lease. D

It is not, however, on the evidence appearing on the face of the deed that I mainly rely. I think there is parol evidence of usage, from which it might reasonably have been inferred that under the word "village" the mountain passed. There was evidence that the defendant's father had from time to time reclaimed and brought into cultivation portions of the mountain for which he and the defendant, his son, had been receiving rent; and that their tenants alone depastured their cattle on it. This was certainly evidence to show that the defendant had a title to the mountain under the lease, the language there used being sufficient to comprise it. There is abundant evidence that the defendant and his ancestors sported over the mountain at their pleasure, and without interruption. This also, though of a more doubtful nature, ought certainly to have been submitted to the jury as affording some evidence of ownership. On these grounds, therefore, that the word "village" would, in point of law, be sufficient to include the mountain, and that there was some evidence of the exercise of ownership by the tenants over the mountain, which might be attributed to their right under the lease, I think the judge was wrong in withdrawing the case from the jury, and the Court of Exchequer Chamber was right in saying that there should be a venire de novo. E F G

LORD WENSLEYDALE.—I agree in the opinion of all the judges who have been consulted by your Lordships, that there ought to be a venire de novo, and consequently that the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber in Ireland ought to be affirmed. BRAMWELL, B., indeed, in the first instance intimated his opinion that upon the grammatical construction of the first clause in the use of the connective word "and," the village of Scartnaglowrane and part of Whitechurch and Tincurry were comprised in the 148 estimated acres, and if so, the mountain of Scartnaglowrane, which comprised 1,700 English acres, could not pass under the description of the village of that name. But I think it clear that the sentence is reasonably capable of the construction that the village of Scartnaglowrane was conveyed, and also part of Whitechurch and Tincurry, containing by estimation 148 acres; and if the evidence should show that the mountain of Scartnaglowrane was comprised in the term "village" as afterwards explained, the latter construction ought to be adopted. H I

In the course of the long and elaborate discussion which this case underwent in the Irish court, some observations were incidentally made which are liable to be

- A misunderstood as to the limits within which parol evidence is receivable to explain deeds, as if it could be done only in cases of doubt. Some observations were also made to the effect that what was intended by the grantor might be always submitted to the jury when parol evidence was receivable—whether parcel or not is often said, but not with strict propriety, to be a question for the jury. I apprehend that the true rule is perfectly well settled, and is fully explained in SIR JAMES WIGRAM's excellent treatise on the subject (ADMISSION OF EXTRINSIC EVIDENCE IN AID OF INTERPRETATION OF WILLS). The construction of a deed is always for the court, but in order to apply its provisions evidence is in every case admissible of all material facts existing at the time of the execution of the deed, so as to place the court in the situation of the grantor. In deeds as well as wills the state of the subject at the time of execution may always be inquired into, and as, with respect to ancient deeds, the state of the subject at their date can seldom, if ever, be proved by direct evidence, modern usage and enjoyment for a number of years is evidence to raise a presumption that the same course was adopted from an earlier period, and so to prove contemporaneous usage and enjoyment at the date of the deed. These deeds are to be construed by evidence of the manner in which the subject has been possessed or used, as LORD COKE observes (2 Co. Inst. 282), optimus interpres rerum usus: Weld v. Hornby (1); Duke of Beaufort v. Swansea Corpn. (2). LORD HARDWICKE, with reference to the construction of ancient grants and deeds, says, there is no better way of construing them than by usage, and contemporanea expositio is the best way to go by. That was in A.-G. v. Parker (3). LORD ST. LEONARDS follows in A.-G. v. Drummond (4), and says one of the most settled rules of law is that you may resort to contemporaneous usage for the meaning of a deed. "Tell me what you have done under such a deed, and I will tell you what the deed means." When the evidence of all material facts is exhausted and there is still ambiguity, no parol evidence of the grantor's intentions as distinguished from extrinsic facts can be admissible, except in the single case of there being two subjects or two objects to which the terms of the instruments are equally applicable, a condition of things which does not exist in the present case.
- F The question is: What is passed under the description of the village of Scartnaglowrane, in the deed of 1704. That the word "village," in deeds of old date, might comprise land is laid down in the passage, so often repeated from the TOUCHSTONE, p. 92, where it is treated as synonymous with "town"; and the great majority of the judges, and indeed all the judges whom your Lordships have consulted, are ultimately of opinion that the word is capable of being so construed. In modern deeds such a description would not be likely to occur. There would be a full particular of the land meant to be conveyed by specifying the number of acres, or some particular description; but in ancient deeds, especially in Ireland, where it appears that small account is made of the acreage of the waste, no more than the simple description of "village" or townland may suffice. Is there then evidence of enjoyment which ought to have been submitted to the jury as proof that, at the date of the lease, the mountain of Scartnaglowrane, or Tincurry was enjoyed by the lessee. I am clearly of opinion that there is. There was evidence that the mountain of Scartnaglowrane and of Tincurry were the same mountain; that those under whom the defendant claimed sported over the mountain forty years ago, and were never stopped by anyone; that part of the mountain was reclaimed from time to time, some as early as 1836, and that the defendant's tenants had occupied and
- I paid him rent for the same; that some of it was tilled, and fell back into a wild state, and that the defendant's tenants always grazed on the mountain, and cut turf on it. This was the defendant's case. On the other side it was proved that the plaintiff had for three years paid rates and income tax for it; that he had for ten years preserved game, and prevented any person from shooting; and that the defendant was warned off, but would not go; that Lord Glengall had a deputation or licence from the plaintiff since 1846 for shooting; that the plaintiff himself was not interfered with, and that the village of Scartnaglowrane consisted of a few scattered houses.

This constituted the case on both sides, and there was certainly evidence for some thirty years of acts of ownership exercised over the mountain, the most important of which was the reclaiming parts of the waste at different times, without objection on the part of the landlord, and without any payment of rent to which he would have been entitled if the mountain was not part of the subject demised, coupled with payment of rent to the defendant from the tenants, which he was not entitled to receive unless the land was his own. The acts of pasturing and shooting over the waste were proved with some evidence to the contrary. The question for the jury arises whether all these acts of pasturing and shooting were to be considered as mere trespasses in a wild country, and the enclosures of the same nature, each of little value, made behind the landlord's back, an appropriation or a sort of stealing of land without any authority, or whether they were done in the exercise of a right claimed by the defendant, and whether the jury would presume from modern acts never properly disputed by the lessor that the lessees always, from the date of the lease, were in possession of the mountain, and had as much enjoyment of it as the nature of the case would admit. It was entirely for the consideration of the jury on the whole evidence on both sides, what character they would give to these acts. Unless the jury were satisfied that they were exercises of a right to the possession of the soil, and that the defendant and his ancestors had enjoyed it from the date of the lease, the question would be decided against the defendant, for the burden of proof lay upon him. [His LORDSHIP dealt with a question of fact which does not call for report, and concluded:] I advise your Lordships that the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber in Ireland should be affirmed with costs.

LORD BROUGHAM, in concurring, said that he considered that the Court of Exchequer Chamber in Ireland rightly held that the learned judge was wrong in withdrawing the evidence from the jury, and properly directed a venire de novo. I shall, therefore, move your Lordships to give judgment for the respondent, and that a venire de novo be awarded.

Carriage of Goods—Common carrier—Loss of goods—Liability—Valuable property—No declaration of value—Delivery of property to carrier at place other than office or receiving house—Delivery to van on highway—Notice of increased charges—Carriers Act, 1830 (11 Geo. 4 and 1 Will. 4, c. 68), s. 1, s. 2.

Where a declaration under s. 1 of the Carriers Act, 1830,* of the value of property of the kinds specified in the section has not been made by the person delivering the same to a carrier for carriage the carrier is exempt from liability for the loss of the property even though the delivery of the property to him takes place, not at his office or other receiving house, but elsewhere, e.g., to a van on the highway. The carrier is not bound to give notice of his increased charges for carrying the goods before the declaration under s. 1 of the Act of 1830 is made to him. When the sender of the goods has declared their value the carrier

E Appeal from a decision of the Court of Exchequer in an action in which the plaintiff claimed from the defendant, a common carrier, damages for the loss of goods entrusted to the defendant for carriage which, the plaintiff alleged, was due to the negligence of the defendant.

F The defendant was a common carrier by land for hire, and carried on his business under the style or firm of Pickford & Co., at an office in Regent Street, London, and at other offices in England and Wales. The defendant notified, according to the Carriers Act, 1830, s. 2, by a notice affixed in legible characters in a public and conspicuous part of every one of the offices, the increased rate of charge required by him to be paid, over and above the ordinary rate of carriage, as a compensation for the greater risk and care to be taken for the safe conveyance of such articles of value as in the statute and notice mentioned. According to the course of the defendant's business as a common carrier, he was in the habit of receiving such packages and parcels as in the Act of Parliament mentioned, and other parcels, at the office in Regent Street, and at his other places of business, to be conveyed by him as common carrier to the places to which he carried, among others to the station of the North-Western Rail. Co., at Camden Town, London.

H On July 31, 1849, the plaintiff sent to the office of the defendant in Regent Street, and requested the clerk who conducted the defendant's business for him there to send to the plaintiff's place of business in Regent Street for certain goods to be carried thence by the defendant in the way of his business to the station of the North-Western Rail. Co. Next day, in consequence of that message, the defendant sent his servant with a cart to the plaintiff's place of business to receive and carry the package, and the plaintiff delivered to the servant a case containing articles of value exceeding £10. The value and nature of the articles was not declared by the plaintiff, or by any person, to the defendant or to his clerk or servant, and no increased charge was paid, nor was any engagement to pay the same given or offered to the defendant or to his clerk or servant in respect of the package or the articles contained therein. The servant, with the cart, called at different offices of the defendant for parcels to carry to various places, and then drove to the defendant's office in Regent Street. While the cart was there waiting for more packages and parcels to be carried to the station, the plaintiff's package was lost by theft, and, consequently, not delivered at the station. A

At the trial of the action before POLLOCK, C.B., the learned judge was of opinion that the defendant was within the protection of the Carriers Act, 1830, s. 1, and he directed the jury to find for the defendant, reserving leave for the plaintiff to move to enter a verdict for him. B

The plaintiff obtained a rule nisi accordingly, and the matter came before the Court of Exchequer on Nov. 2, 1850, and Jan. 16 and 18 and April 29, 1851.

By the Carriers Act, 1830 :

"Section 1. No mail contractor, stagecoach proprietor, or other common carrier by land for hire shall be liable for the loss of or injury to any article or articles or property of the descriptions following : (that is to say) : gold or silver coin of this realm or of any foreign State, or any gold or silver in a manufactured or unmanufactured state, or any precious stones, jewellery, watches, clocks, or timepieces of any description, trinkets, bills, notes of the governor and company of the Banks of England, Scotland, and Ireland respectively, or of any other bank in Great Britain or Ireland, orders, notes, or securities for payment of money, English or foreign, stamps, maps, writings, title-deeds, paintings, engravings, pictures, gold or silver plate, or plated articles, glass, china [silks in a manufactured or unmanufactured state and whether wrought up or not wrought up with other materials], furs, or lace, or any of them, contained in any parcel or package which shall have been delivered, either to be carried for hire or to accompany the person of any passenger in any mail or stagecoach or other public conveyance, when the value of such article or articles or property aforesaid contained in such parcel or package shall exceed the sum of £10, unless at the time of the delivery thereof at the office, warehouse, or receiving-house of such mail contractor, stagecoach proprietor, or other common carrier, or to his, her, or their book-keeper, coachman, or other servant, for the purpose of being carried or of accompanying the person of any passenger as aforesaid, the value and nature of such article or articles or property shall have been declared by the person or persons sending or delivering the same, and such increased charge as hereinafter mentioned, or an engagement to pay the same, be accepted by the person receiving such parcel or package. C

"Section 2. When any parcel or package containing any of the articles above specified shall be so delivered, and its value and contents declared as aforesaid, and such value shall exceed the sum of £10, it shall be lawful for such mail contractors, stage-coach proprietors, and other common carriers, to demand and receive an increased rate of charge, to be notified by some notice affixed in legible characters in some public and conspicuous part of the office, warehouse or other receiving house where such parcels or packages are received by them for the purpose of conveyance, stating the increased rates of charge required to be paid over and above the ordinary rate of carriage as a compensation for the greater risk and care to be taken for the safe conveyance of such valuable articles; and all persons sending or delivering parcels or packages containing such valuable articles as aforesaid at such office shall be bound by such notice, without further proof of the same having come to their knowledge." D

Montagu Chambers, Bramwell and C. Pollock supported the rule. F

PARKE, B., in giving the judgment of the court, said that the learned judges were all of opinion (with the exception of POLLOCK, C.B., who retained the opinion which he expressed at the trial) that the rule should be made absolute to enter a verdict for the plaintiff in respect of all the property lost, on the ground that the Carriers Act, 1830, did not exempt carriers from responsibility for the loss of silk, trinkets, etc., delivered to them at any other place than their office, ware- G

A house, or receiving-house, where a notice under s. 2 of the Act was affixed. The goods in the present case having been delivered to the defendant's servant in a cart at the plaintiff's house without any special contract, the defendant was responsible as a carrier at common law. The statute, having in the preamble recited the difficulty of proving actual notice, pointed out (by s. 2) to what persons the notice should be restricted, those were persons who delivered goods at the office where the notice was affixed, and they were expressly declared to be bound by it without further proof. But those who delivered goods, not at the office, but elsewhere, were in no part of the Act declared to be bound by the notice, and it could never have been intended to exempt carriers from liability to persons who delivered goods to them without receiving any notice, actual or constructive, to limit their responsibility.

Feb. 7, 1852. Willes (Phipson with him) for the defendant.

D PATTESON, J.—We are all of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Exchequer is not correct, and, therefore, there must be a venire de novo. We have come to that conclusion after an attentive consideration of the Act of Parliament and of the judgment of the Court of Exchequer.

The first section has a plain and obvious meaning. The recital clearly shows that one object of the Act was to provide for the giving notice by persons sending parcels of a particular description. The section then proceeds to enact that the carrier shall not be liable for the loss of certain enumerated articles—it does not say “when any notice shall have been given by him,” but “unless at the time of the delivery [of the goods at the office of the carrier] the value and nature . . . of the property shall have been declared by the person or persons sending or delivering the same, and such increased charge as hereinafter mentioned, or an engagement to pay the same, be accepted by the person receiving such parcel or package.”

F These latter are the only words which afford any ground for saying that a carrier is bound to give some notice of some kind before he is entitled to have the value and nature of the package stated to him by the person delivering it. It was argued that all the other clauses are incorporated with the first. We think that is not so. The meaning of the legislature is that all persons sending goods of a particular description and value, whenever they deliver them to the carrier, are bound to give information of the nature and value of the articles. That is the first clause, and the object of the legislature was that such information should be given, whether the goods were delivered at the office of the carrier, or at the sender's house, or on the road, or elsewhere; and clauses follow with certain provisions as to what is then to be done. Although the value and nature of the articles may be declared, it does not necessarily follow that the carrier would be protected, but a different clause must be acted on before his liability ceases.

G However, the first step to be taken is that the sender of the goods notify their value; then it is that the carrier is entitled to have a larger charge. He cannot have that larger charge, or save himself from responsibility, by saying: “I will have such and such a sum of money,” but he must have a tariff stuck up in his office, to notify to all persons sending articles of that kind what he proposes to demand beyond the usual charge. The notice required by s. 2 to be affixed in the office is not a notice that the carrier means to avail himself of the benefit of the Act, and that all persons who send articles of a particular description and value shall tell him that they are of that description and value—for the statute requires that in the first instance—but it is only a notice of what the extra charge is to be. This construction reconciles all the provisions of the Act.

H Counsel for the plaintiff argued that the latter part of s. 2, which says that all persons who deliver at the office shall be bound by the notice there stuck up without further proof of the same, is at variance with this view. He contended, that no person can be in the condition of not being able to maintain an action against a carrier for the loss of goods, although their value has not been declared, unless that notice has been affixed, and there has been a delivery at the office. Such a construction would vitiate the primary object of the legislature. In truth, the real question here is: Who is to take the first step? We think that the Act requires the person who sends the goods to take the first step by giving that information which he alone can give; then the carrier may charge an additional price, but he can only charge the price notified in his office, and he is bound, if required, to give a receipt when the money is paid. All that follows the first step which is to be taken by the sender of the goods; the carrier is not liable unless the declaration be made, and it must be made in all cases, whether the goods are delivered at the office or elsewhere. The declaration, when made, will lead to the consequences that, if the extra charge be paid and the goods lost, the carrier will be liable, or, on the other hand, if he refuses to give a receipt, he will lose the benefit of the statute. But in no case can the sender recover unless he has taken the step which the legislature intended he should take in the first instance. Therefore, we think that the decision appealed from was wrong and there must be a venire de novo.

Venire de novo.

JOHNSTONE AND OTHERS v. BEATTIE

[House of Lords (Lord Lyndhurst, L.C., Lord Brougham, Lord Cottenham, Lord Campbell and Lord Langdale), March 27, 28, April 3, May 26, 1843]

8 E.R. 657]

Infant—Guardian—Appointment by court—Infant domiciled abroad—Temporary residence in England—Property in foreign country—Guardians appointed in foreign country by will of infant's father.

The Court of Chancery, on the application of the next-of-kin of an infant whose parents are dead, has jurisdiction to appoint a guardian of the infant although the infant is domiciled abroad and is only temporarily resident in England, his whole property is situated in a foreign country, and guardians of the infant have been appointed in the foreign country by the will of the deceased father of the infant, in any case in which it appears that it is for the interest and benefit of the infant that there shall be appointed by the court a guardian who is within the jurisdiction of the court and subject to the court. Guardians appointed abroad under foreign law have no rights, as such, in England so as to be considered as entitled to the legal custody of an infant during his residence in England, but in a proper case the court has power to appoint foreign guardians to act conjointly with a guardian or guardians who reside in England.

So held by LORD LYNDHURST, L.C., LORD COTTENHAM and LORD LANGDALE, LORD BROUGHAM and LORD CAMPBELL dissenting.

Appeal from an order of LORD COTTENHAM, L.C., dated April 17, 1841, whereby it was ordered, that an order of Mar. 19, 1841, made on the petition of the appellants should be discharged, except so far as the same discharged an order of Jan. 6 then last, made on the petition of the respondent, and that it should be referred to the master to approve of a proper person or persons to be appointed the guardian or guardians of the infant, Mary Stewart Beattie, and that the master should inquire and state to the court the infant's age, what relations she had, and the nature and amount of her fortune, and also on what evidence or ground he approved of any particular person or persons to be such guardian or guardians; and that he should also consider of a scheme for the residence of the infant, and what would be proper to be allowed for her maintenance and education, to commence from Dec. 21, 1840, the time of the death of Christina Beattie, the mother of the infant, and for the time to come, during her minority, and to state out of what funds such allowance ought to be paid; and that, after the master should have made his report, such further order should be made as should be just. Turner and Romilly for the appellants.

Sir William Webb Follett, Q.C., and Spencer Follett for the respondent.

May 26, 1843. The following opinions were delivered : E

LORD LYNDHURST, L.C.—In this case a bill was filed in the name of an infant, Mary Stewart Beattie, by her next friend, her grandfather, Duncan Stewart, against the defendants, alleging that the defendants were in possession of certain rents and profits, the produce of the estates of the infant, to a very large amount, and praying that they might account in the Court of Chancery for the sums which they had so received. It prayed also that a maintenance might be appointed for the infant, and that the estates and her person might be placed under the protection of the court. This was the scope and object of the bill. According to the uniform course of the Court of Chancery, which I understand to have always been the law of that court, upon the institution of this suit the infant plaintiff became a ward of the court, and, that being so, it was the duty of the court to provide for her care and protection. As the court cannot personally superintend its infant ward, it appoints a guardian, who is an officer of the court, for the purpose of doing that which the court cannot do itself personally. If there be a parent or a testamentary guardian within the jurisdiction of the court, the court, in that case, does not appoint a person to take care of the person of the infant, but the parent or testamentary guardian is subject to the orders and control of the court precisely in the same way as an officer appointed by its authority for the purpose of discharging the duties in question. This appointment is not made without previous inquiry and consideration. The court directs the master to inquire who are the proper persons to be entrusted with the care of the infant; and, as the custody and care may endure for some time, it is necessary that some inquiry should be made for the purpose of determining how that care should be exercised. An inquiry is made as to the property of the infant, and as to what is proper to be allowed for his maintenance, and also as to the manner in which his education shall be conducted. All these are the preliminary inquiries as to the matters of fact for the information of the court; and when the master has made his report, the report is taken into consideration by the court, and the court acts upon it according to its judgment. It does not necessarily adopt the suggestion of the master, but it uses the materials which are found by the master as the ground upon which the judgment proceeds. F G H I

The order which is complained of is merely an order of this description. LORD COTTENHAM, L.C., has directed the master to inquire who are proper persons to be

- A appointed as guardians of the infant, or, in other words, to approve of persons to be guardians, and to inquire what will be a proper maintenance for the infant, what her property consists of, and what scheme of education should be adopted. I apprehend, therefore, that the order is according to the common rule of the court, and I do not precisely understand the grounds upon which it is objected to. One objection is that, the young lady being a Scottish child, tutors and curators have
- B been appointed in Scotland by the will of the father. The father is dead, and the mother also is dead, but the child is here in England. The tutors and curators are domiciled and living in Scotland, out of the jurisdiction of the court, which can exercise no control over them. It cannot make them accountable for any misconduct in the management of the infant; and I apprehend that in all cases the court requires that there shall be a guardian appointed within the jurisdiction of the court,
- C responsible to the court, and subject to its authority. If there be a parent or a testamentary guardian residing out of the jurisdiction, the court interferes, and appoints a guardian within the jurisdiction, because it must have some person to look to, someone who is the representative of the court, on the spot, and responsible to it, who shall have the care and management of the infant. The tutors and curators domiciled in Scotland have no authority in this country. They cannot
- D control the infant. If the infant chooses to take the protection of any improper person, the tutors and curators have no power to interfere, except through the medium of the Court of Chancery. A guardian may be appointed by the authority of that court; and if a complaint is made to the Court of Chancery by the tutors and the curators, the Court of Chancery will set it right through the medium of the officer whom the court has appointed. If it is thought desirable that the child
- E should go to Scotland to reside, the tutors and curators have no power to take the child there unless the court, having appointed a guardian, thinks fit, for the benefit of the child, to direct the guardian to hand the child over to them to be carried to Scotland for education or for any other purpose.

- It seems to have been assumed in this argument, that, because the guardians are appointed by the Court of Chancery, it has, therefore, by this order decided, that she
- F is to be educated, and have her maintenance given in England, and is to continue here up to the time of her attaining the age of twenty-one. But no such consequence follows. The court may, at any time, direct her to be taken to Scotland to be educated there, if it considers that it will be for her benefit. The order does not go to the extent of saying, that there is to be no change in the residence of the child. It is subject entirely to the control, order, and discretion of the Lord Chancellor for the time being. It is supposed also that the tutors and curators appointed
- G in Scotland are not to be the guardians, or not to be among the guardians, of the child. All that the court requires is that there shall be some person within the jurisdiction, and responsible to the court, performing the duties of guardian. There is nothing inconsistent in this order with the Lord Chancellor ultimately appointing the tutors and curators who reside in Scotland as guardians, conjointly with any
- H other persons who are residing in this country.

- This, therefore, appears to me to be an order in the common course. But, it is said, that, from this order it will follow, that any child of foreign or Scottish parents, brought to England for the purpose of education, may be made a ward of Chancery, and impounded at once in this country. Undoubtedly there may be cases of that description. Cases may be supposed where the Court of Chancery, under such
- I circumstances, ought to interfere. Then it is said that fictitious cases may be set up, and that a bill may be filed expressly for that purpose by some concert or contrivance. The authority of the court may, of course, be subject to be abused in this instance as in every other instance, but the court will vindicate its own authority, and will not suffer itself to be abused, and I know no case in which it has been suggested, that, in this direction, any abuse has been committed of the authority of the Court of Chancery. Suppose a bill, obviously fictitious, were to be filed, the court would afford an instant remedy. The bill might be referred to the master for the purpose of determining whether it was for the benefit of the infant that the suit should be prosecuted; and if the master should report in the negative, there would be an end of the suit, and the costs would fall upon the party who had so improperly instituted it; and, as a suit can only be instituted through the medium of a solicitor, the court would visit the solicitor in a further and much more exemplary manner. It does not appear to me, therefore, that the objection, that the authority may be abused, is any valid objection in a case of this description.

It is further suggested that this bill is filed solely for the purpose of making the infant a ward of the Court of Chancery. It may be so. It often happens that bills are filed solely for such purposes, and it may be a very important object, in which the interest of the infant is deeply concerned. Whether this bill is of this description or not, is wholly immaterial. It states facts which bring the case within the jurisdiction of the court. The defendants, who are in Scotland, have appeared to this bill, but they have not put in their answer, and the cause is not at issue. We cannot decide the merits of the cause in this stage of it. Such a course of proceeding was never heard of in the Court of Chancery. The cause is depending, and must be decided like every other cause. We cannot anticipate the result; but till the result takes place the child is a ward of the Court of Chancery. No person can interfere where a child is a ward of the Court of Chancery without calling down upon himself the process of the court. The appointment of guardians in this respect makes no difference. Whether there be guardians or not, the child is under the immediate control and in the custody of the Court of Chancery. The guardian is only appointed as an officer of the court, as the mode by which the jurisdiction and authority of the court is to be exercised. It may happen, indeed, in the result, that this bill may be dismissed; the next friend may have to pay all the costs, and the court may direct the infant to be handed over to the tutors and curators in Scotland, but, until the cause is decided, the child is absolutely a ward of court, and cannot be taken out of its jurisdiction. The appointment of a guardian makes no difference, except as the medium through which the jurisdiction of the court is exercised; because it is better that the court should prevent violence and misconduct, than that it should be afterwards called upon to investigate a charge of violence and misconduct for the purpose of affording a remedy. For these reasons, therefore, I humbly move your Lordships that this order be affirmed.

LORD BROUGHAM.—The appointment of guardians to infants who are unprotected appears to arise in all countries from the necessity of the case; and it would be difficult to point out any other particular in which the jurisprudence of all countries agrees more generally than in the existence of such a power usually confided by the sovereign to the courts of the realm. The nature of the appointment seems personal, as the object of it is the infant's personal protection. But there is incident to the office, also, the care of the infant's property; and in some systems of law, as that of Rome and of the countries which adopted the civil law, a distinction is made between the care of the property and that of the person, curators being given to the former, tutors to the latter.

It is very material to the present question, that we should mark the provisions of the Scottish law on this head, Scotland being beyond all reasonable doubt the domicile of the infant in this case, as it is admitted to have been the place of her birth and the place where all her property is situated. By the law of Scotland, the father may appoint a guardian to act after his decease. In default of such appointment, or of the appointed guardian accepting the office, the right of the guardianship by law devolves upon the next-of-kin, called the nearest agnate; a year, annus deliberandi, is given this relation to determine whether or not he will accept the office, called that of tutor legitim, or of law. In case he declines, a guardian is appointed by the Court of Session, called tutor dative. But so much is the will of the parent and the legal right of the agnate regarded, that if either the tutor testamentary or the tutor of law at any time shall elect to act, the powers and appointment of the tutor dative at once cease. The necessity of extraordinary protection to unprotected

A infants leaves no doubt of the power in the sovereign, or those to whom he has delegated it, to appoint a guardian whensoever an infant comes before him or them and requires protection.

The jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery in the present case is indisputable. The court always and in every case has the jurisdiction, but it is not in every case a matter of course that it should be exercised. On the contrary, its exercise is discretionary, and in many cases would be a plain miscarriage of the court, requiring correction by the court of appellate jurisdiction. The first question that arises in considering this matter is the degree in which the protection is wanted and the infant left unprotected, because this may be said to be the ground of the jurisdiction, but most emphatically it is the thing that calls for and thus justifies the exercise of it. As there are guardians in this case appointed by the lex domicilii, this leads me to consider what are the powers of a guardian beyond the territory in which he is appointed, and to which the infant belongs. Most of the authorities in the general law of Europe seem agreed that the guardian validly appointed in any given country has an authority for the protection of the ward and the administration of his personal estate everywhere ex comitate; and the manifest convenience of this comitas, as well as the evident consideration that the appointment is eminently of a personal nature, appears to justify this position. The guardian is a substitute for the parent, and the artificial relation, resembling the natural, from which it flows, ought surely to follow the same analogies, and to extend everywhere with the person. Where the choice of guardian is made either by the natural parent in exercise of his parental power, or power common to all nations, or by the substitution of the next-of-kin in default of such appointment, or by the authority of the supreme court to which the parent and infant alike owe allegiance, and which has the sole disposal of the infant's property, then surely nothing can be alleged to show that this choice should not be respected in every country in which the infant may accidentally be found for a temporary residence. There is no difference between the systems of the two countries, no peculiarity in that of Scotland, except that which makes the application of an English jurisdiction much more intolerable, because the law of the infant's domicile gives a great preference to the guardians of blood and kindred, and confines the authority of the court within very narrow limits.

The only exception to the natural authority which rests upon principle is that of the real estate. It seems reasonable enough that the power of the foreign-appointed guardian should be confined to the personalty of the infant in order to exclude his interference with the immoveable property, which is more primarily subject to the lex loci than the moveable, which has no situs, but follows the person of the owner. The authority of all, or nearly all, jurists follows these principles. VARTTEL (Bk. 2, ch. 7, s. 85) lays it down generally that the guardian appointed by the judges of the domicile is guardian wherever the pupil may have any concerns. HERRIUS says (1 Opera de Colli. Leg., s. 4, n. 8), "Tutor datus in loco domicilii etiam bona alibi sita administrat," but he confines this to personalty. It is to be observed, that his dictum excludes all necessity of confirmation or new appointment by the foreign courts, wherein the guardian is to sue or to be sued. MATTHEUS (DE AUCTIONIBUS, lib. 1, chap. 7, n. 10) confines the power also to personalty, though others, as STOCKMANS, make it general. BOULLENOIS (4 Obs. 51) is equally strong to this effect; and MERLIN (Repertoire, 414) expressly says that a guardian sues for debts due to his ward abroad, without any confirmation whatever of his title. Even those who have been cited on the other side, as P. VOET and J. VOET, are, in so far as personal property is concerned, only apparently at variance with the authorities, because they hold all such property to belong to the country of the infant's domicile. One thing at least is clear, that none of those jurists, not even STORY, who quotes the American laws as not recognising the authority in one State of the guardians named in another, has ever thought of contending that the foreign guardian cannot exercise the personal superintendence of his ward; still less do they ever contemplate the possibility of any court appointing guardians for a foreign infant. We may add the authority of what was held in the case of a bankrupt's assignee, in Hunter v. Potts (1), by the Court of King's Bench; and in Morrison v. Earl of Sutherland (2), by this House in the instance of a lunatic's committee, in both of which cases the legally appointed curator in one country was held entitled to act in another. A

Can it be doubted that these principles, although not sufficient to exclude the jurisdiction of the courts in any given country, would be abundantly sufficient to restrain its exercise; in other words, that they would prescribe to the court in which the infant's protection, either as to person or property, came in question, the propriety of limiting its inquiry in the first instance to the question whether the infant was unprotected or had a guardian already appointed validly by the courts, or according to the law, of the country to which she belonged and in which her property was situated? If it were found in the result of this inquiry, that the infant had such guardians, would it not follow that to them the court should leave the matter, or at the most should only appoint them, or rather confirm their appointment, in order to remove any shadow of doubt respecting their title to act, though even to that interposition there would be a serious objection, as we shall presently see? Such I humbly conceive to be the course which the Court of Chancery, in the present instance, ought to have taken; and, the court not having taken it, I hold that there has been a miscarriage, which this court is required to correct. For, observe, how manifest is the convenience of such a course. The authority of the guardian appointed here may not be wholly nominal and nugatory, but it is, at least, exceedingly imperfect. The person he may dispose of, the property he cannot touch. Observe the absurdity of calling upon him to account here, when he cannot, by any possibility, have any money passing through his hands; he can only receive a shilling of the ward's estate by the good pleasure of the Scottish guardians, who are wholly and irremediably beyond the court's jurisdiction. Again, mark the consequences of there being an English guardian, under the authority of the court here. He cannot remove the ward out of the court's jurisdiction, although that ward is only here accidentally; she may have been brought here for her education—she must remain here till she attains majority. The penalty of resorting to our schools is her banishment forth of Scotland—the punishment she would have undergone for theft in her own country. B C D E F

The court has no choice in this matter. Discretion it does possess as to appointing a guardian and bringing the ward within the scope of its jurisdiction, but once there, it cannot suffer her to escape: De Manneville v. De Manneville (3); Mountstuart v. Mountstuart (4). It would not make the least difference upon the argument, if it were made to appear that the court might possibly, in the present day, relax the rigour of this rule, because, if the law contended for be good for anything, it was the law also when those cases were decided, that is, in 1801 and 1808, and, therefore, it is subject to all the objections which thence can arise. Nor does it materially alter the argument I am urging if we admit that on an application to the court the infant would be allowed to go to Scotland, for it is a serious grievance to any of the Queen's subjects to be prevented from going home without application to a court of equity, nor is it any answer to the inference drawn from them that the court may hereafter be applied to for a new order, allowing the ward to be removed to her own country, or for handing her over to her Scottish guardians, because the question, and the only question now before us, is the order made, and actually subsisting. G H

Let it be remembered, that it is an order extending over the whole period of the infant's minority. The guardians are appointed until she is twenty-one years of age. If this decision be affirmed, what parent can safely send or bring his children to England for any purpose, whether of education or health? He does so at the risk of their never returning to Scotland until they shall have completed their age of twenty-one years. The error which seems to me to have pervaded this argument arises from the undoubted position that the mere filing of the bill, in which any infant is concerned, makes that infant a ward of court, and that the naming a guardian is of course, because the court's powers are exercised through a I

- A guardian. But this only shows that incidental, and necessarily incidental, to a suit respecting the property or other rights of any infant, is the constitution of the wardship, and consequent appointment of the guardian. Why is this such an incidental? Because the infant must be represented and protected in the matter brought before the court. But here let it be carefully kept in mind, there is no such suit; no lis pendens incident to which is the wardship and guardianship.
- B The object, and the sole object, of the suit is to have a guardian appointed. Here there are guardians enough already in Scotland willing to act, and much more able to act than any the court can name, because they can be both curators and tutors, both manage the property and protect the person. But these are disregarded, in order that others may be named with half the authority, and may prevent the ward from returning home.
- C LORD HARDWICKE, in Butler v. Freeman (5), after showing that the court's jurisdiction is determined solely from the patria potestas, delegated by the Crown with the Great Seal, says:

"The court will even protect an infant against its parents, and a fortiori interferes, though there be a guardian appointed."

- D In other cases we have actual examples of such interference, as in Wilcox v. Drake (6), where the father's insolvency, and in Smith v. Bate (7), where the guardian's insolvency, were held sufficient grounds for interference to protect the infant. But LORD HARDWICKE defines the limits within which this power shall be exercised, in strict accordance with my argument. He says (Amb. at p. 303):
- E "I own that there must be grounds to bring this matter properly before the court; and therefore, if the father be living, and no suit instituted here, they cannot act summarily. There must be a suit pending, relative to the infant or his estate, to entitle the court to this jurisdiction."

The suit there was relative to an estate, and the bill prayed directions for its management. But there would be an end at once to this qualification, if, instead

- F of a suit pending, there was only a bill praying the appointment of a guardian; for, the only ground of the jurisdiction, or, at least, its exercise, being the suit, and the application for a guardian being in vain, according to LORD HARDWICKE, without such suit, the judgment below assumes the very application itself to be suit sufficient, none other being pending. The allegation in the bill, of property in England, makes no difference in the case: besides, it is positively denied, and
- G not re-affirmed. Such an allegation could always be made, and, if sufficient, the appointment of a guardian would be quite a matter of course. If the argument I have held is of any avail, assuredly it cannot be defeated in this manner by a naked and gratuitous suggestion.

I am, therefore, of opinion that there has been a miscarriage in this case, and that this House is called upon to reverse the erroneous order. That the Great

- H Seal had jurisdiction over the question, and was called upon to entertain it up to a certain point, is quite manifest, because on an allegation, whether by bill or by petition, that the infant, being within the jurisdiction, was not protected, there was a necessity for entertaining the complaint, so far at least as to inquire into the state of the facts and to ascertain whether or not the law and the courts of the infant's domicile had not sufficiently provided for the guardianship. As in this
- I case guardians have been appointed in the country of the infant's domicile, the Great Seal ought, in my humble judgment, to withdraw and leave the guardian of the domicile in possession of the ward. If it be said that the Scottish guardian is out of the jurisdiction and that mischief might have arisen to the ward without a remedy, or that the good intentions of the court might be defeated by leaving the custody to persons over whom it has no control, the answer is obvious, and it is satisfactory. The property, at all events, must be left so unprotected in every respect whatever. Over that the court can have no control. But the Scottish guardians, who have the care of it, may also extend their care to the person, though in England. Nor will they be unaccountable in performing that office; they are accountable to the Scottish court, and they will be compelled by that court to do their duty, and visited with punishment for neglecting it, as well touching the person as touching the property. The same law and the same judicature to which we must of absolute necessity leave the whole care of the property, may well be left to take care also of the person, and to dispose of all the questions that may arise in connection with that case.

LORD COTTENHAM.—But for the difference of opinion which I was aware existed upon this subject among the members of your Lordships' House, I certainly should have thought it a case which was purely of course, and this an order which is consistent with every day's practice in the Court of Chancery, to the pronouncing of which I never in my experience have known any exception. But knowing that this did not strike the noble and learned Lords in the same light, I have thought it my duty to review the whole of these proceedings from the commencement, and to see whether there is anything in what has been stated which should induce me to alter the opinion I formed in the first instance.

Before I proceed to state to your Lordships the result of this investigation, there is one point which seems to have struck my noble and learned friend very forcibly, on which I would wish to make one or two observations, namely, the supposed sort of imprisonment within the large limits of this country, which he seems to have imagined is imposed upon an infant, who has the misfortune, as he would represent, of having guardians appointed by the Court of Chancery in this country. There is no such imprisonment, there is no other restraint than the necessity of asking the leave of the court before the infant is taken out of the limits of the jurisdiction. If there is any such restraint, any such imprisonment, I certainly never heard of it during the administration of my duties when I had the honour of holding the Great Seal. When an application of that sort was made to me, the only subject upon which, as it occurred to me, I ought to form an opinion, was whether, under all the circumstances, it was for the interest and benefit of the child that the application should be granted. The misfortune, therefore, supposed to be inflicted upon the child is, that the mind of the Lord Chancellor for the time being should be exercised upon the question whether it is for the interest of the child or not that it should be allowed.

A case very similar to the present occurred while I was Lord Chancellor (Campbell v. Campbell (8)). A Scottish child was brought into this country, and the same contest arose. An application was made to appoint a guardian. The Scottish tutor or curator resisted this, and upon the same ground upon which it has been resisted in this case, viz., that the Scottish tutor and curator had authority over the child in opposition to the power of the Great Seal, and to the exclusion of any person to whom the Court of Chancery might think fit to entrust the duty of superintending and taking care of the child. I certainly was not much impressed with the argument; it was very shortly urged, and I believe not very strongly felt by those who urged it. Upon that occasion I formed the same opinion which I did in the present case, that the Scottish tutor or curator had no authority or power in this country, and that, therefore, the child was entirely without protection and it was a case in which it was the bounden duty of the Court of Chancery to appoint an officer of its own to take care of the child. It afterwards occurred that it would be beneficial to the child to go back to the country to which she belonged. An application was made to me. I investigated the whole of the case. I found that the child's friends all resided in Scotland; that she had no connections in England; and that there were means furnished for an excellent education for the child in Scotland; and, therefore, without doubt or difficulty, I allowed her to be taken back to Scotland, where I believe she has been ever since. This only shows that the hardship which is supposed to exist by the Court of Chancery taking, as it were, possession of these infants, and depriving them of all the advantages of being brought up among their own relations in their own country, has no place

A whatever, if, under all the circumstances, it appears for the interest of the child that it should be permitted to go back to its own country.

It is important, before entering upon the consideration of the questions in this case, thoroughly to understand the proceedings in the cause, so far as relates to the manner in which those questions have been brought before this House. The infant having been made a ward of court by the filing of the bill, a petition was
B presented, praying that the infant's grandfather and great aunt might be appointed guardians upon an allegation and affidavit that they were the nearest relations and that there was no person within the jurisdiction of the court entitled to or empowered to act as guardians, but not stating the appointment of the appellants as tutors and curators in Scotland. The vice-chancellor, by the order of January, 1841, appointed the grandfather and great aunt to act as guardians, according to
C the prayer, which I thought ought not to have been done as a permanent appointment, without a previous reference to the master. A petition was afterwards presented by the appellants, the Scottish tutors and curators, praying that this order might be discharged; and that, if the court should think proper to interfere touching the guardianship of the infant, that they, the petitioners, might be declared to be, or if not already such, might be appointed, guardians, but that if
D the court should not think proper to appoint them guardians, then that an order might be made by way of reference or otherwise having due regard to the father's testamentary disposition, to his domicile, and to the circumstances and situation of the property of the infant. The only part of the petition to which the prayer that the petitioners might be declared to be guardians, can be referred, is an allegation that the instrument appointing them tutors and curators was, in its
E nature, testamentary, and as such, not only constituted a good appointment of tutors and curators according to the law of Scotland, but also constituted a good appointment of guardians according to the law of England. The same proposition was attempted to be supported by the affidavits, and particularly that of Francis Hart Dyke, but I do not find any allegation or attempt to prove that tutors and curators appointed according to the law of Scotland are, as such, recognised in this country
F as guardians, so as to be considered as entitled to the legal custody of infants during their residence in England.

Upon this petition, the vice-chancellor made an order, discharging his former order, and appointing the appellants to act as guardians of the infant during her minority, or until further order, without prejudice to the question whether they were entitled to the guardianship under the statute of 12 Chas. 2, c. 24 [Tenures
G Abolition Act, 1660]. The order appointing the appellants to act as guardians and not declaring them to be so, and reserving only the question as to the claim to be testamentary guardians, would be a decision against their claim to be entitled to the custody of the infant as tutors and curators in Scotland, if any such claim had been made before him. The order would, indeed, be irregular, if the petitioners were entitled to be recognised as guardians in any character, except H as appointed by the court. From this order an appeal was brought before me in the Court of Chancery; and from the report in 1 Ph. 17, I find that, although the claim as testamentary guardians was slightly alluded to, no reference whatever was made to the title supposed to exist in Scottish tutors and curators to be treated in this country as lawful guardians. No such claim having been made before me, I neither formed nor expressed any opinion upon it, but I held that I the Scottish instrument did not appoint the appellants testamentary guardians under the statute of Charles II. Having decided against the only ground upon which the present appellants claimed right to the guardianship, there were but two modes of proceeding, either to appoint the appellants at once as persons selected and preferred, though not legally appointed by the father, or to make the usual reference to the master. To appoint the appellants at once would, for the reasons stated by me in the report in 1 Ph. 17, have been improper, and contrary to the acknowledged practice of the court. The reference, therefore, became a matter of course. It excludes no one, and concludes no question, except the only one argued before me—that the appellants are not testamentary guardians under the statute of Charles II—a decision in which the appellants have acquiesced, not having thought it worth while to raise it again, either by the printed cases in the reasons assigned for the appeal or by the argument at the Bar, it being always kept in mind that, if the appellants were testamentary guardians under the statute of Charles II, it would be irregular, and improper for the court to appoint them. Finding, therefore, that the only point upon which I was called upon in the Court of Chancery is not now in dispute, I do not feel that reluctance to take any part in this appeal which I should have felt if the propriety of my decision upon any point raised before me had been called in question; and I have some satisfaction in finding that this is the state of the case, because a new point has now been raised for the first time, of great importance, if capable of being supported, and calculated, if supported, very much to cripple the Great Seal, and to deprive many infants of the benefit of its protection. The proposition is that the law of England recognises the right and authority of a Scottish tutor and curator with respect to an infant resident in England, and, although it may interfere to aid the authority, or to supersede or control it if improperly exercised, it has no right to take the child under its own care by the appointment of guardians. If that be so, then, no doubt, the order appealed from is wrong, but so is the order of the vice-chancellor of Mar. 19, 1841, sought by the appeal to be established, for that order is as inconsistent with the alleged right of a Scottish tutor and curator, as the order appealed from, and yet that order was obtained upon the application of the appellants themselves, attempted to be supported in their resistance to the appeal before the Lord Chancellor, and now asked to be restored, as would be the necessary consequence of the success of the present appeal. The order of Mar. 19, 1841, is not the subject of appeal, and cannot, therefore, be altered by this House, but the House, it was argued, might vary the order of April 17, 1841, so as to correct the order of Mar. 19, 1841. This House, however, can only deal with that order so far as the Lord Chancellor would have dealt with it when the appeal was before him. He could not have altered it for the benefit of the then respondents and now appellants. He might have refused all or granted all, or any part of what the then appellants asked, but he could not, upon that proceeding, have declared the Scottish tutors and curators entitled in this country to be recognised as guardians of the infant. If this House should be of opinion that such right exists, how could effect be given to that opinion in the present appeal? Certainly not by discharging the order appealed from, which would re-establish the order of Mar. 19, 1841, which assumes that the appellants have no claim of right, unless they can show that they are testamentary guardians under the statute 12 Chas. 2, c. 24 [Tenures Abolition Act, 1660] and certainly not by any variation of that order, which the parties appealing from it, the present respondents, did not ask.

The proposition raised at the Bar is, however, of such general importance, that it would be to be lamented if this appeal were to be disposed of without a due consideration of its merits. If the Scottish tutors and curators are entitled to exercise the duties of that office in England, and, therefore, to be recognised by the Court of Chancery, as having lawful right to the care and custody of the infant while in this country, it must be considered what are the rights and duties to be exercised and recognised in this country. Are they those rights and duties which belong to the office of tutors and curators in Scotland, or the rights and duties which belong to guardians in England? For they differ in several essential particulars. In Scotland the office determines upon the child attaining the age of twelve years. In England it continues up to the age of twenty-one. In Scotland a majority controls the minority. In England all must concur. If, therefore, the Court of Chancery is bound to recognise the rights and duties of Scottish tutors and curators as they exist by the law of Scotland, it must take upon itself to administer foreign law, for it is not disputed but that the court has jurisdiction over them if they do not properly execute their duties, that is, their duties according to the law of Scotland. Follow this to any of its consequences, and its absurdity will be appar-

- A ent. It cannot be contrary to the duty of a tutor and curator in Scotland to promote the marriage of the infant without the consent of the Court of Chancery in England or to remove the infant from England to Scotland. Is the Court of Chancery, therefore, to permit such proceedings with respect to an infant being a ward of court, because it has tutors and curators in Scotland? Would it be the duty of the court, upon any complaint made, first, to imagine in what manner and to what extent the Court of Session would interpose, and to regulate its own interference by that rule? This, in the case of a Scottish child, with Scottish tutors and curators, might be ascertained without difficulty or delay; but if such be the rule as to a Scottish child, it must equally apply to all other foreign children; and thus the court might have to administer the laws of other countries, however remote and uncivilised.
- C It was urged that the court must recognise the authority of a foreign tutor and curator, because it recognises the authority of the parent of a foreign child. This illustration proves directly the reverse, for, although it is true that the parental authority over such a child is recognised, the authority so recognised is only that which exists by the law of England. If, by the law of the country to which the parent belonged, the authority of the father was much more extensive and arbitrary than it is in this country, is it supposed that the father would be permitted here to transgress the power which the law of this country allows? If not, then the law of this country regulates the authority of the parent of a foreign child living in England by the laws of England, and not by the laws of the country to which the child belongs. If foreign tutors and curators are to exercise in this country the rights and duties which belong to their office in the country to which they belong, more deference would be paid to the authority of their office than to that of a parent. If the rights and duties of foreign tutors and curators of a child in this country are not to be regulated by the law of the country to which the child belongs, what are the rights and duties supposed to belong to them which the courts of this country are bound to recognise? They cannot as such be treated as testamentary guardians, there being no testamentary appointment under the Act of Charles II, or as guardians appointed by the Court of Chancery, there being no such appointment. They cannot be English guardians without being able to derive their authority from some one of those sources from which the English law considers that the right of guardians must proceed; and it has before been shown that the rights and duties of a foreign tutor and curator cannot be recognised by the courts of this country with reference to a child residing in this country.
- G The result is that such foreign tutor and curator has no right as such in this country; and this so necessarily follows from reason, and from the rules which regulate, in this respect, the practice of the Court of Chancery, that it could not be expected that any authority upon the subject should be found. It appears, however, that the very case came before LORD HARDWICKE in Ex parte Watkins (9). A child had had a guardian appointed by the governor of the Leeward Islands, and on the child coming to this country, LORD HARDWICKE was applied to to appoint a guardian. The question does not appear to have been contested, but the facts were distinctly stated, and LORD HARDWICKE by the usual order referred it to the master to approve of proper persons to be appointed guardians. This is the only case directly in point which has been referred to on either side, but there are other matters of frequent occurrence which proceed upon the same principle. If a commission of lunacy be in force against a person in Ireland or in the colonies, and the party afterwards comes to England, it is a matter of course to take out a new commission in this country: Re Houstoun (10). But why, if the foreign committee has the same power and authority in this country that he has in his own? Ex parte Lewis (11) turned upon a totally different question, which was whether the party having been found non compos at Hamburg, satisfied the term "lunatic" in 4 Geo. 2, c. 10 [Lunatics Act, 1730], so as to give the Lord Chancellor jurisdiction to direct a conveyance, the words being: "All persons, being lunatics, or the committee of such persons."

Writers upon the civil and international law were quoted as to the comity of nations in recognising rights and duties existing under the laws of other countries. These are well collated and observed upon by Mr. STONY, and the result he draws from them is by no means favourable to the argument of the appellants, but had it been otherwise, the law and practice of this country must decide the question.

If, then, there be no right in this country in these Scottish tutors and curators as such, what order could have been made in preference to that appealed from? Ought the application of the child's relations to discharge the vice-chancellor's order of April 17, 1841, to have been refused, and the order of the vice-chancellor appointing the appellants to act as guardians to have been thereby established? That is, was it proper, if the tutors and curators had not as such any right in this country, to appoint them, they being out of the jurisdiction, and to take the child from the care of its nearest relation, without the usual inquiry before the master? In Ex parte Watkins (9), LORD HARDWICKE refused to act without inquiry; and in Logan v. Fairlee (12), LORD ELDON refused to appoint a person residing in Scotland to be guardian, although the infant appears to have been in that country. In Ex parte Ord (13), LORD ELDON held that the committee of a lunatic going abroad could not continue committee, and the well-known practice of the court is not to appoint persons guardians who are out of the jurisdiction, unless associated with others who are within it. In Wellesley v. Duke of Beaufort (14), LORD ELDON appointed another to act as guardian of a child, merely on the ground of the father being abroad. Upon these grounds it would have been impossible to have established the order of April 17.

Independently of that objection, would it have been right, without inquiry, to have given to these four Scottish gentlemen, by the appointment of the court, the power of guardians of this child? It appeared from the affidavit that the child was of delicate health and required peculiar care; that the mother had been most anxious that the child should continue under the care of its nearest relation in this country; and that a contest had arisen, or had become unavoidable, between those nearest relations and the Scottish tutors and curators for the care and custody of the child. Such a case would probably have called for an inquiry as against testamentary guardians, and certainly required it before disposing of the contest, by investing one of the parties to it with the authority of guardian appointed by the court. Whether the order appointing the appellants guardians should stand, or the usual reference to the master be directed, was the only question before me in Chancery, and is, in fact, the only question now before the House. The appellants, who obtained that order of April 17, 1841, and never sought to have it varied, cannot now complain of it or ask the House to vary it. It appointed them guardians, and they were contented to accept the appointment from the court, and yet they now ask the House to declare (the order standing unappealed from by them) that they are entitled to exercise all the authority of guardians without, and independently of, the authority of the court.

It has been said that, if the court had jurisdiction, it ought not in this case, in its discretion, to have exercised it. This is not very intelligible to those who are accustomed to the proceedings in Chancery. It means, I presume, that the court ought not to have interfered, but when the order appealed from was made the question as to interference or non-interference had gone by. The court had interfered by appointing guardians, and none complained of the fact of interference, but only as to the manner in which it had been conducted. What, upon this doctrine of non-interference, ought to have been the order upon the appeal to the Lord Chancellor? To have refused the application, and thereby to have left the appellants appointed guardians by the interference of the court, or to have granted what was prayed simpliciter and so to have left the respondents guardians by the interference of the court, or to require the usual assistance of an inquiry by the master before deciding upon the future custody of the infant, which was the order made and now appealed from.

In truth, however, independently of form, the doctrine of non-interference has

- A no place in the case of an infant for whose protection no legal right of guardianship in any person in this country exists. The court, being informed that there is no such right of guardianship, supplies the omission as of course, by its own appointment. It is true that, in lunacy, there is a discretion exercised as to whether the commission should issue, although there may be no doubt as to the lunacy, but there are obvious distinctions between the two cases, one of which is that a
- B commission of lunacy is of itself an evil, although often necessary to prevent a greater. This does not apply to the appointment of a guardian to an infant where none already exists, and the application for that purpose is never refused. All infant wards of the court are under the protection of the court. If there be a father living, or a guardian regularly appointed, the court does not interfere except to assist the father or guardian, unless in certain cases in which the misconduct of
- C the father or guardian renders interference necessary for the protection of the child. But, if there be no father, or guardian regularly appointed, the court protects the child through the means of its officer, whom it appoints to perform that duty in the character of guardian. If there were no father, or other person entitled of right to act as guardian, it is impossible that an order referring it to the master to make the inquiries necessary to enable the court to appoint proper persons to
- D act as guardians can be wrong. In the present case there is no father, and if there was no person entitled as of right to act as guardian, the order was quite of course. That there was no person entitled as of right to act as guardian would, I think, be amply established by the consideration before adverted to, if the question were open for consideration, but it is not competent for the appellants to raise that question, the object of this appeal being to establish an order under which they were
- E themselves appointed guardians. Under these circumstances the order appealed from was the only order which could have been made, and the grounds upon which the appellants have complained of it are incompetent for them to take, and are insufficient upon the merits.

LORD CAMPBELL.—I am of opinion that the order of the Lord Chancellor should be reversed; that the second order of the vice-chancellor should be set aside, as well as the first; and that the petition for the appointment of guardians should be dismissed.

- I do not doubt the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery on this subject, whether the infant be domiciled in England or not. The Lord Chancellor representing the Sovereign, as parens patriæ, has a clear right to interpose the authority of the
- G court for the protection of the persons and property of all infants resident in England, even where testamentary guardians have been appointed, and still more where the father is alive, and actually himself resident in England. Upon an appeal against any order of the Court of Chancery for the appointment of guardians to an infant, the only question is whether the jurisdiction of the court has been properly exercised, and the criterion is whether it is for the benefit of the infant.
- H Notwithstanding what has been said by my noble and learned friend who last addressed your Lordships, I can see no difficulty whatever in a court of appeal admitting that the court below has jurisdiction to interfere to appoint guardians, and going on to inquire whether its jurisdiction has been properly exercised. To justify the appointment of guardians, it cannot be enough to show that there is an infant having a temporary residence in England, placed here by the authority of
- I its father resident abroad, and judiciously and tenderly cared for by persons appointed by him for that purpose, the person of the infant requiring no care from the Court of Chancery, and the infant having no property in this country. If the father were alive, the court would not appoint guardians; and can it make any difference whether the infant is so resident in England, by the authority and under the superintendence of its father, or of tutors or guardians appointed by its deceased father, and confirmed by the legal tribunal of the country in which he was domiciled at his death, and in which all the property of the infant is situated? Is it possible that the Court of Chancery, whenever applied to, is bound to appoint guardians to an infant resident in England for a temporary purpose, if its father be dead? The mere death of the father of an infant domiciled abroad, and resident here for health, or education, or amusement, with the consent of those in whom the parental power is vested by the law of the country of its domicile, cannot necessarily require the appointment of guardians by the Lord Chancellor to be invariably and inflexibly made, without considering whether the personal safety or personal interests of the infant require the interference of the court, the infant having no property to be protected, and the appointment being manifestly injurious to the infant itself, as well as perplexing, annoying, and detrimental to its foreign guardians. A B

In the present case a bill has been filed, alleging that the infant has property in England by the receipt here of some part of the rents and profits of her Scottish estates, so that she is eo ipso a ward of the court, and, being a ward of the court, guardians must be appointed to her. But the bill is avowedly filed for the sole purpose of the appointment of guardians to change the custody of the infant, and the allegation in the bill and the petition as to property in England is unsupported by affidavit, and is proved to be false. If, therefore, such a bill, which may be filed by anyone, is of itself sufficient to impose the obligation of appointing guardians, we come back to the absurd proposition that the court is bound to appoint guardians to any foreign infant brought into England, for whatever purpose, and for however short a time. The filing of the bill can impose no necessary obligation to appoint guardians, although thereby, in some sense, the infant immediately becomes a ward of court, for the same consequence follows whenever a bill is filed relative to the estate or person of an infant, or for the administration of property in which the infant is alleged to be interested, although the child be under the immediate tutelage of a father or under the care of a statutory or common-law guardian, or of a guardian appointed by the court, or the infant be resident abroad. E The position will not hold good that a guardian must be appointed to every infant so made a ward of court, as an infant may be made a ward of court as well during the father's life as after his death, and as well where there are testamentary guardians as where there are none. The filing the bill entitles the infant to all necessary protection from the court, but does not compel the court to interfere in a manner which would be injurious to the infant. F

In this case the appointment cannot be justified in respect of the property; it can only be justified with a view to the care of the person. If the care of the person of the infant required the appointment of guardians, the court might undoubtedly interfere for that purpose, irrespectively of any consideration of property; and it is said that she is to be taken as wholly unprotected, because, according to the authorities, the tutors appointed by the law of Scotland can, in no degree, and for no purpose, be recognised in England. I must first observe, that this would be a very inconvenient doctrine, and would lead to the general necessity of appointing guardians for all foreign infants found in England who have lost their fathers. I suppose it is admitted that the existence and power of the father, although he be resident abroad, would be recognised by the Court of Chancery, although it is said, that the existence and authority of the tutors, as guardians, appointed by the law of the country in which the child is domiciled, would not be so recognised. But after a diligent attention to all the cases cited, and all the writers referred to on this subject, I can find no authority for this distinction. G H

The foreign jurists are very much divided as to the extent to which a guardian to an infant appointed in one country shall be recognised in another. BOULLENOIS, I (Obs. 4, p. 51), MERLIN (Rep. Absens., c. 3, art. 3, s. 2, n. 2), VARILITE (s. 2, n. 2), VATTEL (bk. 2, c. 7, s. 85), HUBERUS, (DE CONFLICTU LEGUM, b. 1, c. 3, s. 2), and HERTIUS (Opera De Col. Leg. s. 4), all expressly lay down that the guardian duly appointed by the law of the country where the infant is domiciled is, in every other country, to have the same powers, and is entitled to assert any claims over the moveable property of his ward and to sue for debts due to his ward in foreign countries without having any confirmation of the guardianship by the local authorities, although the powers over immoveable property belonging to the ward must

A entirely depend on the lex loci rei sitæ. On the other hand, PAUL VOET (De Stat. ch. 2, s. 4), and other jurists, deny that the appointment of guardians has any extra-territorial authority, so as to entitle the foreign guardian, virtute officii, to exercise any rights, powers, or functions over the property of his ward situated in a different State from that in which he was appointed guardian; and such appears from STORY to be the law in the different States of the American union (CONFLICT OF LAWS, c. 13, s. 504 a). But, in none of these writers is there the least intimation of opinion that the foreign guardian, whether he may assert right of property and sue in his own name or not, will not be recognised so far as the care of the person of the infant is concerned, or that foreign tribunals will appoint new guardians, superseding those appointed by the law of the country where the infant is domiciled because the infant happens, for a temporary purpose, to be within the territory over which those tribunals exercise jurisdiction.

C Reference has been made to several cases to be found in our own reports; but I think none of them will be found to support the order appealed against, or to throw much light on the subject. It is said to have been the opinion of this House in Morrison v. Earl of Sutherland (2) (cited in 1 Hy. Bl. 677, 682), that an English guardian has authority to institute a suit for the personal property of his ward in Scotland upon the ground that the administration of his personal estate, granted by the law of his place of domicile, must be taken to be everywhere of equal force with a voluntary assignment by himself. But we have no authoritative report of this decision, and as it does not seem to have been acted upon either in England or in Scotland, I do not think that any reliance can be placed upon it. However, Ex parte Otto Lewis (11), is a direct authority to show that E for some purposes the courts of this country will recognise a curator or guardian appointed by a foreign tribunal. That was a petition, grounded on the statute 4 Geo. 2, c. 10 [Lunatics Act, 1730], that a lunatic heir of a mortgagee might be directed to convey to the mortgagor, the words of the act being "that all persons, being lunatic, or the committees of such persons, shall convey." There had been no commission in this country, but, there having been a proceeding before the F proper jurisdiction, the senate of Hamburg, where the lunatic resided, upon which he was found non compos and a curator or guardian appointed for him and his affairs, LORD HARDWICKE said that he would take notice of that appointment and ordered that, on payment of the mortgage-money, there should be a conveyance to the mortgagor. In Ex parte Watkins (9), it is said that the governor of the Leeward Islands had appointed a guardian, but that failed as soon as the infant G came to England, so that another guardian was to be appointed, and there was a reference to the master for that purpose. But we are not in the slightest degree informed what was the nature of that appointment, and the infant may have been domiciled in England and might have had property in England and nowhere else. Reliance has been placed on Re Houstoun (10), showing that where a person has been found a lunatic in Jamaica and is brought to England by one of his committees a commission of lunacy ought to issue against him here, and there is no H doubt that a committee of a lunatic under a commission in Ireland will not be allowed to deal with the property of the lunatic in England, until there has been a commission and he has been appointed committee in England. But this is indisputably necessary for the proper management of the property of the lunatic in England, for the court in Jamaica or in Ireland appointing the committee could I exercise no control over him in respect of the property in England, and the Court of Chancery in England could not do so until, being appointed under an English commission, he should become amenable to that court.

The only other authority cited in the first argument on this part of the subject was Salles v. Savignon (15), which, if accurately reported, although it does not bear very closely upon the recognition of a foreign guardian, would go to show that the Lord Chancellor may make all infants, in all parts of the world, wards of Chancery, and may, at any time, treat any person who may afterwards come within his jurisdiction, having had dealings with an infant so made a ward of court while abroad, answerable for what was done out of the limits of his jurisdiction. My A noble and learned friend said that no case had ever occurred in which there had been a complaint of an excessive jurisdiction on the part of the Court of Chancery.

It is possible he may approve of what was done in this case, but I beg to put the question with great respect: On what sound principles of jurisprudence can the interference of the court, in the case I have referred to, be justified? The parties were in the same situation as if the marriage had taken place in France or in China, B and it is utterly impossible to say that the foreign gentleman, by marrying a foreign lady in a foreign country, before any step had been taken to make her a ward of Chancery, was guilty of any contempt of the court, actual or constructive.

There has been communicated to me the note of a case, not in print, which has been referred to, that of Campbell v. Campbell (8), before LORD COTTENHAM, which is supposed to show that the present order is in conformity with the established C practice of the Court of Chancery. According to that note, a female infant, domiciled in Scotland, happened to be in London in the care of a tutor and curator appointed by the law of Scotland, likewise domiciled in Scotland, and then in London. The young lady had recovered a very large sum of money (I believe £17,000) from a noble marquis for a breach of promise of marriage. The agent of the noble marquis, having the money in his hands to pay over to her, filed a bill D in the Court of Chancery in her name against himself, and paid the money into court. It was stated that the money was paid into court before the application, but, at all events, there was within the jurisdiction of the court a sum of £17,000 belonging to the infant, and it was in respect of that sum of £17,000 belonging to the infant within the jurisdiction of the court that the bill was filed. Thereupon an application was made to LORD COTTENHAM to appoint a guardian to the infant, E and a guardian was appointed. That was probably a very proper order, but, is it supposed that, if the young lady had been in London for a temporary purpose under the judicious care of Colonel Campbell, her Scottish guardian, without any property in England, LORD COTTENHAM would have made an order for the appointment of English guardians?

To show the power of the Court of Chancery in the appointment of guardians, F reference was made to Stephens v. James (16), where guardians were appointed by BROUGHAM, L.C., to an infant, who had been carried to America before the bill was filed, making her a ward of court, but in that case there was large property within the jurisdiction of the court to be managed for the benefit of the infant. It is said, however, that, in the present case, the order is to be supported on the ground that the infant was domiciled in England. She was undoubtedly domiciled in G Scotland at the time of her father's death. Pottinger v. Wightman (17) must be taken conclusively to have settled the general doctrine that, if after the death of the father an infant lives with the mother, and the mother acquires a new domicile, it is communicated to the infant. But in the present case, the mother's Scottish domicil continued till she acquired another, and I find great difficulty in fixing any time when it can be said that she had acquired a new domicile. However this H may be, I am clearly of opinion that, if the order would have been improper had that domicile remained, it was equally improper on the supposition that an English domicil had been acquired. The question would still be: Is the appointment of guardians wanted, and will it be for the benefit of the infant? Where there is personal property to a considerable amount within the jurisdiction of the court not exposed to any risk, and about which there is no dispute, domicile may be I material for guiding the discretion of the Lord Chancellor whether he should interfere for its due management, but in this case LORD COTTENHAM considered the domicil immaterial—and so far I agree with him.

Then it is urged that the appointment of the tutors was not meant by the father to have any operation beyond the territory of Scotland. To this objection LORD COTTENHAM appears to have given considerable weight, and here I feel bound to differ from him. I do not think that it was intended, or that it can operate as an appointment of guardians in England under the English statute 12 Chas. 2, c. 24

- A [Tenures Abolition Act, 1660], but I cannot doubt the intention of the father by the appointment that the infant should remain under the care and superintendence of the tutors, not only in Scotland, but in any country into which, for her health or education, it might be necessary to send her. Can it be supposed to have been his intention that, if she were permitted to pay a visit to her grandfather at Chester, their power over her was to be for ever gone; that she was
- B thenceforth to become a ward of the Court of Chancery; that she should not be permitted to marry, or be at liberty to re-visit her own country, without the permission of the Lord Chancellor?

- Even with respect to a child of English parents, born and domiciled in England, the court ought not to interfere to appoint guardians unless there be property belonging to the infant to be taken care of, or unless the personal security, proper
- C education, or marriage of the infant requires the appointment of guardians. This rule, which is extremely reasonable in itself, is to be collected from Ex parte Becher (18), and it seems to have been uniformly acted upon. Not an instance has been or can be cited of the Court of Chancery interfering to appoint guardians, the infant having no property within the jurisdiction of the court. In Wellesley v. Duke of Beaufort (14), where guardians were appointed, the father being absent
- D from this country, there was large property within the jurisdiction, and the appointment of guardians was clearly for the benefit of the infants. In the present case not only would the will of the father be defeated, but a heavy expense incurred by the double accounting in the Court of Session and in the Court of Chancery. Moreover, I know not how the order is to be carried into effect. An appointment of receivers to collect the rents of real estates in Scotland or France, or any other
- E foreign country, might be treated with very little respect where it is to operate, and might give rise to a collision of jurisdiction very much to be deprecated. Such a proceeding, I believe, cannot be rested either on precedent or principle.

- It has been urged at the Bar that where a bill is filed fraudulently in the name of an infant, alleging property within the jurisdiction, there might be a summary application to the court to take it off the file, but the objection would be made that
- F this fact cannot be tried on affidavit, and it now sufficiently appears to the court, and is not seriously disputed, that the allegation of property within the jurisdiction is merely colourable. Then it is contended, that the suit should go on to its conclusion, and that then justice will be done. But if the order stands, and guardians are appointed, the infant will undoubtedly have to remain under their care, and her property must be administered in the Court of Chancery during her minority.

- G
- LORD LANGDALE.—This case, so far as it now appears, for it is still subject to inquiry and investigation, is of the most simple description. An infant, whose whole property is alleged to be in Scotland and whose tutors and curators are usually resident in Scotland, is now residing in England, and entitled to the protection of the English laws. Her grandfather, also resident in England, assuming (as he
- H has a perfect right to do) to be the next friend of his grandchild, files a bill in her name in the Court of Chancery, praying, among other things, that her fortune and person may be protected by the court, and that proper directions may be given for her maintenance and education.

- It may have been right or wrong to institute this suit, but the sound and proper mode of trying that question is to apply to the Court of Chancery on behalf of the
- I infant and to have it inquired into and ascertained whether the suit is beneficial or prejudicial to the interests of the infant. If, upon inquiry, it appears to be contrary to the interests of the infant that that suit should be prosecuted, the court stays the further prosecution and charges the costs upon those by whom the suit has been improperly commenced, but, in this case there has been no application made for any such inquiry, and, upon the bill being filed, the infant became a ward of the Court of Chancery, and at the same time it became the duty of the court to protect her interests, or to see that they were duly protected. The usual and regular mode of doing this is by appointing guardians. It is true that, if an infant be improperly detained by any unauthorised person, the Lord Chancellor may, by writ of habeas corpus, have the infant brought before him, and set free. But upon a habeas corpus, I apprehend that the Lord Chancellor has no more authority than is possessed by a judge at common law, and for the protection of the infant that authority is of a very different kind and of greatly inferior efficacy to that which is possessed by the Court of Chancery on the appointment of guardians. A

This is very nearly the order which, in ordinary cases, is made by the court for the protection of infants within its jurisdiction on whose behalf its protection is required. In approving of guardians under the order, the master is bound to use his best discretion, to make all necessary and proper inquiries, and to take all the circumstances of the infant into his consideration. The Scottish tutors and curators, whom I assume for the purpose to have been properly appointed, being out of the jurisdiction, and consequently, not being subject to the control of the court, it would not seem to be consistent with sound discretion to appoint them sole guardians unless other arrangements could be at the same time made to secure for the infant that protection which it is the duty of the court to afford. But I think that the appointment of tutors and curators by the father, though it may not be valid in England, is entitled to the most attentive consideration. One obvious mode of attending to it, and at the same time of securing the authority and control of the court over the person of the infant while in England, would be to associate in the guardianship some persons residing in England with the tutors and curators in Scotland, and an offer of this kind was made to the complaining parties by the Lord Chancellor before he pronounced the order in question. B C D

It has been supposed the order will lead to direct conflict between the laws or the courts of England and Scotland, and that the order is so expressed as to exclude the Scottish tutors and curators from the office of guardians. I conceive this to be wholly erroneous. We ought to presume that the courts of England and Scotland will be equally anxious to do that which may appear to be most beneficial to the infant. The person is in one country, the property is said to be wholly in the other. Instead of conflicting with one another, why should not the respective courts of the two countries be mutually assistant in promoting their common object? Although it is not to be expected that either the master would approve, or the court appoint, persons resident out of the jurisdiction to be sole guardians, yet there is nothing in the order to prevent the Scottish tutors and curators from proposing themselves to be guardians, together with one or more persons resident in England, and in the peculiar circumstances of the case it may possibly appear, upon inquiry, to be beneficial to the infant to have guardians both in England and Scotland. E F G

One part of the order requires the master to consider of a scheme for the residence of the infant, and, it being supposed in the argument that there is some general and inflexible rule binding the court to keep its infant wards within the jurisdiction, it is thence inferred that, under this order, the master cannot consider whether the infant ought at any time to be permitted to reside in or to visit Scotland. It is, undoubtedly, a general and useful rule that an infant ward is not to go out of the jurisdiction without special leave and in the absence of special circumstances; but when such occur (and it may appear that they exist in this case) the special leave is always given. There are infant wards of the court now abroad with leave given, sometimes for the general benefit of the infant, sometimes for the sake of health or peculiar instruction, and even for the sake of amusement. The infants who become wards of the Court of Chancery have indeed great and peculiar protection, but they are not debarred of any freedom or of any advantages which the most careful, considerate, and liberal parent would desire his child to possess. Those who imagine that the court acts necessarily upon any fixed and inflexible rules in the management, appear to me to forget the paternal discretionary nature of the jurisdiction, the great care and anxiety with which the interests of the infant wards are constantly attended to, the changes of regulation which are so easily made, even from day to day if required by a change of circumstances, and the extent to H I

A which all technical and positive rules are made to bend to the peculiar circumstances which may be from time to time presented by individual cases. If it should ultimately appear most beneficial to the infant to reside sometimes in Scotland and sometimes in England, and if it should, unhappily, become necessary to call upon the courts of the two countries to exercise their power, I know of nothing which would render it impracticable for the English Court of Chancery to order

B the guardian resident in England to deliver up the infant to the guardian resident in Scotland, and why should we doubt that the Scottish court would consider beneficial to the infant the same course of management which, upon evidence and consideration, had been approved by the English Court of Chancery, and, if necessary, order the guardian resident in Scotland (being the tutor and curator there) to deliver up the infant to the guardian resident in England? It is not reasonable

C to suppose that the guardians to be appointed under the order will conflict, or that the courts of the two countries will conflict, in such a matter.

It is possible that, in carrying out any scheme, difficulties may arise, more especially if those whose duty it is to concur in all things for the benefit of the infant should refuse or neglect to do so. If difficulties should occur, they must be met, as they best may, by adopting that course which, under the circumstances,

D shall appear to be for the benefit of the infant, but, at present, it does not appear to me that there is any difficulty whatever. The infant is here, and entitled to the protection of the Court of Chancery, and it is, among other things, to be inquired where she ought to reside. Whether she ought to remain here or to be sent to Scotland, it is in either case necessary to appoint a guardian who may have legal control over her person, to protect her while here, or, if proper, to deliver her to the

E person duly appointed to protect her in Scotland. It has been said that it would be unsafe and imprudent to take the infant to reside in Scotland, and the tutors and curators have expressed no intention to remove her to Scotland, and in this state of things the complaint made of this order is somewhat singular. The tutors and curators seem to say that the infant ought to be in England, where she cannot be protected by the courts of Scotland which have no jurisdiction over her person

F in England; at the same time they say that she ought not to be protected by the Court of Chancery in England, and that, therefore, in the result, she ought to be left in England to the care or neglect of the tutors and curators resident in Scotland, free from the control of a responsibility to the laws relating to guardianship which prevail in either country. For the reasons which I have stated, I am of opinion that the order complained of ought to be affirmed.

STUART v. MOORE

H Johnstone v. Beattie was discussed in Stuart v. Moore which came before the House of Lords in May, 1861, on appeals from the Court of Session and STUART, V.-C.

In Stuart v. Moore the facts were as follows: The Marquis of Bute, a Scottish peer, afterwards made a British peer, having real estates in England and Scotland, died in England on Mar. 18, 1848, leaving an only son for whom his will appointed no guardian. The infant was born in Scotland in 1847. On May 11, 1848, LORD COTTENHAM, L.C., appointed the mother guardian of the infant. On May 30, 1848, a tutor-at-law, or Scottish guardian, was appointed

I in Scotland. The mother died on Dec. 28, 1859. On Feb. 7, 1860, General Stuart and Lady Elizabeth Moore were appointed by STUART, V.-C., joint guardians. Lady Elizabeth Moore, in April, 1860, clandestinely and fraudulently carried the infant to Scotland. She was then discharged from the guardianship, but refused to deliver up the infant to the sole remaining guardian, General Stuart, and detained him in Scotland. General Stuart applied to the Scottish court to order the child to be delivered up to him, but that court refused to make the order until it was determined whether the infant was domiciled in Scotland or not; charged the Scottish tutor-at-law with the care of the infant; and interdicted and prohibited him from taking the infant out of Scotland. STUART, V.-C., thereupon ordered the English guardian to appeal against the Scottish order; and the Scottish tutor-at-law at the same time appealed against an order of the vice-chancellor. Both appeals were argued together.

LORD CAMPBELL, L.C., in expressing his opinion, said: The refusal [of the Court of Session] to interfere is rested on the decision of this House in Johnstone v. Beattie. I regret that decision, and I must confess that in some of the proceedings in that case, and in the language of some members of your Lordships' House who took part in that decision, there was ground for the Scottish judges apprehending that the Court of Chancery was encroaching on their jurisdiction. The application for English guardians there made was certainly with the intention to supersede the Scottish guardians, who had been appointed to the female child in Scotland under her father's will, she being domiciled in Scotland, being in England only for a temporary purpose, having landed estates in Scotland, having no property whatever in England, there being a prayer in the bill for appointing English guardians, so that the Scottish guardians should account to them, and there being no suggestion that the Scottish guardians had in any respect misconducted themselves, or were in any respect incompetent to take charge of her education. But all that can be considered as judicially decided by the House was, that, if there be a foreign child in England with guardians duly appointed in the child's own country, the Court of Chancery may, without any previous inquiry whether the appointment of other guardians in England is or is not necessary and would or would not be beneficial for the child, make an order for the appointment of English guardians. Allowing the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery, I thought that it was not properly exercised for the good of the infant, and that such an exercise of it was a dangerous precedent for the appointment of guardians to any foreign child residing casually in England, for health, education, or amusement, the necessary consequence of which is, that the ward, till reaching the age of twenty-one, cannot leave the realm of England without leave of the Court of Chancery. But the House did not decide, and no member of the House said that foreign guardians are to be entirely ignored, or laid down anything to countenance the notion that a guardian who has been duly appointed in a foreign country and comes into England or Scotland to reclaim a ward stealthily carried away from him, is to be treated as a stranger and an intruder. On the contrary, an alien father, whose child had been so carried away from him, and brought into England, would undoubtedly have the child restored to him in England by a writ of habeas corpus; and I believe that the same remedy could be afforded to a foreign guardian standing in loco parentis on the ravishment of his ward . . . I can take upon myself to say that Johnstone v. Beattie, whether properly or improperly decided, is no authority whatever for the interlocutor appealed against. In perfect harmony with that decision, the petition, praying for the restitution of the ward to the guardian might have been immediately granted.

LORD CRANWORTH said: It appears to me that there was sufficient before the Court of Session to make it their duty at once to order the infant to be delivered up to the guardian who had been selected by the Court of Chancery. I would make a passing observation upon Johnstone v. Beattie. Perhaps it might have been more consonant to the principles of general law to have held that every country would recognise the status of guardian in the same way as they undoubtedly would recognise the status of parent or the status of husband and wife. But supposing that not to have been the view taken by this House, then there is nothing in that decision of Johnstone v. Beattie that could have been decided otherwise, or that could at all interfere with or touch the present question. For all that was decided there was that the status of guardian not being a status recognised by the law of this country unless constituted in the country, it was not a matter of course to appoint a foreign guardian to be English guardian. But that was only a matter to be taken into consideration. That was all that was decided in that case; and whether or not (as I have already said) it might have been better to have held that the status of guardian was to be itself recognised, without further inquiry, is quite immaterial to the present question.

LORD WENSLEYDALE said that he agreed entirely with his noble and learned friends who had preceded him in the advice which they had given to their Lordships. He made no comment on Johnson v. Beattie.

LORD CHELMSFORD said: I cannot help deeply regretting that so many precious months have been consumed in which the courts of the two countries, instead of cordially co-operating to advance the best interests of the infant, have placed him, as it were, in the centre, as a prize to be contended for by conflicting jurisdictions. I should be sorry to see the authority of the Scottish courts broken in upon by any invasion of the English courts, but I think there was no cause for the jealousy which has unhappily been excited upon the present occasion. I agree that, if the circumstances had been reversed, if the Scottish court had assumed the guardianship of the infant and the infant had been improperly removed from their jurisdiction, and the guardian had come to this country to re-claim possession of his infant ward, the English courts would have facilitated the guardian in his object; and I think that they would not have examined with a very nice and critical eye the proof of the orders which had emanated from the Scottish authority, or if there had been any imperfection in the proof, they would have facilitated the court in obtaining the necessary means of establishing their authority. He also did not refer to Johnstone v. Beattie.

Custom—Reasonableness—Necessary element in valid custom—Custom resulting in damage to or destruction of property.

To a claim by the plaintiff in respect of damage done to houses belonging to him by the foundations being weakened and rendered incapable of supporting them through the working by the defendant of mines under or adjacent to the property the defendant pleaded that he was entitled to work the mines as he had under an immemorial custom.

Held: a custom to be valid must be reasonable; a custom which might result in damaging or destroying property without paying compensation was bad and could not be given legal effect; and, therefore, the plaintiff succeeded.

Action for damage to two houses, one occupied by the plaintiff and the other held under him by a tenant.

The declaration stated that the plaintiff was lawfully possessed of a messuage or dwelling-house situate in the manor of Newcastle under Lyme in the county of Stafford, beneath which messuage or dwelling-house there were foundations which the plaintiff of right enjoyed for the support of the messuage or dwelling-house. Another messuage or dwelling-house, situate in the manor and county aforesaid, was in the possession and occupation of one John Hilton, as tenant to the plaintiff, supporting which messuage there were foundations which the plaintiff for himself and his tenants of the messuage of right enjoyed for the support of the messuage. The plaintiff alleged that the defendant had worked mines under ground near to the said messuages and removed the ores, minerals and other produce of the mines with the result that the foundations of the messuages were greatly weakened and damaged and were rendered unsafe and incapable of supporting the messuages, and, by reason whereof the messuages had cracked and sunk in, and were in danger of falling down. The defendant pleaded that he had a prescriptive right to work the mines as he had, and, further, that he was entitled to do so under an immemorial custom. Each party demurred. C D

LORD DENMAN, C.J.—It is understood to be the practice that the party first demurring begins. E

Cur. adv. vult. F

Feb. 10, 1844. LORD DENMAN, C.J., read the following judgment of the court.—This is an action on the case for injuring two ancient houses, one occupied by the plaintiff, the other held under him by a tenant. These acts are justified by a prescription, stated in the third plea, and by a custom, set out in the fourth, by which a right is claimed for the defendant as lessee of the manor of Newcastle under Lyme. These pleas are demurred to as setting forth a prescription or custom which cannot be sustained at law, because unreasonable. In considering the question, we make no distinction between the two pleas. They are the same with reference to the objection. If either the prescription or the custom is bad on that account, the other must be bad likewise, and, if the one is valid in law, the other may be valid also. We also think that the question whether these houses are freehold or copyhold does not affect that which I have just stated. If the custom can so far prevail as to attach on all the freehold houses within the manor, it might also attach on all ancient copyhold houses, such as the defendant has described these two houses. G

The principle upon which this custom is said to be invalid is laid down by WILLES, C.J., in Broadbent v. Wilks (1). The paragraph (Willes, at p. 363) was cited by both parties in the argument: H I

“The objection that this custom is only beneficial to the lord, and greatly prejudicial to the tenants, is, we think, of no weight; for it might have a reasonable commencement notwithstanding, for the lord might take less for the land on account of this disadvantage to his tenant. But the true objections to this custom are, that it is uncertain and likewise unreasonable, as it may deprive the tenant of the whole benefit of the land, and it cannot be presumed that the tenant at first would come into such an agreement.”

A The custom thus held invalid was this :

"When and as often as the lord of the manor or his tenants of the collieries or coal mines . . . have sunk pits in the freehold lands in Halton . . . for the working of the said collieries there to get coals coming and arising from thence [the lord and his tenants] have used and been accustomed to throw cast and place . . . the earth clay stones . . . coming therefrom together in heaps on the land near to such pits . . . there to remain and continue, and to [place] wood there for the necessary use of the said pits, and to take and carry away from thence with carts . . . part of the said coals so laid and placed there, and to burn and make into cinders there other part of the said coals . . . at his and their will and pleasure."

C WILLES, C.J., after pointing out the uncertainty of the alleged custom, proceeds (Willes, at p. 363) :

"And certainly no custom can be more unreasonable than the present. It may deprive the tenant of the whole profits of the land; for the lord or his tenants may dig coal pits when and as often as they please, and may in such case lay their coals, etc., on any part of the tenant's land, if near to such coal pits, at what time of the year they please, and may let them lie there as long as they please . . . so they may be laid on the tenant's land and continue there for ever, though it may be more convenient for the lord to bring them on his own land, which is absurd and unreasonable."

E The case was removed by writ of error from the Court of Common Pleas into this court and after being argued several times, the judgment was unanimously affirmed. LEE, C.J., said (2 Stra. at p. 1225) that the question was

"whether this was a reasonable lex loci, which they held it not to be, inasmuch as it laid a great burden upon the land of the plaintiff, without any consideration appearing, either public or private. That it savoured of an arbitrary power, and might (as laid) put it in the power of the lord totally to deprive the tenant of the benefit of the land, there being no restriction in time, and the word near was too vague and uncertain."

The report in WILSON, after mentioning the vagueness of that word, remarks also (1 Wils. at pp. 64, 65) that the custom is "very unreasonable, for it laid such a great burden upon the tenant's land, without any consideration or advantage to him, as tended to destroy his estate, and defeat him of the whole profits of his land, and savours much of arbitrary power, being pleaded to be at the will and pleasure of the lord, and to do it as often, and when he pleases . . . and what was said at the Bar touching the public utility of coal pits to the realm cannot be considered, for the pits may be worked without this custom, for ought that appears to the contrary . . . and to support this custom would be to take away the whole benefit of the land granted originally to the copyholder by the lord; and it is a void custom and contrary to law, that the lessor shall have common encounter son demise quia est part del chose demise: White v. Sayer (2) (Palm. 212), and this custom being pleaded to be at the will and pleasure of the lord, tends to make him judge in his own cause, which the law will not endure."

I There can be no necessity for showing by a comparison of details that the custom now pleaded is far more oppressive than that which was thus deliberately condemned by both courts. The words "at the will and pleasure of the lord" do not, indeed, appear in the present record, but such is the effect of the claim, for the defendant and his subtenants assume the power of entering any lands within the manor and searching for minerals without any restriction as to times and seasons, or the mode of occupation or culture.

Several cases were cited to show that such a custom might be valid. The most recent, Paddock v. Forrester (3), though arising in the same district, has no bearing whatever on the point before us. The plaintiff there sued for trespass in digging and taking away his land and the coal ore there. The defendant justified in his third plea under a custom stated generally, and, in his fourth, under the same custom as qualified by a right to compensation. The general custom was traversed: under the special custom, the defendant pleaded that he had made sufficient compensation. At a trial at Bar in the Court of Common Pleas, the court directed a verdict for the plaintiff on the third plea, holding that it was not supported by proof of the qualified custom. The greatest reliance, however, was placed on some decisions in which a custom derogatory to the lord's oral grant has been holden valid. Bateson v. Green (4) is the strongest of these cases, where the lord of a manor defended himself successfully against a commoner whose extent of common he had curtailed by taking clay, on proof that the lord had constantly done so. The language of LORD KENYON is certainly large, though considered by BAYLEY, J., in Arlett v. Ellis (5) to be subject to some restriction. If, indeed, it must be taken to import that a lord, after granting rights of common, may help himself to any portion of the common land to the exclusion of his grantees, such a doctrine is incompatible with many other cases, and cannot be supported in principle. The two decisions which are in the notes to Bateson v. Green (4) (Clarkson v. Woodhouse (6), and Folkard v. Hemmett (7)) are much more cautiously worded; and in that of Folkard v. Hemmett (7) DE GREY, C.J., expressed himself conformably to what we consider the true legal principle:

"The defendants justify under the usage. I will not call it a custom, because I look on it as a reserved right of the lord."

Assuredly, whatever the lord can reasonably be supposed to have reserved out of his grant the usage may adequately prove that he did reserve. But a claim destructive of the subject-matter of the grant cannot be set up by any usage. Even if the grant could be produced in specie, reserving a right in the lord to deprive his grantee of the enjoyment of the thing granted, such a clause must be rejected as repugnant and absurd. That the prescription or custom here pleaded has this destructive effect, and is so repugnant and void, appears to us too clear from the simple statement to admit of illustration by argument.*

* These remarks of LORD DENMAN were criticised in Rowbotham v. Wilson (post p. 601) when that case was before the Court of Exchequer Chamber. MARTIN, B., there said (6 E. & B. 150): "I think the owner of land may grant the surface subject to the quality or incident that he shall be at liberty to work the mines underneath and not be responsible for any subsidence of the surface. If the law of itself, under certain circumstances, protects from the consequences of an act, I think a man may contract for such protection in a case where the law of itself would not apply. 'Modus et conventio vincunt legem.' I am aware that in Hilton v. Lord Granville there is a passage in the judgment of the court adverse to this, but, in my opinion, the view taken by the Court of Queen's Bench, as expressed by LORD CAMPBELL in the judgment in the present case, is the more correct." When Rowbotham v. Wilson was in the Court of Queen's Bench, LORD CAMPBELL, C.J., in his judgment, said: "In the present case we are of opinion that there is evidence to show that, upon the severance of the surface and the minerals, the owner of the surface took it as a separate tenement, without that continuing and unqualified right to support from the subjacent strata to which the owner of the surface would be prima facie entitled. He had an easement for the support of the surface, but it was of a qualified character. There was a servitude imposed upon the owner of the minerals, but this servitude likewise was of a qualified character. Both easement and servitude were subject to the right of the owner of the minerals to work and get them in a careful manner, although the surface might thereby be injured. The owner of the surface had it conveyed to him with this qualified easement only, and with this qualified easement he was contented to accept it. Notwithstanding some expressions of LORD DENMAN, C.J., in Hilton v. Earl Granville, we are of opinion that upon the severance of the surface and the minerals into separate tenements, to be held by different owners, such an arrangement might effectually be made as to the right of support to the surface from the minerals. There is here nothing in derogation of the grant of the surface. The grantee of the surface may still hold in fee simple with all the rights and incidents belonging to that estate. He would not have the perfect easement of support from the minerals: but this (as must be supposed for valuable consideration) he has been contented to waive; and he takes his tenement with an easement of support of a qualified character. No deceit is practised upon him; and no attempt is made to create an estate in law without the usual incidents belonging to that estate. Therefore, no rule of law is violated."

ROWBOTHAM v. WILSON

24 J.P. 579; 6 Jur.N.S. 965; 11 E.R. 463]

Land—Right to support—Prima facie right of owner—Need for claimant to property in minerals to show grant or conveyance—Presumption of right to get minerals—Presumption against right of mineowner to do avoidable damage to surface.

Prima facie the owner of the surface of land is entitled to all below it ex jure naturæ, and those who claim property in the minerals below, or any interest in them, must show some grant or conveyance by him or from the Crown. The rights of the grantee must depend on the terms of the deed by which they are conveyed or reserved when the surface is conveyed, but prima facie it must be presumed that the minerals are to be enjoyed, and, therefore, that a power to get them must also be granted or reserved as a necessary incident. A similar presumption prima facie arises that the owner of the minerals is not to injure the owner of the soil above by getting them, if it can be avoided, but it rarely happens that these mutual rights are not precisely settled by the deed by which the right to the mines is acquired, and then the only question would be as to the construction of that deed.

E Deed—Covenant—Construction—Construction to effect intended purpose—Interpretation of covenant as grant of right.

The covenantee is entitled to render a covenant in a deed available in any manner in which it would answer the intended purpose.

A covenant by a person granted an allotment of land by an Inclosure Act and award declaring that he was willing and desirous to accept his allotment "subject to any inconvenience or incumbrance which may arise from working and getting the mines" beneath the allotment,

F

Held, by LORD CHELMSFORD, to be capable of being interpreted as a grant of the right to work the mines without molestation, denial, or interruption, even to the taking away the support, and damaging the surface, of the allotted land.

Easement—Grant—Sufficiency of words showing intention to give grantable easement.

No particular words are necessary for the grant of a right or an easement, and any words which clearly show an intention to give an easement which is by law grantable are sufficient to effect that purpose.

Appeal from a decision of the Court of Exchequer Chamber, affirming a decision of the Court of Queen's Bench on a Special Case, in an action brought by the appellant, D. Rowbotham, in which he alleged that he was entitled in reversion to certain houses which had been erected and standing for more than twenty years; that he was entitled to have the said houses and the foundations supported by the subjacent and adjacent soil; that the respondent had wrongfully worked certain mines under the houses and contiguous land and removed the coals and minerals therefrom without leaving any sufficient support, so that by reason thereof the houses cracked, sunk in and became dilapidated; and that as a result the appellant had been injured in his reversionary interest. There was a second count for the like injury to certain land in the possession of tenants the reversion of which belonged to the appellant.

The appellant was the reversioner in fee of the surface lands and buildings mentioned in the declaration, having become seised of the same by virtue of divers mesne conveyances from one Samuel Pears, to whom the surface land was allotted by the award hereinafter mentioned. The buildings on the land mentioned in the

A first count had been erected more than twenty years before the cause of action, and were not upon the land at the time of the execution of the award. The respondent was entitled to and worked the mines of coal, being the same mines as those allotted to Henry Howlette by the award, and the damage to the reversion was caused by the sinking of the soil.

B It was stated in the Special Case that the course and practice of mining was for the owner of the mine to get the whole of the underlying mine without leaving any pillars of the same coal by way of support, for the coal was so soft and perishable that what was left by way of support soon fell away and decayed. But instead of leaving pillars of the same coal, the course and practice of mining was to erect pillars of the refuse coal, called lamb and slack, which formed a much more durable support than pillars of the same coal would if left. The respondent's mines had C always been worked without any negligence on his part, and according to the course and practice of mining, and he left, as is usual, pillars of lamb and slack. No natural or artificial pillars could prevent the accrual of the injuries complained of, which had arisen from the natural subsidence of the surface soil in getting the mine, according to the use and practice of the country and neighbourhood.

D An Act of Parliament was passed in 1769 for dividing and enclosing the common fields, etc., in the parish and township of Bedworth, and for regulating certain charity estates within the parish, and commissioners were appointed for the purposes of the Act. The Act, after reciting that there were common fields and commonable lands, the property in which lay intermixed and dispersed in small parcels, and the owners were desirous that the lands should be specifically allotted among them in severalty, directed the commissioners, in a due and fair E proportion, to divide and allot the same. After reciting that there were lands in the parish supposed to have mines under them and that on that account the proprietors might be desirous of retaining their property therein, the Act provided that such proprietors should, in the allotment, get other lands supposed to contain mines of equal value. The award of the commissioners was to express the quantity of the land, and all orders, regulations and determination proper and necessary as to F fencing, laying out roads, etc., which were to be binding and conclusive on the several parties interested, and the lands allotted were to be in full bar, satisfaction and compensation of and for the several respective pieces and parcels of land and ground, right of soil, right of common, and other rights, interests and properties whatsoever.

G On June 21, 1770, the commissioners made an award or instrument under their powers, which allotted certain lands to Henry Howlette. It proceeded :

H "And as to the mines in the said estate of the said Henry Howlette, previous to the inclosure thereof, the same not having been required to be set out by metes and bounds, we do assign, allot and appoint unto the said Henry Howlette in lieu thereof all the mines of coal and limestone under the several allotments of land before made to him, and also all the mines of coal under the turnpike-road so far as the same ranges in the outline of his allotment, etc., on the west side of the said turnpike-road, against the allotment to Samuel Pears, and no more, the residue on the east against the house of the said Samuel Pears and Daniel Jackson being allotted to the said Samuel Pears."

I The commissioners also awarded and allotted to the said Samuel Pears "all that lot or parcel of land lying, etc., bounded on the west and south by an allotment to the said Henry Howlette"; and as to the mines on the estate of the said Samuel Pears, the commissioners allotted to the said Samuel Pears

"all the mines of coal under that part of the turnpike-road, etc., which the said commissioners adjudged to be equal in value to the mines he was previously possessed of, without being entitled to any part of the mines under his own allotment of land, which last-mentioned mines were thereby before awarded to the said Henry Howlette."

The award also contained the following covenant:

"And whereas, in order to preserve the convenience of situation of the allotment to the several proprietors interested in the said inclosure and division, it hath been found necessary in some cases to assign the mines under the whole of some particular allotments, and in other cases part of such mines, to different persons that those to whom the allotments of the surface land are awarded, and the several proprietors parties to this our award are the only persons interested in the disposal of land and mines under such circumstances, which said proprietors parties hereto do by their sealing and executing these presents testify their acceptance of their respective allotments in manner as the same are allotted to them as aforesaid, and do for themselves severally and respectively, and for their several and respective heirs, executors and administrators, successors and assigns, utterly disclaim, release and disavow all right, title, interest, claim and demand of, in, or to any of the mines under their several allotments, except such or such part thereof only as are hereinbefore particularly mentioned and described to be allotted to each of them. And the same proprietors do hereby for themselves severally and respectively, and for their several and respective heirs, executors, administrators, successors and assigns, covenant, promise, and agree to and with each other, and the heirs, executors, administrators, successors and assigns of each other, that the said mines so allotted under the circumstances aforesaid shall or lawfully may for ever after be held and enjoyed by the respective persons to whom the same are assigned according to the true intent and meaning of this award, and by them and every of them be worked and gotten accordingly without any molestation, denial, or interruption of any other person or persons parties to these presents and those claiming under them respectively, who for the time being are or may be owner or owners of the surface of the lands under which such mines are situate, and without being subject or liable to any action or actions for damage on account of working or getting the said mines for or by reason that the surface of the lands aforesaid may be rendered less commodious to the occupier thereof by sinking in hollows or being otherwise defaced and injured where such mines shall be worked, the said several proprietors parties to these presents and interested in the disposal of lands and mines under the circumstances aforesaid, having agreed with each other, and being willing and desirous to accept their respective allotments in their several situations hereinbefore declared, subject to any inconvenience or encumbrance which may arise from the cause aforesaid, so nevertheless as that nothing herein contained shall extend or be construed to extend to authorise or enable any of the parties for the time being entitled to the said mines to sink pits into the allotments under which the same are situate for the purpose of working the said mines without the consent of the then owners of the surface of the same allotments previously obtained, or in any manner to dig or break up the said surface without the like consent."

The award was executed by several parties, among others by Samuel Pears, but not by Henry Howlette.

In the Queen's Bench judgment was given for the respondent on both counts. That judgment was affirmed by the Exchequer Chamber, and the appellant appealed.

Serjeant Hayes and Spinks for the appellant.

Montagu Smith, Q.C., and Field for the respondent.

June 19, 1860. The following opinions were delivered.

LORD WENSLEYDALE stated the facts, and continued: I am of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber, affirming that of the Court of Queen's Bench, is right, and I advise your Lordships to affirm it.

Whether the right to the support given by the land below to the land of the owner of the surface when the strata belong to different persons is properly to be

A called "an easement," as it is by Mr. GALE in his treatise on EASEMENTS—a natural easement—or whether it is to be termed a right ex jure naturæ to that support, or whether the owner of the surface has merely a right to enjoy his own land in its natural state and condition, with a right of action against the owner of the land adjoining or subjacent, when the act of his neighbour does him an injury, are questions immaterial, as it appears to me, to the decision of this case, though

B the last proposition appears to be fully established by the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber in Bonomi v. Backhouse (1), where it was held that the Statute of Limitations does not begin to run until the damage be sustained. There is no doubt that prima facie the owner of the surface is entitled to the surface itself and all below it ex jure naturæ, and those who claim the property in the minerals below, or any interest in them, must show some grant, form, or conveyance by him, or it

C may be from the Crown, as suggested by LORD CAMPBELL in Humphries v. Brogden (2). The rights of the grantee of the minerals, by whomsoever granted, must depend upon the terms of the deed by which they are conveyed or reserved when the surface is conveyed. Prima facie, it must be presumed that the minerals are to be enjoyed, and, therefore, that a power to get them must also be granted or reserved as a necessary incident. It is one of the cases put by SHEPPARD (TOUCHSTONE 5, c. 89), in illustration of the maxim "Quando aliquid conceditur, conceditur etiam et id sine quo res ipsa non esse potuit," that by grant of mines is granted the power to dig them. A similar presumption prima facie arises that the owner of the minerals is not to injure the owner of the soil above by getting them, if it can be avoided. But it rarely happens that these mutual rights are not precisely ascertained and settled by the deed by which the right to the mines is acquired,

E and then the only question would be as to the construction of that deed.

The question to be decided in this case is what sort of right the respondent had upon the facts stated in the Case to get and take away the coals under the appellant's land. The origin of the appellant's right to the land and of the respondent's right to get the coals is the award made in 1770, under the private Inclosure Act for the common fields of Bedworth. A larger extent of surface, no doubt, was

F given to the allottee of the surface as the compensation for the minerals not being given to him. It is clear that the persons under whom the appellant and defendant respectively claim took with full knowledge that the one was intended to have a very large power of getting the mines, and the other the surface subject to that power, and that each of the parties to the suit had notice of their respective titles by the award itself. The appellant's case is, therefore, not a very equitable one,

G but the question still is whether that power and limitation were legally annexed to the respective rights or not.

I am clearly of opinion that they were, whether the award be considered valid or not. The objection to the validity of the award is that the commissioners had no power to separate, in any case, the minerals from the surface. If they had the power (and I think they had), then the award of the surface of the particular

H allotment to Pears and of the coal under it to Henry Howlette, was valid, and of necessity the commissioners could give to the latter, for the enjoyment of his allotment, the power to get the coal. They have done so by their award, and though Pears is made to covenant at the same time as to the manner in which the power is to be exercised, it is the act of the commissioners also, for it is evident that they intended it to be done, and no precise words are necessary. It

I may be, that they doubted of their powers, and so added the covenant.

On the supposition, therefore, that the award is valid, Howlette obtained the right to get the coal in a manner which would render the surface uneven and less commodious to the occupier. Supposing this power is not to be considered as given by the act of the commissioners, but only by the contract of the parties, Pears' contract—he being seised in fee by virtue of the award—would certainly operate as a grant by him to Howlette (who at the same instant took the fee-simple in the mines) of the power to get the minerals and to disturb the surface of his own land for that purpose by winning the mines below from some adjoining land or bed of coal. I do not feel any doubt that this was the proper subject of a grant as it affected the land of the grantor; it was a grant of the right to disturb the soil from below and alter the position of the surface, and analogous to the grant of a right to damage the surface by a way over it; and it was admitted at your Lordships' Bar that there is no authority to the contrary. It is undoubted law that no particular words are necessary to a grant, and any words which clearly show the intention to give an easement which is by law grantable are sufficient to effect that purpose. If the words could only be read to amount to a covenant, it must be admitted that such a covenant would not affect the land in the hands of the assignee of the covenantor, but, if they amount to a grant, the grant would be unquestionably good, and bind the subsequent owners of the surface. Therefore, if the award be valid, the appellant as assignee of the surface would be bound either by the order of the commissioners or by the grant. A B C

The reason why I think the commissioners had the power to allot the surface to one and the mines to another is because the words of the Act do not necessarily limit the division into allotments of the whole interest in the land in separate entire portions of the surface and minerals together. There is nothing inconsistent with the terms of the Act in allotting the surface in some portions of land to one, and the minerals under those portions to another. The Act of Parliament recites that the property lies intermined and dispersed in small parcels, and small parcels would have probably to be assigned to each proprietor, and it might be out of question for each owner to win the coals under his own allotment by sinking a shaft in it, and it would be most convenient for all parties to have the coals assigned in such cases to a neighbouring proprietor and more of the surface given to the owner whose coal was taken away. The private Act of Parliament is really no more than an agreement between the parties to it sanctioned by the legislature, and in order to construe that agreement we may look at the surrounding circumstances at the date of it. Add to this, the Act and award having been acted upon for ninety years, every intendment must be made which would give it validity. These considerations lead me to the opinion that the commissioners had the power for the general convenience which they believed they had, and which they exercised, to give portions of the surface to one and the mines under each to another, and that the award, therefore, is valid. D E F

The opinion, however, of the majority of the judges in the courts below seems to have been that the award was bad. But supposing that it is so, and that Pears did not take a legal right to the land, nor Howlette a legal title to the mines by the award, I still think that the respondent is entitled to the verdict. It might, perhaps, be enough to say that after ninety years' enjoyment a legal right to the surface land ought to be presumed in those under whom the appellant claims, and a legal right to the minerals below also, and with a right to get them by a legal grant in those under whom the respondent claims, and if there was such a right on the finding in the Case, it could not be exercised without rendering the surface uneven from the peculiar nature of the coal, and the incapability to support the land above by artificial means. The right to get involved, therefore, of necessity the right to withdraw a certain quantity of support from the land above, and so to do all the damage which has been done, for it is found that the defendant's workings were carried on with care and skill, and without any negligence. I do not think, however, that it is necessary to have recourse to this presumption. If the commissioners had no power to award the surface to one person and the minerals to another, it would follow that the award was totally void, but Pears would still be bound by the deed which he executed, which would operate as a grant of the right to win the coals so as to injure the superjacent land. He would not be estopped from saying that he was not at the time the owner of the surface because his defect of title appeared upon the same instrument and so the estoppel would be avoided, and he would be in the same situation as if without any legal right, but at the same time fully believing that he had executed a grant of a right to get G H I

- A the minerals under a particular close to another person, and so to disturb the soil of that close, and afterwards acquired the legal title to that close. This acquisition would operate by feeding the estoppel, and make it obligatory from that time and operate as a grant of an interest in the land: Trevivian v. Lawrence (3). It is quite clear that after a lapse of twenty years a good title was obtained from that time, and thence I think the grant had full operation and authorised all that
- B the defendant did in getting the coals.

It may be proper to add that if the appellant had a right properly so called to the support of the minerals as an easement or ex jure naturæ, the covenant might operate as a release of that right. But that notion is at variance with the law laid down in Bonomi v. Backhouse (1), above cited, which I think is perfectly right. Feeling assured that the covenant operates as a grant of a right to disturb

C the surface, it is enough to decide the case on that ground. The circumstance of the appellant having afterwards built houses upon the allotment which was subject to this power makes no difference in this case, and, therefore, I think the defendant was entitled to judgment. I should add that LORD BROUGHAM, who heard the case, is unavoidably absent, but he authorises me to say that he entirely concurs in the view which I have taken of this case.

- D LORD CHELMSFORD.—This action was brought to recover damages for injuries to certain surface land, and houses standing thereon, occasioned by the respondent having wrongfully and negligently worked his mines under the land without leaving any sufficient support, by reason of which the foundations of the houses were rendered incapable of supporting them and they became dilapidated and unsafe.
- E From the facts in the Special Case stated for the opinion of the court by consent of the parties, it appears that the respondent's mines have always been worked without any negligence on his part and according to the course and practice of mining of the county and neighbourhood in which the mines are situate, and that he left (as is usual) pillars of lamb and slack according to such course and practice. The Case also states that "no natural or artificial pillars would prevent the accrual
- F of the injuries complained of, which have arisen from the natural subsidence of the surface soil in getting the mine according to the use and practice of the county and neighbourhood." This is not very clearly expressed, but I suppose the meaning to be that no natural or artificial pillars, that is, pillars of coal left in the working nor pillars erected of the refuse coal called lamb and slack, according to the use and practice of the neighbourhood, would have prevented the accrual
- G of the injuries complained of. It cannot be intended to allege (what it seems to import) that the mines could not have been worked in any manner without necessarily occasioning the subsidence of the surface land.

- The question, therefore, raised by the Special Case is whether the respondent was bound, while working his mines according to the proper and regular course and practice of mining in the county and neighbourhood, to take care to leave a
- H sufficient support to the appellant's surface land, and to his houses erected thereon. The appellant and the respondent, or those from whom they claim, have been respectively in possession, the one of the surface land, the other of the mines beneath, from the time of an award made in the year 1770, under an Inclosure Act of 1769, "for dividing and inclosing the common fields, common grounds, and commonable lands in the parish and township of Bedworth, in the county of
- I Warwick." By this award the commissioners divided the surface land from the mines, and allotted the former to one Samuel Pears, from whom the appellant derives his title, and the mines beneath to one Henry Howlette, from whom the respondent claims. The power of the commissioners to make this separation of the mines from the surface land has been denied. But it is to be observed that the Act contains nothing which prohibits a division in this manner of the lands to be inclosed, and deals with small parcels of land in a mining district where it would be extremely inconvenient that each proprietor (however small) should possess the mines within his allotment, so that the legislature must be assumed to have intended that a division, so much for the common benefit, should be made, and, therefore, that an authority for the purpose must be implied. It is certain that the parties who signed and sealed the award never doubted the power of the commissioners in this respect, and the respective allotments have been uninterruptedly enjoyed without any question as to the title to them until the present action was brought. A

In the view which I take of the case, however, it is quite immaterial whether the award is valid or not, because upon either supposition there will still exist the covenant of Pears, which will be available to prevent the action being maintained. This covenant is in terms much more than a covenant not to sue, for Pears expressly declares that he is willing and desirous to accept his allotment "subject to any inconvenience or encumbrance which may arise from working and getting the mines." The word "encumbrance" (though not a happily chosen word for the purpose) I understand to mean any "obstruction" or "impediment" to the use of the surface land. The covenantee, according to the well-known rule on the construction of deeds, is entitled to render this covenant available in any manner in which it will answer the intended purpose. The construction adopted by the judges whose judgments were in favour of the respondent is that it may be used as a grant, and I think that when the subject-matter of the grant is correctly understood, this is the correct view. It must be borne in mind that Pears had no right, either by the award or as attached to his ownership, which was capable of being granted and transferred to another. It was a right inherent in the land to support from the subjacent land, which would pass with the land itself, but could not possess a separate existence. I was disposed to think that it was a right which might be relinquished to the owner of the mines, and that the covenant might, therefore, be used as a release, but I am satisfied that the view taken by my noble and learned friend LORD WENSLEYDALE, founded upon the nature of the right, as explained in Bonomi v. Backhouse (1), is correct, and that it is not such a right as can be the subject of a release. But although the thing itself, namely the right to support, cannot pass by grant, nor be extinguished by release, yet the covenant amounts to a grant of a licence to do acts which may be completely destructive of that right, and being by deed, and, therefore, presumed to be founded upon good and sufficient consideration, it is irrevocable and binding upon all who claim the surface land from Pears. The effect of Pears' deed is not to transfer to Howlette any right or interest in the coal which might serve as a support to the surface land, but it operates as the grant of a right to Howlette, his heirs and assigns, to work the mines without molestation, denial, or interruption, even to the taking away the support, and defacing and injuring the surface, of the lands, which without such a grant could not lawfully have been done. For these reasons I agree with my noble and learned friends that the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber is right and ought to be affirmed. B C D E F G

Solicitor—Lien—Extent of lien—Costs of action by solicitor against client to obtain payment of costs.

If a solicitor has a lien upon his client's deeds for costs incurred by him, the client upon application refuses to pay those costs, and the solicitor is driven to bring an action to recover them, the lien extends as well to the costs of enforcing the bill of costs as to the costs incurred by the client.

Solicitor—Lien—Mortgage—Solicitor acting for mortgagor and mortgagee—Duty to disclose lien on mortgaged property.

A solicitor who has a lien upon the title-deeds of his client's estate and is retained by a lender to prepare a security for money to be advanced to the client on the security of the estate is bound to inform the lender of the existence of his own lien.

Appeal by Gray, a solicitor, from a decision of the Court of Session in Scotland.

From 1827 to 1833, the appellant acted as solicitor to Charles Cunningham, and as such solicitor, he held the title deeds to certain properties owned by Cunningham. In 1830 Cunningham mortgaged these properties to a Miss Cunningham, and it was alleged by her that in procuring and preparing this mortgage, the appellant acted as solicitor to Cunningham and also to herself, but he did not disclose to her that he had any lien. In 1836, the appellant delivered a bill of costs to Cunningham for acting as his solicitor. Not receiving payment, he brought proceedings in the Scottish courts, and recovered judgment for the sum claimed in the bill of costs and interest. Cunningham died in 1840.

F

In the present appeal, the question arose as to the extent of the lien which the appellant had acquired against Cunningham, i.e., whether the lien covered the costs of the proceedings brought against Cunningham. A further question arose, whether the appellant, through his alleged failure to disclose to Miss Cunningham his claim to a lien, had lost, as against her, any lien to which he would otherwise have been entitled. The report here is confined to these two questions. Other questions were raised in the appeal, in particular the question whether any lien which the appellant had acquired against Cunningham in respect of the costs of the proceedings to recover payment of the bill of costs was also enforceable against mortgagees of the property, but the law differs in England and Scotland as to how far a mortgagor's solicitor can enforce a lien against a mortgagee of his client's property, and the appeal is not reported on this point. The respondents to the appeal were Miss Cunningham and other mortgagees of the property.

Sir Richard Bethell, Q.C., and Anderson, Q.C., for the appellants.
Rolt, Q.C., and Roundell Palmer, Q.C., for the respondents.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

Aug. 14, 1855. LORD CRANWORTH, L.C., having stated the facts, said: According to the law, certainly of this country (though there is very little authority upon this subject), if a solicitor has a lien upon his client's deeds for costs incurred by him, and the client, upon application, refuses to pay those costs, and the solicitor is consequently driven to bring an action, undoubtedly by the law of England, though there is no direct authority upon the subject, except a case very shortly reported, Lambert v. Buckmaster (1), all principle goes to this, that the law of lien must extend as well to the costs of enforcing the bill of costs as to the costs incurred by the client himself. A

[HIS LORDSHIP then dealt with other matters, and continued:] The only remaining point in this case lies in a very narrow compass—that is, the proposition of Miss Cunningham, who disputes the claim of the appellant to any lien against her, upon a ground which I think the Court of Session was perfectly right in sustaining in point of law, if the facts had warranted the application of it. What the court decided was this, that where there is a borrower and a lender, and the solicitor for the borrower acts as solicitor for both parties, he, preparing the security for the lender at the expense, as will ordinarily be the case, of the borrower, if he has any demand upon the title deeds which belong to the borrower and affect his security, he is bound to disclose that fact to him, because otherwise he is deceiving his own client by leading the lender, who is as much his client as the borrower, to suppose that he is giving him the security of the estate free from any lien on his part, whereas in truth he afterwards sets up a right of retention against him. The Court of Session held that nothing was more dangerous than to allow transactions of this sort; and that where the same law agent acts for parties who have conflicting interests, the law must always be taken most strongly against him; and consequently they held in this case that there was a personal exception against the appellant setting up this lien against Miss Cunningham. As regards the law there laid down I entirely concur in the judgment of the Court of Session. B C D E

[HIS LORDSHIP then reviewed the facts on this issue, and concluded that there was no evidence that the appellant had ever undertaken to act as solicitor to Miss Cunningham, and consequently the application of the rule of law applied by the Court of Session was not warranted by the facts of the case.]

Appeal allowed in part. F

Will—Setting aside—Need to prove coercion or fraud—Conduct amounting to coercion or fraud—Burden of proof—Inference from influence exercised in other transactions.

Influence, to be undue within the meaning of any rule of law which would make it sufficient to vitiate a will, must be an influence exercised either by coercion or by fraud. In the interpretation of these words some latitude must be allowed. To come to the conclusion that a will has been obtained by coercion it is not necessary to establish that actual violence has been used or even threatened. The conduct of a person in vigorous health towards one feeble in body, even though not unsound in mind, may be such as to excite terror and make him execute as his will an instrument which, if he had been free from such influence, he would not have executed. Imaginary terrors may have been I

- A created sufficient to deprive him of free agency. A will thus made may possibly be described as obtained by coercion. So as to fraud: if a wife by falsehood raises prejudices in the mind of her husband against those who would be the natural objects of his bounty, and by contrivance keeps him from intercourse with his relatives, to the end that the impressions which she knows he has formed to their disadvantage may never be removed, such contrivance may be equivalent to positive fraud and may render invalid any will executed under false impressions thus kept alive.
- B

When once it has been proved that a will has been executed with due solemnities by a person of competent understanding, and apparently a free agent, the burden of proving that it was executed under undue influence is on the party who alleges it. To discharge this burden it is not sufficient to show that the circumstances attending its execution were consistent with the hypothesis of its having been obtained by undue influence. It must be shown that they were inconsistent with a contrary hypothesis. Further, it must be proved that the undue influence was exercised in relation to the will itself, not in relation to other matters or transactions. But this principle must not be carried too far. Where the court sees that, at or near the time when the will sought to be impeached was executed, the alleged testator was, in other important transactions, so under the influence of the person benefited by the will that he was not a free agent, but was acting under undue control, the circumstances may be such as fairly to warrant the conclusion, even in the absence of evidence bearing directly on the execution of the will, that in regard to that also the same undue influence was exercised.

Appeal by the defendants from decrees and orders of the Court of Chancery in Ireland.

- The bill was filed in 1849 by the respondents John Thomas Rossborough, now John Thomas Rossborough Colclough, and Mary Grey Wentworth, his wife, against Thomas Boyse and the appellant Jane Stratford Boyse, his wife, its object being to impeach the alleged will of Cesar Colclough, deceased, the former husband of the appellant Jane Stratford Boyse. The bill stated that Cesar Colclough died intestate in August, 1842, without issue, seised in fee of large real estates in Wexford, and leaving Mary Grey Wentworth Rossborough, now Mary Grey Wentworth Rossborough Colclough, his heiress-at-law, and that after his decease his widow Jane Stratford Boyse, then Jane Stratford Colclough, entered into possession of all the estates, claiming to be entitled thereto by virtue of an alleged will of her husband, Cesar Colclough, dated Aug. 6, 1842, rather more than a fortnight before his death, by which he gave to her all his real and personal estate and made her his sole executrix, of which will, or alleged will, she obtained probate in the Prerogative Court of Canterbury and also in the Prerogative Court in Ireland. The bill charged that this was not the genuine will of Cesar Colclough, but that, if it was in fact executed by him, such execution was obtained by Jane Stratford, his wife, by means of undue influence exercised by her over him when he was in a state of mental imbecility and incapable of resisting her influence, or of exercising any will of his own. The bill further stated the marriage of the said Jane Stratford Colclough in 1846 with Thomas Boyse, from whom however she separated within three months after the marriage. It further stated that the plaintiffs were desirous of proceeding by ejectment to obtain possession of the estates, but were unable to do so inasmuch as at the time of the death of Cesar Colclough the entire lands and premises were, and still were held by tenants under leases for lives, under leases for years, or under tenancies from year to year, which tenancies were valid and binding tenancies at the time of the death of Cesar Colclough, and still continued so. It was also stated that the premises were also comprised in a term of years, still subsisting, created by a settlement, dated Jan. 6, 1846, for securing a jointure for Jane Stratford Boyse, and that Thomas Boyse and Jane Stratford Boyse intended to rely on these outstanding tenancies and terms of years as a bar to any ejectment to be brought by plaintiffs for recovery of said premises.

The prayer of the bill was :

“That the said alleged will of Aug. 6, 1842, may be set aside and declared null and void, and be delivered up to be cancelled, as having been obtained from said Cesar Colclough, the alleged testator, by undue influence and misrepresentation, and as having been executed by him when not capable of exercising his judgment in such matters, and, therefore, as not being his genuine last will and testament: or, if the court shall think fit, that an issue may be directed to the county of Wexford, to try whether the freehold estates of the said Cesar Colclough, the alleged testator, were by said alleged will devised or not; and if it shall be found that the said estates descended on the plaintiff Mary Grey Wentworth Rosborough, as his heiress-at-law, then that the said defendants may be ordered to hand over and deliver up to plaintiffs all the deeds, documents, title-deeds and papers in their or either of their hands relating to the same; and to come to an account with the plaintiffs for all the rents and profits of the said lands received by them or either of them, or for their or either of their use since the death of the said Cesar Colclough, the alleged testator, and pay over to plaintiffs what shall be found due on taking such accounts; or that plaintiffs be at liberty to proceed at law by ejectment for recovery of the said lands and premises of which the said Cesar Colclough was so seised at the time of his decease; and that the said defendants may be restrained from relying on the said outstanding tenancies or any outstanding terms of years or temporary bars as a defence against plaintiffs' said proceedings: and that plaintiffs may have such further and other relief as to the court may seem meet and the circumstances of the case may require.”

A great number of facts were set forth in the bill, for the purpose of showing that Jane Stratford had for a long course of years studiously estranged and separated Cesar Colclough from his own relatives, and had obtained such an ascendancy over his mind that he could not be considered a free agent in the management of his affairs.

The defendants Thomas Boyse and Jane Stratford his wife put in a joint answer, insisting on the validity of the will, and denying all fraud or undue influence in obtaining it, and they alleged that the testator was of perfect capacity and well able to manage his affairs, and that the will was the genuine expression of his own unbiased wishes as to the disposal of his property. The answer further stated, that on the marriage of the defendants in 1846, a settlement was executed, by which the defendant Jane Stratford Boyse became entitled to the whole of the property devised to her for her sole and separate use, and the defendants admitted, for the purposes of the suit, that the devised estates were then subject to outstanding terms and tenants' leases, which would prevent the plaintiffs from recovering in ejectment.

At the trial in July, 1852, before PENNEFATHER, B., and a special jury of the county of Wexford, a verdict was found that the document was not the last will and testament of Cesar Colclough. A motion which was afterwards made in the Irish Court of Chancery for a new trial on the ground that the verdict was not warranted by the evidence was refused by the LORD CHANCELLOR. The defendants appealed.

Sir Frederic Thesiger, Q.C., Rolt, Q.C., and Smythe for the appellants.

Sir Richard Bethell, Q.C., and Whiteside, Q.C., for the respondents.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

- A Mar. 13, 1857. LORD CRANWORTH, L.C., delivered the following opinion in which after dealing with a preliminary point as to the jurisdiction of the court below, which does not now call for report, continued: In considering the question whether the Court of Chancery in Ireland ought to have refused the application for a new trial, I must say whether I am entirely satisfied that the whole case was explained to and understood by the jury, and that they were thoroughly aware
- B of the principles which ought to guide them in coming to a conclusion. The first point then is: What was the issue which the jury had to try? The issue to be tried was whether a certain paper writing, bearing date Aug. 6, 1842, was the last will of Cesar Colclough deceased, the late husband of the appellant. That it bore his genuine signature and was signed by him in the presence of and attested by two witnesses, in manner required by law, can hardly be said to have been a matter in
- C controversy—indeed, no dispute was ever raised on that point. But, though a good will, so far as related to its execution and attestation, it yet might not be an instrument having any legal validity. For if the person by whom it was made was not at the time of making it of sufficient mental capacity to enable him to dispose of his property, or, if, having sufficient disposing mind, he executed it under coercion, or under the influence of fear, or in consequence of impressions created in
- D his mind by fraudulent misrepresentations—in none of these cases can the instrument be properly described as being his will. In the first case, the maker is by the hypothesis incapable of having a will. In the other cases supposed, though there is a power of willing, yet the instrument will not be, in contemplation of law, a true expression of that will. I say, in contemplation of law, for, perhaps, speaking with strict metaphysical accuracy, the instrument in these latter cases does
- E truly express the testator's will, and the more correct mode of expression would be that the law will not give effect to the will of a testator when that will has been thus unduly brought about. If I meet a man in the street, and he puts a pistol to my breast and threatens to shoot me if I do not give him my purse, and to save my life I yield to his demand, or if a neighbour, meaning to steal my horse, asks me for the loan of it, stating that he wants it in order to go to market, and trusting to
- F this representation I deliver it to him, and then he rides off and sells it—in both of these cases it was my will to hand over the purse and the horse, but the law deals with the case as if they had been obtained against my will, my will having been the result in the one case of fear, and in the other of fraud. The same principles must guide us in determining whether an instrument duly executed in point of form, so far as legal solemnities are concerned, is or is not a valid will.
- G The inquiries must be—first, was the alleged testator at the time of its execution, a person of sound mind? and if he was, then, secondly, was the instrument in question the genuine expression of his will, or was it the expression of a will created in his mind by coercion or fraud?

On the first head, the difficulty to be grappled with arises from the circumstance that the question is almost always of one degree. There is no difficulty, in the

H case of a raving madman or of a drivelling idiot, in saying that he is not a person capable of disposing of property. But between such an extreme case and that of a man of perfectly sound and vigorous understanding, there is every shade of intellect, every degree of mental capacity. There is no possibility of mistaking midnight from noon, but at what precise moment twilight becomes darkness is hard to determine. In this case, however, with respect to the general mental

I capacity of Mr. Colclough, I do not apprehend that any question is raised. The evidence shows irresistibly that he was a man of superior and cultivated mind, and the only question on this head of inquiry is whether, though previously of a strong and vigorous understanding, he had or had not become, before Aug. 6, 1842, so enfeebled as to be incapable of understanding the nature and affect of a will, or generally of managing or disposing of property.

[His LORDSHIP referred to the evidence, and continued:] I shall, therefore, assume that Mr. Colclough, when he executed the instrument of Aug. 6, 1842, had sufficient mind to enable him to make a will if left to exercise his judgment freely; and I will consider the other, which is the real point of the case, namely, whether A the verdict is satisfactory supposing it to have proceeded on the ground that, though Mr. Colclough had a disposing mind, yet the document in question cannot be considered to be his will by reason of its having been obtained from him by the undue influence of his wife.

The difficulty of deciding such a question arises from the difficulty of defining with distinctness what is undue influence. In a popular sense, we often speak of a person exercising undue influence over another when the influence certainly is not of a nature which would invalidate a will. A young man is often led into dissipation by following the example of a friend of riper years, to whom he looks up and who leads him to consider habits of dissipation as venial and perhaps even creditable. The friend is then correctly said to exercise an undue influence. But if, in these circumstances, the young man, influenced by his regard for the friend C who had thus led him astray, were to make a will and leave to him everything he possessed, such a will certainly could not be impeached on the ground of undue influence. Nor would the case be altered merely because the friend had urged, or even importuned, the young man so to dispose of his property, provided only that in making such a will the young man were really carrying into effect his own intention formed without either coercion or fraud. I must further remark that all the difficulties of defining the point at which influence exerted over the mind of a testator becomes so pressing as to be properly described as coercion are greatly enhanced when the question is one between husband and wife. The relation constituted by marriage is of a nature which makes it as difficult to inquire, as it would be impolitic to permit inquiry, into all which may have passed in the intimate union of affections and interests which it is the paramount purpose of that connection to cherish, and this is the case with which your Lordships have now to deal. E

In order, therefore, to have something to guide us in our inquiries on this very difficult subject, I am prepared to say that influence, in order to be undue within the meaning of any rule of law which would make it sufficient to vitiate a will must be an influence exercised either by coercion or by fraud. In the interpretation, F indeed, of these words some latitude must be allowed. In order to come to the conclusion that a will has been obtained by coercion it is not necessary to establish that actual violence has been used or even threatened. The conduct of a person in vigorous health towards one feeble in body, even though not unsound in mind, may be such as to excite terror and make him execute as his will an instrument which, if he had been free from such influence, he would not have executed. G Imaginary terrors may have been created sufficient to deprive him of free agency. A will thus made may possibly be described as obtained by coercion. So as to fraud: if a wife by falsehood raises prejudices in the mind of her husband against those who would be the natural objects of his bounty, and by contrivance keeps him from intercourse with his relatives to the end that the impressions which she knows he has thus formed to their disadvantage may never be removed, such H contrivance may, perhaps, be equivalent to positive fraud and may render invalid any will executed under false impressions thus kept alive. It is, however, extremely difficult to state in the abstract what acts will constitute undue influence in questions of this nature. It is sufficient to say that, allowing a fair latitude of construction, they must range themselves under one or other of these heads—coercion or fraud. One point, however, is beyond dispute, and that is that where I once it has been proved that a will has been executed with due solemnities by a person of competent understanding, and apparently a free agent, the burden of proving that it was executed under undue influence is on the party who alleges it. Undue influence cannot be presumed, and, looking to the evidence in the present case, I am unable to discover evidence warranting the conclusion at which the jury have arrived—supposing them to have proceeded on the ground of undue influence.

That Mr. Colclough might, without any undue influence operating on his mind, desire to make a will giving everything to his wife, is a proposition which cannot

- A be controverted. She had been the partner of his life for twenty-four years. He had no children. His nearest relative was a first cousin of his father, with whom, from whatever cause, he had never had more than slight and casual intercourse. His heir presumptive was a second cousin, of whose very existence he does not appear to have been aware, being the daughter of another and elder first cousin of his father, who had died very many years previously. That he should in these
- B circumstances wish to give everything to his wife could surely afford no ground for surprise; and one mode, therefore, of looking at this subject is, to consider whether, supposing him without the exercise of any sinister influence to have entertained such a wish, his conduct would have been that which, according to the evidence, he in fact pursued. Supposing, then, that Mr. Colclough on Aug. 6, 1842, being as I assume he was, sound in mind, though very infirm in body, entertained
- C the wish to give everything to his wife, what is the course which, as a reasonable man, he would be likely to pursue? He would merely send for his solicitor, and, in the absence of his wife, give him the necessary instructions, and when the will was prepared, he would execute it in the presence only of his solicitor and some other disinterested witness, for which purpose no one would be more fit than his medical attendant. This is precisely the course which he did take. The burden of
- D proof at the trial was, therefore, on the respondent to show that, though what was done bore the semblance of being the voluntary act of Mr. Colclough, yet it was an act which he was induced to perform under the influence of terror or fraud. I look in vain for any such evidence. The most I can find—if indeed that can be found—is evidence to show that the act done was consistent with the hypothesis of undue influence; that the instrument, though apparently the expression of his
- E genuine will, might in truth have been executed only in compliance with the threats or commands of his wife, or that he had been led to execute it by unfounded prejudices artfully instilled into or cherished in his mind by his wife against those who would otherwise have been the probable objects of his bounty.

- But, in order to set aside the will of a person of sound mind, it is not sufficient to show that the circumstances attending its execution were consistent with the
- F hypothesis of its having been obtained by undue influence. It must be shown that they were inconsistent with a contrary hypothesis. Can it be truly said that there is any inconsistency here? The undue influence must be an influence exercised in relation to the will itself, not an influence in relation to other matters or transactions. But this principle must not be carried too far. Where a jury sees that, at and near the time when the will sought to be impeached was executed, the alleged testator was, in other
- G important transactions, so under the influence of the person benefited by the will that he was not a free agent, but was acting under undue control, the circumstances may be such as fairly to warrant the conclusion, even in the absence of evidence bearing directly on the execution of the will, that in regard to that also the same undue influence was exercised. Even allowing the utmost latitude in the application of this principle, I feel compelled to say that I do not discover the proof of anything
- H sufficient to show undue influence in the obtaining of this will. That Mr Colclough did not execute it under actual duress or coercion is certain. The only persons who were witnesses to the execution were Mr. Colclough's solicitor and medical attendant, and their testimony excludes the notion of anything like actual force or violence having been made use of to control him. There is no evidence to show that his wife knew that he was making his will. Several of the servants,
- I indeed, speak to the general conduct of his wife as having been of a violent and overbearing character towards him. But this, even supposing them to have had the means of forming a just opinion as to Mrs. Colclough's conduct, is clearly insufficient to prove actual coercion in the particular act of making the will, which was certainly made and executed by Mr. Colclough apart from his wife, and when she being absent could not, even if she wished it, force him to do what he was unwilling to do.

The question then is whether the evidence shows that, though not under actual duress or coercion, he would not have executed the will but from fear of the consequences which might result to him if she should discover that he had given his property to any one but herself. Assuming that a will so obtained might be set aside as made by coercion, the testimony of the servants is totally insufficient to prove such a case. [His LORDSHIP examined the evidence.] I confess that I feel very great difficulty in understanding how this will can be impeached on the ground of coercion.

Is there any stronger evidence to show that it was obtained by fraud? That is, defining fraud with reference to the circumstances of this case, is there any evidence to show that, in order to induce Mr. Colclough to make this or some similar will, Mrs. Colclough represented to him matters to the prejudice of Sarsfield Colclough and his family which she knew or believed to be false, or that, knowing him to entertain prejudices against his relatives resting on no foundation, she contrived by force or artifice to prevent any intercourse with them, fearing that the result of any free intercourse would be to cause a reconciliation; and even assuming that such conduct would be sufficient to invalidate the will? I can discover no evidence of the sort. Mr. Colclough had, or thought he had, good grounds for entertaining very unfriendly feelings towards his family. The suggestion that all these causes of aversion had no foundation in fact, but owed their existence to the artful contrivances of Mrs. Colclough, is a suggestion in support of which there is not, in my opinion, a tittle of evidence.

On these grounds I think that the verdict is one with which the Lord Chancellor ought not to have been satisfied, considering that it was to bind the inheritance for ever, and that he ought to have directed a new trial. [His LORDSHIP dealt with a question arising under the old procedure, and concluded:] The consequence is that the order refusing the new trial must be discharged, and the cause remitted back to Ireland with a declaration that there ought to be a new trial, with such special directions (if any) as the Lord Chancellor may deem it proper to make.

Mistake—Mistake of fact—Money paid under mistake—Recovery—Rent—Recovery by tenant—Set-off by landlord of payments made on tenant's behalf.

Money paid for rent under a mistake of fact may be recovered back in an action for money had and received, and in the action ground-rents, rates and taxes, paid by the defendant in respect of the premises occupied by the plaintiff, may be set off, it being shown that the plaintiff must be taken to have sanctioned the payments made by the defendant in respect of those matters.

Cur. adv. vult.

D Nov. 14, 1856. CRESSWELL, J., delivered the following judgment of the court.—This was an action for money had and received: pleas, never indebted and a set-off. The cause was tried before JERVIS, C.J., at the sittings after last Trinity Term, and the verdict was for the plaintiff, with damages as stated in the declaration, subject to the opinion of the court upon a Special Case, the material parts of which may be shortly stated.

E The plaintiff is a warehouse-keeper, carrying on business in Lower Thames Street, London, and the defendants are the executors of John Thackeray, deceased. On Jan. 11, 1811, one William Lingham was possessed under two leases, dated respectively Aug. 15, 1794, and Jan. 9, 1795, for two certain terms of years, both of which expired in Midsummer, 1854, of premises in the city of London, of which certain warehouses, called Lingham's warehouses, formed part. By an indenture of that date, in consideration of the sum of £2,000, he granted to John Thackeray an annuity for his life and the lives of two other persons, and for the lives of the survivors, and for securing the same he demised to John Thackeray the premises, including Lingham's warehouses, for the term of forty-three years from Jan. 10, 1811. By another indenture of that date, William Lingham, in the like manner for a similar consideration, granted an annuity of the same amount to one Ralph Ellis, and demised to him the premises for forty-three years to secure that annuity.

G In 1817 the premises and the annuities in the deeds mentioned were assigned for the payment of the residue of the leases granted by Lingham, subject to the annuities to Thackeray and Ellis, and to the under-leases for securing the same. In 1825 Thackeray and Ellis were let into possession of the premises so underlet to them. In 1830 the plaintiff became tenant to them of part of the premises, at a rent of £550, payable in equal moieties. John Thackeray was the last survivor of the cestuis que vie mentioned in his annuity-deed, and died in May, 1851. The defendants were his executors, and, from the time of his death till the expiration of the leases granted to William Lingham, that is, for six half-years, William Ellis, as their agent, regularly applied for and received the rent of £550, for the representative of Ralph Ellis, and accounted for the moities to each of them, deducting

I various sums paid on their account.

The plaintiff seeks to recover the sums so paid for rent since the death of Thackeray, and the defendants claim to set off various sums so paid by their agent for them, if the plaintiff shall be held entitled to recover in this action. The money paid by the plaintiff was paid under a mistake of fact, and the defendants had no right to any such payment. But the defendants say—first, that, to allow the plaintiff to recover would be to try his title in an action for money had and received; secondly, according to the facts stated in the Case, it would be inequitable to allow the plaintiff to recover the money in an action for money had and received, it being an equitable action; thirdly, they claim to set off various sums of money A paid by them for ground-rent and rates and taxes.

As to the first point, we think it is not an action to try a disputed title to the land. There is no dispute upon the subject; it is a simple case of money paid after the title of the defendants had expired, the fact of it having so expired not being in any manner disputed. The second point depends upon the effect of an agreement bearing date Oct. 25, 1825. That agreement was in these terms. After the death of William Lingham and before his will was proved, the ground-rents due from William Lingham in respect of the premises comprised in the annuity-deeds being greatly in arrear, an arrangement was come to for discharging the same and for other matters, by an agreement bearing date Oct. 25, 1825, between John Thackeray and Ralph Ellis and Thomas Lingham and George Augustus Lingham and one Richard Ellis (those parties were the executors to William Lingham's will), which agreement was in these terms: B C

"In consideration of each of the undersigned, John Thackeray and Ralph Ellis, having, at the instance of and request of us the undersigned Thomas Lingham, George Augustus Lingham and Richard Ellis, and each and every of us, agreed to advance and pay to Mr. R. Hains, as the agent of the ground landlords of the premises on lease to the late William Lingham, half (making together the full amount) of the ground-rents due at Michaelmas last, and of one year's insurance to that time, each moiety amounting to the sum of £342; and in order to induce each of them the said John Thackeray and Ralph Ellis so to do, we, the said Thomas Lingham, George Augustus Lingham and Richard Ellis, do hereby jointly and severally engage and undertake with each of them the said John Thackeray and Ralph Ellis, that the will of the said William Lingham shall be proved in the Prerogative Court of Canterbury within fourteen days from this time, and that one moiety of the money now due to the estate of the said William Lingham from the Commissioners of his Majesty's Customs for rent of part of the said premises, and also one moiety of all other rents now due and hereafter to accrue due in respect of the said premises, shall in the first instance be applied in payment to each of them, the said John Thackeray and Ralph Ellis, of his said sum of £342, with interest thereon at the rate of £5 per cent. per annum from the date of the advancement thereof, and that the said leasehold premises shall be chargeable with the same sums and interest. And also that both moieties of the same rents and profits shall in the next place, and after payment of the ground-rents and taxes payable thereout, be applied in the manner following, that is to say: one moiety in payment and discharge of the present arrears of the annuity granted to each of them, the said John Thackeray and Ralph Ellis, by the said William Lingham, and charged upon the same premises, and all the future and growing payments of the same annuity; and that possession of such parts of the said leasehold premises as are in hand shall this day be delivered to the said John Thackeray as having the prior legal title to the possession or receipt of the rents of the premises; but all the rents and profits applicable to the payment of the said annuities, or either of them, shall be applied in payment and discharge of both of the said annuities pari passu, that is to say, by equal pound rate. And this undertaking shall be a sufficient authority and consent and direction to and for the tenants of such parts of the said leasehold estates as are in the possession of tenants for paying the arrears and future and growing payments of their rents to the said John Thackeray, to be by him applied for the purposes aforesaid." D E F G H I

It then provides that the costs and charges of Thackeray and Ellis in certain negotiations which led to this agreement, though not exceeding £600, shall be paid and discharged out of the rents and profits of the leasehold estates, and shall be a charge on the leasehold estates and the rents and profits thereof. Then it concludes in these terms:

A "And that, for the purpose of securing the said several sums of £342 and £342, and the said costs and charges, an underlease or underleases (and not an assignment by way of mortgage), and at a peppercorn rent, shall at our costs and charges be executed to the said John Thackeray and Ralph Ellis respectively, or to a trustee for them and him respectively; but that the sum to be secured to each of them the said John Thackeray and Ralph Ellis, for the sum of £342, and his share of such costs and charges, shall not exceed in the whole the sum of £942."

It does not appear that any such underlease was ever made. It was contended, and we think rightly contended, that the plaintiff must be taken to have had notice of this agreement.

C Then the defendants say that the operation of the agreement was to create an equitable charge on the premises leased to William Lingham for the sum of money thereby agreed to be paid by Thackeray and Ellis for the arrears of annuities then due, and all the future and growing payments of their rents, to John Thackeray, and that the sum paid by Thackeray and Ellis in pursuance of the agreement and the arrears of annuities now remaining unpaid by far exceed the money sought to be recovered in this action. But it appears to us that the agreement in question had not such an operation as the defendants now ascribe to it. The agreement shows that up to that time Thackeray and Ellis had not been let into possession, nor into the receipt of the rents and profits of the premises demised to them to secure their annuities; and it recites that the ground-rent payable to Lingham was in arrear; that Thackeray and Ellis agreed each to pay £342 of that rent, and in order to enable them to do so, Lingham's executors agreed to prove his will; that the rents of the premises should be applied first to the payment of those sums, and the leasehold premises should be chargeable with those sums, and the residue of the rents, after paying the ground-rents and the rates and taxes, should be applicable to the payment of the annuities granted to Thackeray and Ellis; and it then provided for giving possession to Thackeray of such parts of the premises and the payments to them of such parts as were realised. Further, it provided that the costs of the agreement, not exceeding £600, should be paid out of the rents which should be charged on the said leasehold estates, and it concludes that the underlease should be for the purpose of securing £342 and £342, and the costs. There is not one word about that underlease being made to secure any arrears of annuities. This agreement is, not that any further charge on the leasehold estates of Lingham should be created to secure either the arrears or future payment of annuities, but for the two sums of £342 and costs, not exceeding £600. There was to be a further charge of an underlease at a peppercorn rent, and it may be taken that that underlease would include the whole of William Lingham's term. There is no reason to suppose the sums to be secured by such underlease are still unpaid. This agreement provides that the rent shall be applied in the first place to the payment of those sums, and the residue only to the payment of the annuities. The rents received before Thackeray's death would far more than cover those sums. There is, therefore, no further equitable charge on the premises to interfere with the right of the plaintiff to recover in this equitable action.

H The remaining question relates to the set-off. If the defendants had been in possession and had after ejectment been sued for mesne profits, they would have been entitled to the allowance of ground-rent, according to Doe v. Hare (1); and we think the same principle would extend to the rates and taxes. If, instead of being sued for mesne profits, an action had been brought for use and occupation, we think the same allowance would be made in estimating the value of the occupation on the same principle as in this action which is to recover back money paid by mistake and without consideration, and it is just and equitable to allow the deduction with respect to those payments which, if not made by them, might have been claimed by the plaintiff or assignee of the original leases and occupier of the premises. To this it may be objected that the defendants cannot show that the money was paid by them at the request, expressed or implied, of the plaintiff. A But from the year 1827, when the plaintiff became assignee of the original leases, he must have known that he was liable to pay the rent due to the ground landlord, and he must be taken to have known, till the agreement of 1825, that Thackeray was bound to pay the rent and the rates and taxes out of the rents received by him, and he never took upon himself the payment of the ground-rents as assignee of the lease or rates and taxes which he was liable to pay as occupier, and must be B taken to have sanctioned the continued payment of them by the party to whom he paid rent. We are, therefore, enabled to say that this money was paid at the request of the plaintiff, and must be allowed by way of set-off. Our judgment is that the plaintiff is entitled to recover five half-years' rent paid by him after the death of Thackeray, and the defendants are entitled to set off the ground-rents, rates and taxes paid by them in respect of the premises occupied by them. C

Auctioneer—Sale of goods—"Without reserve"—Undertaking by auctioneer—Bidder's right of action for breach.

An auctioneer who puts property up for sale without reserve pledges himself that the sale will be without reserve. This contract is made with the highest bona fide bidder who, in the case of a breach of it, has a right of action against the auctioneer. F

Auctioneer—Authority—Revocation—Right of owner of goods to revoke at any time—Indemnity to auctioneer.

The owner of goods put up for sale by auction may revoke the auctioneer's authority at any time before the contract is legally complete, but he does so at his peril, and if the auctioneer has contracted any liability in consequence of his employment and the subsequent revocation or conduct of the owner, he is entitled to be indemnified. D Appeal by the plaintiff from a decision of the Court of Queen's Bench (Lord CAMPBELL, C.J., WIGHTMAN and ERLE, JJ.), reported 1 E. & E. 295, making absolute a rule to enter a nonsuit obtained by the defendant in an action for breach of contract.

The plaintiff by his declaration stated that the defendant exercised and carried on the trade and business of an auctioneer, and was retained to sell by public auction divers horses; that the defendant caused to be printed and circulated advertisements advertising an intended sale by auction on Thursday, June 24, 1858, at No. 1, Cheapside, Birmingham of (among other horses) a certain horse, namely :

E "The property of a gentleman, without reserve, Janet Pride, a brown mare without white, five years old, by Jago out of Stormy Petrel. For performances see "Racing Calendar."

F The plaintiff attended the sale, and was the highest bidder for the mare so advertised to be sold without reserve, and he alleged that thereby the defendant became his agent to complete the contract on his behalf for the purchase of the mare, yet the defendant did not complete the contract, but refused so to do, whereby the plaintiff was deprived of the benefit of the contract and was put to expense in travelling with his groom and servants to the sale, and employing a veterinary surgeon to examine the mare. The defendant denied liability.

G At the trial, before SIR ALEXANDER COCKBURN, C.J., it appeared that the plaintiff attended the sale and bid sixty guineas for the mare, and another person immediately bid sixty-one guineas. This person was Mr. Henderson, the owner of the mare. The plaintiff having been informed that the last bidder was the owner, declined to bid further, and thereupon the defendant knocked down the mare to Mr. Henderson for sixty-one guineas, and entered his name as purchaser in the sale-book.

H The plaintiff went at once into the auctioneer's office, saw Mr. Bretherton and Mr. Henderson, and claimed the mare from Mr. Bretherton as he was the highest bona fide bidder and the mare had been advertised to be sold without reserve. Mr. Henderson said: "I bought her in, and you shall not have her. I gave £130 for her, and it is not likely I am going to sell her for £63." On the same day the plaintiff tendered to the defendant £63 in sovereigns as the price of the mare, and demanded her. The defendant refused to receive the money or deliver the mare, stating that he had knocked her down to the highest bidder, and he could not interfere in the matter. There was evidence that the plaintiff had notice that the following were among the conditions of sale :

I "The highest bidder to be the buyer; and if any dispute arise between two or more bidders before the lot is returned into the stables, the lot so disputed shall be put up again, or the auctioneer shall declare the purchaser . . . (iii) The purchaser being declared, must immediately give in his name and address with (if required) a deposit of 5s. in the pound on account of his purchase, and pay the remainder before such lot or lots are delivered. . . . (viii) Any lot ordered for this sale, sold by private contract by the owner, or advertised without reserve and bought by the owner, to be liable to the usual commission of 2 per cent."

At the trial a verdict was entered for the plaintiff for £5 5s. damages, and leave was given to amend the declaration if the court should think fit. Leave was also given to the defendant to move to enter a nonsuit. The Court of Queen's Bench made the rule absolute to enter a nonsuit, and the plaintiff appealed.

Macaulay, Q.C. (Isaac Spooner with him), for the plaintiff.

Field (Mellor with him) for the defendant.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 26, 1859. MARTIN, B., delivered the judgment of WATSON, B., BYLES, J., and himself, in which after stating the facts he continued: Upon the pleadings, as they stand, we think the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench is right, and that the defendant is entitled to the verdict upon the issue whether or not he became the plaintiff's agent as alleged. There is, however, a power given to the court to amend, and it has been held that the power extends to the Court of Appeal, and we think that we ought to exercise it largely in order to carry out the object of the Common Law Procedure Acts, 1852 and 1854, namely, to determine the real question in controversy between the parties in the existing suit.

Upon the facts of the case, it seems to us that the plaintiff is entitled to recover. In a sale by auction there are three parties, namely, the owner of the property to be sold, the auctioneer, and the portion of the public who attend to bid, which includes the highest bidder. In this, as in most cases of sale by auction, the owner's name was not disclosed; he was a concealed principal. The names of the auctioneers, of whom the defendant was one, alone were published, and the sale was announced by them to be "without reserve." This, according to all the cases, both at law and in equity, means that neither the vendor nor any person on his behalf may bid at the auction, and that the property shall be sold to the highest bidder whether the sum bid be equivalent to the real value or not. For this position see Thornett v. Haines (1) [By s. 58(3) of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, where a sale by auction is not notified to be subject to a right to bid on behalf of the seller it shall not be lawful for the seller or any person on his behalf to bid at the sale.]. We cannot distinguish the case of an auctioneer putting up property for sale upon such a condition from the case of the loser of property offering a reward, or that of a railway company publishing a time-table stating the times when and the places to which the trains run. It has been decided that the person giving information advertised for, or a passenger taking a ticket may sue as upon a contract with him: Denton v. Great Northern Rail. Co. (2).

Upon the same principle, it seems to us that the highest bona fide bidder at an auction may sue the auctioneer as upon a contract that the sale shall be without reserve. We think that the auctioneer who puts property up for sale upon such a condition pledges himself that the sale shall be without reserve, or, in other words, contracts that it shall be so, and that this contract is made with the highest bona fide bidder, who, in case of a breach of it, has a right of action against the auctioneer.

The case is not at all affected by s. 17 of the Statute of Frauds [replaced by s. 4 of Sale of Goods Act, 1893, which was repealed by Law Reform (Enforcement of Contracts) Act, 1954], which relates only to direct sales, and not to contracts relating to or connected with them. Neither does it seem to us material whether the owner or a person on his behalf bids with the knowledge or privity of the auctioneer. We think that the auctioneer has contracted that the sale shall be without reserve, and that the contract is broken upon a bid being made by or on

A behalf of the owner, whether it be during the time when the property is under the hammer or whether it be the last bid on which the property is knocked down. In either case the sale is not "without reserve," and the contract of the auctioneer is broken.

B We entertain no doubt that the owner may at any time before the contract is legally complete interfere and revoke the auctioneer's authority, but he does so at his peril, and if the auctioneer has contracted any liability in consequence of his employment and the subsequent revocation or conduct of the owner, he is entitled to be indemnified.

C We do not think that the conditions of sale stated in the case (assuming the plaintiff to be taken to have had notice of them) affect it. As to the first, Mr. Henderson could not be the buyer. He was the owner, and, if that be material, there is ample evidence that the defendant knew him to be such. Indeed, we think he ought not to have taken his bid, but to have refused it, stating as his reason that the sale was without reserve. We feel inclined to differ from the view of the Court of Queen's Bench in this, that we rather think the bid of Mr. Henderson was not a revocation of the defendant's authority as auctioneer.

D The third condition has nothing to do with the case, and the eighth condition only provides, that, if on a sale without reserve the owner act contrary to the conditions, he must pay the usual commission to the auctioneer. For these reasons, if the plaintiff think fit to amend his declaration, he, in our opinion, is entitled to the judgment of the court.

WILLES, J.—I have to state that BRAMWELL, B., and myself do not express any dissent from the judgment which has just been delivered by MARTIN, B., but we prefer putting our judgment upon the ground that the conduct of the parties is strong evidence to show that the auctioneer had not authority to sell without reserve, that he was without such authority ab initio, and that his conduct is evidence that that was so. If that view be correct, there ought to be a count added in the amendment, stating an undertaking by the auctioneer that he had authority to sell without reserve, and a breach of that undertaking. Suffice it to say, the result is the same, but BRAMWELL, B., and I prefer putting our judgment on that ground. We do not express any dissent from what MARTIN, B., has said, but we see our way more clearly in coming to the same conclusion upon the ground I have stated. The rule will be that the plaintiff be at liberty to amend and proceed to a new trial. I don't know which party it was who was unwilling to have a stet processus entered, but it seems to me that that would be a proper ending of the case.

Appeal allowed.

Master and Servant—Contract of service—Termination—Summary dismissal—Misconduct—Incompetence of servant to do skilled work undertaken by him.

When a person who holds himself out to do certain work is employed to do that work for a specified period there is on his part an implied warranty that he is reasonably competent to do the work. If he is found to be incompetent, his failure to afford the requisite skill is a breach of legal duty, and, therefore, misconduct, and his employer is entitled to dismiss him before the end of the period for which he was engaged.

Notes. Section 1 of the Contracts of Employment Act, 1963, which provides for a minimum period of notice to terminate a contract of employment, excludes (by sub.-s. (6)) from the provisions of that section a right which either party had to treat the contract as terminable without notice by reason of such conduct by the other party as would have enabled him so to treat it before the passing of the Act (43 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 276).

Rule Nisi obtained by the defendant to enter verdict for him in an action for wrongful dismissal.

The plaintiff by his declaration stated that in consideration of the plaintiff entering into the service of the defendant in the capacity of a painter, on the terms

A that he was to work from eight o'clock in the morning to six o'clock in the evening each day of the plaintiff's engagement, that the defendant should retain him in his service in the capacity aforesaid for more than a month, and would pay him for his said services at the rate of £2 10s. per week during the continuance of such service. The defendant promised to fulfil those terms; and the plaintiff entered into the defendant's service in the aforesaid capacity and terms, and although the

B plaintiff was ready and willing to continue in the defendant's service in the capacity aforesaid, the defendant did not and would not retain the plaintiff in his service for more than a month, but wrongfully discharged him.

The defendant pleaded, by his second plea, that the plaintiff was not ready and willing as alleged; and by his sixth plea that the defendant was induced to make the promise mentioned in the declaration by the false and fraudulent representation

C of the plaintiff that he was competent to perform the service for which he was engaged, whereas the plaintiff was quite incompetent to perform such service, and the defendant, as soon as he discovered the said fraud and the plaintiff's incompetency, rescinded the contract, and discharged the plaintiff from his said service without having derived any benefit therefrom.

At the trial before WILLIAMS, J., and a jury, the evidence showed that the

D plaintiff expressly represented that he possessed the requisite skill. The jury found that the plaintiff was incompetent, but that he did not fraudulently represent that he was competent. A verdict was entered for the plaintiff, with leave to the defendant to move to enter the verdict for him. The defendant obtained a rule accordingly.

E Needham, for the plaintiff, showed cause against the rule.

D. Keene (with him S. Temple, Q.C.), for the defendant, supported the rule.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 5, 1858. WILLES, J., delivered the following judgment of the court.—The question in this case is whether, when a person is employed to do work which

F requires skill, and he undertakes it without having skill to do it, he can be dismissed by the person who employs him, or whether he is bound to go on with the work. We are of opinion that he is liable to be discharged, and that this rule must be made absolute.

When a skilled labourer, artisan or artist is employed, there is on his part an implied warranty that he is of skill reasonably competent to the task he undertakes.

G Spondes peritiam artis. Thus, if an apothecary, a watchmaker, or an attorney be employed for reward, they each impliedly undertake to possess and exercise reasonable skill in their several arts. The public profession of an art is a representation and undertaking to all the world that the professor possesses the requisite ability and skill: see the observations of JERVIS, C.J., in Jenkins v. Betham (1) (15 C.B. at p. 189). An express promise or express representation in the particular case is

H not necessary. It may be that, if there is no general and no particular representation of ability and skill, the workman undertakes no responsibility. If a gentleman, for example, should employ a man who is known never to have done anything but sweep a crossing, to clean and mend a watch, the employer would probably be held to have undertaken all risk himself. But in the case under consideration the correspondence shows, in addition to the implied representation, an express and

I particular representation by the plaintiff that he did possess the requisite skill.

The next question is this: supposing that, when the skill and competency of the party employed are tested by the employment, he is found to be utterly incompetent, is the employer bound, nevertheless, to go on employing him to the end of the term for which he is engaged, notwithstanding his incompetency? This is a question, upon which we have been furnished by the Bar with no authority, probably because such labour, being seldom retained for a long time certain, the question has not often arisen. It seems, however, very unreasonable that an employer should be compelled to go on employing a man who, having represented himself as competent, turns out to be incompetent. An engineer is retained by a railway company to drive an express train for a year, and is found incompetent to drive or regulate the locomotive—are the railway company still bound under pain of an action to entrust the lives of thousands to his dangerous and demonstrated incapacity? A clerk is retained for a year to keep a merchant's books, and it turns out that he is ignorant, not only of book-keeping, but not sufficiently skilled in arithmetic—is the merchant bound to continue him in his employment? Misconduct in a servant is, according to every day's experience, a justification of a discharge. The failure to afford the requisite skill which had been expressly or impliedly promised is a breach of legal duty, and, therefore, misconduct, the rule of civil law imperitia adnumeratur applies.

We may add that a precedent of a plea founded on the implied condition of competency is to be found in the late MR. CHITTY's work on PLEADING, edited by MR. PEARSON, p. 363. In Spain v. Arnott (2), LORD ELLENBOROUGH, speaking of a servant who had refused to perform his duty, says: "The master is not bound to keep him on as a burdensome and useless servant to the end of the year." It appears to us that there is no material difference between a servant who will not, and a servant who cannot, perform the duty for which he was hired. For these reasons we think that the substantial part of the plea was proved, and that the rule must be made absolute.

Rule absolute.

TURRILL v. CRAWLEY

Inn—Innkeeper—Lien—Goods not property of the guest—Carriage.

The plaintiff sought to recover a carriage from the defendant, an innkeeper, which the defendant claimed to be entitled to retain in satisfaction of the bill of a guest, who had brought the carriage to the inn. The defendant had thought that the carriage belonged to the guest, but it had been hired to her by the plaintiff.

Held: there was no distinction, on an innkeeper's exercise of his right of lien, between the goods of a guest and the goods of a third party in the apparent possession of a guest; in the present case there was a distinct charge for housing and caring for the carriage, the lien was reasonable, and the defendant was entitled to exercise it; and, therefore, the action failed.

Notes. Section 2(2) of the Hotel Proprietors Act, 1956, excludes from the innkeeper's right of lien a guest's horse or vehicle, but the principle of the present decision will apply to goods not excepted by the subsection.

D Rule Nisi obtained by the plaintiff to enter a verdict in an action of trover brought by the plaintiff, a coachmaker in Long Acre, against the defendant, an innkeeper, who kept an hotel at Norwood, to recover a carriage which the defendant had claimed to retain in satisfaction of a bill due to him from a guest, a Miss Jerdan, who had been staying at the hotel, and who had brought with her this carriage, which she had hired of the plaintiff, but which the defendant believed to be her own.

E At the trial before COLERIDGE, J., and a jury a verdict was directed for the defendant, upon a plea which alleged that the plaintiff was not possessed of the carriage at the time of the alleged conversion thereof by the defendant, but leave was given to the plaintiff's counsel to move to set it aside, and enter the judgment in his favour on that issue. A rule was accordingly obtained by the plaintiff.

F Martin and Hayes for the defendant showed cause against the rule.
Whateley and Hance supported the rule.

G LORD DENMAN, C.J.—If an innkeeper has a right to detain any of the goods of a guest for the whole of the expenses incurred by that guest, then it is clear that the defendant is right in this case, and if he is entitled to detain any particular thing for the expenses of that thing, then also he is right. On the first point I shall say nothing. I do not think it necessary here to decide the general matter. But on the second point I have no doubt. There is money expended on the carriage. It is placed in a carriage-house, which is a place of value, a place for which rent is paid, and as that rent was not tendered to this defendant, he is not bound to part with the carriage.

H PATTESON, J.—I am of the same opinion. There is a charge in the bill for the standing of this carriage, for which there is unquestionably a lien. It is not necessary to say more. The ground on which the rule was granted was to ascertain how far this right of lien extended, and whether it attached to a carriage brought into the inn by a guest, but not actually belonging to him. Here it was suggested that the time for which the guest had hired the carriage had expired I when the detainer took place, but that turn out not to be so, for when the carriage was detained the term of hiring still existed. If, then, the lien once attached, it is difficult to say that the owner of the carriage may now be permitted to say that the lien has come to an end.

LORD DENMAN, C.J.—There is no doubt upon that point.

COLERIDGE, J.—I am of the same opinion. It now seems to be clear that there is no distinction, with respect to an innkeeper's exercise of his right of lien, between the goods of a guest and the goods of a third person in the apparent possession of a guest. Robinson v. Walter (1) is a sufficient authority for that proposition, which is reasonable in itself; and as it seems to me in proportion as a proposition is reasonable in that proportion is there less authority required to support it. Then that being so, the question here is whether this right of lien existed in the present case. I am of opinion that it did, and that the same principle is applicable to the case of a carriage as to that of a horse. A

There are many things which may be good law, and yet which have not been formally decided. Counsel supporting the rule says that the burden of maintaining this doctrine of lien is upon those who say that it exists; but the answer to that is, that the decision of courts proceed according to the wants of the times; and that in former times circumstances did not necessarily give rise to such a question as the present. Circumstances have altered now. A carriage now is in the situation in which a horse was in former times. A horse was, and a carriage is, the common means of travelling. I cannot therefore, say that, when this person came to the defendant's hotel with a carriage, she was in a different position from a traveller in former times coming with a horse. B C

This carriage is taken in, and if taken in, it must be taken care of. The innkeeper must keep it in safety. More than that, he must take care of it, clean it, and keep it fit for the use of the guest, and for doing these things there is a distinct charge made in the bill. If the innkeeper would be justified in detaining the horse for its keep and for the care bestowed upon it, he may detain it for the housing and the care of the carriage. D

WIGHTMAN, J.—The doubts upon questions of lien have from time to time become less, and it now appears to be settled law that the innkeeper is not bound to inquire whether the property brought by a guest really belongs to that guest or not. In Johnson v. Hill (2), it was stated by counsel that if a robber brought a horse, which he had stolen, to an inn, the innkeeper would be entitled to a lien upon it; and ABBOTT, L.C.J., said that he had no doubt of the law being as it was stated. There does not appear to be any distinction between a carriage and a horse, so far as the lien is concerned. Here there is a distinct charge for taking care of the carriage, and the lien here is a reasonable lien. E F

Inn—Liability for loss of guest's goods—Negligence of guest.

A guest at an inn placed his watch and money on a table in his bedroom and left the door of the room open all night so that the things on the table were visible from outside. While the guest was asleep, this property was stolen by a thief who had been let in during the night and who left two hours later.

In an action by the guest against the landlord to recover in respect of the loss,

Held: in a case like the present the goods remained in the charge of the innkeeper and under the protection of the inn so as to make the innkeeper liable as for a breach of duty unless the negligence of the guest occasioned the loss so that it would not have happened had the guest used such ordinary care as a prudent man might reasonably be expected to have taken in the circumstances.

H

Rule Nisi obtained by the defendant to enter a verdict and for a new trial of an action tried in the Borough Court of Manchester, by the Recorder of Manchester, and brought by the plaintiff, a guest at an inn, against the defendant, the landlord, to recover the value of a gold watch and four sovereigns stolen while he was a guest.

It appeared that the plaintiff, while at the inn, had shown his money openly in the commercial room, and that when he went to bed he placed his watch and money on his bedroom table, and left his bedroom door open all night, so that the table and that which was upon it could be seen from the outside. After he had gone to bed (at four o'clock in the morning), the boots let in a stranger, and two hours after, the stranger left the house privately (the boots being asleep at the time) having committed the theft of the guest's property (but of nothing else), for which he was afterwards convicted. The recorder, in summing-up, left it to the jury to say, "whether the plaintiff had been guilty of gross negligence, telling them that if he had, the defendant was entitled to their verdict; but if they did not think the conduct of the plaintiff amounted to gross negligence, he was entitled to their verdict, and they must say to what amount of damage." The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff, with £25 damages. A

A rule was obtained by the defendant calling upon the plaintiff to show cause why the verdict found for the plaintiff should not be set aside, and a new trial had between the parties on the ground of misdirection, in that the Recorder had directed the jury that, if they did not think the conduct of the plaintiff amounted to gross negligence, he was entitled to their verdict. Whereas the recorder should have directed the jury that, if there was negligence on the part of the plaintiff conducing to the loss, the defendant was exonerated; also that the recorder should have explained what constituted gross negligence. B

Wheeler and Kay for the plaintiff, showed cause against the rule. C

H. Hill, Q.C., for the defendant, supported the rule.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 3, 1856. ERLE, J., delivered the following judgment of the court.—In this case the plaintiff brought his action to recover damages for the loss of a watch and some sovereigns, supposed to have been stolen from a room in the defendant's inn where he was a guest. The defendant set up for a defence certain acts of the plaintiff, charged to have been negligence, and to have occasioned or contributed to the loss. At the trial before the recorder of Manchester, the jury were directed that the defence failed, unless they thought the plaintiff had been guilty of gross negligence. D

A rule for a new trial having been obtained, as on misdirection, two questions appear to have been raised before us. It was said, first, by the plaintiff's counsel, that the particular acts imputed to the plaintiff were of such a nature as not to amount to negligence, and that the recorder should have directed the jury that there was no evidence of negligence. If we were satisfied there was no evidence to go to the jury of any negligence on the part of the plaintiff, we should be authorised in discharging the rule for a new trial on that ground; but we cannot say there was not some evidence on which the opinion of the jury ought to have been taken. E

The other question was as to the alleged misdirection in the direction to the jury that there must be gross negligence to maintain the defence. It does not appear that there is any information given to the jury as to what they were to understand by gross negligence; but, if they were told to understand by gross negligence the absence of that ordinary care which, under the circumstances, a prudent man ought to have taken, which seems to have been the meaning given of gross negligence in some of the modern cases cited before us, the direction as to the degree of negligence might not have been objectionable. But the legal meaning of gross negligence is greater negligence or the absence of such ordinary care; it is such a degree of negligence as excludes the last degree of care and is said to amount to a dolus. F G H

We think the rule of law resulting from all the authorities is that in a case like the present, the goods remained in the charge of the innkeeper and under the protection of the inn so as to make the innkeeper liable as for a breach of duty, unless the negligence of the guest occasioned the loss so that it would not have happened if the guest had used such ordinary care as a prudent man may be reasonably expected to have taken under the circumstances. We think, therefore, the direction in the present case cannot be supported, and the rule for a new trial should be made absolute. I

CLARKE v. ROYAL PANOPTICON OF SCIENCE AND ART

[VICE-CHANCELLOR'S COURT (Kindersley, V.-C.), February 11, 12, 18, 1857]

B Corporation—Powers—Wrongful use—Mortgage granted with power of sale—Grant ultra vires—Mortgagee sought to be restrained from selling—Acquiescence by corporation in wrongful use of power.

A corporation had under its charter a special power of mortgaging which did not include a power to grant mortgages with a power of sale. Mortgages by the corporation were granted containing powers of sale, but no objection on behalf of the corporation was made between 1853 (when it was decided to raise money on a mortgage which should contain such a power of sale) until 1856.

Held: although the power to mortgage in the charter did not permit the grant of a mortgage containing a power of sale and such a power should not have been exercised, the corporation had acquiesced in that exercise for so long that it was too late to raise an objection on that ground, and the mortgagee would not be restrained from exercising the power.

D

Notes. Where the mortgage is by deed a power of sale is now conferred by the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 101(1)(i), (5) (20 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 655, 662), replacing the Conveyancing Act, 1881, s. 19 (1). An express power of sale, however, may still be inserted in a mortgage deed.

Motions to dissolve an injunction.

The court was asked by these two motions to dissolve an injunction granted by KINDERSLEY, V.-C., restraining a sale of the buildings and property of the Royal Panopticon of Science and Art, under a power of sale contained in a mortgage of that property. The first motion was brought by the mortgagee, who had been restrained from selling under his power of sale, and the second motion by the council of the society, against whom, as well as the mortgagee, the injunction had been granted.

H

The "Royal Panopticon of Science and Art" was formed under a charter dated Feb. 21, 1850, which directed that the council, to be constituted and provided by the deed thereafter directed to be executed, should have full power and authority on behalf of the said corporation to enter into and make and execute all contracts, purchases, sales, assurances and other acts to which the corporate seal should require to be affixed, and generally to do all acts which they should consider to be necessary for the well ordering of the affairs of the institution, and to execute all the powers in relation to the corporation, as if the same were done with the assent of the whole body, so as the same were done in conformity to the provisions of the charter or of any supplemental deed.

Power was also given to the corporation to purchase, acquire and hold to the corporation and their successors in perpetuity, or for any other term or estate, any lands, tenements and hereditaments, and to sell, demise, and otherwise to dispose of the same. Provided that the yearly value of such lands, tenements and hereditaments should not exceed the sum of £5,000, and no sale, mortgaged encumbrance, or other disposition of such lands, tenements or hereditaments was to be made, except with the approbation and concurrence of a general meeting of the proprietors of the corporation. Provision was also made that the proprietors should execute a deed of copartnership and settlement; and it was declared that the regulations contained in such deed should be taken to be the existing regulations of the corporation, except so far as the same might be repugnant to the charter or to the laws of the realm. It was also directed that the deed of settlement to be prepared should, within one year from the date thereof, be enrolled in the Court of Chancery. A B C

In compliance with the provision contained in the charter an indenture of settlement was, on Dec. 18, 1850, entered into and executed by the council and certain proprietors of the company, who thereby covenanted to observe, and keep, and enforce the engagements and duties contained in the several clauses of the deed. Clause 21 provided that the council, at their discretion, might call an extraordinary or special general meeting, or that twenty shareholders, holding not less than 1,000 shares, might require the council to call such meetings; and by cl. 22 it was provided that there had to be present, personally or by proxy, at any meetings not less than ten shareholders, holding 200 shares; and by cl. 23 that fourteen days' notice was to be given of any meetings. Clause 33 provided that the resolutions passed at any meetings should be entered in a book, and be signed by the chairman of the meeting, and that such book should be evidence of the same. By cl. 42 it was declared that in all cases not provided for by the charter, or that deed, it should be lawful for the council to act in such manner as they should think best for the interests of the corporation. Edward Marmaduke Clarke was, by cll. 65 and 66, appointed managing director for twenty years, at a salary of £800 a year, and that situation he continued to occupy until the closing of the institution. D E F

On Sept. 20, 1851, the council issued a circular to the proprietors, stating that 5,400 shares had been actually allotted out of the 8,000 contemplated by the charter, and that the shares so allotted represented £54,000, of which £50,000 had been received, leaving £4,000 to be received; that the whole of the cash received had been expended, and that, in addition, £4,500 had been advanced by members of the council; and measures were in progress for raising the further sum which was required. On April 23, 1852, and at subsequent periods, Augustus Shakespeare Oliver Massey advanced sums amounting in the whole to £9,000. On June 15, 1852, a letter, signed by the secretary, T. J. Brown, was forwarded to the members of the council, giving notice of a meeting of the council to be held on June 17, for the purposes of authorising the appropriation of £5,000, part of £10,000 to be lent to the corporation by A.S.O. Massey, pursuant to the resolutions of the council passed on June 3, for payment to the builder of moneys which should become due to him under his contract with the association, and carrying over such sum to an account to be called "The Royal Panopticon of Science and Art—the Building Fund"; and also for taking into consideration the deed of security to be made to A. S. O. Massey, and ordering the corporate seal to be affixed to that deed, on payment by Massey of the £10,000. G H I

In pursuance of that letter a meeting of the council was held on June 17, 1852, at which resolutions were passed authorising the corporate seal of the corporation being affixed to the deed of security to Massey for securing £10,000 and interest. This sum was repaid to Massey. On Sept. 30, an ordinary annual meeting of the proprietors of stock in the institution was called for the transaction of the ordinary business, and to consider the propriety of authorising the council to raise a sum not exceeding £25,000. A resolution was passed at that meeting authorising the council to raise a sum not exceeding that amount. On Sept. 28, 1855, in

- A pursuance of a circular of the 11th of that month addressed to the proprietors, a general meeting was held to transact the ordinary business and to obtain the approbation of the proprietors of the corporation to the mortgaging the lands, etc., of the corporation for any sum not exceeding £13,000, and in a note at the end of the circular calling the meeting it was stated that the powers of mortgaging to the extent of £25,000, authorised by the general meeting of Sept. 30, 1853, had been exhausted, but that £13,000, part of the money so raised, having been paid off, the lands, etc., of the corporation would not be charged beyond the sum of £25,000.
- B Mortgages for £2,000 and £3,000 to Samuel Gurney, Jun., and one for £10,000 to John Willson, were entered into by the council between the general meeting in 1854 and that in 1855, the latter being for sums due to him in respect of the building. On May 31, 1855, Richard Mansel O. Massey, the father of A. S. O. Massey, advanced to the corporation a sum of £10,000, out of which £2,000 was paid to A. S. O. Massey.

- C At a meeting held on Sept. 28, 1855, it was resolved to raise a sum not exceeding £13,000 by means of a mortgage of the lands, etc., of the corporation, and a committee of investigation appointed. Their report was presented at an adjourned general meeting held on Jan. 30, 1856, and it was resolved that further steps for raising money to carry on the undertaking should be taken.
- D On July 31, two circulars, signed by the secretary, were distributed to the proprietors, the one calling a meeting to arrange for the winding-up of the corporation, and the other informing them that the mortgagees intended to sell the buildings and their contents. R. M. O. Massey, A. S. O. Massey, Samuel Gurney, and John Willson, claiming to be mortgagees of the building and its contents, took possession of and instructed Messrs. Chinnock and Galsworthy to sell the same, and in consequence a sale thereof was announced for Aug. 25, 1856, subject to certain particulars and conditions of sale. The particulars stated that the sale was made by direction of the mortgagees, and comprised the building in Leicester Square, and its fixtures and contents.

- E A bill was filed by Edward Marmaduke Clarke, the managing director, on the part of himself and all the other proprietors, except the defendants, praying that the mortgages might be declared illegal as against the corporation and the proprietors of stock therein, and that the powers of sale contained in the mortgages might be declared void, and for an injunction to restrain the proposed sale of the property by the defendants. The bill also asked for the appointment of a receiver.
- F On a motion which came before the vice-chancellor at Southampton in August 1856, during the long vacation, an injunction restraining the proposed sale was granted.

- G Baily, Q.C., and C. Hall for A. S. O. Massey, a mortgagee.
Rawlinson for S. Gurney, a mortgagee.
Glass, Q.C., and Beale for the council.
Terrell and Stiffe for the plaintiff, Clarke.

- H KINDERSLEY, V.-C.—This was a motion to dissolve an injunction granted in the long vacation on notice to restrain the mortgagee from exercising a power of sale in his mortgage. There was also a motion by another party representing the Panopticon as a corporation, also for the purpose of dissolving the injunction on the ground that they should not have been included in it.

- I With regard to the motion which was made by the mortgagee two points arise. The first question is whether it was competent to the mortgagor, or the party who executed the mortgage, to give a power of sale; and the second question is, supposing it was not competent to them so to do, whether the party who is seeking relief against the exercise of that power of sale is not precluded by concurrence or acquiescence from asking that relief. With regard to the first question, it is very remarkable that there should have been such a dearth of authority. It appears to me that there are certain clearly settled principles, by reason of which the conclusion ought to be that it was not competent to give such a power of sale. The principles which I refer to are the following: It is clearly settled, beyond all doubt, that though a special power to sell given to a trustee may comprise a power to mortgage, yet a special power of mortgaging does not comprise a power of selling. That is a proposition beyond controversy. A

Another proposition which I take to be equally clear is that if a special power is given to a trustee involving confidence, personal judgment and discretion in him, it is not competent to that trustee to delegate the exercise of that power and discretion to another person. Many authorities might be cited in aid of these propositions, but they are so clear that it was unnecessary to cite any in support of them. Taking these two propositions, what is the conclusion which must necessarily be arrived at from them? Taking the second, that it is not competent to a trustee to delegate his authority to another, the principle of that is, that if there be a special power of sale given to a trustee, and that power involved confidence in him and an exercise of discretion on his part whether a sale should take place at all; or if it were a confidence or discretion as to the circumstances under which the sale shall take place, it would not be a matter of course that the trustee could delegate to another the exercise of that power; and if that be so, how can a trustee who has not vested in himself a power of sale give authority to another to sell? The principle simply is, that a power to mortgage does not comprise a power to sell, and a special power to mortgage also does not comprise a power to sell. B C D

It has been contended that the practice of giving to mortgagees a power of sale has become so universal that a power of sale must be considered as a necessary incident to a mortgage. In the first place I cannot admit the universality of that practice. No doubt it has become much more common than it was thirty or forty years ago for an ordinary mortgagee to require, and the mortgagor to give, a power of sale; but it is by no means universal, and many mortgages are made where the property is of a satisfactory nature, such as agricultural, for example, and of a large marketable value, where the mortgagor would refuse to give a power of sale, money being readily obtainable without giving it. E

The proposition is that a power of sale has become an incident of a mortgage, and that unless there is something to the contrary, it is a matter of course to insert a power of sale. What is the extent of that power to sell, and to whom is it to be given? Is it to be given to the mortgagee alone, or is it meant that the trustee may delegate it not only to the mortgagee himself, but also to the executors, administrators, and assigns of that mortgagee, whoever they may be? It seems very unusual that a trustee who may not sell himself may delegate an authority which he does not possess to persons whom he does not know. On what terms is the power to be with respect to the notice which is to be given, and to whom? Is it to be after failure in payment of one half-year's interest, or what? It has been suggested that, unless there is a power of sale included in the power to mortgage, it may be very disadvantageous to the cestuis que trust, for the property may be of such a character that a mortgagee may not be found to advance his money without having a power of sale; and that money could not be obtained upon equally advantageous terms as if there had been such a power; and that it would be for the benefit of the cestuis que trust that the trustee may do with the property what any prudent owner might have done. F G H

That argument, however, goes too far and destroys itself. It is clear that a trustee is not armed with the power to do what an owner may do. The owner may deal with his property in any way he thinks proper. He may deal with it in a variety of ways which, in a trustee, would be breaches of trust. He may, for example, invest in any shares in the Royal British Bank, or in the Tipperary Bank, or in any other undertaking of a similar kind; but a trustee cannot do this: he is tied down to the letter and spirit of the trust and discretion vested in him. A power of sale has become much less important since the passing of the Act for the Improvement of the Jurisdiction in Equity (15 and 16 Vict., c. 86), as by s. 48 of that Act a mortgagee coming to the court for a foreclosure may apply to the court for a sale, if he prefers a sale to a foreclosure, and the mortgagor may I

A do the same. Great power of obtaining a sale is, therefore, given to the mortgagee. That is a very good provision for all parties, and very beneficial for the cestuis que trust, because, if there is a mortgage without a power of sale, and the mortgagee applies to the court, he may have a sale, but the sale would be under the direction of the court. Being of opinion, therefore, that a power of sale is not incident to a mere power to mortgage, and that a special power to a mortgagee does not
B give him power to sell himself, and, therefore, does not give him power to delegate to another a power to sell, it appears to me that, with regard to the realty, I must decide in favour of the plaintiff on that ground.

The personal property, however, stands in a different position. The chattels, such as the apparatus of works of art and science, in the building, are in a different situation, and for this reason, that they are not yielding any profit, and the only
C way in which any effective mortgage of them can be made is by means of a bill of sale; otherwise no mortgage can be made of them, for no person would be so unwise as to advance his money upon property of that description, except upon that security.

By the charter, which was dated in 1850, it was declared that the corporation thereby formed should be able, notwithstanding the Statute of Mortmain, to hold
D lands, etc., for any term of years or other term, for the purposes of the institution. Powers of exchange were also given them. The object of these provisions was to make them absolute owners of the property, and they might deal with it as they pleased. Then follows a clause limiting the lands to be held to the yearly value of £5,000, and a clause to the effect that no sale, mortgage, or encumbrance of any of such land, should be made, except with the approbation and concurrence of
E a general meeting of the proprietors and members. The charter provided that a deed of settlement should be prepared, and that such deed should contain nothing contrary to the charter. That deed was so prepared and executed, but it does not appear to affect the present question. [His Honour here referred to the various mortgage transactions which had occurred, and continued:] Then comes the question, whether it was competent for the council, who were the trustees for the F corporate body, in respect of their powers of selling, mortgaging, etc., with a special power of mortgaging only, to grant a mortgage containing powers of sale. I have already expressed my opinion that it was not competent for them to do so.

The other question is whether Clarke was precluded either on behalf of himself, or of himself and certain other shareholders, from filing a bill and complaining of the transactions which had taken place. Clarke was, from the time of the
G commencement of the institution up to 1854, a member of the council, and the managing director, he being a man of science. Being thus a shareholder, a member of the council and managing director, he was present at the meeting of the general body on Sept. 30, 1853, at which the resolution was passed authorising the raising of money; and not only was he present at that meeting, but also at a meeting of the council in December, 1853, at which it was resolved to raise money on mortgage
H with powers of sale. It does not appear from the books how the different members voted. But assuming that Clarke did vote in the minority on the ground that the mortgage was to contain a power of sale, objecting as he did to the power of sale on the ground that the council could not, consistently with the powers vested in them, give such a power; and knowing, as he must have known, that the resolution was carried, he took no steps, and from 1853 to 1856 he made no complaints of what had

When the injunction was applied for, concurrence on the part of Clarke had not been suggested, for the representations in the bill blinded the defendants to it. That is quite enough to justify the defendants in saying that these matters were not brought to their attention, and they have a right now to raise the question. It was quite unnecessary to cite cases on the point, for it is quite clear that if the person who complains of a transaction, though it may have been ultra vires, if that person had concurred in it, he is precluded from relief—and in one case it was decided that where a party has filed a bill on behalf of himself and the other shareholders, if any of those others have concurred, although he may not have been a member when the transaction took place, that is sufficient to disentitle him to relief. I am, therefore, of opinion that it was competent to the defendants to raise the question as to concurrence, and that Clarke is precluded from obtaining the injunction, and, therefore, that it must be dissolved. A

The other motion was by the body at large, asking that the injunction might be dissolved so far as it related to them. There is no reason why they should have been made parties. By the terms of their charter they had full power to deal with the property as they pleased. As to them, therefore, the injunction must be dissolved on both motions. Therefore, although the plaintiff is right on the question as to the power of sale, still, upon the questions of acquiescence and power in the council to deal with the property, the two motions must be allowed with costs. B

Rentcharge—Arrears—Recovery—Distress and entry—Incompetency of action for ejectment.

Rentcharge—Interest in land—Extent—No estate at law.

The owner of a rentcharge has no estate at law. He cannot bring an ejectment to recover it, his remedy being by distress and entry, and he has an interest in the land only to the extent of recovering arrears due in respect of the rentcharge. He is entitled to enforce his claim only in this peculiar way. F

Appeal by the plaintiff from a decision of SIR JOHN ROMILLY, M.R., infra, dismissing a bill filed by the plaintiff, a first rentcharger, asking for an injunction to restrain the defendant, a second rentcharger, from taking possession of premises charged with several annuities until the plaintiff was paid the money expended by him in repairs.

By indentures of lease and release dated Aug. 6 and 7, 1778, a piece of land was conveyed by Peter Hooper (through whom the plaintiff claimed) to John Perry and his heirs, to the use that Peter Hooper, his heirs and assigns, should thereafter receive and take from and out of the premises thereby conveyed the yearly sum or rentcharge of £4, with power, in case of the non-payment thereof, to distrain on the premises and to enter on the same and receive the rents until the rentcharge should be fully satisfied, and all arrears which should grow due while he and they should be in possession, together with all costs, charges and expenses as should be laid out and expended by him or them, or occasioned by the non-payment thereof. In 1822, the piece of land, together with some messuages erected thereon, was sold, subject to the said rentcharge of £4, in consideration of a perpetual rentcharge of £40 which became vested in the defendant Cooke. In 1842 the premises had become greatly dilapidated and untenable, and having remained unproductive until 1855, the plaintiff whose rentcharge had not been paid since 1841 brought an action of ejectment and obtained possession of the premises. H

- A The defendant's rentcharge of £40 had also remained unpaid since 1842. The plaintiff repaired the property in a substantial manner at a cost of upwards of £500, and had since been in possession of the rents, amounting in the whole to £396 13s. 4d. He had, however, expended a further sum of £207 7s. 4d. in necessary repairs, leaving a large sum still due in respect of his outlay, and the arrears of the rentcharge, but having received more than sufficient to cover the arrears of the
- B rentcharge. The defendant, the owner of the rentcharge of £40, demanded possession, but the plaintiff refused to deliver up the same except on being paid the balance due in respect of the repairs and the arrears of the rentcharge. The defendant then commenced an action of ejectment, and the plaintiff being advised that he had no defence at law, allowed judgment to go by default, and filed the present bill to restrain the defendant from taking possession of the premises except on
- C the terms of her paying the arrears of the rentcharge together with the moneys expended by the plaintiff on the premises.

Lloyd and Howe for the plaintiff.

Roundell Palmer and Whitbread for the defendant.

- SIR JOHN ROMILLY, M.R. I have felt some difficulty in coming to a decision
- D as to the principle which ought to govern this case. The plaintiff, in order to recover the arrears of his rentcharge, enters on the property, subject to the charge; but in consequence of the dilapidated condition of the houses, they are untenable, and the plaintiff is unable to get anything in satisfaction of his claim, and thereupon, in order to render the houses habitable, and to get rent for them, he expends a large sum in necessary repairs, and in the result, after being in possession for several
- E years, he has received rents which are more than sufficient to satisfy all arrears of the rentcharge, but are inadequate to reimburse the plaintiff what he has expended in repairs. In this state of things the defendant, who is entitled to a rentcharge of £40 on the premises, subject to that of the plaintiff, brings ejectment against him, and the plaintiff files this bill to distrain these proceedings until he is paid.

- It was argued that the case of the plaintiff is the same as that of a landlord who
- F is entitled under a restraint to carry away crops, and may charge the expense of cutting the crops, and, in the case of a meadow, of making the hay and also of carrying the crop away, as an expense incidental to the making the distress available. For the defendant it was contended that the plaintiff can have no greater power than what is given him by the deed; that the construction to be put on the deed is the same in equity as at law; and that he has admitted that he has no defence
- G at law by giving judgment in the action of ejectment, and coming into equity. I concur in the argument that the plaintiff has a mere legal demand and that in this court he must make out his claim the same as in a court of law. I could not preclude the plaintiff from relief in this court from the circumstance of his having allowed judgment to go by default in the action at law, and, therefore, I do not consider that as conclusive evidence that the plaintiff has no defence at law. I
- H might, if I thought proper, give the plaintiff leave to continue to try the right at law; but both parties have acquiesced that this court should decide the right between them—at least the plaintiff has done so by coming here and not resisting the action.

- I have come to the conclusion that the plaintiff is not entitled to relief in this court. I think that the well-recognised principle that where a person passes
- I property to another, he also incidentally, if not expressly, gives him the power necessary to enable him to enjoy the thing given, and to render it productive, although applicable to the extent of making distress and entry, and also to the cutting and carrying away of crops, it is not in effect applicable to the present case, and does not entitle the plaintiff to lay out any money on the property, or to receive anything in consequence of having done so. To hold that it did would be, in my opinion, to put the plaintiff in the position of a mortgagee in possession and thus to permit him to alter the character and quality of the property as he thought proper.

The distinction between the plaintiff's position and that of a mortgagee is obvious.

At law the mortgagee is absolute owner of the land, and he may deal with it as he thinks fit. The mortgagor may come into equity to recover possession of the property notwithstanding his title at law is gone, and equity will give him possession, imposing upon him certain conditions, viz., he shall not have possession except on the terms of repaying the mortgagee not only all moneys due to him for principal and interest, but also all which, as owner of the property, he may have properly expended for the purpose of repairing and permanently improving the property. The owner of the rentcharge has no estate at law; he cannot bring ejectment to recover it, but his remedy is by distress and entry, and he has an interest in the land only to the extent of recovering the arrears due in respect of the rentcharge. He is entitled to enforce his claim in this peculiar way, and in no other. A mortgagor must come into equity to recover possession of the property, but the owner of land charged with a rentcharge may recover possession without the aid of this court as soon as the rentcharge is fully satisfied, and this court can impose no terms on him as it can upon a mortgagor. If the plaintiff in this case has any right, he can only obtain it at law. In my opinion the plaintiff has mistaken his position and his remedy and the bill must, therefore, be dismissed.

Roundell Palmer and Whitbread for the defendant.

LORD CRANWORTH, L.C.—This is a bill filed by the plaintiff, a party entitled to a rentcharge of £4 a year on three houses of small value. The rentcharge was created in 1778, and the deed creating it contained the usual powers of distress and entry. This rentcharge was duly paid up to 1841, but it then fell into arrear; and in the year 1854, the property being in an extremely dilapidated state, and the plaintiff's rentcharge having been in arrear ever since 1841, the plaintiff entered into possession of the property, and expended a very considerable sum of money in putting this dilapidated property into repair; and although he has since received sufficient rent to pay him the arrears of his rentcharge, yet he has not been repaid the amount he expended in repairs. The defendant Cooke, who is entitled to a rentcharge of £40, subject to the plaintiff's rentcharge, commenced an action of ejectment against the plaintiff last year to recover possession of the property, and the present bill was filed asking an injunction to restrain the defendant, the plaintiff in the ejectment suit, from taking possession of the premises, upon two grounds—first, that the plaintiff had, according to the true construction of the instrument, a lien upon the property for the amount of the money expended in the repairs; and, secondly, that whether that were so or not, the defendant was estopped from saying that the plaintiff had not a lien, in consequence of his standing by and allowing the plaintiff to lay out money without giving him notice that he was doing repairs for which he would not be paid. The Master of the Rolls dismissed the bill, not thinking either point made out.

On the point of acquiescence, the defendant denies notice of the fact that the plaintiff was expending money in repairs; and the effect of the evidence on the question amounts to this only, that unauthorised persons told the solicitor of the defendant of the circumstances. But communications to a solicitor, to make them notice to a client, must be made in respect of some pending matter, and be such that the solicitor was bound to communicate them to the client; the mere circumstance of being the ordinary solicitor of a party amounts to nothing. But supposing the defendant knew that the plaintiff had taken possession, and that he was expending money in repairs, what of that? He knew that the plaintiff had a right to take possession; was he bound, then, to say to the plaintiff, "Your construction of the deed granting the rentcharge is probably wrong, and you are making these repairs at your own risk?" This disposes of the question of acquiescence, which, in fact, was an afterthought, for the bill as originally framed had no reference to the question of acquiescence, but was merely rested on the ground of lien.

The question still remains, has the plaintiff such a lien? I entirely concur with

A the Master of the Rolls in thinking that no such lien exists. Clearly the plaintiff had the legal right to the possession for the purpose of obtaining payment of his arrears : that cannot be said to create a lien : the rentcharge was a debt by covenant. He did enter and hold possession, and the question now is, entering under such circumstances, was he entitled to apply the rents received by him towards payment of the repairs ; for there is no doubt that if he was not, the arrears of his rentcharge

B have entirely been satisfied. That question depends upon this point, whether the expenditure upon the repairs can be considered to come within the meaning of the words, "such costs, charges, and expenses as should be laid out and expended by him or them, or occasioned by the non-payment thereof." The course I am about to take renders it unnecessary to express any opinion upon that point, although I have a very strong opinion upon it. The question is a purely legal one, and one

C which this court cannot, according to its practice, decide, unless the nature of the accounts were such as would render it very inconvenient to try the question at law. There is nothing of the sort here ; there is no complication of accounts, and no reason why a court of law cannot try it as well as a court of equity.

The questions will be—first, whether, upon the construction of the covenant, the plaintiff in equity was entitled to expend any sums of money upon the repairs of the premises ; and, secondly, if he was, whether the sums he has expended were proper expenditures. This bill has been filed upon the assumption that the ques-

D tions cannot be tried at law, which I consider was an entire misapprehension. I concur with the view of the case taken by the Master of the Rolls, that the plaintiff has failed in making out any case for equitable relief, and the appeal must be dismissed, with costs ; but upon the rights at law I express no opinion. I make this

E order upon terms that the defendant here, the plaintiff at law, withdraw the judgment he has obtained, and that the defendant at law do admit the plaintiff's title, except as it is affected by the deed of 1778.

Appeal dismissed.

Demurrer in an action by shippers against shipowners to recover in respect of loss of cargo shipped in one of the defendant's ships.

Under a contract of affreightment the plaintiffs shipped on board the defendant's ship, then in the bay of Gibraltar, and bound for London, goods to be safely conveyed to London and there delivered in good order. A term of the contract was that the defendant should be excepted from liability in respect of loss occasioned by the act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation, of whatever nature or kind soever. In the course of her voyage the ship called at Cadiz, and came within the jurisdiction of the officers of customs there and of the Revenue Court of Andalusia. While the ship was there, the goods were, according to the law of Spain, lawfully, taken out of the ship by the customs officers, against the will and without the default of the defendant, on a charge of suspicion of their being contraband under the law of Spain, and in due course they were confiscated by a decree of the Revenue Court. In an

A action by the plaintiffs to recover in respect of the loss of the goods they complained that the defendant had not safely carried and delivered the goods, but had wholly failed and neglected so to do, and had behaved and conducted himself so carelessly with respect to the carrying and delivering of the goods that the goods had become and were wholly lost to plaintiffs. The defendant denied liability and pleaded that he was not responsible for the loss of the goods which had been due to their
 B having been confiscated by the order of a competent court within whose jurisdiction they were. To this plea the plaintiffs demurred on the following grounds: that it was not averred with sufficient particularity how, or wherefore, or on what account, or by what act, neglect or default, the goods became confiscated; that it was not shown by what law or custom of Cadiz, or of the kingdom of Spain, the goods became confiscated; that it was not averred with sufficient particularity
 C that it was necessary for the purpose of the voyage for the ship to go within the jurisdiction of the Spanish court, and that it was not averred that the goods were contraband, but only that the court found them to be so.

Crompton for the plaintiffs.—The defendant's contract to convey the cargo is an absolute contract, subject to certain express exceptions; and no excuse is sufficient, unless it show that performance was prevented within one of the exceptions specified, or by the act of the plaintiffs themselves, or by the law of this country. Even the act of God, if not expressly excepted, would be no excuse: COMYN'S DIGEST, Condition (D 1). The danger contemplated by touching at Cadiz may have been the very reason why the plaintiffs contracted in these terms. It has been held no excuse for the shipper that the loading of a cargo was rendered impossible by pestilence: Barker v. Hodgson (5); or by foreign embargo or prohibition: Sjoerds v. Luscombe (6), Blight v. Page (7). In like manner it has been held that the shipowner is not excused, even where government officers of this country have prevented the performance of his contract to carry goods: Evans v. Hutton (8), Gosling v. Higgins (3). The excuse here alleged is, that performance was prevented by the revenue laws of Spain, but our courts do not notice the revenue laws of foreign countries: per LORD MANSFIELD in Holman v. Johnson (9) (1 Cowp. at p. 343); and the observations of LORD HARDWICKE in Boucher v. Lawson (10) are to a like effect.

Bovill for the defendant.—The plea raises a question which is of great importance, and not governed by any decided case. By agreement of both parties, their property is brought within the jurisdiction of a court of justice at Cadiz, and so made amenable to that jurisdiction. Proceedings take place in that court, in consequence of which the loss of his property ensues to the freighter. Those proceedings were in rem and bound the property. The shipowner contends that the freighter must bear the loss which has befallen him in the due course of performance of that contract which he has chosen to enter into. It is said that the defendant has contracted absolutely, subject to certain declared exceptions, and that he has not brought his case within them. But the act of God, which is one of the exceptions, extends to other than natural causes, and means no more than inevitable accident: STORY ON BAILMENTS, 318, s. 489, following JONES ON BAILMENTS (4th Edn.), p. 104; and inevitable accident must mean something which has occurred without the defendant's default. It must be conceded that vis major is not always an excuse; but the exceptions of "act of God" and "perils of seas" have been
 I liberally interpreted: ABBOTT ON SHIPPING (8th Edn.), part iv, chap. vi, p. 382. Thus, capture by pirates, accidental collision, the taking ground in a dock, have been considered perils of the seas: Pickering v. Barkley (11), Buller v. Fisher (12), Fletcher v. Inglis (2). Secondly, the plea shows that the loss was occasioned by the default of the plaintiffs themselves in putting contraband goods on board. Thirdly, the plaintiffs are bound by the judgment of the court of Cadiz. Both parties placed the property within the jurisdiction of that court. It is true that one country will, in general, not notice the revenue laws of another country for the purpose of invalidating contracts, although eminent text writers reprobate the principle: STORY'S CONFLICT OF LAWS (2nd Edn.), p. 332, s. 257. But the practice is subject to the qualification that every country does notice the judgment of a foreign court on any case within its jurisdiction, and respects it, not, perhaps, as conclusive, though it is so put by LORD HARDWICKE in Boucher v. Lawson (10) (Lee temp. Hard. at p. 89), but, at all events, as binding prima facie: Power v. Whitmore (13), Phillips v. Hunter (14), Hughes v. Cornelius (15).

LORD DENMAN, C.J.—This is a bold attempt, though supported with great ingenuity, to unsettle the law which has always been understood to govern contracts of this kind, and I think that, if the law was to be questioned, a more favourable case might have been chosen for the purpose. The plea does not state the contract to be in contravention of the law of either England or Spain, as known to either party, nor does it allege anything which, on general principles, ought to affect the contract. No deceit or criminal act is charged against the plaintiffs: it does not appear that the defendant was not as well aware as the plaintiffs of all that was done and all that was likely to happen. If, indeed, the contract appeared to have been made for the purpose of defrauding the revenue laws of a foreign country, I think a question might arise whether we should give effect to it. It has been contended that the plea brings the defendant's case within the exceptions contained in the contract, or rather, perhaps, that, although this may not be so in strictness, we ought to extend the meaning of those exceptions so as to include the present and other similar cases. In my opinion, we should do very ill if we were to tamper with the rules of construction which have always been applied to such exceptions. Those rules were laid down, originally, with reference to the interests of the individuals who are parties to these contracts, and not to any notions of general policy; and they are rules now well understood. I will merely refer to the judgment of LORD ELLENBOROUGH in Atkinson v. Ritchie (1), which completely disposes of this part of the argument.

PATTESON, J.—The first question in this case is whether the defendant by his plea has brought himself within any of the exceptions in this contract. As LORD ELLENBOROUGH, C.J., says in Atkinson v. Ritchie (1) (10 East, at p. 533):

“No exception (of a private nature at least) which is not contained in the contract itself, can be engrafted upon it by implication, as an excuse for its non-performance.”

The defendant's contract is to carry the plaintiffs' goods to London, and he is liable for non-performance of his contract unless its performance was prevented by one or other of the exceptions provided against, or by the act of the plaintiffs themselves, or by the law of this country. I am of opinion that the defendant was not prevented by the act of God, or the Queen's enemies, or any dangers of the seas. It is said that he was prevented by dangers of the seas, and Fletcher v. Inglis (2) has been relied upon in which the straining of a vessel in a dry harbour was held to be within this exception. But there the damage occurred in the regular course of navigation. The loss in this case had nothing to do with the navigation of the vessel; it was caused by the execution of the law of Spain of which both plaintiffs and defendant might be equally ignorant. We must not assume that the plaintiffs knew this law and the defendant did not know it. If the plaintiffs did not know it, the loss was not occasioned by their act. If the plea had stated that the plaintiffs knew their goods would be liable to confiscation under the law of Spain, and that the defendant did not know it, there might be a question as to his liability; I do not say how that might be. Gosling v. Higgins (3), which was the only case cited in point, has been distinguished on the ground that there the shipowner had a remedy over. I doubt whether that was the ground of the decision. The reference to foreign attachment is inapplicable, for such attachment is, in some sense, the act of the principal debtor, who, therefore, cannot complain of the garnishee's non-payment to him. In this case both parties, perhaps, were ignorant of the law by the operation of which the loss was occasioned. At what

A time the law was made, and whether the goods were contraband per se, or became so by something done or omitted in respect of them, we do not know. But I disclaim minute considerations of this sort. It was for the defendant to bring himself within the exceptions in his contract, and he has not done so.

WIGHTMAN, J.—I am of the same opinion. The defendant entered into an absolute contract, subject only to certain specified exceptions, to convey goods to the port of London, and it has been contended with much ingenuity that the cause for the non-performance of his contract falls within one of these exceptions. We have already expressed an opinion against so much of the plea. But the defendant takes higher ground also, and contends that his plea shows that he was prevented from performing his contract by the decree of a competent court, and that this is a valid excuse. But it is not averred that the plaintiffs did any wrongful act in respect of the cargo, or that they knew it to be contraband by the law of Spain, or that it was taken to Cadiz by their desire. The object was to convey the goods to London; and Cadiz is mentioned merely in describing the route of the ship. On the pleadings it does not appear that either party knew that the goods would be liable to seizure there, or that the voyage was likely to be frustrated by taking that route. There was no illegality in the contract itself, and the case comes within the principle recognised by LORD ELLENBOROUGH, C.J., in Atkinson v. Ritchie (1) (10 East, at pp. 533, 534):

E “The rule laid down in the case of Paradine v. Jane (4) has often been recognised in courts of law, as a sound one; i.e., that when the party by his own contract creates a duty or charge upon himself, he is bound to make it good, if he may; notwithstanding any accident by inevitable necessity; because he might have provided against it by his contract.”

F LORD ELLENBOROUGH, C.J., refers to several other cases where the same principle has been recognised. The defendant here was prevented by inevitable necessity from performing his contract. But he might have provided in his contract against the consequences of such a contingency: he has not done so, and is without excuse. The case of foreign attachment furnishes no analogy. There the law enables a third person to step in and take advantage of a contract between others; the payment by the garnishee to him, is, by law, also a payment by the garnishee to his own creditor.

G ERLE, J.—The defendant's contract was, in effect, a contract of insurance against all but certain specified risks, and the seizure in question was not one of them. The only remaining defences which would be open to him are that the contract was illegal by the law of this country, or that the plaintiffs themselves prevented him from performing his contract. Neither of these cases is set up by the plea.

Judgment for plaintiffs.

WHEATLEY v. BASTOW

[COURT OF APPEAL IN CHANCERY (Knight-Bruce and Turner, L.JJ.), May 7, 8, 9, 1855]

[Reported 7 De G.M. & G. 261; 3 Eq. Rep. 859; 24 L.J.Ch. 727;

Guarantee—Surety—Liability—Assignment of security by mortgagee—No notice to surety.

A., B. and C. were entitled in equal shares in reversion to a fund in court. B. borrowed £1,000 from D., secured by a mortgage deed dated Feb. 23, 1841, by which both A. and B. assigned their respective third shares. A. was expressly declared to be joined only as surety for B. E., a solicitor, who had acted professionally for other parties, also covenanted as surety for B. for payment of principal and interest. E. prepared a marriage settlement by which D. assigned the debt and securities to trustees on trusts for himself, his wife and children. The trustees neglected to obtain a stop order and no notice of the assignment was given to A. On Dec. 18, 1846, an order was obtained whereby the shares of B. and C. were sold and the proceeds disposed of by E. The petition asking for the order to sell was prepared by E., who acted without authority, and B. and C. were unaware of its presentation until after the order had been made. Furthermore E. without authority had instructed counsel to consent on behalf of A. and D., the petition falsely stated that £500 had been repaid on the loan, and the mortgage deed was set out in such a way as not to show that B. alone was liable and A. was only a surety, but made it appear that both A. and B. were equally liable. A., the surety, sought a declaration that D. and all claiming under the settlement should be bound by the statements in the petition of 1846 and that the proceeds of B.'s share retained by E. ought to be considered as received for D. or for his trustees.

Held: (i) neither A. nor D. were bound by the statements in the petition of 1846, E. having acted in the matter without express authority and without any general authority to act for either of them; (ii) the neglect of the trustees to obtain a stop order, whatever equity it might create as between them and their cestuis que trust, did not affect their rights against the surety, A.; (iii) the assignment of the debt by the creditor D. without notice to the surety A. did not operate to discharge the surety; (iv) E., appearing on the evidence to have been guilty of irregular and fraudulent conduct as a solicitor, would be ordered to show cause why his name should not be struck off the Rolls.

Appeal by the defendants against an order of STUART, V.-C., on a petition by the plaintiff, Mrs. Wheatley, against the defendants, Mr. and Mrs. Bastow, their trustees and others, for an order that they be declared to be bound by the statements in a former petition of 1846, as to payment of £500 and for an account of what was due on the mortgage having regard to that declaration and for re-assignment of the shares on payment of what was found due. After the commencement of the suit the plaintiff, Mrs. Wheatley, died and the suit was prosecuted by her husband as her administrator. At the hearing on Feb. 22 and 23, 1855, STUART, V.-C., refused the relief asked for and held that the defendants had lost all right to resort to the plaintiff's share by reason of the neglect of the trustees in not obtaining a stop order of their assignment and that a surety had a right to have notice of any assignment of the debt for which he was liable.

Under the will of John Lloyd, the plaintiff, Mrs. Wheatley, then Hester Barratt and her brother Thomas and sister Ann Barratt were entitled in equal shares to a F fund of £4,000 in consols, subject to the life interest of their mother Mrs. Barratt. In the action of Morrison v. Jefferies the fund was paid into court to an account, "The annuity account of [Mrs. Barratt] and her children." In February, 1841, Thomas Barratt borrowed £1,000 from the defendant Bastow and by a mortgage dated Feb. 23, 1841, Thomas Barratt and the plaintiff, then Hester Barratt, assigned their respective third shares, subject to their mother's interest to secure the loan and the deed declared that the plaintiff only joined as security for Thomas Barratt. Thomas Barratt, the elder, and John Collins, a solicitor, covenanted as sureties for Thomas Barratt, the younger, for the payment of principal and interest. On Mar. 5, 1841, the defendant, Bastow, obtained a stop order on the shares comprised in his mortgage. On Feb. 23, 1846, the defendant Bastow in contemplation of his marriage assigned the £1,000 secured by the mortgage deed of Feb. 23, 1841, toH trustees on trust for himself and wife and their children. No fresh stop order was ever obtained by the trustees nor was any notice of the assignment given to the plaintiff or her husband whom she married in June, 1846.

In 1846 a petition was presented by Thomas Barratt and his sister Ann Barratt which stated the trusts of the £4,000 fund under the will of the testator in that cause and the decree, in so far as it related to that sum. The petition then set

I forth the mortgage deed of Feb. 23, 1841, in such a way as not to show that the £1,000 was lent to Thomas Barratt alone nor that the plaintiff was only surety, but also to make it appear that Thomas Barratt and the plaintiff were equally liable; and it further stated that Thomas Barratt had paid the defendant Bastow £500 in part discharge of the £1,000 loan. The petition then set out a deed of Nov. 18, 1846, by which the mother Mrs. Barratt purported to assign to Thomas Barratt and his sister Ann Barratt her life interest in the £4,000 fund so far as regarded their shares; and it prayed that two thirds of the fund might be sold out and the proceeds paid to the petitioners in equal shares. John Collins, a solicitor, who had been a party to the mortgage deed of Feb. 23, 1841, prepared the petition and instructed counsel to appear on behalf of Bastow and the trustees of the marriage settlement and also on behalf of the plaintiff and her husband and to consent. On Dec. 18, 1846, an order was made as asked and the two thirds of the fund were sold out and the proceeds disposed of. John Collins was a partner in the firm of solicitors who had been employed by the plaintiff Bastow as his solicitor in various matters and acted as solicitor of the trustees of the settlement in matters of the trusteeship, but neither John Collins nor his firm had any authority to act for them in this petition nor did they know that this petition had been presented until after the order on it had been made. The consent brief on behalf of the plaintiff and her husband was also given without authority. The statement in the petition that Thomas Barratt had repaid £500 was also false and in fact no part of the £1,000 had been repaid.

The defendants appealed against the order of STUART, V.-C., made on Feb. 23, 1855.

Malins, Q.C., and Goldsmid for the plaintiff.

Rolt, Q.C., and Speed for the defendants.

KNIGHT-BRUCE, L.J.—The question we have to determine in the cause is whether the share of the plaintiff in the fund in court, in the suit of Morrison v. Jefferies, is discharged either wholly or in part from the debt of Thomas Barratt, to secure which it was by way of suretyship assigned by the deed of Feb. 23, 1841, in the pleadings mentioned; that is, whether it has been so discharged by the conduct of some or one of the defendants. The plaintiffs, in support of the affirmative of this proposition, allege in the first place, that although the creditor William Bastow upon his marriage assigned the debt to trustees, no stop order was obtained by the trustees, and no notice of the assignment was given to Mrs. Wheatley or the other parties. They allege, in the second place, that if the debt is not wholly discharged, it is affected as to £500 by the petition and order of Dec. 18, 1846, and the consequent abstraction and application of Thomas Barratt's share of the fund. Of these points, one at least has appeared to me to be not clear from difficulty; but, upon consideration, my opinion is that upon both points the plaintiff's case fails.

It appears that Mrs. Wheatley charged her share in this fund by way of suretyship for Thomas Barratt, whose share remained primarily liable. If, therefore, upon the evidence it was shown that Mr. Bastow and the three trustees to whom the share was assigned, or any one of these four gentlemen, had participated in, or been connected with, or associated in the application of Dec. 18, 1846, the plaintiff would probably be right. But the evidence shows no such thing. It shows that Mr. Bastow and the trustees were strangers to that application. It is true that the order purports to have been made upon the appearance of Mr. Bastow. But this was the unauthorised and highly improper act of Mr. Collins, a solicitor, who permitted himself to instruct counsel to appear for Mr. Bastow. Doubtless there are some cases in which it is not competent for a client to assert that his solicitor has acted in a particular matter without his authority, whatever hardship may follow. But that reasoning has no application here. Mrs. Wheatley was married to her present husband in 1846, and both he and she were ignorant of the order, and of the whole transaction of the petition, and as much strangers to it as Mr. Bastow, although it purports to be made on their appearance. This was also the more than irregular act of Mr. Collins, and was altogether void, so far as it affected the Wheatleys or Mr. Bastow; and it makes in my opinion no difference that Mr. Collins was the solicitor of Mr. Bastow, as to whom Mr. Collins's conduct was as wrongful as if they had never seen each other. Nor can the plaintiff take any benefit by the payment of the £500, or by the fraudulent petition and proceedings. If jewels, belonging some of them to Mr. Barratt and some to Mrs. Wheatley, had been pledged to Mr. Bastow for Mr. Barratt's debt, and his portion of the property had been stolen from Mr. Bastow's possession, could it have been

A said that Mrs. Wheatley was entitled to have her jewels restored to her without payment of the debt?

It is said, however, that Mr. Bastow and his trustees acted negligently or fraudulently in not obtaining a stop order, or informing Mr. and Mrs. Wheatley of the assignment. To this argument I do not accede. The subject of the assignment was a debt, a thing not capable of being assigned at law, and which, when it has been assigned, as only it can be, in equity, the debtor not having notice of the assignment, may still pay to the assignor, and therefore cannot generally complain of want of notice of the assignment. If the plaintiff had paid to Mr. Bastow that which was secured upon her share, such a payment would have entitled her to have her share restored to her. As an authority for this proposition, it is unnecessary to refer to Matthews v. Wallwyn (1). It is not material to the present question, whether the trustees are liable to their cestuis que trust for a breach of trust on account of no notice having been given of the assignment. That circumstance cannot operate to discharge the surety. It is argued that if a stop order had been obtained, the fraud effected by means of the petition could not have been committed. Of course this is a matter of conjecture; but it appears to me probable that the stop order would not have been allowed to stand in the way. At all events, it was D no breach of duty to Mrs. Wheatley to dispense with the stop order. I think, therefore, the only order which can be properly made will be one for redemption or dismissal. But we cannot thus part with the case as it concerns Mr. Collins; as to whom all I have said has been founded upon evidence taken between others, though partly given by himself. Before it can be considered as substantiated against him personally, he must have an opportunity of adducing evidence himself. E We think it our duty to take the course followed by LORD ROSSLYNN in Dungey v. Angove (2), and to order Mr. Collins to show cause why his name should not be struck off the Rolls. The proceeding will be prosecuted by the solicitor to the suitors' fund.

TURNER, L.J.—The short point to be decided is, whether, when a creditor F having a security from his debtor and from a surety, assigns the debt, he loses the security of the surety, unless he informs him of his assignment. STUART, V.-C., has held that he did so, on the ground that the surety had a right to be informed who his creditor from time to time might be. This is a new point, resting on the relation of the three parties, the principal, surety and creditor. No doubt the surety has a right to have the benefit of all securities held by the creditor, and if G they are lost by the creditor, the surety is discharged. But when the debt is assigned, the obligations of the creditor attached upon his assignee, and the surety is not injured. It was said that he had a right to know who was the assignee. But the surety might pay the debt to the original creditor if he had not notice of the assignment, and such payment would be good against the assignee. If the securities are not given up to him, the surety will then have a right to apply for H relief to this court. If such notice was held necessary, serious impediments would be thrown in the way of assignments by creditors. Upon these grounds I hold the plaintiff's fund is not discharged.

Upon the other points I agree that no decree can be made for the plaintiff upon the bill. The plaintiff's case is founded upon two reasons. First, it was said that the plaintiff's fund ought not to be liable for the improper disposition of a I portion of the security by the act of the court; and that the plaintiff, as it was expressed, was not a guarantee for the Lord Chancellor. Secondly, it was contended, that the defendant was bound by the act of Collins, his solicitor, and Duke of Beaufort v. Neeld (3) was cited in support of this contention. As to the first point, the plaintiff's fund is a security for a deficiency, from whatever source it may arise. With respect to the second point, it appears that Collins had no authority for making the statements in the petition, nor for his acts relating to it. Neither Mr. Bastow, therefore, nor those claiming under him, are bound by the acts of Collins. In Duke of Beaufort v. Neeld (3) the agent for the duke was a general agent; but that is not the case here. With respect to the order to be made, if the plaintiff desires it, an account might be directed of what was due upon the security of the plaintiff's fund, and there might be a decree for payment or foreclosure. Otherwise, the bill must be dismissed. In either case the plaintiff must pay the costs of the suit, and there will be no costs of the appeal. I agree with KNIGHT-BRUCE, L.J., as to the course to be taken with reference to the solicitor.

Arbitration—Setting aside award—Error on law—Not appearing on face—Error appearing on other document—Mistake as to accounts.

On a reference to an arbitrator the defendant set up the Statute of Limitations as a defence to the plaintiff's claim for the balance of an account. The arbitrator held that the account was a running account to which the statute did not apply. On an application to set aside the award or refer it back on the ground that it was erroneous in law and fact,

Held: there was no ground for setting aside the award or for referring it back to the arbitrator.

Per WATSON, B.: If an arbitrator professes to decide upon the law and he mistakes it, the court will set aside the award although the arbitrator's reasons do not appear upon the face of the award, but only on some other paper delivered therewith. To that extent the law has gone, but it has refused to go any further.

- B Rule Nisi obtained by the defendant to set aside or to refer back an arbitration award of the judge of the county court of Bedfordshire, as arbitrator, on a compulsory reference under s. 3 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, made under an order of MARTIN, B., in an action to recover £92 11s. 7d., the balance of an account for beer supplied by the plaintiff to the defendant. The defendant set up the Statute of Limitations and the plaintiff relied on the account being a running account. The arbitrator held that the account was a running account and that the Statute of Limitations did not apply and his award was duly made a rule of court. The defendant obtained a rule nisi to set aside the award on the ground that the arbitrator had decided the matter of account contrary to law and fact, or that the matter be referred back to the arbitrator.

- D H. Lloyd for the plaintiff, showed cause against the rule.
Cooke for the defendant, supported the rule.

MARTIN, B.—It is expressly provided, by s. 7 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, that the proceedings on any compulsory reference under the Act, as to enforcing or setting aside, etc., shall be the same as under any reference before the Act. By the old rule the decision of the arbitrator, both in law and fact, was conclusive; but that was broken into by a decision in the Court of King's Bench in Kent v. Elstob (1), and, on another occasion, by the Court of Common Pleas in Re Hall and Hinds (2). The latter case was brought before this court in Phillips v. Evans (3), and in that case PARKE, B., concludes his judgment by saying (12 M. & W. at p. 312):

- F “Although we may possibly do some injustice in particular cases, I think it better to adhere to the principle of not allowing awards to be set aside for mistakes, and not to open the door to inquire into the merits, or we shall have to do so in almost every case.”

ALDERSON, B., says (ibid. at p. 313):

- G “The door to inconvenience has been a little opened by the case in the Common Pleas, but I am not disposed to open it further.”

Such, then, was the clear old rule, and we have now to deal with an Act of Parliament which, under certain circumstances, makes these sort of references compulsory.

- H The clause for sending back awards to the arbitrator is of modern invention; it was introduced by Mr. Vaughan Richards, and is known as his clause. By s. 3 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, the court or a judge may, in country causes, refer certain matters in dispute, which are matters of account, to a county court judge, and he is the proper and competent person to decide. Then comes s. 7, which says that the proceedings upon any such arbitration

- I “shall be conducted in like manner, and subject to the same rules and enactments, as to the enforcing or setting aside the award, and otherwise as upon a reference made by consent under a rule of court or judge's order.”

That is an express enactment that the position of the arbitrator and of the court shall be the same as in cases of reference by consent, and the court has no more power than in such cases. Then counsel for the defendant says that s. 8 alters that. Let us see what that section is; it provides:

“In any case where reference shall be made to arbitration as aforesaid, the court or a judge shall have power at any time, and from time to time, to remit the matters referred, or any or either of them, to the re-consideration and re-determination of the said arbitrator, upon such terms as to costs and otherwise as to the said court or judge may seem proper." A

It seems to me that that is nothing more than saying that Mr. Richards' clause shall apply to all cases under this Act of Parliament, and that awards under these compulsory clauses stand on the same footing as other awards. If that were not so, the evil to arise from increased litigation would infinitely exceed all others. B

WATSON, B.—I am of the same opinion. I think the law under this Act is perfectly clear. Kent v. Elstob (1) decided that if an arbitrator profess to decide upon the law, and he mistake it, the court will set aside the award, although the arbitrator's reasons do not appear upon the face of the award, but only upon another paper delivered therewith. To that extent the law has gone; it was attempted to carry it further in Phillips v. Evans (3), but the court refused, and discharged the rule. Then the only other question is, Is there any difference between awards under this Act and awards by consent of the parties? It is clear, looking to the several sections, that awards under these compulsory clauses are to be governed by the ordinary rules; and to my mind it is not doubtful that we have only power to refer an award back in cases in which we have power to set it aside. C D

CHANNELL, B.—I also think the rule should be discharged. It was obtained on the ground that there was a difference between references under these compulsory clauses and by consent; but I think it clear for the purposes of this case that there is no such distinction. Re Hall and Hinds (2) is not an authority in this case; the ground of that decision was misconduct. I was counsel in that case, and I know that the Common Pleas proceeded on that ground. E

Rule discharged.

Landlord and Tenant—Covenant—Perpetual renewal—Presumption against—Rebuttal—Covenant to renew—Insertion in new lease.

There is a presumption against construing a covenant in a lease so as to amount to a covenant for perpetual renewal, but, if there are in the lease expressions indicative of such an intention on the part of the lessor, the court will give effect to that intention. H

A reversioner, who is an assignee by purchase from the original lessor of the reversion with notice that a covenant for perpetual renewal would be required of him, is bound to perform such a covenant, as the perpetual obligation affects the land and the person for the time being entitled to the reversion. I

- E Action for specific performance of a covenant for renewal contained in an original lease. lease, according to the terms of the covenant for renewal contained in the original lease. He had nominated a new life in the place of that which had dropped. A

PAGE-WOOD, V.-C.—Two questions were raised: first, whether the covenant B in the original lease amounted in effect to a covenant for perpetual renewal; and if it did, then, secondly, whether, under the circumstances of this case, the defendant could be required to enter into an express covenant for renewal; or whether the court would not hold, as in Copper Mining Co. v. Beach (1), that a new demise reciting the original covenant would be a sufficient performance of that covenant.

As regards the first and main question, I must hold, that the covenant in the C original lease is in effect a covenant for perpetual renewal. Counsel for the defendant argued, that this question must never depend upon mere inference; that, in the absence of words indisputably pointing to a perpetual renewal—words so strong that it is impossible to adopt any other construction—the court, although it may find in the instrument words apparently pointing to perpetual renewal, will not adopt that construction, if any other can by possibility be put upon the terms of D the covenant. To that view I cannot accede.

It seems to me, that the true rule of construction in a case like this, is that referred to by TURNER, V.-C., in Rochford v. Hackman (2), where he says that some effect must if possible be given to all the words of an instrument, and if the court sees no effect which can be given to certain words, unless they be construed in a particular manner, then, whatever mere presumption may stand in E the way, it will construe them in that manner. The court is not at liberty to do violence to the words of the instrument, in order to carry into effect what is merely a presumption. So, in a case like the present, giving full weight to the argument, that there is a presumption against construing a covenant so as to amount to a covenant for perpetual renewal—that prima facie a lessor shall not be taken to have intended to enter into such a covenant, still there may be in the F instrument expressions indicative of such an intention; and, if there be, the court will not force the construction, but will give effect to what appears to have been the lessor's intention.

In the present case, the covenant is that in case the plaintiff shall, upon the decease of either of the three original lives, be desirous of taking a renewed lease of the demised premises for another life, and shall, within twelve months after such G decease, give the requisite notice, and shall nominate any person in the room of the deceased, the person entitled for the time being to the reversion shall execute a new and further lease of the premises for the life of the person so to be nominated, and the lives of such of the three first-named persons as shall be then living, and of the survivors and survivor of them, at the same rent, and with and subject to such and the same covenants, provisoes, and agreements, "including this present H covenant," as are contained in the original lease.

There is a further covenant that, if within the twelve months after the decease of any one of the three original cestuis que vie, and before any renewed lease or leases shall have been granted by virtue of the former covenant, any other or others of the three shall die, it shall be lawful for the plaintiff, his heirs or assigns, to insert another life or lives in the lease so to be granted as aforesaid in the room I of the life or lives which shall so drop, upon making certain payments, it being the intention of the parties that the plaintiff shall not be obliged, provided he renew within the period appointed, to incur the expense of a further or additional lease or leases in respect of the second and third lives dying as aforesaid. Suppose the event for which the further covenant provides to take place—suppose all the three original lives to drop within the twelve months, and before any renewed lease has been granted—to carry out the construction for which the defendant contends there ought to be an express proviso, that, in the lease to be granted in that event, the

A covenants for renewal shall not be included; for it would be absurd to suppose that there is to be a renewed lease for the lives of three persons, all of whom will be dead at the time of its execution.

It was argued that the words "including this present covenant," would be satisfied by inserting in the first renewed lease a covenant to renew on the dropping of either of the two surviving lives. But that is not a natural construction. Such a covenant would be applicable to only two lives, whereas the original covenant is applicable to all the three. The true construction is clearly this—that, on the death of any of the three, the plaintiff is entitled to a new lease for three lives, with a like covenant for renewal, mutatis mutandis, that is, writing in such covenant the name of the new life instead of that of the deceased. Looking to the history of leases of this description, it becomes still more clear that this is the true construction. The struggle has always been this. The court has felt, that, where the covenant has been merely in general terms, however large—where, for instance, it has been a covenant to grant a renewed lease "under the like rents, covenants, and conditions as were contained in the original lease," or "with all the covenants and conditions contained in the original lease"—to construe that as amounting to a covenant for perpetual renewal would be a surprise on the lessor. It, therefore, refused to imply, upon a covenant so worded, an intention on the part of the lessor that it should operate as a covenant for perpetual renewal.

That being the rule of the court in construing a covenant so generally worded, conveyancers have taken this course. Finding that the courts would not imply such an intention, they have said: "We will express it." The course they have taken in order to express it has been, to add to the general words which the courts have held as necessary to imply such an intention, the words "including this present covenant." That this has been the history of the law in these cases, is clear from the able work (JARMAN'S PRECEDENTS IN CONVEYANCING) to which counsel for a mortgagee referred me as illustrative of the practice of conveyancers, which, in reference to such a question, may properly be taken into consideration. Counsel for the defendant says, that if the parties to the original lease really contemplated a perpetual renewal, they would have made their intention clearer, by some such words as these: "in case in this or any future lease any life should drop, a new lease shall be granted including this present covenant." Such words might have had that effect, but it appears to me that they were not necessary to express what was intended.

With regard to the second question, it was argued, that even if the plaintiff were entitled to a perpetual renewal, the court would not compel the insertion in the lease which is now to be granted of an express covenant for renewal, upon the ground that the insertion of such a covenant would have the effect of fastening an obligation upon every person who may hereafter become entitled as an assign to the reversion of this property for all time, and be binding upon the assets of every such person indefinitely; and Copper Mining Co. v. Beach (1) was cited as an authority to show, that a new demise reciting the original covenant would be a sufficient specific performance. But, after much consideration, I am unable to see any principle upon which to hold that in the present case an express covenant for renewal ought not to be inserted. The notion of its being objectionable on the ground of tending to a perpetuity is out of the question. The moment any assign of the reversion grants a renewed lease, his duty is discharged, and his assets, therefore, are free from any liability. As to Copper Mining Co. v. Beach (1), all that was there decided was, that, under a decree for specific performance, the courts will not compel parties, who are trustees, to enter into covenants into which, under ordinary circumstances, trustees would not be called upon to enter. But that rule has no application to a case where, as here, the person in whom the reversion is vested is entitled to the beneficial interest; in such a case, the court will act in respect of a covenant like the present in the same manner as it acts in the case of ordinary covenants for title under a decree for specific performance. The defendant in this case having the beneficial interest in the reversion, and having purchased with notice that a covenant for perpetual renewal would be required of him, the court will require the insertion of such a covenant in the lease in question.

Order accordingly.

WATERS AND ANOTHER v. MONARCH FIRE AND LIFE ASSURANCE CO.

[COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH (Lord Campbell, C.J., Wightman and Crompton, JJ.), January 19, 1856]

Insurance—Fire—Bailee—Warehouseman with whom goods deposited for third parties—Recovery of full value—Excess recovered beyond his interest to be held in trust for owners.

Under a floating policy of fire insurance "on goods, the property of the assured or held by him in trust or on commission," a warehouseman may recover the full value of goods destroyed by fire which were deposited by third parties, although those parties gave no orders to insure the goods and were unaware of their insurance. He is not limited to the amount of his charges for warehousing, landing, and cartage, for which he has a lien on the goods, but any excess recovered beyond the amount of his own interest must be held in trust for the owners.

Notes. Under s. 4 of the Life Assurance Act, 1774, insurances on goods and merchandise are excluded from that Act (13 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 8).

B Special Case stated for the opinion of the court in an action on two policies of fire insurance, effected by the plaintiffs with the defendants, to recover the value of flour and other goods destroyed by fire on Feb. 16, 1855, and which had been deposited by third parties in the plaintiffs' warehouse near Blackfriars.

C The plaintiffs were corn factors and merchants, and also warehousemen, and had effected two fire policies, commonly known as floating policies, with the defendants. In the first policy the assurance was described to be "on goods in trust or on commission." And in the second, "on flour, the property of the assured, or held by them in trust or on commission." The goods, the value of which was sought to be recovered, were deposited in the plaintiffs' warehouse by third persons, in the way of their trade as warehousemen, and such persons had not authorised the plaintiffs to insure the goods, and the fact of insurance was communicated to one of such persons only, who appeared to approve of it when so mentioned to him.
D Two of the parties had insured their own goods elsewhere. The flour was destroyed by the fire on Feb. 16, 1855, and at that time the plaintiffs had a lien on the goods to the extent of his charges for warehousing, and landing and cartage. The amount of such charges was paid into court by the defendants.

E At the trial, before LORD CAMPBELL, C.J., at the Guildhall in 1855, a verdict was found for the plaintiffs subject to the opinion of the court as to the plaintiffs' right to recover under the circumstances and, if so, for what sum, the court to be entitled to draw inferences of fact. The plaintiffs maintained that the amount recoverable was not limited to the amount of their charges for which they had a lien on the goods but extended to the whole amount of the loss. The defendants contended that the plaintiffs had no insurable interest in the goods deposited.

F Mellish and Bovill for the plaintiffs.
Lush and Barnard for the defendants.

LORD CAMPBELL, C.J.—I consider that it is clear that this action is maintainable. Looking to the words in the policies, were these goods included in the policies? I am of opinion that they were. In the first policy the assurance is on
G "goods in trust or on commission," and in the second policy "on flour, the property of the assured, or held by them in trust, or on commission." The words "in trust" here mean goods with which the assured were entrusted; not goods of which they might be trustees in the legal technical language, i.e., of holding property on equitable trusts, but as descriptive of goods entrusted to him, landed at his wharf, and deposited in his hands. There is no doubt but that it was intended that these
H goods should be covered by the policies. Is there anything illegal in such an insurance? There is nothing illegal at common law, as was determined by the recent decision of Marks v. Hamilton (1). And it is allowed that there is no statute which renders such an insurance illegal. It is, therefore, a valid insurance. It would be extremely inconvenient if such an insurance were not allowed, although the plaintiffs had no order from the owner of the goods to insure, and the plaintiffs
I never told the owner that they had insured. It would be extremely inconvenient if a floating policy of insurance could not be kept up, which the plaintiffs might apply to the benefit of those whose goods they were entrusted with, and which, as far as I can see, causes no injury to commerce or the interests of society.

Then the question arises, To what extent do the policies go? I am of opinion that they extend to the whole corpus of the goods. If it is a valid contract, the contract is to pay or make good all such damage or loss as shall happen by fire to the property mentioned in the policies—not the mere particular interest which the plaintiffs might have in the property, but the whole value of the property. The plaintiffs will be entitled to take sufficient to cover their own interest in the goods, and may be regarded as trustees of the remainder for those parties who have the ulterior interest in the property. There are authorities to show* that the owners of the property although they had given no orders to insure, or had the fact of an assurance of their property communicated to them, may at any time ratify the insurance. The plaintiffs are now entitled to recover the full amount which they have claimed.

WIGHTMAN, J.—These goods were, beyond all reasonable doubt, held by the plaintiffs in trust. They were deposited in their warehouse; they had a right to charge in respect thereof, and they were liable to account to the owners for them. I, therefore, think they fall within the words of the policies. If so, to what extent can the plaintiffs recover? It seems to me, unless the policies are illegal except to the extent of their own interest in the goods, that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover their full value. That the case is not within the Life Assurance Act, 1774, is allowed, nor is the contract illegal at common law. The plaintiffs may, therefore, recover the total amount of their loss, for it is not a mere contract of indemnity to the extent of the plaintiffs' own loss.

CROMPTON, J.—I cannot doubt but the policies apply to a case of this kind. The goods were entrusted to the plaintiffs in the way of their trade, and they were interested in the whole of the goods. They might have recovered the whole of the goods in trover; in an indictment for felony they would be described as their goods. Then I think the plaintiffs might recover the whole value of the goods, and the surplus beyond their own beneficial interest would go to the parties to whom the plaintiffs are accountable for the goods.

Judgment for plaintiffs.

Rates—Assessment—Profits basis—Ascertainment of rateable value—Apparatus for supply of water situated in several parishes.

The works of a water company extended over several parishes, and consisted of two portions, the first being the service pipes which delivered the water to the consumers, which was directly productive of rateable value, and the second being the works bringing the water to the service pipes which indirectly conduced to such production.

Held: the rateable value ought to be apportioned among the several parishes in the following manner: (i) as to the second portion, the rateable value of the land with all the buildings and fixtures thereon should be deducted from the total rateable value and distributed among the parishes in which the parts of that portion were situated; (ii) the residue of the rateable value should be apportioned among the parishes in which the service pipes were situated in the ratio of the net profits in each parish.

H

Case Stated for the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench.

A poor rate was made by the officers of the hamlet of Mile End Old Town, assessing the East London Water Works at the net annual sum of £1,473 in respect of their mains, pipes and other works fixed in the ground for conveying water. The company appealed to a special sessions, where the magistrates decided that the annual value of the company's occupation in the hamlet was £900 and reduced the rate to that sum. On appeal to the sessions, that decision was affirmed, subject to the opinion of this court on a Case. The Case was referred to a barrister to decide the amount at which the company should be rated, with liberty to state any points for the decision of this court. He decided and certified that the company should be rated on the net estimated rental or rateable value of £1,473.

Hill and Clarkson for the parish.

Sir Fitzroy Kelly, Bodkin and Hodges for the company.

June 26, 1847. LORD DENMAN, C.J., delivered the following judgment of the court.—This was an appeal against a rate, the rateable subject being the apparatus for the supply of water situated in twenty parochial districts, and the rateable value of that, viz., £30,800, being the residue of the gross receipts after making all the deductions to which the company are entitled, has been correctly ascertained by the award. The principle for dividing that sum among those districts is the matter to be decided, the company contending that the division should be according to the amount of fixed capital in each district. But the rule of law laid down by Act of Parliament for ascertaining the rateable value of any subject refers to an estimate of the rent which it may yield. The outlay of capital may furnish no such criterion, since it may have been injudiciously expended, and what was costly may have become worthless by subsequent changes. As our opinion is against the company on the objection relied on in argument in their behalf, it follows that the rate should be affirmed. But, as the award suggests different methods of apportioning the rateable value, and so arriving at the same rate, it would be convenient if we also stated our view of the methods for applying the above rule of law to such rateable subjects as the present.

The first step in the apportioning has been in effect to divide the whole apparatus constituting the rateable subject into two portions, of which one is directly productive of rateable value, being the service pipes which deliver the water to the consumers; the other indirectly conduces to such production, being the residue of the works bringing the water to the service pipes. The second portion has been first rated in the ordinary way by valuing the land with all the buildings and fixtures thereon, and the amount of the rate so ascertained has been deducted from the rateable value, and distributed to the district in which the parts of this portion are situated. An analogous course appears to have been adopted for railways in R. v. London and South Western Rail. Co. (1), and R. v. Grand Junction Rail. Co. (2); and for gas companies in R. v. Cambridge Gas Light Co. (3). Also the spring which indirectly conduced to the ultimate profit by the water-rate was held rateable in a parish where it was situated, in R. v. New River Co. (4), the quantum of such rate being left to the sessions. As this course was acquiesced in by both parties in the three latest cases, we may assume that it may be applied without practical difficulty, and we see no objection to it.

The remaining step has been to apportion the residue of the rateable value among the districts in which the direct productive portion of the works is situated, in the ratio either of net profits or of gross receipts, or of the quantity of mains and pipes, and of the land occupied by them in each district, and each ratio in the present case gives the same result. If they differed it would be necessary to elect between them, and that ratio should be preferred which would best show the rent to be expected, if the part of the works situated within the district was let separately. It is clear that the net profits in each parish would be the best criterion for such rent, and they would, therefore, give the proper ratio. It is also clear that the ratio of the gross receipts or earnings of the several districts to each other will be the same as the ratio of net profits in those districts to each other in all cases where the total of the expense is taken to be common to the whole apparatus, and is deducted from the total of the receipts in the progress of ascertaining the rateable value; for in such case the net profits in each district would be ascertained by distributing the expense among the several districts, and it would be distributed in the ratio of the gross receipts in each; and, if a proportionate deduction should be made from the gross receipts of each, the ratio of the remainder to each other would be the same as the ratio of the net profits to the gross receipts. As any attempt to ascertain the net profit of each district in any other way would lead to minute and inconvenient inquiries in practice, the ratio of gross receipts should be adopted, as being an index of the net profits when the rateable value is ascertained in the way stated in the Case.

- A We think that an apportionment in this sense, according to the gross receipts, is in accordance with the decisions which have apportioned the sum of rateable value on a railway or canal, according to the length of the line in each parish: R. v. Kingswinford (Inhabitants) (5) and R. v. Woking (Inhabitants) (6), where the profit arose from transit, and the line of canal or railway was directly productive of the profit, and the reservoirs, warehouses, stations, etc., indirectly conducive to such production. Each portion of the line earns an aliquot portion of the profit, and, if equal portions of one line, carrying at one rate could be conceived to be let separately, no one portion would be let at a higher rate than the other, and the apportionment of a sum of rateable value according to the length of the line in each parish is according to the rent to be expected on that part of the line. In the case of water companies, where the profit arises from the delivery of water from a given place, the previous transit being immaterial to the consumer, the service pipes immediately produce the profits, and the agency by which the water reaches those pipes indirectly conduces to such production. If the service pipes in each parish could be let separately, the water being assumed to be sold at the same price throughout, the criterion of the rent would be found in the gross receipts which would depend on the number, the diameter and the level of the service pipes in each parish, and the apportionment according to the gross receipts in each district would be according to the rent to be expected from that part of the rateable subject situate in each district. This apportionment is not at variance with the grounds of the judgment in R. v. Cambridge Gas Light Co. (3). There, the court decided that the parishes in which the profits are not received are not entitled to all the amount produced by the rate, but that the parishes on which the parts of the apparatus indirectly conducing to produce profits are situate are entitled to a proportion; and the court also declared that the principle on which the sum of rateable value on the rates of all the parishes should be apportioned is the same as that which was to be applied to canals, and the principle is the same here. By the method adopted in this case, the rateability of the portion of the apparatus indirectly conducing to produce profit is provided for, and the residue of the sum of the whole rateable value is apportioned to those parts of the apparatus directly producing profit, in analogy to the rateable proportion for canals and railways.

We have thus endeavoured to show that the rule for ascertaining the value for separate rating ought to be applied, as far as practicable, to apportioning among several districts a sum of rateable value arising partly in each.

Order of quarter sessions quashed; original rate confirmed.

KEATS v. KEATS AND MONTEZUMA

[COURT FOR DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES (Lord Chelmsford, L.C., Wightman, J., and Cresswell, J.O.), February 1, 4, 5, 1859]

Divorce—Condonation—Need for reinstatement of guilty party—Conjugal cohabitation.

Divorce—Costs—Wife's costs—Liability of husband—Wife failing in suit—No application for security.

Condonation means a blotting out of the matrimonial offence imputed, so as to restore the offending party to the same position as that which he or she occupied before the offence was committed. Words, however strong, can at the highest only be regarded as imperfect forgiveness, and, unless followed up by something which amounts to a reconciliation and a reinstatement of the guilty party in the condition he or she was in before the transgression, it must remain incomplete. There can be no condonation which is not followed by conjugal cohabitation.

A husband is not liable for his wife's costs where she has brought her case to a hearing and has failed and has not applied for security of costs before the hearing.

Rule Nisi for a new trial on a verdict for the husband on his petition for dissolution of marriage on the grounds of the wife's adultery. The wife had denied adultery and pleaded condonation.

Phinn, Q.C. (Addams, Q.C., and H. S. Giffard with him), for the husband, showed cause against the rule.

Phillimore, Q.C. (H. Thring with him), for the wife, supported the rule.

LORD CHELMSFORD, L.C.—In this case an application is made to the court for a new trial on two grounds: first, that CRESSWELL, J.O., misdirected the jury as to the law of condonation; secondly, that, even if there were no misdirection,

A the verdict of the jury was contrary to the evidence in finding that there was no condonation.

The first question is undoubtedly one of very great and general importance, as the court is called on to decide whether a definition of condonation, which the learned judge had for the first time to give, is or is not correct, and whether it is to be adopted as the principle on which all similar cases are for the future to be decided. It is admitted that there is nothing to be found in the reports in the ecclesiastical courts in explanation of this term, the reason of which was clearly explained by the Judge Ordinary. The judges of the ecclesiastical courts were judges both of the law and of the facts, and, when any question of condonation arose before them, the law was never argued, because it was supposed to be well known and in the breast of the judge; the argument, therefore, turned on whether the facts proved amounted to condonation. This word is one which has long become peculiar to the ecclesiastical courts, and, like many other words which are familiar to us by daily use, was believed to be thoroughly understood till the necessity arose for defining it. The legislature having directed that, in cases of this description, questions of fact should be argued by a jury, it became necessary for the learned judge to explain to them in this case what amounted in law to condonation. This he did by stating that it meant "a blotting out of the offence imputed, so as to restore the offending party to the same position which he or she occupied before the offence was committed." Everyone who heard this clear enunciation of the meaning of the term would know that the learned judge, by the words "blotting out the offence," could not be understood as speaking literally, because the offence having been committed could not actually have been blotted out, but must have been received in the sense of its being no more remembered against the offending party. We have the highest sanction for this form of expression, "I am He that blotteth out thy transgressions, and will not remember thy sins." That, of course, is not a promise of the obliteration of things past, which is impossible; but it means that I will so act towards you as if the transgression had not taken place, and the sin shall be no more imputed to you. The second part of the proposition, however, as stated by the learned judge, explains as well as restricts the first part. It must be such a blotting out of the offence as restores the wife to her former position. This is contended to be incorrect, because it excludes a condonation by words only; for it is said that there are two sorts of condonation—one express or by words only, the other implied, as by taking back a delinquent wife and cohabiting with her. On the other hand, the distinction in the law of condonation is denied, and it is asserted that no condonation by words only, however strong, will be sufficient, unless they are followed by sexual intercourse.

I think that it is unnecessary to resort to the Roman classics for the interpretation of the term condonation, or to SANCHEZ for his definitions and distinctions. Words in the course of time often depart very widely from their original meaning, and a foreign author, however learned, may be entitled to deference, but cannot be regarded as an authority by the court. The description of condonation by LORD STOWELL in Beeby v. Beeby (1), that it is a "forgiveness legally releasing the injury," is that which is principally relied on by the counsel for the wife, and it has been insisted that it proves that words alone are sufficient to amount to condonation. In the course of the argument it was even mentioned that if the husband, with knowledge of the adultery, were to say, "I forgive you, but will never see you again," the forgiveness is complete by the first words, which are not susceptible of any qualification. But surely such a proposition is not reasonable, and, if it were admitted, it would lead to every species of artifice or influence to extort from the injured party the healing words which are to be of such powerful and uncontrollable efficacy. The strong and sudden impulse of recollected affection, the importunity of friends, or the surprise of weakness, each of these might produce a hasty expression of forgiveness which, when once uttered, would be irrevocable. How naturally, too, compassion for a guilty creature, associated with the remembrance of former days of happiness, would find vent in such an expression. Those who felt that perpetual separation must be the inevitable consequence of the unpardonable fault, might still anxiously desire to lighten the load of despair by some kind words of consolation and peace. This is not the forgiveness which amounts to condonation, but rather which declares it to be impossible. If I might be permitted to borrow an illustration from poetry [CRABBE'S TALES OF THE HALL, b. 12], the distinction between forgiveness and reconciliation is nowhere more strikingly shown than by a poet who, more than most other men, has sounded the depths of human feeling and who supposes the question put to the husband of an adulteress, "Her did you freely from your soul forgive?" to which he replies:

"Sure as I hope before my Judge to live,
 Sure as the Saviour died upon the tree
 For all who sin—for that dear wretch and me—
 Whom never more on earth will I forsake or see."

But following out the idea conveyed by LORD STOWELL's language in Beeby v. Beeby (1) that condonation is a good plea in bar, as it is not fit that a man should sue for a debt which he has released, counsel for the wife argued that it must be wrong to say that the forgiveness must be such "as to restore her to her former position," because the debt which the wife has incurred is the liability to be sued for a divorce, and, if the husband gives up his right to proceed against her, her offence is condoned, although her former position is not restored. There is no greater fallacy than that of carrying analogy too far, and supposing that, because there is resemblance between two things in one point, they therefore correspond in every respect. In this instance, the injury which a wife has committed by her infidelity is compared to a debt, for the purpose of illustration; it is something which the person to whom it is owed has the right to release. But the condition in which an unfaithful wife stands to her husband is rather that of a person who has incurred a penalty; she has exposed herself to a proceeding to dissolve the tie of marriage, and she has lost her right to insist on cohabitation. The release of the husband's right to proceed for a divorce does not reach the whole of the penalty incurred and, therefore, cannot be complete forgiveness, because it falls short of restoring her to her former position. It is true that forgiveness (as was argued) is an act of the mind, but it can only be manifested by words or by outward acts. The acts which prove forgiveness may be so strong and unequivocal, as by taking home an offending wife and cohabiting with her, that they may conclusively establish condonation, but words, however strong, can at the highest only be regarded as imperfect forgiveness and, unless followed up by something which amounts to a reconciliation and a reinstatement of the wife in the condition she was in before she transgressed, it must remain incomplete.

It has been argued that nothing less than renewed sexual intercourse will be sufficient to establish condonation. It is obvious, without adducing instances to illustrate my meaning, that in some cases that may be a test wholly inapplicable; but I am willing to adopt an expression which was happily used by WIGHTMAN, J., in the course of the argument, and to say that, in my judgment, there can be no condonation which is not followed by "conjugal cohabitation." This is clearly the opinion of DR. LUSHINGTON in Campbell v. Campbell (2). To say that condonation requires conjugal cohabitation or connubial intercourse leaves the nature of the cohabitation or intercourse to be adapted to the varying condition and circumstances of different parties. This will also justify the language of the learned Judge Ordinary that the forgiveness must be shown by a restoration of the wife to her former position. This does not mean that the cohabitation is to be renewed with all the circumstances which surrounded her former life; to accomplish this is beyond the power of the husband. She may live with him as a wife, but live as a degraded wife. The degree or extent to which all her former privileges may be restored to her does not enter into the question; by her infidelity she has forfeited all her title to be regarded as a wife. Condonation is a pardon which is not necessarily absolute, but which may be accompanied with conditions. I see no reason at all to differ

A with the Judge Ordinary in the way in which he has stated the law of condonation to the jury; but, with him, I think that the forgiveness which is to take away the husband's right to a divorce must not fall short of reconciliation, and that this must be shown by the reinstatement of the wife in her former position which renders proof of conjugal cohabitation, or the restitution of conjugal rights, necessary.

B Secondly, it is, however, said that, even if the definition of the learned judge is correct, yet the verdict is contrary to the evidence. I have great difficulty in understanding how, if the first point of misdirection fails, the other can possibly succeed, because, if condonation requires all the circumstances stated in order to render it available as a defence, it can hardly be contended that the proof given approaches at all near what is necessary. Even if the more favourable proposition "that the act of pardon may be done by word of mouth," is accepted, still the evidence falls
C short even of this. There is nothing which shows anything more than an inclination, or it may be an intention, to condone. The husband was anxious to avoid publicity; he desired an amicable arrangement. The wife's family availed themselves of this disposition to endeavour to draw him on to a reconciliation, but they never succeeded; and it would be occupying time most unnecessarily to show that the evidence fully justified the verdict which was pronounced.

D WIGHTMAN, J., concurred.

Rule discharged.

[On the question of the wife's costs, the court said that an application should have been made before the cause was heard. The foundation of the rule of the ecclesiastical court was that the wife should be enabled to bring her case to a hearing and defend herself, and so, up to any time previous to the hearing, the husband was generally liable to have the wife's costs taxed against him, and the court had so far followed the rule, as in Evans v. Evans and Robinson (3), but if the wife had brought her case to a hearing, howsoever, and failed, the husband had never then been made liable to her costs.]

Moss v. Gallimore (1779), 1 Doug.K.B. 279; 99 E.R. 182; 35 Digest (Repl.) 369, 706.

Rule Nisi obtained by the defendant to enter a verdict in an action of trespass for, inter alia, turning the plaintiff out of her dwelling-house. Plea, liberum tenementum.

At the trial before MARTIN, B., the defendant gave prima facie evidence of his title to the house, and the plaintiff then showed that, at the time when she was let into possession by the defendant, he had really no title but was a disseisor. The real owner, a Mrs. Knowles, then insisted on the rent being paid to her and distrained for rent on the tenant of the cellar of the house, and threatened to do the same to the plaintiff, who thereupon paid her rent. It was objected for the defendant that the plaintiff was estopped from denying his title, but a verdict was entered for the plaintiff on the count in question, leave being reserved to the defendant to move to enter the verdict for him. A rule nisi was accordingly obtained by the defendant.

Cleasby showed cause against the rule.

Manisty and Brett supported the rule.

SIR ALEXANDER COCKBURN, C.J.—This rule must be made absolute. I am of opinion that the plaintiff was estopped from denying the title of the defendant under whom she had obtained possession of the premises as landlord, and that on the common law principle that a person who obtains possession from another is estopped from denying the title of the person from whom it was obtained. A distinction has been attempted on the ground that this is not an action of ejectment, but trespass, to which only liberum tenementum was pleaded, and what fell from POLLOCK, C.B., in Watson v. Lane (1) was relied on; but that turns him out, and then he brings an action of trespass. Then, as in the one case, if he had brought ejectment against the tenant the tenant would have been estopped from denying his landlord's title, so he is in the other, and there is no difference if he does so immediately on the termination of the tenancy or some time after. On the other hand, it is true that the tenant may show that the title has expired, among other ways, by eviction, either actual or in point of law; and it is said, on the authority of Poole Corpn. v. Whitt (2), that there may be a constructive eviction. It is not necessary to determine that question, though I may say that it would be much to the detriment of landlords if that doctrine were to prevail. Here, however, there has not been even a constructive eviction; there was a threat of expulsion. Language must be considered with reference to the facts of Watson v. Lane (1). It was an action neither of ejectment nor trespass but on a covenant to deliver up fixtures at the end of the term. The court took a distinction between estoppel as to the right to the land, and on a covenant to deliver up the fixtures, and with reference to that distinction POLLOCK, C.B., said that it was only in an action of ejectment that it could be set up; but he was evidently meaning to distinguish between an action for the recovery of the land and an action for not delivering up certain chattels. Here there is no distinction between ejectment and trespass. The tenant having held over wrongfully the landlord enters, by Mrs. Knowles it is true, and she broke open a cellar which formed no part of this tenement; but what is more striking, these proceedings have been brought, not by the plaintiff, but by Mrs.

A Knowles, and the attorney is found by her. Therefore, there is nothing which could amount to a constructive eviction, even if, as at present advised I am not, we were of opinion that there could be one.

B CRESSWELL, J.—I am of the same opinion. In the first place, evidence was given to sustain the plea of liberum tenementum. The defendant proved that he had let to the plaintiff, and that prima facie showed a seisin in fee; and, unless that is determined or altered in some way, it must be presumed to continue.

As to the eviction, I entirely concur that the consent to pay rent to Mrs. Knowles did not establish an eviction, and I fully concur in doubting whether a constructive eviction can be established. Watson v. Lane (1) was no decision on this point.

C WILLIAMS, J.—I am of the same opinion. It is fully established by a long series of cases that a tenant shall not be permitted, as against a landlord who has let him into possession, to dispute that landlord's title, so long at least as that possession continues; but it may be shown that it has expired. Doe d. Higginbotham v. Barton (3) was certainly decided as an instance of that doctrine, but whether it is so may be doubted. As to the eviction, the rule is that where a party by title paramount has entered, and then restored possession to the tenant, the question may be raised because there the possession is not the same. As to the point raised of a constructive possession, it is unnecessary to give any opinion.

E WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. The defendant prima facie proved his plea, which has not been displaced if there be an estoppel, as there is. Then it is said that this estoppel ceased with the re-entry; but it continues as long as the tenant remains in possession. Then it is said that there is an exception where the tenant has been evicted by title paramount, and that that is the case here, that there was a constructive eviction; but that is not proved here, and if it had been proved, I doubt whether it would have been sufficient.

Rule absolute.

REID AND ANOTHER v. FAIRBANKS AND OTHERS

[COURT OF COMMON PLEAS (Jervis, C.J., Cresswell, Maule and Talfourd, JJ.), June 8, 1853]

Reported 13 C.B. 692; 22 L.J.C.P. 206; 1 C.L.R. 787;

Sale of Goods—Passing of property—Unascertained goods—Contract for building of ship—Sale before ship completed.

The plaintiffs contracted with R., a shipbuilder in Nova Scotia, for the building of a ship. R. was already indebted to the plaintiffs, but from time to time they made advances to him to assist in the building of the ship and furnished him with marine supplies. In June, 1848, R. sent the plaintiffs, as a security for past and future advances, a bill of sale by which he granted, bargained, sold, assigned, etc., to the plaintiffs the ship in course of construction, together with the masts and fittings which might belong to her when completed. The words of the habendum were "to have and to hold the said ship or vessel . . . to [the plaintiffs], their executors [etc.] to their absolute use and benefit and behoof for ever when the said ship or vessel shall be complete and finished, in as full, ample, and perfect a manner as if the said ship or vessel were ready for sea, and ready to be delivered to [the plaintiffs] at the time of executing these presents." In January, 1849, R. registered the ship in the plaintiffs' name, and in a builder's certificate stated them to be the owners. In March, 1849, he induced the comptroller of customs in Nova Scotia to cancel the registration and to grant him a new certificate in his own name as owner. He then executed an assignment of the ship to the defendants, who completed her and sent her to Liverpool with a cargo of their own. On the defendants' refusal to deliver the ship to the plaintiffs they brought an action in trover against the defendants to recover the value of the ship and compensation in damages by reason of the loss of the freight on the voyage.

Held: the bill of sale was executed for the security of the plaintiffs; if it were to operate as a future sale, it would be no security, and, therefore, it must be construed to operate as a present sale: accordingly, by it the property in the ship passed to the plaintiffs; that right was not affected by the habendum, and, therefore, the defendants were liable in trover.

Conversion—Damages—Contract for building ship—Property passing before completion—Sale by builder to third person.

The parties having agreed that the amount of the damages should be assessed by an average stater, the court suggested, and the parties assented, that the proper principle on which to estimate the damages would be the value of the ship and all her stores, etc., when the defendants took possession of her, and that, as a mode of ascertaining that value, the arbitrator should consider what would have been the value of the ship at Nova Scotia if she had been completed by R. according to his contract with the plaintiffs, and deduct therefrom the money that would necessarily have been laid out by R. after that date in order to complete her according to the contract.

Greening v. Wilkinson (1825), 1 C. & P. 625; 171 E.R. 1344, N.P.; 43 Digest, 521, 587.

Action of trover to recover the value of a ship, stores, etc., and a compensation in damages by reason of the loss of the freight on a certain voyage. The defendants pleaded not guilty and a traverse of the plaintiffs' property.

At the trial, a verdict was taken by consent for the plaintiffs, subject to the opinion of the court on the following Special Case. The plaintiffs were merchants, established at Glasgow under the name of Stewart & Co.; the defendants were

A merchants, established at Halifax, in Nova Scotia, under the name of Fairbanks and Allison. Alexander Russell was a shipbuilder, living at Pictou, in Nova Scotia. They were all British subjects. Since 1845 the plaintiffs had had dealings with, and made advances to, Russell, who had built and consigned to the plaintiffs at Glasgow, as his agents, several ships for sale. In 1847, Russell was indebted on the balance to the plaintiffs, and he offered to build a vessel of which the
B plaintiffs were to be half-owners. They consented to this, and he commenced building the ship and received advances from them to assist him in doing so. They also furnished him with rigging, anchors, etc. In consequence of complaints made by them of the state of the account between them and him, he sent them a bill of sale of the ship, dated June 20, 1848, as a security. The bill of sale, after reciting that the plaintiffs had made some advances to Russell and had agreed to
C make such further advances as he should require to complete the vessel, witnessed that, for and in consideration of the premises, and of 5s., and for the security and repayment of all such sum or sums of money as the plaintiffs had already advanced or might thereafter advance to aid and assist Russell to complete and finish the vessel, Russell granted, bargained, sold, assigned, etc., to the plaintiffs a certain ship or vessel then in course of progress of building by him to be of the burthen
D of 900 tons, or thereabouts, her length of keel being 117 feet, breadth of beam 35 feet, and depth of hold 20 feet, and all and singular the masts, sails, etc., and fittings of every description whatever, which might belong to or appertain to the ship or vessel when completed and ready for sea, together with one long-boat, etc., and also 600 tons of timber, then in his possession, to build, finish and complete the ship or vessel, to have and to hold the ship or vessel, with the appurtenances, together
E with the boats and timber and the other goods and chattels, to the plaintiffs, to their absolute use and benefit and behoof for ever, when the ship or vessel should be complete and finished, in as full, ample, and perfect a manner as if the ship or vessel were ready for sea, and ready to be delivered to the plaintiffs at the time of executing those presents. Russell also covenanted with the plaintiffs that, when and so soon as the ship should be sufficiently advanced to be measured, and her
F burthen ascertained, he would cause her to be registered and an endorsement made on the certificate of registry, as by law required, in the name and for the sole use and benefit of the plaintiffs, and that he had good title, etc. On June 20, 1848, the ship had her stern and stern-frame made and bolted to the keel, the floor timbers were fastened to the keel, and some of her planks were fastened. There was afterwards an agreement between the parties, by which Russell agreed to complete the
G vessel by May 1, and the plaintiffs agreed to accept bills to a certain amount. On Mar. 29, 1849, the plaintiffs had accepted bills to the amount of £1,145. In December, 1848, Russell delivered to the comptroller of customs at Pictou a builder's certificate describing the vessel, and stating that he built the vessel for the plaintiffs. On Jan. 30, 1849, Russell made a declaration and deposited it with the comptroller, in which he described himself as agent for the plaintiffs and stated
H them to be the sole owners of her. On the same day, the comptroller granted to Russell a certificate in accordance with the declaration, stating the plaintiffs to be the owners. That certificate was not sealed, it not being customary in Nova Scotia to seal such certificates. The certificate was retained by Russell. All the documents were registered in the custom-house books. On Mar. 29, 1849, Russell prevailed on the comptroller of customs to cancel the document dated Jan. 30, 1849,
I and delivered to him a builder's certificate stating that he built the vessel for himself and that he was sole owner. The comptroller granted to Russell a certificate of registry, stating him to be the owner. On the same day, Russell, as owner, executed an instrument by which he assigned the vessel, rigging, stores, etc., to the defendants as a security for the sum of £5,000; and on the same day the defendants took possession of her, being then in a very advanced state. She was afterwards completed by the defendants, at a cost which it was agreed should be referred to Mr. Richards of London, average stater, to ascertain. On July 17, 1849, she was launched and loaded with a cargo by the defendants. On Oct. 1, she was sold absolutely by Russell to the defendants by a deed recorded in the custom-house books at Pictou; and afterwards the comptroller of customs issued to the defendants, as owners, a certificate of British registry. The ship was sent by the defendants with a cargo to Liverpool, and the plaintiffs then demanded the ship from the defendants. They refused to deliver her up to them, and this action was brought. The court were to be at liberty to draw such inferences as a jury might properly draw. A

The questions for the opinion of the court were whether the plaintiffs were entitled to recover in the action, and if they were, to what extent, and on what principle the damages were to be ascertained. Their decision and the principle on which the damages were to be ascertained was to be embodied in a rule of court referring the amount of damages according to such decision and principle to Mr. Richards. If the court should be of opinion that the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover, the verdict for the plaintiffs was to be set aside and a verdict entered for the defendants. Either party was to be at liberty to turn the Case into a special verdict, in which the inferences drawn by the court were to be treated as facts found by the jury. B

Sir Fitzroy Kelly (Barstow with him) for the plaintiffs.

Bramwell, Q.C., for the defendants. C

JERVIS, C.J.—We all think that the proper principle on which to estimate the damages in this case will be the value of the ship and all her stores, etc., on Mar. 29, 1849, the time when Russell ceased to work on her on the plaintiffs' account and when the defendants took possession of her; and that, as a mode of ascertaining such value the arbitrator should consider what would have been the value of the ship at Pictou, if she had been completed by Russell according to his contract with the plaintiffs, and deduct therefrom the money that would necessarily have been laid out by Russell after Mar. 29, 1849, in order to complete her according to the contract. D

That principle of computing the damages having been assented to by counsel on both sides and Mar. 29, 1849, having been fixed as the date of the conversion, the court proceeded to pronounce judgment. E

JERVIS, C.J.—I am of opinion that the plaintiffs are entitled to judgment. The matter turns on the construction which is to be put on the bill of sale. There are, unquestionably, cases where a contract such as this would vest the property at once in the purchaser; on the other hand, it is equally clear that there may be cases where the contract would take effect as a transfer of the property only when the chattel is completed. I think that this contract comes under the first head, for, although some words in the instrument, such as "when the said ship or vessel shall be finished," might have such a construction as to show a contract under the second head, yet the whole instrument being looked at shows that the other is the true meaning. It was executed for the security of the plaintiffs and, if it were to operate as a future sale, it would be no security; whereas, if it operates as a present sale, it is a security. I think that, to carry out the obvious intention, we must construe it as a present sale. It is, therefore, unnecessary to consider the question of the Registration Acts. If there had been no contract, I think it very likely that the certificate might be construed as showing ownership. The damages will be ascertained as agreed on. F

MAULE, J.—This instrument is to be looked at according to the existing circumstances of the parties. It is clear that the instrument was intended to give the plaintiffs a security; unless property in something passed, it gave no security. That shows, therefore, that it was the intention of the parties that the property in the vessel should pass; but it appears to me that the parties meant even to pass a great deal more than they were capable of passing, namely, what might never be in existence, a thing which we find constantly attempted. If they made an effort to do that, it is very unlikely that these words were not intended to pass anything G

A which they might pass. As to the habendum, that is directed to the ship when completed and has not the effect intended, but that does not restrain the operative words so as not to pass the ship as it then existed.

Master and Servant—Contract of service—Termination—Contract for twelve months certain “and to continue from time to time until three months’ notice in writing be given”—Determination at end of twelve months.

The plaintiff was employed by the defendants as a commercial traveller under a written agreement which stipulated that the agreement was to be binding between the parties “for twelve months certain from the date hereof and to continue from time to time until three months’ notice in writing be given by either party to determine the same.” After the agreement had been in force for nine months the defendants gave the plaintiff three months’ notice to determine his employment at the expiration of twelve months from the date of the agreement. In an action for wrongful dismissal the plaintiff contended that the agreement was not determinable at the expiration of the first year.

Held: the agreement was for one year certain and did not bind the parties for longer, and therefore, the defendants were entitled to give three months’ notice expiring at the end of the first year of employment.

Demurrer in an action for wrongful dismissal.

The declaration stated that in consideration that the plaintiff would enter into the service of the defendants as their country traveller, in their trade or business of wine merchants, and would continue therein for one year certain, and would further continue therein from time to time, until three months’ notice in writing should be given by the plaintiff or by the defendants to determine such service, and would make three journeys during the year to such parts as they might direct, and would attend entirely to their business, and not take any other commission, the defendants agreed to employ him in the capacity aforesaid, and to pay him a yearly salary of A £150, payable quarterly, and also an allowance of £1 1s. per day during the time he should be on his journeys, and to continue him in such service for such the period, and on the terms aforesaid; and during the continuance of the employment from time to time to direct and allow the plaintiff to make three journeys in each year. The plaintiff entered into the service of the defendants in the capacity and on the terms aforesaid, and continued therein until the expiration of one year; and B although the plaintiff was ready and willing to make the three journeys in each year, and to continue in the service of the defendants, and although all conditions precedent had been fulfilled to entitle the plaintiff to have the agreement performed by the defendants, and to continue in their service, and to make the journeys, and to maintain this action in respect of the breaches hereinafter alleged; yet the defen- C dants did not, although requested by the plaintiff so to do, direct or allow him to make the journeys during the year of his service as their country traveller, and wrongfully dismissed the plaintiff from their employment, whereby the plaintiff had been deprived of the allowance, salary, and profits, which he otherwise would have received for his journeys and service, and had also lost and been deprived of valuable commercial connection in the United Kingdom.

The defendants pleaded by their fourth plea, that as to the allegation that the de- D fendants wrongfully dismissed the plaintiff from their employment, the agreement in writing, was as follows :

“Memorandum of agreement entered into this 11th day of January, 1858, between Frederick Symons and John Fairgray Sharpin, wine merchants, trading under the firm of Symons, Sharpin & Co., at No. 5, Lawrence Pountney E Lane, in the city of London (for themselves and the survivor of them), of the one part, and Robert Brown, of No. 5, St. Paul's Churchyard, in the said city of London, commercial traveller, of the other part. The said Robert Brown engages to serve the parties of the first part as their representative or country traveller in their trade or business of wine merchants aforesaid, in all such parts of the United Kingdom as they may from time to time determine upon for the purpose of soliciting orders and collecting in accounts, at the yearly salary of F £150 sterling, payable quarterly, and also an allowance of £1 1s. per diem during the time he is upon his journey, he being allowed any reasonable extra expenses he may be put to by entertaining any of the customers when transacting business, and settling accounts, etc.; he also engages to remit all moneys received by him by the first post, or second post as time and circumstances will permit, G and send a statement of all moneys received by him, and remitted home, keeping only a balance of odd moneys in hand that cannot conveniently be remitted by letter. He also undertakes to make three journeys during the year to such parts as they the said parties of the first part may direct, and will attend entirely to their business, and not take any other commission. The said parties of the first part hereby agree to the aforesaid terms, and engage to pay the said H yearly salary and other allowances, and such other increased sum for salary as they may deem the said Robert Brown to be entitled to receive.

“This agreement to be binding between the said parties for twelve months certain from the date hereof, and to continue from time to time until three months' notice in writing be given by either party to determine the same.”

The defendants stated that they, the defendants, gave to the plaintiff three months' I notice in writing of their desire to determine the employment of the plaintiff at the expiration of twelve months from the date of the agreement, and at the expiration of such notice his employment was determined accordingly. Demurrer and joinder in demurrer. One matter of law intended to be argued was, that the agreement set out in the plea was not determinable at the expiration of the first year.

Day for the plaintiff.—The plaintiff was entitled to three months' notice from the expiration of the twelve months certain. It is an agreement for a year certain, and

A a further term, and the three months' notice applies to such additional term after the expiration of one year.

Serjeant Hayes for the defendant.

B ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that the construction the court should put on the agreement is in favour of the defendant. It seems to me that the agreement was that the plaintiff should serve the defendant for a term of twelve months certain, and as it stands it does not bind the parties for a longer time.

WILLES and BYLES, JJ., concurred.

C KEATING, J.—I have some doubts owing to the words "and to continue," but after Thompson v. Maberly (1), I do not feel that my doubts are sufficiently strong to make me differ from the rest of the court.

Demurrer in an action of debt for calls on railway shares.

The declaration stated that the defendant was the holder of thirty shares in the Cork and Bandon Rail. Co., and was indebted to the company in the sum of £825, in respect of nine calls, that is to say, seven calls of £2 10s. each, and two calls of £5 each, on each of the said shares; whereby an action had accrued to the com- E pany, by virtue of the Companies Clauses (Consolidation) Act, 1845, and the Cork and Bandon Railway Act, 1845; but the defendant had not paid the same, or any part thereof. The company also claimed interest on the debt and money found to be due from the defendant to the company on an account stated between them.
The company claimed £1,500.

The defendant's second plea, was that the action was on contracts without F specialty, and that the alleged causes of action did not accrue within six years before this suit under the provisions of the Limitation Act, 1623. To this plea the plaintiffs demurred on the ground that the Statute of Limitations referred to by the second plea, and therein pleaded, was not pleadable to the causes of action declared on.

Beasley (with him Serjeant Byles) for the company.—The action is brought on G a specialty, and, therefore, the limitation is, the twenty years provided by the Civil Procedure Act, 1833, s. 3, and not the six years provided by the Limitation Act, 1623, s. 2. The Companies Clauses (Consolidation) Act, 1845, shows that the liability of the defendant in this action is the creature of the statute. Here, the defendant would not have been suable in this form for not paying calls, but for the statute. [MAULE, J.—You say that the facts stated here do not show any II contract, except for the statute?] Exactly so. The defendant becomes bound by the statutory contract—a record of the highest nature: and a duty is imposed on him by the statute, for the breach of which the special form of remedy is given.
The liability is created by, and altogether founded on, the statute. That an action on a statute is an action on a specialty, is clear from BACON'S ABRIDGMENT, Limitation of Actions (D. 3), and COMYNS' DIGEST, Temps. (G. 15). The company does I not admit the allegation in the plea that the action is on contracts without specialty, inasmuch as the court can see that it is an action founded on the statute.

Udall for the defendant.—The plea is good. The liability to pay calls is a liability on a contract without specialty. An action upon a statute is a totally different thing. [MAULE, J.—Where is the shareholder's undertaking to pay calls but for the statute?] It must be conceded that there is none. [MAULE, J.—Then he undertakes by the statute. Is an action brought upon that undertaking, an action on a contract without specialty?] It is submitted that it is. Unless this contract

A is governed by the Limitation Act, 1623, s. 3, there is no limitation at all applicable to the case; for, the Civil Procedure Act, 1833, s. 3, which speaks of "debt upon any bond or other specialty," must be confined to specialties ejusdem generis, or to specialties of an inferior sort.

B JERVIS, C.J.—I am of opinion that the second plea in this case is no answer to the action, and that the company is entitled to judgment.

C This is an action of debt: it professes to be an action on the Companies Clauses (Consolidation) Act, 1845, and the Cork and Bandon Railway Act, 1845, and is in the form given by s. 26 of the former act. I think it is an action on statute. There are various modes of becoming a holder of shares pointed out by the statute: some members of the company are liable to pay calls, others are not. But for the Act of Parliament, no action could be brought by the company against one of its own members. This, therefore, is an action brought in respect of a liability created by statute and, therefore, is an action founded on the statute, and the plea which relies on the six years' limitation is no answer to it: consequently the company must have judgment.

D MAULE, J.—I also am of opinion that this is a bad plea. It states that the action is on contracts without specialty, and that the alleged causes of action did not, nor did any or either of them, accrue within six years before this suit. When we look at the declaration, we find that the action is brought on two statutes—the Companies Clauses (Consolidation) Act, 1845, and the Cork and Bandon Railway Act, 1845. It is manifest, on reading the declaration, that it is a declaration in debt on these two statutes. A declaration in debt on a statute, is a declaration on a specialty; and it is not the less so because the facts which bring the defendant within the liability, are facts outside the statute: that must constantly arise in actions for liabilities arising out of statutes.

F That appearing to be so, the allegation in the plea, that the action is on contracts without specialty, is a false allegation of a matter of law. There may, undoubtedly, be cases where a statute enables an action to be brought, which nevertheless is not an action on the act of parliament. The question is, however, whether that state of things exists here. It manifestly appears that this is an action of debt, and on the statute and, therefore, an action on a specialty.

G Whether assumpsit or case would lie, leaves altogether untouched the question whether this plea is an answer to this action. The case seems to me to be abundantly clear. The proper limitation is that prescribed by the Civil Procedure Act, 1833, s. 3, viz., twenty years: an action on statute is an action on a specialty, and is clearly comprehended within the words of that section: "debt upon any bond or other specialty," although a bond is the plainest and simplest kind of specialty, and a statute the highest. On the whole, I concur with the Lord Chief Justice in thinking that the company is entitled to the judgment of the court.

H CRESSWELL, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. This is plainly an action on a statutory liability to pay the calls: and the defendant is not at liberty to tell us that it is an action on contracts without specialty.

I TALFOURD, J.—I am of the same opinion. The relation between the shareholders and the company is the creation of the Act of Parliament. The action is in terms founded on the Act, and consequently an action on a specialty within the Civil Procedure Act, 1833.

[COURT OF EXCHEQUER (Pollock, C.B., Alderson, Rolfe and Platt, BB.), May 31, 1850]

Arrest—Arrest without warrant—Suspicion of commission of misdemeanour.

A police constable of the city of London has no power, under the City of London Police Act, 1839, to take a person into custody without a warrant merely on suspicion that he has committed a misdemeanour.

Notes. Considered: Barnard v. Gorman, [1941] 3 All E.R. 45. Referred to: Ledwith v. Roberts, [1936] 3 All E.R. 570.

Demurrer in an action for trespass for assaulting the plaintiff, and conveying him to a police-station, and there detaining him without reasonable or probable cause.

As to assaulting the plaintiff, and conveying him to the police-station, the defendant pleaded that, before the time when the alleged assault took place, the defendant was a constable of the police of the city of London, appointed under City of London Police Act, 1839, and that, at the time when the alleged assault took place, he was acting as such constable within the city; and that just before the committing of the supposed trespasses, and while he was acting as such constable within the city, one John Miller, in the presence and hearing of the plaintiff, stated and represented to the defendant, then acting as such constable of the police force as aforesaid, that the plaintiff had committed perjury, by wilfully and corruptly making a false affidavit in a judicial proceeding before one of the Queen's justices, and that John Miller then and there charged the plaintiff with the commission of the offence, and then and there required the defendant to take the plaintiff into custody on the charge. That because the plaintiff, on being asked by the defendant if his name was Bowditch, replied that it was not, and that he should not tell what his name was, the defendant then had good cause to, and did suspect, the plaintiff of having committed the offence, and, as such constable of the police, took the plaintiff into custody. That because there was no justice of the peace for the city then sitting, before whom the plaintiff could be taken on the charge, the defendant caused the plaintiff to go to the police-station for the district of the city within which the plaintiff was so taken into custody, and delivered him to the constable in charge. Demurrer, and joinder.

J. Brown for the plaintiff.—The substantial question raised by this demurrer is whether a police constable of the city of London can take a person into custody on suspicion of perjury. That depends on the City of London Police Act, 1839, "for regulating the police in the city of London." Section 9 confers on police constables appointed under that Act all the powers which any constables possess by the common or statute law. At common law a constable has no power to arrest a person without warrant, on suspicion of having committed a misdemeanour. Section 8, on which this plea is framed, empowers

"any man belonging to the said police force to take into custody, without warrant, all loose, idle, and disorderly persons, whom he shall find disturbing the public peace, or whom he shall have good cause to suspect of having committed or intending to commit any felony, misdemeanour, or breach of the peace, and all persons whom he shall find between sunset and the hour of eight in the forenoon lying in any highway, yard, or other place, or loitering therein, and not giving a satisfactory account of themselves."

The words "loose, idle, and disorderly persons," override and control the words

A "whom he shall have good cause to suspect of having committed, etc., any misdemeanour." But the plea contains no averment that the plaintiff was a loose, idle, or disorderly person. Section 35 enumerates the offences for which a police constable may take a person into custody without warrant.

B Hugh Hill for the defendant.—Although, according to strict grammatical construction, the words, "loose, idle, and disorderly persons," might override the subsequent part of the clause, yet the plain intention of the legislature was, that whenever a constable had good cause to suspect any person of having committed, or intending to commit, any felony, misdemeanour, or breach of the peace, he should be justified in taking such person into custody without warrant. [ALDERSON, B.—If the legislature had so intended, they would have inserted the words, "and all other persons." POLLOCK, C.B.—Suppose a person refused to serve some public office, or had committed any breach of duty imposed by statute, would a police constable be justified in taking him into custody without a warrant? In a case in which the liberty of the subject is concerned, we cannot go beyond the natural construction of the statute.]

D PER CURIAM.—We cannot, in construing a statute involving the liberty of the subject, go beyond the strict and natural construction of the words used by the legislature. The words pointed out by counsel for the plaintiff clearly govern and override the whole section. No policeman can claim under this section the right of apprehending a man without a warrant, simply because he has good cause to suspect him to be guilty of misdemeanour. If it were not so, there would be no protection for anyone against apprehension on the most groundless suspicion. The plea is, therefore, bad, and our judgment must be for the plaintiff.

H The defendant, the owner of a flock of black-faced lambs, when collecting his lambs from a field where they had been pastured, by mistake also took a white-faced lamb from the flock of another farmer. When selling his lambs the defendant realised the mistake, but nevertheless sold the white-faced lamb together with his own lambs.

I Held: although the original taking was not a felony, there being no intention then of appropriation, it was a trespass, and in consequence an unlawful taking that continued up to the time of the fraudulent appropriation when the felony of larceny was committed, and, therefore, the defendant was rightly convicted of larceny.

Appeal from conviction for larceny at Durham Quarter Sessions.

At the Durham quarter sessions on Oct. 18, 1852, the prisoner, Charles Riley, was indicted for having on Oct. 5, 1852, stolen a lamb, the property of John Burnside. The prisoner pleaded Not Guilty. At the trial it was proved that on Friday, Oct. 1, 1852, John Burnside, the prosecutor, put ten white-faced lambs into a field occupied by John Clarke, situated near to the town of Darlington. On Monday, Oct. 4, the prisoner went with a flock of twenty-nine black-faced lambs to John Clarke, and asked if he might put them into Clarke's field for a night's keep, and upon Clarke agreeing to allow him to do so for one penny per head, the prisoner put his twenty-nine lambs into the same field with the prosecutor's lambs.

At half-past seven o'clock in the morning of Tuesday, Oct. 5, the prosecutor went to Clarke's field, and in counting his lambs he missed one. The prisoner's lambs had also gone from the field. Between eight and nine o'clock in the morning of the same day, the prisoner came to the farm of John Calvert, at Middleton St. George, six miles east from Darlington, and asked him to buy twenty-nine lambs. Calvert agreed to do so, and to give 8s. a-piece for them. Calvert then proceeded to count the lambs, and informed the prisoner that there were thirty instead of twenty-nine in the flock, and pointed out to him a white-faced lamb, upon which the prisoner said, "If you object to take thirty, I will draw one." Calvert, however, bought the thirty lambs; and paid the prisoner £12 for them.

One of the lambs sold to Calvert was identified by the prosecutor as his property, and as the lamb missed by him from Clarke's field. It was a half-bred white-faced lamb, marked with the letter "T," and similar to the other nine of the prosecutor's lambs. The twenty-nine lambs belonging to the prisoner were black-faced lambs. In the afternoon of Oct. 5 the prisoner stated to two of the witnesses that he had never put his lambs into Clarke's field, and had sold them on the previous afternoon, for £11 12s., to a person on the Barnard Castle Road, which leads west from Darlington.

There was evidence in the case to show that the prisoner must have taken the lambs from Clarke's field early in the morning, which was thick and rainy.

It was argued by counsel on behalf of the prisoner in his address to the jury that the facts showed that the original taking from Clarke's Field was by mistake; and if the jury were of that opinion, then, as the original taking was not done animo furandi, the subsequent appropriation would not make it a larceny, and the prisoner must be acquitted.

The Chairman, in summing-up, told the jury that, though they might be of opinion that the prisoner did not know that the lamb was in his flock until it was pointed out to him by Calvert, he should rule that in point of law the taking occurred when it was so pointed out to the prisoner and sold by him to Calvert, and not at the time of leaving the field. The jury returned the following verdict: The jury say that at the time of leaving the field the prisoner did not know that

A the lamb was in his flock, and that he was guilty of felony at the time it was pointed out to him.

The prisoner was then sentenced to six months' hard labour in the house of correction at Durham; and being unable to find bail, was thereupon committed to prison until the opinion of this court could be taken upon the question whether he was properly convicted of larceny.

B Liddell for the prisoner.

Grey for the Crown was not called on to argue.

POLLOCK, C.B.—We are all of opinion that the conviction is right. The case is distinguishable from those cited. R. v. Thistle (1) decides only that if a man once gets into a rightful possession, he cannot, by a subsequent fraudulent appropriation, convert it into felony. So in R. v. Thurborn (2), in the elaborate judgment delivered by my brother PARKE, the same rule is laid down. It is there said that the mere taking up of a lost chattel is no appropriation of it; and no doubt a man may take up a lost chattel, and carry it home, with the proper object of endeavouring to find the owner; and then, afterwards, if he yields to the temptation of appropriating it to his own use, he is not guilty of felony. In R. v. Leigh (3) also the original taking was rightful; but here the original taking was wrongful. I am not desirous of calling in aid the technicality of a continuing trespass; and I think this case may be decided upon the ground either that there was no taking at all by the prisoner in the first instance, or a wrongful taking; and in either case, as soon as he appropriates the property, the evidence of felony is complete.

E PARKE, B.—I think that this case may be disposed of on a short ground. The original taking was not lawful, but a trespass, upon which an action in that form might have been founded; but it was not felony, because there was no intention to appropriate. There was, however, a continuing trespass up to the time of appropriation, and at that time, therefore, the felony was committed. Where goods are carried from one county to another they may be laid as taken in the second county; F and the difference between this and R. v. Leigh (3), as well as the others cited, is that the original taking was no trespass.

WILLIAMS, J., TALFOURD, J., and CROMPTON, J., concurred.

Conviction affirmed.

Shipping—Freight—Abandonment of ship—Voyage completed by substituted ship—Right of underwriters to benefit of freight earned by substituted ship.

The plaintiffs chartered their ship for a voyage to carry troops to Calcutta. By the terms of the charterparty a portion of the freight was payable only on the completion of the voyage. The vessel sailed, and when 700 miles beyond Mauritius took fire, and was compelled to make back for Mauritius, which she reached having sustained great damage. She was insured by a marine policy in the common form. On notice of the loss, the plaintiffs abandoned, and the abandonment was accepted. The captain freighted another ship in which the troops were taken to Calcutta, and freight was earned and received by the plaintiffs. In an action on the policy to determine whether the freight so earned passed to the defendant as underwriter,

Held: the substituted ship was not the ship of the underwriters; the captain, in hiring her, was acting solely for his employers, the former owners; and, therefore, the underwriters were not entitled to the benefit of the freight earned by the substituted ship.

Special Case stated for the opinion of the court in an action brought on a policy of marine insurance against the defendant for £100, as underwriter, the question being whether the benefit of the freight earned by a substituted ship, passed to the underwriters of a first ship insured and abandoned by the assured.

An agreement was entered into between the master of a ship called the Sarah Sands and the East India Co. to convey troops from Portsmouth to Calcutta at

A the rate of £40 for each soldier and passenger conveyed, and half that sum for children, one-third of the whole sum to be paid within fourteen days after the ship had finally sailed from Portsmouth, and the remaining two-thirds to be paid after the disembarkation of the troops at Calcutta. If the ship did not arrive at its destination within seventy days after sailing from Portsmouth (unless detained by the perils of the sea), the East India Co. were to be entitled to deduct £30 for each day between the seventieth day and the day of arrival. Before the agreement was made, Walton & Son, as agents for the shipowner, insured the vessel and machinery for £15,000, and the plaintiffs, the shipowners, effected the policy, on which the present action was brought. Walton & Son also effected two policies on the chartered freight to India. On Aug. 16, 1857, the ship took on board 14 officers and 355 men, with 5 women and 5 children, the military authorities refusing to send more on board, although the vessel was fitted to carry 504 passengers, and on that day the ship sailed. Walton & Son then rendered to the East India Co. two accounts, by which they claimed £6,733 6s. 8d., being one-third of the sum for 504 troops, and £980, being two-thirds payable on behalf of the officers; the company disputed the amounts and endorsed on the first £4,733 6s. 8d., deducting for 149 men short of the complement the ship ought to have carried; and after deducting £60 for six days' demurrage, they tendered the balance to the plaintiffs, the shipowners, which sum they accepted under protest.

On Nov. 11, when the vessel was about 700 miles to the N.W. of Mauritius, she took fire, and the captain, with the greatest difficulty and danger, succeeded in getting her back to Mauritius, where the troops were disembarked. It was found, on an attempt to repair the damage, that it would cost more money to do so than the ship was worth, and the captain drew up a notice of the abandonment of her, and forwarded it to the plaintiffs, who accepted it. On Feb. 17, 1858, the plaintiffs gave notice of abandonment to the underwriters who declined accepting it, but ultimately some of them, including the defendant, did accept it. The captain then chartered a ship called the Clarendon, and forwarded the troops on to Calcutta, paying for freight £6,197 8s. 4d., which sum was paid by the East India Co. to the owners of that vessel, and the amount deducted from the payments they had to make. After the troops had arrived in India the agents of the assured made a claim on freight, and after certain deductions the claim was paid and forwarded by a bill at four months. The question for the opinion of the court was whether the underwriters were entitled to any benefit of the freight earned by the substituted vessel.

Cur. adv. vult.

H May 11, 1859. BRAMWELL, B., delivered the judgment of the court.—The plaintiffs were the owners of a ship, the Sarah Sands, which they chartered for a voyage to carry troops to Calcutta. By the charterparty a portion of the freight was payable only on the completion of the voyage, so that the plaintiffs' right to it depended on that event. The vessel sailed, and, when 700 miles beyond Mauritius, took fire, and was compelled to desist from the completion of the voyage and make for Mauritius, which she reached, having sustained great damage. She was insured by a marine policy in the common form. On notice of the loss the I insured abandoned, and the abandonment was accepted; the captain freighted another ship; the troops were forwarded to Calcutta; the freight earned and received by the insured. This action is brought on the policy, and the question is whether the underwriters are entitled to the benefit of the freight so earned?

The case was very ably argued on both sides before us; the defendant claimed the benefit as a matter of principle as well as of authority. He said that a contract of insurance was one of indemnity; that the insurer was in the nature of a surety, and entitled to the benefit of all the security the insurance possessed. But, in truth, this argument tells against him. The common insurance on a ship is in no way concerned with the freight in course of being earned; it is an insurance on the absolute value, not on that of the vessel's adventitious advantages. If any question of the value of the ship arose, the insured could not include the freight as an item in the calculation, any more than he could in respect of winning a wager which he had made, that she would arrive at her port of destination. It is the goods, not the ship, which are increased in value by the arrival of the ship, or rather their arrival; and if they arrive the freight is earned. But the matter needs no argument. It is enough to refer to the practice of separate insurance on freight. If then the loss of freight is a part of the loss on the loss of the ship, consequently the insurer of the ship ought to have no benefit from the accruing of the freight unless he helps to earn it. This argument, therefore, fails.

Counsel for the defendant cited cases to show—and indeed it was admitted—that there are cases in which the underwriter on a ship does get a benefit from the freight earned. In all those cases, however, the freight was earned by the insured ship, and the underwriters had the benefit thereof, on the ground that, by the abandonment, the property in the insured ship vested in the underwriters from the time of the loss, and consequently it was their ship that earned the freight; and the principle which entitled the purchaser of a ship to freight which it earned after the purchase was applied, the underwriter being treated as such purchaser. Whether this is a just or equitable rule, whether that which prevails in America is not more fair, or whether even that might not be improved on, it is unnecessary to consider. The mercantile community may alter it by their contracts if they think fit; it exists, and is the law, but does not govern this case, being founded solely on the ownership by the underwriters of the abandoned ship.

With one exception, all the authorities give this as the reason, in terms which negative the claim made by the defendant in this case. It is needless to refer to them; but there is one expression of opinion the other way, to which every respect is due. In Stewart v. Greenock Marine Insurance Co. (1), LORD COTTENHAM said the case is the same as if the ship had ceased to exist as such on July 27, and the cargo had been brought home and delivered by other means. That inevitably assumes the case of freight earned; but the goods being carried on in a fresh ship after the loss of that insurance, the underwriters in the latter are entitled to the freight earned. It is to be observed, however, that that was not the matter to be determined, nor even that on which the speaker's mind was engaged. All LORD COTTENHAM was establishing was, that the loss was a loss during the voyage, as much as though it had occurred fifteen days before the vessel reached the docks. It seems to us, therefore, that the argument and authorities failed to establish the defendant's claim.

Not only that, but we think it can be shown on principle the claim is ill-founded. Where the insured ship finishes the voyage, it is the ship of the underwriter, and those who make use of it may not altogether unreasonably be held to do so for the benefit of its then owners; but where another ship finishes the voyage, it is not the underwriters', and there is no reason why those who hire it should be supposed to be acting for the benefit of the underwriter, but rather for their own employers, the former owners. Here the captain, when he hired the new vessel, was not the underwriters' captain, nor their agent, nor under the duty to them he was under to his former owners. Take the case put in the argument; suppose the plaintiff and the defendant had been at Mauritius, and each had claimed to bring the troops for his own benefit, who would have been entitled to do so? Undoubtedly the plaintiffs. Then take the other case, of there being a breach of duty to the charterers in not forwarding the troops, who would have been liable? The plaintiffs, not the defendant. Again, suppose the hire and cost of the new ship exceeded the freight earned, who would be liable for it? The plaintiffs, not the defendant. Or suppose the case of the owner of goods arriving at Mauritius, and insisting on the goods being there delivered to him, in which case he must pay the whole freight, surely the owners would be entitled to it.

On these grounds we are satisfied the captain, in such a case as the present,

A acts for the owner of the ship, and not for the underwriters, and that they are not entitled to any benefit from the freight acquired. The underwriters may, indeed, be entitled to advantages attached to the ship, but not to those arising from contracts, the fulfilment of which can be and is detached from the ship.

Judgment for plaintiffs.

Rule Nisi obtained by the plaintiff to set aside the verdict for the defendant on the second plea and enter judgment for him on that issue, in an action by the plaintiff, landlord, against the defendant, tenant, for recovery of rent. The defendant pleaded, by his second plea, that the house was in fact unfit for habitation and that there was an implied warranty as to fitness. H

The plaintiff claimed for one quarter's rent on an agreement, dated June 23, 1843, by which the defendant agreed to take an unfurnished house and garden for three years, and to pay a certain annual rent at the usual quarterly days of payment, and to preserve the house in good and tenantable repair, and to deliver it up in such good and tenantable repair at the expiration of the term of three years. I

The defendant pleaded, secondly, that the house was demised to him for the purpose of inhabiting in for and during the term, and that at the time of his entering in, and from thence onwards, the house was not in a reasonably fit and proper state for habitation or dwelling in, and the defendant could have no benefit therefrom on account of the house being infested, swarmed, and overrun with

A noxious, stinking, and nasty insects called "bugs," and that, in consequence of the house being so infested, the defendant, as soon as he discovered it, left the house, and gave notice to the plaintiff. It was submitted that the plea disclosed the fact that the house was let for the purpose of habitation, and that there was a condition or warranty implied at the time of letting, that the house was reasonably fit for the habitation of man.

B At the trial before ROLFE, B., the facts alleged in the second plea having been proved, the jury found a verdict for the defendant on that issue. The plaintiff subsequently obtained a rule nisi to set aside the verdict and enter judgment in his favour.

Watson and Humfrey for the defendant, showed cause against the rule.

C Addison for the plaintiff, supported the rule.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 17, 1844. PARKE, B., delivered the following judgment of the court.— This was a case very fully and ably argued on Feb. 10 upon showing cause against a rule for judgment non obstante veredicto. The declaration is not for use and occupation, but on an agreement in the nature of a lease. [His LORDSHIP read the declaration and the second plea.] The question is whether the plea contains substantially a good answer to the plaintiff's claim for a quarter's rent, becoming due after the defendant quitted.

On the part of the plaintiff, it was insisted that it did not, for several reasons; the principal one being, that where there is an actual demise of the unfurnished fabric of a specific messuage for a term, there is no contract implied by law on the part of the lessor, that the messuage was at the time of the demise, or should be at the commencement of the term, in a reasonably fit and proper state and condition for habitation (that is, so far as concerned the fabric), though it was demised and let for the purpose of immediate habitation. As we are all of opinion in favour of the plaintiff upon this objection, it is unnecessary to observe upon the others in detail; but it may not be useless to remark, that two of them are very important, and have not been satisfactorily answered; viz., that if such a contract is implied by law, it would be no defence, where the tenant has actually occupied; his remedy would be by a cross action; and to constitute a valid defence on the ground of the breach of this contract, the law must give also a right to abandon the lease upon the breach of it; that is, to make a defence, the law must imply, not merely a contract, but a condition that the lease should be void if the house was unfit for occupation.

The cases cited from BROOKE'S ABRIDGMENT, "Dette," 18 and 72, are decisive, that where the lessor is bound by the custom of London, or by covenant, to repair, and does not, the tenant cannot quit. The other objection, which we think right to notice, is, that in this case the house and some garden ground are both demised; and to make the plea good, it must be held, that, if a messuage be taken for habitation, and land for occupation, by the same lease, there is such an implied contract for the fitness of the house for habitation, as that its breach would authorise the tenant to give up both. Whether, if there were such a contract or condition implied by law, generally, it would be implied in this case, where the defendant agrees to preserve in tenantable condition, is a question on which it is quite unnecessary to enter.

I The point to be considered, then, is, whether the law implies any contract as to the condition of the property demised, where there is a lease of a certain ascertained subject, being real property, and that lease is made for a particular object. The question relates to a case of actual demise of a specific tenement, and we have not to inquire what the obligations of a party would be under an executory agreement, to procure a lease of some house for the habitation of another; nor whether the defendant would not be exonerated on the ground of fraud in the plaintiff, if the plaintiff knew of the defect in the house himself, and that the defendant would not have taken the house if he knew it; nor have we to consider whether the defendant would be responsible, if at the time of the demise there was no house at all—he may be, by reason of the implied contract for title to a house, not the land merely: which imports that the subject of the contract exists. The simple question is, What is the implied obligation on the part of the landlord to his tenant, under a lease of a house for years? A

Considering this case without reference to the modern authorities, which are said to be at variance, it is clear that from the word “demise,” in a lease under seal, the law implies a covenant, in a lease not under seal, a contract, for title to the estate merely, that is, for quiet enjoyment against the lessor and all that come in under him by title, and against others claiming by title paramount during the term, and the word “let,” or any equivalent words which constitute a lease, have, no doubt, the same effect, but not more: SHEPPARD'S TOUCHSTONE, pp. 165-167, and 272. There is no authority for saying that these words imply a contract for any particular state of the property at the time of the demise; and there are many, which clearly show that there is no implied contract that the property shall continue fit for the purpose for which it is demised, as the tenant can neither maintain an action, nor is he exonerated from the payment of rent, if the house demised is blown down, or destroyed by fire: Monk v. Cooper (1), Belfour v. Weston (2), and Pindar v. Ainsley and Rutter (3); or gained upon by the sea: Richards le Taverner's Case (4); or the occupation rendered impracticable by the king's enemies: Paradine v. Jane (5); or where a wharf demised was swept away by the Thames: Carter v. Cummins (6). In all these cases, the estate of the lessor continues, and that is all the lessor impliedly warrants. It appears, therefore, to us to be clear upon the old authorities, that there is no implied warranty on a lease of a house, or of land, that it is, or shall be, reasonably fit for habitation or cultivation. The implied contract relates only to the estate, not to the condition of the property. B

But the defendant's counsel rely upon some modern decisions in support of the positions which they are to maintain. It is not necessary to refer to the cases on the implied warranty of chattels, further than to say that the rule of the common law, which prevails in general (Co. Litt. 102 a), that there is no implied warranty on the sale of specific goods, has had exceptions engrafted upon it, where the goods are ordered from a manufacturer, or tradesman, who impliedly engages to use a proper degree of skill and care in constructing or supplying them. Such are Brown v. Edgington (7), Shepherd v. Pybus (8), and others. These have no bearing on the present case. F

But the defendant chiefly rests his case upon the decision of Smith v. Mar- rable (9). My judgment in that case certainly proceeded upon the authority of two previous decisions, which, though they contained a novel doctrine, had not been questioned in Westminster Hall, and had received, to a certain degree, the sanction of TINDAL, C.J., in a subsequent case. Those cases were Edwards v. Etherington (10), before LORD TENTERDEN, and afterwards the Court of King's Bench; Collins v. Barrow (11); and the last, that before TINDAL, C.J., Salisbury v. Marshall (12). I thought they established the doctrine, not merely that there was an implied contract on the part of the lessor, that the house demised should be habitable, but an implied condition, that the lease should be void if it were not, and the tenant chose to quit. From the full discussion which those cases have now undergone, on the present argument, and that in the recent case of Sutton v. Temple (13), I feel satisfied they cannot be supported, if the reports of them are correct; and we all concur in opinion that they are not law—an opinion strongly intimated in Sutton v. Temple (13), in which this court decided that there was no implied warranty of condition or fitness for a particular purpose on a lease of aftermath. G

We are under no necessity of deciding in the present case, whether that of Smith v. Marrable (9) be law or not. It is distinguishable from the present case on the ground on which it was put by LORD ABINGER, both on the argument of the case itself, but more fully in that of Sutton v. Temple (13); for it was the case of a demise of a ready-furnished house for a temporary residence at a watering-

A place. It was not a lease of real estate merely. That case certainly cannot be supported on the ground on which I rested my judgment.

B We are all of opinion, for these reasons, that there is no contract, still less a condition, implied by law on the demise of real property only, that it is fit for the purpose for which it is let. The principles of the common law do not warrant such a position; and though, in the case of a dwelling-house taken for habitation, there is no apparent injustice in inferring a contract of this nature, the same rule must apply to land taken for other purposes—for building upon, or for cultivation; and there would be no limit to the inconvenience which would ensue. It is much better to leave the parties in every case to protect their interests themselves, by proper stipulations, and if they really mean a lease to be void by reason of any unfitness in the subject for the purpose intended, they should express that meaning.

Landlord and Tenant—Lease—Surrender—Grant of new lease—Grant not valid execution of power.

F In 1775 a tenant in fee demised premises to the defendant's grandfather for ninety-nine years depending on certain lives. By his will he devised the premises to his son for life, with remainders over and a power to the tenant for life to grant leases. After the testator's death and during the term of the lease the son granted the lessee a new lease of the premises which was pur-
G ported to be granted in consideration of the surrendering up to the lessor by the lessee, at or before the delivery of the lease, of the lease of 1775, "which surrender is hereby made and accepted accordingly." The new lease was not a valid execution of the power, and one of the lives mentioned in the lease of 1775 was still existing.

H Held: the new lease did not pass an interest according to the contract, and therefore, the acceptance of it, even with the express words, did not effect an absolute surrender; accordingly, the surrender was inoperative and the lease of 1775 remained in force.

Rule Nisi obtained by the defendant to enter a nonsuit in an action of ejectment for messuages and land in Devonshire, tried by COLERIDGE, J., and a jury.

On September 29, 1775, the Earl of Egremont, being seised in fee of certain premises, demised them to the defendant's grandfather for ninety-nine years, determinable on the death of the grandfather and of one Betty Hill. By his will, executed in 1761, the Earl of Egremont, who died in 1763, devised the premises to his second son, Percy Charles Wyndham, and his assigns for life, remainder to his first and other sons respectively in tail male, remainder to the testator's other sons successively for life with remainder on each life estate to the first and other sons of the tenant for life successively in tail male. The will contained a power to each tenant for life to grant leases under certain restrictions. In 1785, Percy Charles Wyndham demised the premises to the defendant's grandfather for ninety-nine years from the expiration of the former term, if the defendant should so long live. In 1812, Percy Charles Wyndham demised the premises to the defendant for ninety-nine years after the expiration or determination of the term created in 1785, if two named children of the defendant, or either of them, should so long live. This last lease purported to be granted in consideration of the surrendering up to the lessor by the lessee, at or before the delivery of the lease, the lease of 1755 which was now determinable on the death of Betty Hill "which surrender is hereby made and accepted accordingly," and in consideration of £240. Percy Charles Wyndham died in 1833, and the plaintiff's lessor succeeded him as tenant in tail male under the will. The 1785 and 1812 leases were not valid execution of the power and in an action of ejectment, the lessor of the plaintiff contended that the 1755 lease, having been surrendered, was no bar to his claim, though it did not appear that one of the lives on which that lease had depended (Betty Hill) might not still exist (the defendant's grandfather died before the action was brought). At the trial COLERIDGE, J., directed a verdict for the plaintiff, but reserved leave to move for a nonsuit. A rule nisi was accordingly obtained by the defendant.

Crowder, Q.C., M. Smith and Phinn for the defendant, showed cause against the rule.

Serjeant Kinglake and Merivale for the plaintiff, supported the rule.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 26, 1848. COLERIDGE, J., delivered the following judgment of the court.—This case was tried before me at the Devon Assizes and, as it is admitted, the lease under which the defendant had supposed himself to be in possession could not be sustained with reference to the power under which alone it could have been valid, the verdict passed for the plaintiff. But two points were made on the trial, and on motion before us for a nonsuit, which are now to be considered. There were the

A counterparts of three leases produced, of the respective dates of 1755, 1785 and 1812; and the plaintiff's case was that the two latter were invalid, which was admitted, and that the last was granted in consideration of the surrender of the first, and operated as a surrender of it. This was necessary to his case, as one of the lives on which the lease of 1755 was granted was still in being, and that lease still in force unless so surrendered. But the defendant contended that the surrender

B having been made wholly in consideration of the grant of a new and valid lease, did not take effect because the new lease was invalid. Secondly, assuming that this point should be decided against him, he contended that he had become tenant from year to year, and that his tenancy had not been determined by any good notice to quit.

On the first point the counsel for the plaintiff contended that it had been already

C decided in their favour by this court, in Doe d. Earl of Egremont v. Forwood (3). It is remarkable that, in the judgment in that case, not a word is said on this point, and what is reported to have dropped from the judges in the course of the argument seems against the plaintiff; but as the judgment could not have passed for him unless the court thought that there had been a good surrender of a valid lease, it must be taken that they did so hold under the circumstances of that case.

D There the former lease was particularly described in the invalid one, which was said to be granted for the consideration of the surrender of such former one, adding "which is hereby surrendered accordingly"; and that the sum of £157 10s. was paid by the lessee to the lessor. This surrender was relied on by the counsel in that case as being an express surrender, and as taking it out of the principle of the decision in Roe d. Earl of Berkeley v. Archbishop of York (4), and bringing

E it within that of Farmer d. Earl v. Rogers (5). That case, however, turned on no distinction between an express and an implied surrender, but on whether the note in writing there relied on was a sufficient surrender to satisfy the Statute of Frauds. Nor is there anything in the judgment that was given in Doe d. Bishop of Rochester v. Bridges (6), a case also referred to, which points to the importance of the distinction. The surrender there of the valid lease was by a deed poll executed

F a few days before the valid lease; and the consideration of such surrender was not stated to be the granting of a new lease; and, what is more important, the new lease, as the judgment remarks (1 B. & Ad. at p. 860) was in terms precisely conformable to the intent mentioned in the deed poll:

"The surrenderor obtained exactly the lease for which he bargained, and, therefore, it cannot be said that the new lease was a fraud or deception upon him; and if the surrender be deemed conditional [that is, on the granting G a new lease as stipulated for], the condition has been complied with."

It was said on behalf of the defendant in the present case that the surrender in Doe d. Earl of Egremont v. Forwood (3) was taken to be express, and that in the present case it was only implied; that in that case it was found that, on the execution of

H the second, the first was, in fact, delivered up to the lessor, but that, in the present case, no such delivering up was proved. This difference, in fact, was relied on to distinguish the two cases, but it is not made out satisfactorily. In Doe d. Earl of Egremont v. Forwood (3), the ground for calling the surrender express was the introduction of the words "which is hereby surrendered accordingly"; in the present case were the words "which surrender is hereby made," which are equivalent

I words. On the words "hereby surrendered accordingly," in Doe d. Earl of Egremont v. Forwood (3), PATESON, J., is reported to have said (3 Q.B. at p. 639): "that is, on the supposition of a new lease being granted," referring to the consideration immediately before expressed. As to the delivery up of the old lease, the fact was not shown either way on the trial in the present case, nor was any point made of that on either side. But this fact can only be evidence of the intention, which was not needed in this case, but would not be in itself a surrender. In Roe d. Earl of Berkeley v. Archbishop of York (4), the fact existed together with cancellation, and yet the surrender was not held to be complete.

But then it was said that the whole doctrine which vacated the surrender of a prior lease, whether express or implied, where the consideration is a grant of a new lease, applied only to the case where such new lease was void, and not where it was merely voidable; that here, in fact, the second lease was not void, it was good as against the grantor, and might have been confirmed by each succeeding tenant for life to its expiry by the efflux of time. We have had occasion to consider this doctrine in another case of the same sort, and to examine the decisions at some length, and we need not now repeat that examination, contenting ourselves with saying the principal to be found laid down by LORD MANSFIELD in Wilson v. Sewell (1) (4 Burr. at p. 1980) and Davison d. Bromley v. Stanley (2) (4 Burr. at p. 2213) seems to us the true one; that, when a new lease does not pass an interest according to the contract, the acceptance of it will not operate as a surrender of the former lease; that, in the case of a surrender implied by law from the acceptance of a new lease, the condition ought also to be understood as implied by law, making void the surrender in case the new lease should be made void; and that in case the express surrender is so expressed as to show the intention of the parties to make the surrender only in consideration of the grant, the sound construction of such an instrument, in order to effectuate the intention of the parties, would make the surrender also conditional, to be void in case the grant should be void: see Doe d. Biddulph v. Poole (7). Tried by this principle, we are, on consideration, satisfied that the lease of 1755 was not a surrender, and that it was a good answer to the action. Our decision on this point makes it unnecessary to consider the validity of the notice to quit, and the rule for entering a nonsuit will be absolute.

Rule absolute.

Tenant in Common—Claim against co-tenant—Share of rent—Money had and received—Action for account.

A tenant in common brought an action for money had and received against his co-tenant in respect of his share of the rent of the joint property which had been received by that co-tenant.

Held: a tenant in common could not bring an action for money had and received against his co-tenant; the remedy of the plaintiff lay in an action for an account.

Rule Nisi obtained by the defendant to enter a nonsuit in an action of assumpsit for money had and received.

- At the trial, before ROLFE, B., at the Hertfordshire Summer Assizes, 1849, it appeared that the plaintiff and one Benjamin Thomas, the defendant's late husband, were entitled under the will of one Alice Thomas to certain premises as tenants in common which were let to a tenant from year to year, but that Benjamin Thomas, on the death of the testatrix, believing he was entitled to the whole of the premises, entered into sole possession, and for some time previously to his death in February, 1848, received the whole rent until the plaintiff, discovering that he was entitled to half the rent, brought the present action to recover five years' rent.
- E For the defendant it was contended that the plaintiff ought to be nonsuited on the ground that this form of action would not lie by one tenant in common against his co-tenant. ROLFE, B., refused to nonsuit and gave judgment for the plaintiff leave being reserved to the defendant to move to enter a nonsuit. The defendant obtained a rule accordingly.

- F Whately, Q.C., and Cook for the plaintiff, showed cause against the rule.
Keating, Q.C., for the defendant, supported the rule.

Cur. adv. vult.

- Feb. 15, 1850. PARKE, B., delivered the following judgment of the court.—The question reserved for the consideration of the court is whether an action for money had and received will belie one co-tenant in common against another. On the argument the authorities on this subject on both sides were cited; but, it appears to us clear, on consideration of the authorities which are to be found in Co. Litt. 200, b, that at common law one tenant in common cannot have an action for money had and received against the other; for in the passage in Co. Litt. are to be found the several cases in which one tenant in common may maintain an action against another, in which it was said, that if there be two tenants in common of a chattel, one cannot maintain an action against the other for the value, but must seek only to recover it from the other, unless the chattel be destroyed, and other proceedings of the same kind are put; and that no action of account will lie at common law, unless the plaintiff who brings it has constituted the other a bailiff or receiver of the money. That was obviated by the Administration of Justice Act, 1705, s. 27 [repealed by Law of Property (Amendment) Act, 1924] which gives
- I power to one tenant in common to bring an action of account against the other, considering him as his bailiff or receiver. In an action of account by one tenant in common of a chattel, or in a case where he would not be absolutely responsible for the money received, the defendant would be able to show that the money had been lost without his default; whereas, in an action for money had and received, he would be liable to an action for the money. The Act of 1705, therefore, does not give anything more in an action of account than that the receiver would be entitled to all allowances. Not so in an action for money had and received.

It appears to us clear, therefore, that the action will not lie: Martin v. Crompe

(1) and Midgley v. Lovelace (2), where it is said that one tenant in common in reversion may sever in an action, if the other recover a moiety of the sum due; that is, if the rent be £20 and the other recover £10 he can only recover his moiety of the rent. The case of one tenant in common receiving the whole rent, is analogous to the case of one tenant in common taking the whole of a chattel into his possession. The law is clear on the point that an action of trespass or trover would lie in such case, and by analogy no action for money had and received would lie, but the only remedy is an action of account. Therefore, the rule must be made absolute.

Rule absolute.

SIMPSON v. LESTER

[VICE-CHANCELLOR'S COURT (Kindersley, V.-C.), December 10, 1858]

[Reported 33 L.T.O.S. 6; 4 Jur.N.S. 1269]

Will—Apportionment—Exclusion of rule in Howe v. Earl of Dartmouth—Application leading to result contrary to intention of testator.

A testator by his will gave successive interests in his residuary estate and directed his trustees "to sell all or any part of my last-mentioned real and personal estate at their discretion . . ." At his death he possessed large mining interests, and in an action for the administration of his estate it was claimed on behalf of an infant remainderman that the mining property should be valued at the expiration of one year from the death of the testator, that interest on the value at 4 per cent. per annum should be paid to the tenants for life, and the remainder of the annual income invested for the benefit of those interested in remainder, according to the rule in Howe v. Earl of Dartmouth.

Held: where there was sufficient indication in a will that the operation of the rule in Howe v. Earl of Dartmouth would lead to a result contrary to the intention of the testator the rule would not be applied; in the present case the will showed such an indication; and, therefore, the trustees were not bound to convert immediately.

A "I give, devise, and bequeath to my brother-in-law William Lester, my dear wife Hutton Simpson, my said clerk Joseph Brown, and my nephew William Carruthers of Lancaster, all other my real and personal estates whatsoever and wheresoever, including my mining property and shares in mines and minerals (subject, nevertheless, to the annuity and legacy hereinbefore bequeathed), in trust for my dear wife during her natural life, so long as she continues my widow, and after her decease or second marriage, in trust as to two-thirds of the annual income for my son James during his life, and after his decease in trust for his issue in tail general; and the remaining one-third to accumulate during the life of my said son for his younger children. And in default of issue of my said son, the whole to be in trust for my nephews and nieces absolutely in equal shares as tenants in common. And I hereby authorise and empower my said trustees to sell all or any part of my last-mentioned real and personal estate, at their discretion, and to invest the moneys arising therefrom in mortgage of real estates and railway shares or debentures."

D The testator died on June 16, 1855, possessed of mining property of large annual value, and of other property; and a suit was instituted for the administration of his estate. In that suit a claim was made on behalf of his infant son, that the mining property should be valued at the expiration of one year from the death of the testator, that interest on the value at the rate of £4 per cent. should be paid to the tenants for life, and the remainder of the annual proceeds invested for the benefit of those in remainder.

E Glasse, Q.C., and H. Humphreys for the plaintiff, an infant, interested in remainder in the testator's estate.

Baily and Martindale for the tenant for life.

F KINDERSLEY, V.-C.—This is a very strong case for saying that the rule in Howe v. Earl of Dartmouth (1) is not to be followed in the present instance. The rule is purely artificial, and proceeds upon the footing that where the testator gives the residue of his estate to A. for life and after his death to another person, it is assumed he must mean that the identical corpus which is to be enjoyed by the tenant for life shall go untouched and undiminished to those in remainder. It is purely an artificial rule, and is often calculated to defeat what the testator would have wished; and slight circumstances will be sufficient to show that the rule is not to be put in force.

G H I The rule in Howe v. Earl of Dartmouth (1) is that where the court thinks that the testator meant the same identical corpus to be enjoyed by several persons in succession, he must have meant that intention to be effectuated, and if it could not be effectuated by other means, by an immediate sale and conversion. But here, so far from wishing an immediate sale, the testator says the trustees are themselves to exercise a discretion as to when the property is to be sold, or whether it is to be sold at all. That is inconsistent with the idea that there is to be a peremptory direction for a sale that the trustees cannot depart from, which was the case in Howe v. Earl of Dartmouth (1). Then we have this state of things: the testator has first given a specific part of his property to one person; then a certain part of his real property to his son; and then he says [His Honour read the will as above stated]. I think that I have much more in this case to prevent the conversion than there was in many of the other cases cited. I declare that the trustees are not bound to convert immediately.

BODENHAM v. HOSKINS

[VICE-CHANCELLOR'S COURT (Kindersley, V.-C.), June 9, 10, 1852]

Bank—Duty of bank—Duty to honour customer's cheques—Inquiry as to purpose and operation of account—Notice that account opened by customer as agent—Money drawn for customer's private purposes.

As between banker and customer the banker looks only to the customer in respect of the account opened in that customer's name. Whatever cheques the customer chooses to draw the banker must honour. He is not to inquire for what purpose the customer opened the account; he is not to inquire what the moneys are that are paid into that account; and he is not to inquire for what purpose moneys are drawn out of the account. But it is otherwise if the banker has notice that an account was opened by a customer as an agent for another person whose money is paid into the account, and that the customer is drawing on that account for his own private purposes.

Three accounts were opened by a customer with his bankers, one of which was called the "R. estate account." To the knowledge of the bankers this account was opened by the customer as the agent of the owner and as receiver of the rents of the estate. The bankers allowed the customer to draw cheques on the agency account to liquidate a balance due from the customer to the bankers on his own account. In an action by the owner of the estate to recover from the bankers the amount of those cheques, Held: the bankers were liable to make good to the owner of the estate the sum allowed by them to be drawn from the "R. estate account" and placed to the credit of the customer's private account.

Notes. The decision in this case was affirmed by the Court of Appeal in Chancery (LORD CRANWORTH and KNIGHT-BRUCE, L.JJ.), 2 De G.M. & G. 903, without reasons being given.

B Bill filed by the owner of an estate called the Rotherwas estate, in the county of Hereford, against the defendants, bankers at Hereford, to charge them with a sum of £829 11s. 9d. improperly allowed by them to be drawn out of their hands by the receiver of that estate appointed by the plaintiff.

Stuart and W. Wright for the defendants.

C KINDERSLEY, V.-C. The doubt that has from time to time crossed my mind in this case was chiefly whether the facts were stated in the pleadings with that degree of particularity as that I could say there had been a full opportunity for the defendants to meet those allegations of fact by the evidence which they might be able to adduce. Now that I have become more acquainted with what is contained in the pleadings, I feel myself in a condition, without waiting to look through the pleadings more in detail, to express my opinion in this case.

D I will first consider the case as between the plaintiff and Parkes—that is, what was the state of things as between the plaintiff and Parkes in the course of these transactions?—and then consider what was the relation of the defendants, the bankers, towards Parkes in the matter, and how far the plaintiff, upon that state of things, is entitled to the decree which he asks against the defendants. As between the plaintiff and Parkes, the matter seems to have stood thus. The plaintiff was the owner of the Rotherwas estate and considerable property in the neighbourhood of Hereford, and it seems that he had employed as his solicitor and agent and receiver a gentleman of the name of Blount. Mr. Blount being about to give up his employment, sold his business, or transferred it to Mr. Parkes, who had been previously a solicitor in London. It was arranged between Parkes and Blount that for six months Parkes should use the name of Blount, and, accordingly, E an account was opened by Parkes, with the concurrence of Blount, with these bankers, in the joint names of Blount and Parkes. It was intended that that should not continue longer than six months. When that account ceased—in short, when Parkes was to use his own name exclusively in the matter—or shortly after that period, he was employed by the plaintiff as his solicitor, succeeding Blount in that employment. Shortly after that period again (all within the period of a very few G months or even weeks), Parkes was employed by the plaintiff as his receiver and agent in respect of the Rotherwas estate, apparently in the same manner as Blount had been employed before. Parkes, on the putting an end to the joint account in the names of Blount and Parkes with the bankers, opened a private account of his own on June 23, 1846. When he came to be appointed the receiver of the rents and profits of the Rotherwas estate by the plaintiff, he very properly opened another H account with the bankers for the purpose of placing to the credit of that account with the bankers the sums which he might receive in respect of the rents and profits of the Rotherwas estate, and drawing from the account the sums which he might have to pay on account of the Rotherwas estate or to his employer, the plaintiff. As between the plaintiff and Parkes, that account, although unquestionably it was the account of Parkes and the bankers were to look to Parkes as the I only person entitled to draw upon the account, was opened by Parkes for the purpose of keeping in that form an account of the receipts and payments by Parkes as receiver in respect of the Rotherwas estate, Parkes very properly entitled the account as the “Rotherwas estate account,” which distinctly marked it, at all events as between him and the plaintiff, as being the account of the Rotherwas estate. How far it marked it as between Parkes and the bankers, I shall have occasion to refer to presently. With a third account, called the “general account,” which Parkes opened, the plaintiff had nothing to do.

Whatever balance might from time to time be standing to the credit of the

Rotherwas account, it is quite clear that, as between the plaintiff and Parkes, A Parkes would violate his duty if he applied any part of that balance to any purpose of his own—if, for example, he had drawn out that money and applied it to any purpose of his own, the bankers knowing nothing of the matter, still, as between Parkes and the plaintiff, it would be a gross breach of that duty which Parkes owed to the plaintiff, not to apply the moneys which should arise from the Rotherwas estate to any other purposes than the purposes of the plaintiff. B
 When, therefore, Parkes drew a cheque on July 9, 1847, for £829 and a fraction, which was then the balance standing to the credit of the Rotherwas account, in order that the amount of that cheque might go towards the liquidation of the separate account of his own on which he was debtor, without at present saying how far the bankers were affected by that, as between Parkes and the plaintiff it was a breach of trust committed by Parkes as against the plaintiff. C
 It was a fraud, in fact, committed upon the plaintiff—a misappropriation by Parkes of that which was money belonging to the plaintiff for purposes of Parkes. That, I conceive, is beyond all question the condition of things, and, whether or not the bankers have made themselves liable, as far as Parkes is concerned, there was a great breach of duty. As the agent or receiver of Mr. Bodenham, the plaintiff, he clearly was in one sense a trustee for him—there was a fiduciary character created D between the plaintiff and Parkes. I do not know that it is very material whether what occurred be technically called a breach of trust on the part of Parkes, but at all events it was a breach of duty which Parkes owed to the plaintiff, standing towards him in a fiduciary character in respect of the moneys which, as receiver of the Rotherwas estate, he received in respect of the rents and profits.

I approach the question as to how far the bankers (the defendants) were in any E way participators in this misconduct of Parkes. Participators in the act they were, but it does not follow because they were so, they were participators in the fraud of Mr. Parkes. Let us see, therefore, what was the position of the bankers in the matter. I entirely agree with many of the observations that have been made by counsel for the defendants, that as between banker and customer, in a naked case of banker and customer, the banker looks only to the customer in respect of the F account opened in that customer's name. Whatever cheques that customer chooses to draw the banker is to honour. He is not to inquire for what purpose the customer opened the account; he is not to inquire what the moneys are that are paid into the account; and he is not to inquire for what purpose moneys are drawn out of the account. That is the plain general rule as between banker and customer.
 Let us see whether that naked state of circumstances existed in the present case. G
 The first transaction or circumstance that appears important to notice first in point of date appears to be the interview which, on June 10, 1846, took place between Parkes and Mr. Hamp (one of the partners), and Spozzi, a clerk or cashier of the bankers. It appears that at this time there was a considerable balance, I think somewhere about £1,200, to the credit of the joint account which I have mentioned had been opened in the names of Blount and Parkes, but the six months during H which Parkes was to keep that account open, that is, to use the name of Blount, were nearly expired, and Parkes represented to the bankers, that is, represented to Mr. Hamp and Mr. Spozzi, the cashier on that occasion, that he would have occasion to draw largely for purposes of his own, and wished to know whether they would honour his cheques, that is to say, allow him to overdraw the account which he had with them. One can easily conceive there would be some hesitation in I acceding to that proposal, and Mr. Hamp very fairly, I think, said: "Well, if we are to do this for you, you ought to be doing something for us, we should expect some sort of return of obligation," and, whether suggested originally by the bankers, or offered by Parkes, this at least took place. Parkes told the bankers that he would introduce to them the Rotherwas account.

Referring to the statement in the evidence of Parkes upon this part of the case,
 I find that he represents it thus. After stating what I have already adverted to, which is not precisely material to the present case, the particulars of that account

A opened in the names of Blount and Parkes, he states this that when that joint account was closed the balance standing to the credit of that account was transferred to the credit of his own account which he himself opened, and which I should observe was not opened until some days after this interview. It was on June 26, 1846, that the private account was opened, and the interview I have adverted to was on the 10th, just before the opening of the private account. He speaks of the B separate account, and then goes on thus :

“The book produced and shown to me at this, the time of my examination, marked with the letters A.B., is the passbook, wherein such private or office account was kept by the said defendants, the bankers. Before the said joint account was closed, and on or about June 10, 1846, while there was a balance to the credit of the said joint account of £1,337 or thereabouts, I had an interview at the defendants’ banking-house, with the defendant Francis Hamp and Mr. Spozzi, the cashier of the bank, touching certain pecuniary engagements to persons in London which I was about to be called upon to meet. The six months during which I was entitled to use the name of the said Charles Blount had then nearly elapsed, and it was consequently in contemplation to close the said joint account, and open a separate account. The object of that interview was to obtain leave from the defendants, the bankers, to overdraw my account, from time to time, as might be necessary, to the extent of about £1,500 for the purpose chiefly of making certain payments in London, and also temporarily the expenses of my business in Hereford. On my making the application in question, the said Francis Hamp, in the presence of Mr. Spozzi, said that he and Nathaniel Morgan, ‘the two partners, would assent to it, and that they would communicate with the said K. Hoskins, who would no doubt also concur in it.’ [Those are the three partners of the bank.] In the course of the interview, the said Francis Hamp said to me : ‘I understand from Mr. Spozzi, that you intend to introduce the Rotherwas account; you ought to do something for us if we help you.’ ”

F I confess it does not appear to me that the use of the word “introduce” there, which occurs more than once, is important. It is evidently not the splitting of a pre-existing account into two, for the mere convenience of the individual keeping the account; it was a holding out to the bankers, or a conception on the part of the bankers, that there was held out to show the introduction to them, that is, the opening with them, of some account which would be for their benefit. Whether the benefit that they were to derive from that was the benefit merely of having an additional customer, an additional account on which there would be generally some balance, or whether they contemplated something beyond that, namely, that when allowing Parkes to overdraw his account they might appropriate the balance which might be to the credit of the Rotherwas account to protect themselves against loss, this, at all events appears to me to be clear in this transaction, that the question of the opening of the Rotherwas account was mooted as the introduction to them of H some account which was to be for the benefit of the bankers. Parkes goes on to say :

“I said that I did intend to introduce that account when I became the plaintiff’s receiver, and the said Francis Hamp then asked me two or three questions as to the rental of the Rotherwas estate, and the balance that would probably be kept on the account. I told him that the rental was about £6,000 a year, and the balance I would keep as large as I could—that it would probably average about £1,000. He then said that he was satisfied. The arrangement then entered into between the said Francis Hamp, on behalf of the defendants, the bankers, and myself, was undoubtedly that I should be allowed to overdraw my separate account when the same was opened, if I would introduce to the bank the account of the rents of the Rotherwas estate, so soon as under my arrangements with Charles Blount I became the receiver thereof. I did certainly promise the said Francis Hamp, or lead him to understand, that on my becoming such receiver I would open the last-mentioned account at the banking-house of the defendants."

There was no evidence given on the subject of this interview in any way contradicting this. The bankers knew this was a receivership account in respect of the rents and profits.

On Oct. 26, 1846, when the Rotherwas account was actually opened, another person intervened, who is examined as a witness, for the precise act of opening the account was not by Parkes himself going to the bankers, but by his sending Mr. Ward, his clerk. Mr. Ward states :

"I was directed by Mr. Parkes, in the month of October, 1846, to open an account with the house of Messrs. Hoskins & Co. of Hereford, bankers, which was then composed of Kedgwin Hoskins, Nathaniel Morgan, Francis Hamp (since deceased), and Joseph Morgan for him, Mr. Parkes, in the name of the Rotherwas estate account. I accordingly attended at the bank of Messrs. Hoskins & Co. in Hereford, on Oct. 26, 1846, opened the account, and paid to the credit of it the sum of £700. I stated to Mr. Spozzi, by Mr. Parkes's directions, that the account was to be opened under the title of the 'Rotherwas Estate Account,' that the cheques which he (Parkes) would draw upon it would be so endorsed as the money which would be paid into the account belonged to Mr. Bodenham [the plaintiff], and that he (Parkes) wished it to be kept separate from the other account which he had with the bank. The sum of £700, which I paid in to the credit of the account consisted of rents arising from the Rotherwas estate, which had been received by Mr. Parkes and belonged to the plaintiff, and was, to the best of my recollection, chiefly composed of country bank notes. Mr. Parkes had, at that time, another account with the bank, entitled 'Office Account,' which related to his business as a solicitor; and in the ensuing month of December he opened a third account."

Whatever doubt might exist on Parkes's evidence, here is Mr. Ward's evidence, showing that when the account was opened at the moment when the very first sum was paid in to the credit of that account, the bankers were distinctly informed of the reason why it was to be kept as a separate account, why the cheques were to be entitled with the words "the Rotherwas account," namely, because the moneys which had been paid in to that account belonged to Mr. Bodenham, the plaintiff. It appears to me beyond all question, therefore, that from the very commencement of that account the bankers knew that the moneys paid in to it were the moneys of Mr. Bodenham arising from the rents and profits of his Rotherwas estate, and that the account was kept by Parkes, not as an account of his own in relation to his own moneys, but in his character of receiver to Mr. Bodenham's Rotherwas estate.

Whether the bankers in their own minds, or even in their own books, if the fact had been so, treated the Rotherwas account as if it had been the private account of Mr. Parkes—whether they did so or not, the question is whether they had a right to do so—whether they had a right to say, knowing from the outset that the money placed to that account was Mr. Bodenham's money, and that any balance standing to the credit of that account at any time was Mr. Bodenham's balance, that they would make such an arrangement with Mr. Parkes that at any time they should be at liberty to appropriate the balance to the credit of that account towards the liquidation of the balance standing to the debit of the private account of Mr. Parkes. It appears to me that on every principle of equity they had no right to do so. It appears to me that it is not a question whether simply at the time when the cheque was drawn for the £829 on the estate account they had a right then to allow that cheque to be placed to the credit of the other account, the private account of Parkes, but whether they had a right ever to make an arrangement with Parkes to that effect, if the arrangement was made, or intended to be made, whether they had a right to say that the receiver should so deal with them as to make his principal's money at any time liable to be appropriated to discharge the private

A debt of the receiver to the bankers. I am quite satisfied that upon all principles of equity that could never be done. I do not think there is to be imputed to these gentlemen any design to do that which in their minds was dishonest or improper. I believe they had no such intention. All I think that I can impute to them is that they were not aware that according to the principles—the moral principles of a court of equity, and acted upon daily by a court of equity—a person who deals with another person who he knows to have in his hands, or under his control, moneys belonging to a third person, cannot deal with the individual holding those moneys for his own private benefit when the effect of that transaction is that that person commits a fraud on a third person. That Parkes was committing a fraud in appropriating to his own purposes the money of his employer, is beyond question. The bankers did not seem to be aware that they had no right, and that Parkes had no right, to enter into any arrangement the effect of which was to make the money (although Parkes was the only person who could draw on that particular account) liable for any deficiency that might exist upon the private account of Parkes.

I do not know that in the view which I take of this case, it is necessary to consider whether the bankers from time to time, in the course of the transactions, considered what were the circumstances. Some witnesses laboured very much to repeat that Bodenham, the plaintiff, never told them that these were his moneys; that he never told them that this was his account; that he never claimed to have any control over the account, and so on, but that is not the question. Again, it appears to me immaterial to consider whether the bankers treated the three accounts as the accounts of one single customer. It appears to me to be immaterial what view the bankers took between the time when the Rotherwas account was opened and July 9, 1847, when the balance of that account was transferred to the credit of Parkes's private account, because I find at the very opening of the account, nay, some months, three months at least, before the opening of that account, the bankers were well aware that that account was the account of Mr. Parkes, as receiver of the Rotherwas estate, that the moneys which were to be paid in to the credit of the account were the moneys of Mr. Bodenham, and that it was for these very reasons that that account was to be kept as a separate account, and so headed. I am constrained to arrive at the conclusion that the bankers, although I must exonerate them from any deliberate intention to commit a fraud, were not only parties to the simple fact of the transfer, but were parties to the fraud in question in this sense—that they were aware of the circumstances which made it a fraud in Parkes to make the transfer to his private account, and, being cognisant of that throughout, they concur in a transaction the effect of which was that for their own pecuniary benefit an act was done by Parkes which is a fraud upon the plaintiff. According to the plain principles of a court of equity such an act never can be sustained; a person cannot retain the benefit which he has derived from being a party to such an act, with such knowledge of the nature of the act.

I am, therefore, under the necessity of decreeing the repayment of the £829 11s. 9d. by the defendants, the bankers, to the plaintiff. With respect to the question of interest, it appears to me that I cannot give any higher interest than the interest which the bankers allowed upon the account. If there had been no interest allowed, it does not appear to me that I could give any interest at all, but considering that this was transferring to the detriment of Mr. Bodenham from an account which was yielding interest, a sum of money which, if it had still stood there, would be bearing interest, I think it ought to be with interest at the same rate at which the interest was allowed by the bankers.

Decree accordingly.

THOMPSON v. WHITMORE

[VICE-CHANCELLOR'S COURT (Page-Wood, V.-C.), November 16, 17, 19, 1860]

[Reported 1 John. & H. 268; 3 L.T. 845; 9 W.R. 297; 70 E.R. 748]

Mistake—Document—Rectification—Marriage settlement—Trusts not expressing intention of parties—Need to show mutual mistake of husband and wife.

A deed of marriage settlement will only be rectified on the ground of mistake where such mistake has been mutual on the part of both husband and wife. Proof of an intention on the part of only one party different from the trusts as declared in the settlement is not sufficient.

Mistake—Rectification—Right of volunteer under settlement to have error rectified.

A volunteer under a settlement declaring the trusts of property placed in the hands of trustees is entitled to file a bill stating that the trusts had erroneously declared the intention of the parties, and, on making out his case, to have the error rectified, even though the effect of the error would be to carry back the fund to the original settlor.

Action for the rectification of a marriage settlement dated April 23, 1838, alleging that the intention of the parties that the trusts thereby declared to take effect "in case there shall be no child of the [marriage] or being such, he or she or they shall all die under the age of twenty-one and unmarried in the lifetime of the [wife]" should take effect whether such deaths under twenty-one and unmarried should take place in her lifetime or not and the words restricting such trusts to the event of all such deaths happening in her lifetime were introduced into the settlement by mistake and contrary to the intention of the parties.

By deed dated April 23, 1838, a settlement in consideration of marriage was made between, the intended husband William H. Bainbrigg; the intended wife Maria M. Thompson, and three trustees; whereby securities etc., were settled on the wife for life and if the husband survived in trust to pay him an annuity of £100; and subject thereto and to the power of appointment thereafter contained in favour of the husband, in trust for all such children of the marriage as should attain twenty-one or marry; with power to the wife, if there should be any children of the marriage living at her death, to appoint to the husband the whole or part of the trust fund for such part of his life as there should be children of the marriage in being; and also a power of appointment by the wife in case she should survive the husband in favour of children by a future husband.

A "But in case there shall be no child of the marriage or being such, he, she, or they shall all die under the age of twenty-one and unmarried in the lifetime of the wife"

B then if the husband should die in her lifetime on trust for the wife absolutely; but if the husband should survive the wife then subject to the aforementioned interest of the husband, the trustees to stand possessed of £4,000 in trust for the wife's brother, William Knight Thompson, if he should be living at the death of the wife, but if he should be dead, in trust for his children as thereinmentioned and as to the residue of the trust fund in trust for such persons as the wife should appoint and in default of appointment in trust for her next-of-kin as if she had died intestate and unmarried.

C The wife died on Jan. 29, 1844, without having exercised her power of appointment among children, survived by her husband, three children and her brother, William Knight Thompson. By her will dated Jan. 12, 1844, she appointed the trust fund in case any children died under twenty-one and unmarried to her husband whom she appointed her sole executor. There were four children of the marriage all of whom died under twenty-one and unmarried, one in the lifetime of the wife and three subsequently up to Aug. 5, 1854.

D William Knight Thompson died on June 16, 1847, and the plaintiffs who filed the bill for rectification of the settlement were his executors and in the events which happened they also claimed the £4,000; this sum was also claimed by the assignee in the bankruptcy of the husband as personal estate of the wife as passing to him as administrator.

F PAGE-WOOD, V.-C.—The most important point raised in this case is the question, which was argued with much force, whether a volunteer has any right to have a settlement rectified by putting the trusts into the shape in which they were intended to be declared. I apprehend that it is clear, that, if a trust is declared, and the property placed in the hands of trustees, it is competent for a volunteer to file a bill, stating that the trusts had been erroneously declared contrary to the intention of the parties, and, on making out his case, to have the error rectified, even though the error should be of such a nature as to carry the property back to the original settlor. To this extent, I think the argument is sound.

G Counsel for the husband contended, that, where an instrument has been executed by two parties, partly for their own benefit, but also containing provisions in favour of volunteers, and where both the contracting parties are content with the instrument as it stands, and maintain that there is no error in it, in such a case it is not competent for a volunteer to insist that there is an error in the instrument, and to come to this court to have it rectified. There is a fallacy in this argument, as applied to the present case, because the two parties to the agreement are not here in any other sense than that the husband happens to represent the wife's estate. If it should turn out that there really was an error in the settlement, I am of opinion that it would not be a sufficient answer for the husband to say, that he, as representing both his original interest and that of his late wife, is satisfied that the instrument contains no error at all.

H It is for the plaintiffs to prove the existence of the mistake which they allege to have been committed; but if they can clearly make out such a case, I do not think that the circumstance of the husband having become the representative of his wife's estate, is sufficient to disentitle the plaintiffs to relief, although I am not aware of any case where a person in the position of the present plaintiffs has filed a bill to rectify a settlement. I think, therefore, that I am bound, notwithstanding ing the plaintiffs represent a volunteer, to enter into the merits, and consider the evidence adduced as to the intention with which the settlement was framed. A

The real question is whether any material mistake is proved on the part both of the husband and the wife. On the wife's side, I think it clear that there was error, though I have some doubt as to the extent of it. Mr. Lace, the solicitor, jotted down certain notes of the verbal instructions which he received for the preparation of the settlement. The memorandum is so brief as to be scarcely intelligible, except to persons very conversant with such matters; and the only way in which it could be used in evidence, was for the purpose of assisting Mr. Lace's memory as to what passed on the occasion, as was done with similar documents in Duke of Bedford v. Marquess of Abercorn (1). The memorandum is to this effect: B

"To wife for separate use, then £100 per annum to Mr. B. for life—subject to—for the children by deed or will—in default equally—Proviso half to children of intended marriage," C which is worked out no doubt correctly in the actual settlement, so as to mean that, in the event of a second marriage, the power should cover all the children, but so that one-half, at least, of the property should go to the children of the then intended marriage. Then it goes on D

"If no children—then £4,000 to W.K.T.—if living, if not, to his children, if any. If none, then as to the £4,000 and residue for such persons as Miss T. by deed or will shall appoint—in default for next-of-kin." E

This, again, when it came to be expounded in the hands of a conveyancer, would naturally be worked out in the ordinary form of limitations to the children to be absolute on sons attaining twenty-one, or daughters attaining twenty-one or being married; but, in this settlement, the vesting is at twenty-one or marriage, both as to sons and daughters. So the note, "if none," though it would, prima facie, point to an entire absence of issue, would suggest to a conveyancer the event of no children becoming capable of taking a vested interest under the trusts of the settlement. F

The settlement does give the £4,000 to W. H. Bainbrigge

"in case there shall be no child of the said Martha Maria Thompson, by her said intended husband, or, being such, he, she, or they shall all die under the age of twenty-one years and unmarried in the lifetime of the said Martha Maria Thompson." G

The alteration insisted on is, to strike out the clause "in the lifetime of the said Martha Maria Thompson." But that would not make the gift of the £4,000 coincident with the failure of previous limitations, because the power of appointment is not limited to children attaining twenty-one or marrying, and would be very likely to be exercised to some extent in favour of sons under age. The effect of adopting this alteration would be, in the event of all the children dying under twenty-one, to give Mr. Thompson the £4,000 absolutely, and to leave the residue of the fund to fall under the absolute power of appointment of Mrs. Bainbrigge. H It was suggested that, to prevent an appointment from being defeated by the gift over to Mr. Thompson, the wife might have made an appointment directing out of what part of the trust funds the appointed sum should be taken. It is possible that that might have been done, but, independently of that, the settlement would not be consistent with the proper form of limitation over, "in default of a child living to take a vested interest," which would meet every contingency. I

Being satisfied, therefore, that there was a mistake on the part of the wife, though I cannot see exactly in what way it ought to be rectified, I have now to examine, whether the plaintiffs can say that the husband also married on the faith of the settlement being framed in a form different from that which it actually bears. That cannot be asserted on the evidence before me. Where a settlement contains a variety of provisions, and there is a desire to avoid all delay in the treaty, it may very well happen that some of the clauses are passed over without attention, so

A as to leave the husband unable to say that he had made up his mind as to every particular; but it does not follow that, on all these points, the matter was left absolutely to the lady's discretion, so that a mistake on her side alone would be conclusive on a question of rectification. This would amount to saying, that, whenever the wife's advisers make any mistake, and the husband is unable to say that he would have acted differently if the mistake had been pointed out, there, there

B is a mutual mistake. That cannot possibly be so. The husband's advisers received the settlement in the form in which it stands, and, until the alleged error was brought to their notice, they were not called upon to form any judgment upon the point.

I do not think the husband is bound, in order to sustain the settlement, to say, that, if the error had been pointed out and proposed to be corrected, he would have

C refused his assent to the settlement, or, to say more than he does say, that he took the settlement as it was, and that no new bargain ought now to be forced upon him. The single fact of there being no discussion on a particular point, will not justify the court in saying that a mistake committed on one side must be taken to be mutual. But here, there was discussion on this very point, the husband's advisers objecting to this part of the settlement in toto. A clause, providing absolutely for collaterals in default of children, is most unusual, and was naturally

D protested against. The husband's advisers objected that the clause, as it stood, was too favourable to the brother, and now the contention is, that it was intended to be in a still more favourable shape.

How can I infer, that, if it had been put in such a form, it would have been acquiesced in? It is possible, that the husband might have submitted to this, as he

E did to the actual clause; but I am asked to assume that that must have been the result. The agreement, as it stands, was all that the husband was called upon to consider. The absence of the evidence of Mr. Moss, the husband's solicitor, was rightly commented on. But it is not clear that he observed the alleged mistake. Even supposing the error to have been noticed, the husband's advisers might perhaps say, "You offered a very objectionable settlement; we took as it stood,

F though we protested against it, and it was not for us to correct any error into which you may have fallen." I do not impute any such disingenuousness; but, even if the fact had been so, it would have been very far short of establishing the right of the brother to an additional chance of obtaining the £4,000, the gift of which, in any shape, was protested against by the husband. The more reasonable supposition is, that the form of the clause was not very much considered. There

G was discussion as to the objectionable character of the clause altogether, but none, so far as appears, as to the exact contingencies on which it was to take effect.

No case has gone nearly to the extent to which I am asked to go, in inferring, from such circumstances, the existence of mutual mistake; and there is this additional element of weakness in the case, that the alteration suggested at the Bar would not make the settlement hang consistently together, nor is it easy to say

H what correction would do so. I cannot say that the intention on the wife's side was so clear, that the husband could only have accepted the settlement in the sense which the plaintiffs now insist upon. They have failed to fix upon the husband any notice, that, in the events which have happened, the £4,000 was to go to the brother, and the case is, therefore, not brought up to the point at which the court is justified in interfering. The bill must be dismissed, but, as the parties

I have acted for some time on the plaintiff's view, it must be without costs.

Order accordingly.

BRETTEL AND OTHERS v. WILLIAMS AND OTHERS

[COURT OF EXCHEQUER (Parke, Alderson, Rolfe and Platt, BB.), June 20, December 4, 1849]

Partnership—Authority of one partner to bind firm—Act not in ordinary course of partnership business, but reasonable towards effecting partnership purposes—Guarantee given by one partner without authority of other partners.

The defendants, who were in partnership as railway contractors under the name of W., A. & Co., contracted with a railway company to do certain works. W., A. & Co., entered into a sub-contract with U. & R. to do part of the work, and as U. & R., to perform that work, required coals to make bricks, A., without the knowledge or assent of his co-partners, signed in the name of the firm, and delivered to the plaintiffs, a guarantee, not addressed to any person, for the payment for coals to be supplied to U. & R. The plaintiffs having pointed out the omission, a clerk of W., A. & Co. by the direction of A. wrote to the plaintiffs, stating that the guarantee was intended for them. The clerk, also, without the knowledge of the other partners, wrote to the plaintiffs certain letters amounting to evidence of an account stated in respect of the amount due on the guarantee.

Held: (i) the guarantee and subsequent letter together constituted a sufficient memorandum in writing within the Statute of Frauds, 1677; (ii) a partner communicated to another partner or other partners, simply by the creation of the relation of partnership and as incident thereto, all the authority necessary to carry on their partnership in its ordinary course and all such authority as was usually exercised by partners in the same sort of trade, but a partner could not bind another by contracts outside the apparent scope of the partnership business merely because they were reasonable acts towards effecting the partnership business, and, therefore, there being no evidence to show the usage of the defendants in this particular business, or of others in a similar business, or of sanction of the acts of one partner by the others, the firm was not bound by the guarantee.

Cross-Rules Nisi obtained in an action of assumpsit on a guarantee for the payment to the plaintiffs of the price of coals to be supplied by them to a firm named Unit & Roberts. There was also a count for money due on an account stated.

B The defendant Aykroyd suffered judgment by default. The defendants Williams and Price, except as to a small sum which they paid into court on the last count, pleaded that they did not promise, and other pleas not material.

At the trial before PLATT, B., at the Worcester Spring Assizes, 1849, it appeared that the defendants, who were in partnership as railway contractors, under the name of Williams, Aykroyd & Co., had contracted with a railway company to do certain works. Unit & Roberts had made a sub-contract with them to do part of the works, and required coals to make bricks for that purpose. As they were not able to procure coals from the plaintiffs on their own credit, Aykroyd signed the following guarantee in the name of the firm :

"Campden, August 16, 1847.

D "Gentlemen—The bearers, Messrs. Unit & Roberts, have a large contract from us for brickmaking, and will require a large quantity of coals. We have no doubt of their stability, and will consider ourselves bound to see their coal bills paid. We are, gentlemen, yours respectfully,

"WILLIAMS, AYKROYD & Co."

E This document not being addressed to anyone, the plaintiffs, on its being presented to them by Unit & Roberts wrote to Williams, Aykroyd & Co., pointing out the omission, and requesting that it might be stated that the guarantee was meant for them. On Aug. 25 one Hamlet, the clerk of the firm, by the direction of Aykroyd wrote to the plaintiffs as follows :

F "The promise to see Messrs. Unit & Roberts' coal bills paid was intended for you. We are, gentlemen, your obedient servants,

"Per pro, WILLIAMS, AYKROYD & Co., E. HAMLET."

G On the faith of the above guarantee coals were then supplied by the plaintiffs to Unit & Roberts. Other letters were written to the plaintiffs by Hamlet, on behalf of the firm, which, it was contended, contained evidence of an account stated respecting what was due on the coal account under the guarantee. It was not proved, however, that the defendants Williams & Price authorised the clerk to write those letters, or that they sanctioned or knew of the guarantee.

H It was objected, on behalf of the defendants, that the plaintiffs could not recover on the guarantee : first, because it was not addressed to them; and, secondly, because it was given by Aykroyd only, who, it was contended, had no power to bind the other partners by entering into a guarantee in the name of the firm. The plaintiffs relied on the letters of the clerk as evidence of an account stated, the defendants contending that they were not admissible. The learned judge received them subject to the objection, and directed a verdict for the plaintiffs on the first count, and for the defendants on the other count, reserving leave to move on both the above points. The defendants subsequently obtained a rule nisi to enter a verdict for them on the first count, and the plaintiffs also obtained a rule nisi to enter a verdict for them on the last count.

By s. 4 of the Statute of Frauds (1677), so far as is material :

"... no action shall be brought ... whereby to charge the defendant upon any special promise to answer for the debt default or miscarriages of another person ... unless the agreement upon which such action is brought or some memorandum or note thereof shall be in writing and signed by the party to be charged therewith or some other person thereunto by him lawfully authorised."

Phipson for the plaintiffs.

Keating for the defendants.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 4, 1849. PARKE, B., delivered the following judgment of the court.—This case was tried before PLATT, B., at the Spring Assizes at Worcester. It was an action on a guarantee alleged to have been given in the partnership name, by the defendants guaranteeing to the plaintiffs the payment for all such coals as they should supply to certain persons carrying on business under the firm of Unit & Roberts. There was also a count on an account stated.

It appeared on the trial, that the defendants were in partnership together, and had entered into a contract with a railway company to do certain works. Messrs. Unit & Roberts had made a sub-contract with them to do part of the works, and required clay and coals to make bricks for that purpose. Not being able to procure credit for coals, one of the partners gave a guarantee in the name of the partnership firm, not addressed to anyone in particular, stating that the bearers, Messrs. Unit & Roberts, had a contract for bricks, and required a large quantity of coals, engaging to see those coals paid for. The plaintiffs received the guarantee, and supplied coals on the faith of it, for the amount of which this action was brought.

It was objected on the trial, that the plaintiffs could not recover on the guarantee: first, because it was not addressed to them, nor their names mentioned in it; and secondly, because the guarantee, being given by one partner, did not bind the others, not being within the scope of the authority communicated by one partner in a railway contract to another. The first of these objections was obviated by the production of a letter from the defendants, who subscribed the guarantee to the plaintiffs, stating that the guarantee was meant to be given to them. Upon that proof, the letter and the guarantee together constituted a note in writing having all the parties, and sufficient to satisfy the Statute of Frauds, and to bind the defendant who actually signed it. Whether the other defendants were also bound, was a question deserving much consideration, and was reserved by PLATT, B. It was also insisted that there was evidence on the account stated; and that point also was reserved, a verdict being directed for the plaintiffs on the first, and for the defendants on the last count, reserving both points. Counsel for the defendants moved to enter a verdict for the defendants on the special count, counsel for the plaintiffs to enter a verdict for the plaintiffs on the account stated, and cross-rules were granted, which were argued at the Sittings after last Trinity Term.

Upon the first question it was contended by counsel for the plaintiffs, that this guarantee bound all the partners, because the supply of bricks by Messrs. Unit & Roberts was material to enable them to carry on the partnership contract with the company; and that the supply of coals by the plaintiffs to Messrs. Unit & Roberts was equally material, as this was the only mode of procuring those bricks; and that, though one partner could not bind another by a guarantee for collateral purposes, he had that power where the guarantee was connected with the partnership business, and a reasonable mode of giving effect to a transaction within the scope of the partnership dealings; and he relied on Ex parte Gardom (1).

That one of two partners engaged in business as merchants had not, by reason of that connection alone, power to bind the other by a guarantee apparently unconnected with the partnership trade, was decided by LORD ELLENBOROUGH in Duncan v. Lowndes and Bateman (2), and the Court of Queen's Bench gave a similar decision in Hasleham v. Young (3), where the defendants were in partnership as attornies. No proof was given in either of these cases of the previous course of dealing or practice of the partners, which, it is admitted in both cases, might be sufficient to prove a mutual authority; nor was any evidence given of the usage of similar partnerships to give such guarantees; nor was there any of a recognition and adoption by the other partners, which would have the same effect. Sandilands v. Marsh (4) proceeded on the latter ground. In the present case, no evidence was given to show the usage of the defendants in this particular business,

A or of others in a similar business; nor was there any evidence of the sanction by the other defendants of the act of their co-partner; for a witness, who was called to prove the latter fact, would not, on cross-examination, swear that he was authorised by them to write a letter, which, if proved to have been so written, would have been sufficient. Simply as railway contractors, they could not have any such power.

B The only question then is, whether they had it in this particular case, in consequence of its being a reasonable mode of carrying into effect an acknowledged partnership contract. We think that the contention of counsel for the plaintiffs cannot be maintained. One partner does communicate to the other, simply by the creation of that relation, and as incident thereto, all the authority necessary to carry on their partnership in its ordinary course: see Hawtayne v. Bourne (5); and all such

C authority as is usually exercised by partners in the same sort of trade, but no more. To allow one partner to bind another by contracts out of the apparent scope of the partnership dealings, because they were reasonable acts towards effecting the partnership purposes, would be attended with great danger. Could one of the defendants in this case have bound the others by a contract to lease or buy lands, or a coal mine, though it might be a reasonable mode of effecting a legitimate object

D of the partnership business? Our opinion is, that one partner cannot bind the others in such a case, simply by virtue of the partnership relation. In Ex parte Gardom (1) this point was not fully discussed, but given up by SIR SAMUEL ROMILLY, who had two other objections to the guarantee, on which he could rely, and on one of which he succeeded. Besides, we are not sufficiently informed by the report, whether there might not have been some peculiar circumstances in the case which

E caused the abandonment of that point. We do not think that is an authority sufficient to establish the doctrine now contended for.

We think, therefore, that the defendants' rule to enter a verdict on the first count must be made absolute. The rule on the part of the plaintiffs to enter a verdict for them on the account stated cannot be supported, because there was no evidence of an admission by the defendants, who did not sign the guarantee. That

F rule must be discharged.

Orders accordingly.

BULLOCK AND OTHERS v. DOWNES AND OTHERS

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Campbell, L.C., Lord Brougham, Lord Cranworth, Lord Wensleydale and Lord Kingsdown), June 7, 8, July 24, 1860]

[Reported 9 H.L.Cas. 1; 3 L.T. 194; 11 E.R. 627]

Will—Gift to next-of-kin—Gift to testator's son for life, then to testator's next-of-kin—Time when next-of-kin to be ascertained—Right of son's personal representatives to share of capital—Right of next-of-kin to take as tenants in common—Long delay in claiming share due to mistake of law.

A testator gave the residue of his estate in trust for his son R. for life and after R.'s death to R.'s children, and in case there should be no children of R., then to "such persons of the blood or next-of-kin as would by virtue of the Statute of Distributions have become and been entitled thereto in case I had died intestate." R. died without issue. For some twenty-four years after R.'s death the family assumed that R.'s personal representatives were not entitled to a share of the capital of the estate, and the income of the estate had been distributed after R.'s death on this footing, but the trustees retained a considerable part of the testator's property. On a claim by the executors of R. to a share of the testator's estate.

Held: (i) the next-of-kin of the testator were to be ascertained at his death, so that R. was included among them; (ii) (LORD WENSLEYDALE dissenting) the next-of-kin took as tenants in common, not as joint tenants; and (iii) the claim was not barred by laches or acquiescence or under the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833.

Appeal by the defendants, the trustees of the will of the testator, the Rev. Andrew Downes, from a decision of SIR JOHN ROMILLY, M.R., holding that the plaintiffs, as executors of Robert Downes, were entitled to a share of the testator's residue, and that such claim was not barred by lapse of time.

The late Rev. Andrew Downes left a will, dated in 1815, by which he gave a legacy of £20,000 to his widow Elizabeth Downes; also portions to his unmarried daughters, and the residue was given to trustees to pay a life-annuity of £100 to each of his other unmarried daughters, so long as they continued unmarried, and other annuities, and the interest, after payment of the annuities, was to be paid to the testator's son Robert Downes, during his life, and after his decease to the widow of his said son, an annuity not exceeding £600 during her widowhood, as his said son should appoint; and after other trusts of the residue, the testator added :

"And in case there shall not be any child or children of my said son Robert Downes who under the trusts aforesaid should obtain a vested interest in the said trust-moneys, stocks, funds and securities, then do and shall stand and be possessed of and interested in the said trust-moneys, stocks, funds and securities, and the interest, dividends and annual produce thereof (but subject to the several annuities hereinbefore mentioned), in trust for and to pay, assign and transfer the same moneys, stocks, funds and securities unto such person or persons of the blood or next-of-kin of me the said Andrew Downes as would by virtue of the Statutes of Distribution of Intestates' Effects have become and been then entitled thereto in case I had died intestate."

The testator died in 1820, and the will was duly proved. The trustees paid the residue of the interest and dividends to Robert Downes up to 1832, when he died. In 1821 Robert Downes had married, and in exercise of the power appointed his widow to an annuity of £600 during her life; and he left no issue at his death. The family of the testator were advised by their solicitor, that Robert Downes had no interest whatever under the ultimate contingent trust in the testator's will as to his residuary estate, and accordingly the testator's widow advanced about £7,500 to the said Robert Downes, and she made a voluntary settlement on the same understanding. After his death, the executors of the father went on upon the same assumption as before, and paid the dividends of the residuary property to and among the four daughters, and transferred to them and their children some parts of the capital.

In 1856 the executors of Robert Downes filed a bill for the administration of the testator's estate, and, as representing one of the five children of the testator, claimed a fifth part of the ultimate residue of the estate. The trustees claimed the benefit of the Statute of Limitations, and relied on the acquiescence of the plaintiffs. Four points were raised, viz. : first, whether Robert Downes was entitled to a share in the residue; secondly, whether the right of Robert Downes' representatives had been barred by the Statute of Limitations; thirdly, whether independently of the Statute of Limitations they were barred by laches or acquiescence; and fourthly, whether the ultimate trust of the residue created a joint tenancy in the persons beneficially interested.

By the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833, s. 40 :

"No action or suit or other proceeding shall be brought to recover any sum of money secured by any mortgage, judgment or lien or otherwise charged upon

A or payable out of any land or rent at law or in equity or any legacy but within twenty years next after a present right to receive the same shall have accrued to some person capable of giving a discharge for or release of the same unless in the meantime some part of the principal money or some interest thereon shall have been paid or some acknowledgment of the right thereto shall have been given in writing signed by the person by whom the same shall be payable or

B his agent to the person entitled thereto or his agent; and in such case no such action or suit or proceeding shall be brought but within twenty years after such payment or acknowledgment, or the last of such payments or acknowledgments, if more than one, was given."

Follett, Q.C., Sir Hugh Cairns, Q.C., and H. W. Busk for the appellants.

Roundell Palmer, Q.C., and Selwyn, Q.C., for the respondents.

C LORD CAMPBELL, L.C.—Considering the staleness of the respondents' demand in this case, and the disturbance that it gives to a course of dealing which had proceeded bona fide in the testator's family for so many years after his death, I confess that it would have been agreeable to me to discover any ground on which, according to the rules of law, the claim could have been resisted. But after the

D elaborate arguments which we have heard on both sides, and a reference to the numerous authorities relied upon, I am bound to say that, in my opinion, the decree of the Master of the Rolls must be affirmed.

It seems to me quite clear that upon the just construction of this will the personal representatives of the testator's son were, in the events which happened, entitled to a share of the personal property in question; the son, having been one of the blood, or next-of-kin of the testator, who at the testator's death would, by

E virtue of the Statute of Distributions, have been entitled thereto in case the testator had died intestate. Generally speaking, where there is a bequest to one for life, and after his decease to the testator's next-of-kin, the next-of-kin who are to take are the persons who answer that description at the death of the testator, and not those who answer that description at the death of the

F first taker. Gifts to a class following a bequest of the same property for life vest immediately upon the death of the testator. Nor does it make any difference that the person to whom such previous life interest was given is also a member of the class to take on his death.

There is here a bequest to the testator's son, Robert, for life, and afterwards to his children, and in case of his having no children, unto such person and persons of blood or next-of-kin of the testator as would, by virtue of the Statute of Distributions, have become and been then entitled thereto in case he had died intestate.

G Robert, the son, was one of the class who, as next-of-kin of the testator, would have been entitled at the testator's death to his personalty had he died intestate; and the son having died without having had any children, his personal representatives, prima facie, are entailed to an equal share with his four surviving sisters, the other individuals of the class. There may be, as in Wharton v. Barker (1), before PAGE-WOOD, V.-C., a clear indication in the will that notwithstanding the use of such expressions, the time for ascertaining the class is the time fixed by the will as the period of distribution. But in the will now to be construed nothing appears to indicate an intention in the testator contrary to the general rule; and on the contrary the second "then" in this limitation, seems expressly to refer to

H the time of the testator's death as the period when the class was to be ascertained. I, therefore, consider it quite unnecessary again to go over the long string of authorities on this subject, and to try to reconcile them, or to point out any that must be considered erratic.

The only feasible argument against the right of the representatives of the son to a share in the personalty, appeared to me to be that the next-of-kin might be considered to have taken as joint tenants, and that the joint tenancy was not determined in his lifetime. I was immediately struck by the objection, that if this could be rested on any rule of law, it could not have been according to the intention of the testator; for, although he might not actually have thought of his son's representatives taking any share on the son dying without children, he could not have meant that if one of his daughters should die leaving children in the lifetime of the son her children should not take a share. But we were told that upon the authorities this rigid rule of law was established. However, on reference to the authorities it will be found that in every case in which there has been a gift to persons entitled under the Statute of Distributions, the statute has been held to regulate the interest taken as well as the parties to take; and that upon the death of individuals of the class who were so entitled, representation has been always admitted. These authorities, I have reason to believe will be fully examined and commented upon by a noble and learned friend, whose view of this question your Lordships will have the very high advantage of hearing, and, therefore, I abstain from any further reference to them. The interest being determined by the interest given to the next-of-kin as upon an intestacy, it is clearly not a joint tenancy; nor indeed is it, strictly speaking, a tenancy in common. It is enough to say, that in case of the death of one of the class, representation is admitted.

To the next objection, founded on the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833, the first answer attempted, was that this statute is confined to real estate, and does not apply to a pecuniary legacy not charged upon land. But I am of opinion that s. 40 would be a bar if this were a suit for a legacy. Limiting the time for actions or suits to recover any sum of money secured by mortgage, judgment or lien, or otherwise charged upon or payable out of any land or rent at "law or in equity," it adds, "or any legacy," i.e., any action or suit to recover any legacy whatsoever, whether or not it be charged upon or payable out of any land or rent at law or in equity. A better and a conclusive answer to the objection is, that this is neither action nor suit to recover a legacy. The appellants are trustees, in whom the personal property of the testator was vested on certain trusts. A considerable part of that property still remains in their hands undisposed of; for this they are still accountable to the cestui que trust; and the present is a suit calling on them to account for a share alleged to be due to the respondents as representatives of one of the next-of-kin of the testator. It can hardly be contended that there being a continuing duty to distribute the property among the next-of-kin, and the trustees having from time to time paid the interest to the daughters of the testator or their representatives, they were at liberty at the expiration of 20 years from the death of the son, to claim a right to his share as their own property.

By the only remaining objection I was at first much struck, and I thought it might possibly be substantiated by showing, that from the course of dealing which had so long prevailed in the family, founded upon the supposition that the class to take on the son dying without children was to be ascertained at his death, not at the death of the testator, and that the daughters were entitled to divide the whole to the exclusion of the representatives of the son, a family agreement might be presumed to that effect, which cannot now be disturbed. Had a doubt really existed as to the construction of the will in the lifetime of the son, and had it been agreed among all the members of the family that the son should be considered as having no interest in the property on his death without children, and in consideration of this the mother had made over to him large sums of money which she would otherwise have bestowed upon her daughters, I do not think that after the death of the mother the representatives of the son would have been permitted to set aside the agreement on the ground that it proceeded on a mistake of law as to the proper construction of the will. The son having been lucrated by the mistake, and the allowance to the daughters having been diminished by it, his representatives could not fairly claim from the trustees the son's fifth share of the property, although he might have been one of the five next-of-kin entitled to it.

But according to the evidence the question was not considered doubtful. Although fraud is not imputed, it appears that the husband of one of the sisters, a solicitor, and the solicitor for the family, asserted as clear law, that the son would have no title to a share as one of the next-of-kin. There was no consideration for

- A the son renouncing his right. The chief part of the mother's advances to him was made while he was quite a young man, likely to have children, and although the correspondence by letter between the mother and son, when he was moribund, showed that they reciprocally took an erroneous view of his rights, he then gained no advantage which could prevent his representatives, at any subsequent time, from claiming a share to which, on a proper construction of the will, they were entitled.
- B For these reasons, my Lords, I must advise your Lordships that the appeal be dismissed with costs.

LORD BROUGHAM.—I take entirely the same view of this case with my noble and learned friend, after having at one period of the discussion had very considerable doubt upon the point of joint tenancy; but upon examining the case itself, and

C upon examining former cases, I have come to the unhesitating opinion that that doubt has no foundation. The rule is, that where a testator gives a direction for a class of persons to take according to the Statute of Distributions, that is to be regarded not merely as a direction to point out or discover the persons who are to take, but as affecting the interests so to be taken.

- D The cases are almost innumerable. My noble and learned friend has referred to a very able statement of those cases which we have had the benefit of having access to, which has been prepared by my noble and learned friend opposite, who will presently state them more fully to your Lordships. I rely upon Jacobs v. Jacobs (2) and Lewis v. Morris (3), as laying down clearly this principle. There was some doubt expressed upon the point in Godkin v. Murphy (4) by KNIGHT-BRUCE, V.-C. There was no decision there, but he indicated a strong inclination
- E of opinion; but in the subsequent case of Martin v. Glover (5), and also in Bird v. Luckie (6), he certainly came to an opposite conclusion. I, therefore, consider that the cases taken altogether are all one way upon this point, namely, that where under a will property is to go to the persons entitled under the Statute of Distributions, and there is no indication of an intention to exclude the effect of the Statute of Distributions as to interest as well as persons, that Statute must be
- F applied to determine the interest as well as the persons. I hesitate to say that I feel no doubt that they did take the inheritance as tenants in common, but it is sufficient to say that they did not take in joint tenancy.

I, therefore, think with my noble and learned friends that this appeal ought to be dismissed.

- G LORD CRANWORTH.—Upon the main question raised in this cause, namely, the question whether, on the death of Robert Downes in 1832, the residuary personal estate of the testator became divisible in fifths or in fourths, we should, I believe, have been fully prepared to give our judgment at the close of the argument. All of your Lordships then present were satisfied that the decision of the Master of the Rolls was in strict conformity with the law as now understood. Where a
- H testator, having by his will, made contingent dispositions of his estate or of any part of it to take effect after the termination of particular interests for life, has proceeded to direct that if the contingencies do not arise, on which those dispositions are to take effect, then the property shall go to his next-of-kin according to the statute, the courts have in modern times held that prima facie his language is to be taken to refer to those who are his next-of-kin at his death, not to those who
- I may happen to answer that description at the determination of the preceding particular interests.

This rule of construction in general prevails even though the person or persons taking as next-of-kin, or some or one of them, may have been the person or persons entitled to the particular interest. It is true that there are authorities which have held that in such cases the property is to go to those who were next-of-kin at the termination of the preceding interests; and it is impossible to say that the language of a will may not be such as to show that persons answering the description of next-of-kin according to the statute at some time other than that of the testator's death, may have been those intended to take. But as a general rule, the death of the testator is the time to which the testator must be held to refer. Whether the circumstances which have induced the courts to put on the will a construction different from that which the general rule would have prescribed, have in all cases been sufficient to warrant the decisions, is a matter on which I do not think it necessary to speculate. It is sufficient to say that I agree with the Master of the Rolls in the conclusion at which he arrived in this case, namely, that there is nothing in this will to warrant a deviation from the general rule. Neither the circumstance that the son was himself one of the next-of-kin, nor the use of the words "then entitled," as describing the person to take in the event which happened of the son dying without issue, is sufficient to affect the construction.

The son was one of the persons of the blood of the testator who would, by virtue of his Statute of Distributions, have become entitled to his personal estate if he had died intestate; and, even assuming that the word "then," as connected with the word "entitled," is to be read as an adverb of time, still the time indicated is not the time of the death of the testator, but the time when the persons would come into the enjoyment of that which is bequeathed to them. The legatees to take on the son dying without issue are not the persons who would have been entitled if the testator had then died, but those who would then be entitled if the testator, when he died, had died intestate.

On two other questions discussed at the Bar none of your Lordships, I believe had, at the close of the argument, any doubt. I allude to the defences set up, grounded, first, on the Statute of Limitations, and, secondly, on the long acquiescence of all parties interested. The Statute of Limitations can have no operation in a case like the present, where the residuary estate has been set apart, and appropriated on the trusts of the will, whatever those trusts may be; as between trustee and cestui que trust, the statute does not apply. The defence resting on the ground of lapse of time and long acquiescence obviously fails. There has been no acquiescence after the parties interested were apprised of their rights; and there is nothing to satisfy me, if that be material, that any of the parties have, under a mistaken notion of their rights, made dispositions of their property which they would not have made if their rights had been correctly understood.

On all these grounds your Lordships were, as I believe, prepared at the close of the argument, to express your concurrence in the decree of the Master of the Rolls. But a point was raised in the course of the discussion here, not it seems argued before the Master of the Rolls; at all events not adverted to by him in his judgment. It was contended that, assuming it to be true that the son, as well as the four daughters, were entitled to claim, as coming under the description of one of the next-of-kin of the testator, entitled, according to the Statute of Distributions, still his representatives could have no claim, as he and his sisters must be deemed to have taken as joint tenants; and so by his death, the whole interest survived to his sisters. On this point I have felt considerable doubt. The language of the will merely indicates, by a general description, the persons who are to take the residue. They are to be the persons who, being of the blood of the testator, would have been entitled to his personal estate by virtue of the Statute of Distributions. This would exclude the widow, and would embrace only his son and four daughters, and therefore it was said the will must be read as if the direction had been that the trustees should hold the residuary moneys, stocks, funds and securities in trust for the son and four daughters, which undoubtedly would have made them joint tenants.

When the testator died, it was certain who the persons were who would take in the event of the son dying without issue; and it was contended that the will might, therefore, be read as if, instead of describing those persons by the description of next-of-kin, according to the statute, the testator had described them all by name, in which case they would have taken as joint tenants. I am far from saying that interpreting the testator's language with strict grammatical accuracy the construc-

A tion contended for might not be correct. But an examination of the authorities has satisfied me that we cannot act on such a construction without overruling a number of decisions, which have given to words similar to those now before us, an interpretation different from that contended for by the appellants. The authorities seem to establish, that where there is a bequest to the persons who would have been entitled under the Statute of Distributions, those persons are to take as they would have taken if there had been an intestacy.

B In Mattison v. Tanfield (7), there was a devise of real estates in trust for the person or persons who at my decease shall be next-of-kin of R.D., according to the statute. It was held that the persons entitled took unequal shares per stirpes, and not per capita. The question of joint tenancy did not arise in that case, as the devisees were expressly made tenants in common; but the circumstance that they took in unequal shares per stirpes, shows conclusively that the words used did more than merely indicate who were the persons to take. In Martin v. Glover (5), under a bequest to the persons who would have been entitled under the Statute of Distributions, the widow and only child were held to take in the proportions pointed out by the statute, a construction necessarily excluding joint tenancy. In Jenkins v. Gower (8), under a similar bequest, where the testator left a widow and a sister, but no issue, the widow and sister were held to take equally as tenants in common. The same principle was acted on in the subsequent cases of Jacobs v. Jacobs (2), Horn v. Coleman (9), Lewis v. Morris (3). I am aware that in Richardson v. Richardson (10), SHADWELL, V.-C., in construing a similar bequest, held that the widow and four children of the testator took as joint tenants, but this is the only case in which such a construction has prevailed, for Godkin v. Murphy (4) might have been decided on other considerations, and the very learned judge, whose decision it was, has more than once intimated distrust of its correctness.

E Considering, then, how probable it is that many estates have been administered on the faith that the law has been correctly understood in the numerous cases to which I have referred, and considering further, that the rule of construction there acted on is one which recommends itself to the common sense of mankind, as probably carrying into effect the real intention of the testator, I think your Lordships ought not to depart from it merely because, according to the strict grammatical interpretation of the words, they do no more than point out who are the persons intended to be legatees, without indicating the quantum or quantity of the interest they are to take.

F I will only add, that I do not think the case is altered merely because the persons to take are not all the next-of-kin according to the statute, but all excluding (as in this case) the widow. The principle must be the same whether all are to be benefited, or only some. The question is whether the statute is to be looked to as the guide in interpreting the language used, and as showing not merely who are to take, but how, and in what proportions they are to take. If it is, I see no difference whether all the persons entitled under the statute are indicated, or only a part of them.

H On these grounds I advise your Lordships to dismiss this appeal with costs.

I LORD WENSLEYDALE.—Three questions arise in this case; the first, as to the construction of the clause in the will of the Rev. Andrew Downes; the second, whether the appellants' claim was barred by the Statute of Limitations; third, whether the laches of the appellants in lying by for so many years afford any answer. I think it unnecessary to enter into the second and third questions; I agree in the opinion so clearly expressed by the Master of the Rolls upon that part of the case.

The only question remaining is as to the construction of the clause in the will, which gives the property over in the event of there not being a child or children of Robert Downes, who should obtain a vested interest under the prior trust in the property devised. On the part of the appellants it was contended, first, that the true construction was, that on the event occurring, the persons to whom the property was to be given, were those who would have been next-of-kin of the testator if he had then died intestate; secondly, that the clause only designating the persons who were to take by description, and not stating what interest they should take, the true construction was, that it should be read as if all those persons who filled that character were introduced by name into the will; and so read, that they must all take the entire interest, and there being no words of distribution, they must all take as joint tenants. I agree in opinion with my noble and learned friends on the first of these propositions. On the second I am not satisfied, so as to be able to concur with them. A B

For the proper construction of this devise we must apply the established rules. The question is strictly not what the testator meant, but what is the meaning of the words; for the use of the expression "the intention of the testator," is apt to lead the mind to speculate as to what the testator meant to do, instead of inquiring what he has done. Further, the words used must be read in their ordinary and grammatical sense, unless that construction would lead to some obvious absurdity or inconsistency repugnant to the declared intention of the testator, to be collected from the whole instrument. It is much more useful to attend closely to these rules, than to look out for guides in decisions on the construction of words in similar instruments. It seldom happens that the decisions on the meaning of words in one instrument are of any assistance in the construction of others, the context in each case, and the circumstances admissible in evidence vary so much as to give a different meaning to the expressions used. It may happen indeed, but it must be rarely, that some particular words have by a long previous course of decisions acquired a certain meaning, and may be supposed to have been used in that acquired sense by the framer of the instrument, but subsequent decisions on somewhat similar words used in other instruments can hardly ever be of the least use, though it is the common practice to quote them all at length. C D E

Applying these rules, the persons who would by the Statute of Distribution of Intestates' Effects have been entitled to them in case he died intestate, are those who filled the character of wife or next-of-kin at the time of the testator's death. The testator has provided that those (except the widow), if there should be no child of his son Robert who should obtain a vested interest, should receive the residue of his estate; but he has not said that those who would have been entitled if the testator had then died, that is died at the time of the event happening, should be entitled. The daughters and son of the testator are the persons who answer the description. It has long been held that courts should try to construe every legacy so as to make it vest at the earliest possible period consistent with the words of the bequest, and not to be contingent unless the words require it; and therefore we ought to hold that this legacy to the next-of-kin should be construed as giving the residue to the son and daughters, subject to the son's life estate. To interpolate the word "then" before the word "died" is to add to the will something that is not within it, and is contrary to the rule of construction of written instruments, now fully established, of looking for the meaning of the words in the will, but adding none. I should rather have thought, if there was not so strong a tendency in courts to construe all legacies to be vested at the earliest possible period, that the natural meaning of the words used was, that, on the death of his son without issue, the property should then be divided among those who filled the character of next-of-kin at that time, and not at that when the testator died, and that the son could not then have taken a share, because he was no longer alive. But in compliance with the rule above mentioned, I think we ought to hold that all who were next-of-kin at his death then took a vested interest in remainder after the son's life estate. I think, therefore, that the Master of the Rolls came to a perfectly right conclusion on this part of the case. F G H I

The next question is, What is the proper construction, applying the same rule, of the latter part of the clause in question? [His LORDSHIP read the clause.] The persons who are the intended legatees are sufficiently described, but nothing is expressly said as to the nature of the estate they were to take. When those persons

A are ascertained, you are to insert into the will their names; and that done, the persons so named would take the whole, and there being no words of distribution, would take the whole as joint tenants, unless you can collect some further qualification from other words in the will. My noble and learned friends are of opinion that this may be done, and my doubts as to that part of the case will produce no effect. I think if the testator had left the whole to those who would have been
B entitled thereto under the Statute of Distributions, there might be some good ground to say that he meant them to take the whole as they would have taken it under an intestacy. That is Horn v. Coleman (9), before STUART, V.-C., for the next-of-kin were the only persons there entitled, and other cases to the same effect which were cited in the argument. But in this case he has given the whole to those who, under the statute, would take only two-thirds, for the wife would take
C one-third.

It seems to me that the bequest, taken as it stands, means clearly that the next-of-kin are to take the whole. He expresses no intention that they are to take less than the whole. It cannot be held that the bequest is to be cut down to two-thirds, and that he died intestate as to the remaining one-third. If that could be done, those who were next-of-kin to the testator's widow, who died in 1836,
D at the time of her death would be entitled to share that one-third, and the decree would not be right. But I think it impossible to contend that the meaning of the words used is not that the legatees are the persons to take the whole. The Master of the Rolls suggests that the words "would have been entitled thereto in case I had died intestate," mean as if he had died intestate, and the persons of my blood, who are the next-of-kin pointed out by the statute, had been the only persons
E entitled under the statute. But this is to introduce many additional words into the will. Whether the testator had the idea of so bequeathing his property, is a pure matter of conjecture, very likely not an improbable one, but the words to carry that intention into effect are wanting. If he meant it, he certainly has not said so.

The result is, that in putting a just construction on this will, I cannot help thinking we ought to hold that the testator meant that all the next-of-kin should
F take the whole, and not having expressed any other intention, they must take as joint tenants, and consequently that on the death of Robert, the sisters took by survivorship. This result is satisfactory, as it is in conformity with the mode in which the members of the family have enjoyed the property for so many years.

LORD KINGSDOWN.—On the only point on which there is any difference of G opinion among your Lordships, I have never myself entertained any doubt. On the happening of the event contemplated, the trustees are "to pay," etc. [HIS LORDSHIP read the clause.] There is no gift except in the direction to pay and transfer. There is no expression of the interest which any of the persons who may answer the description are to take, except by reference to their title under the statute. They are to take according to their title under the statute. The words seem to H me, according to their natural import, to mean this: "My trustees shall transfer the funds according to the title created by the statute among my next-of-kin," and I think that this is the construction settled by the decided cases. It is useless to go again through the authorities which have been cited by my noble and learned friend below me. It may, however, be worth while to make one or two observations on the two cases which are supposed to be opposed to this construction, which I
I think the true one, Richardson v. Richardson (10) and Godkin v. Murphy (4).

In Richardson v. Richardson (10) the trust was to assign unto and among the person or persons who at the time of the testator's death would be entitled under the Statute of Distributions. There were a widow and four children, and it was argued on behalf of the children that the words "unto and amongst" created a tenancy in common (for which authorities were cited), and that the children were, therefore, entitled to take equal shares as tenants in common with the mother. It was argued on the other side, that the statute was to be resorted to not only for the purpose of ascertaining the parties to take, but also the shares. The vice-chancellor held that the plaintiffs, i.e., the children and their mother, took the estates in equal shares as tenants in common. This case occurred in 1845, but neither of the preceding cases of Mattison v. Tanfield (7) and Martin v. Glover (5) was referred to. This decision proceeded, as I collect, on the ground that the gift to the legatees as tenants in common excluded the statute, and had the same effect as would have been attributed to the word "equally." No reason is assigned in the report for the judgment which is expressed in the words above quoted.

Godkin v. Murphy (4), when it is examined, has really no bearing upon the question. The limitation there was to such persons as would be entitled under the statute. There was no decision; but KNIGHT-BRUCE, V.-C., expressed an opinion that as the testator had made a gift to those who would be entitled if he had made no gift, he must be understood to intend something different from that which would have happened if he had made no gift, and that, to create such difference, the words must be read either as intending next-of-kin at a time different from that provided by the statute, or as creating an interest different from that given by the statute, viz., a joint tenancy, instead of a tenancy in common amongst those who would be entitled under the statute. This reasoning is not, perhaps, very satisfactory. It seems to me inconsistent with the subsequent decision of the same learned judge in Martin v. Glover (5), and he himself in Bird v. Luckie (6), expresses some doubt about it. But however that may be, the ground of the observations in that case entirely fails in the present, for here, there was an obvious reason for the gift, though the parties intended to take were to take according to the statute, for the next-of-kin were alone the objects of the testator's bounty, and the widow was excluded.

The authorities seem to me to bear out the proposition, in itself (as I think) perfectly reasonable, and most likely to give effect to the intention of testators, that under a direction to pay to those entitled under the statute, if no other expression or indication of intention be found as to the interests to be given, reference must be had to the statute for the measure as well as the objects of the gift. The rule laid down by STUART, V.-C., in Horn v. Coleman (9), that if the reference to the statute is for the purpose of ascertaining only the object, and not the measure of the gift, the parties will not take according to the statute, is no doubt a sound one, though the cases to which he refers in support of it do not seem to apply. There may be words to restrict the effect of this reference, as it was held that there were in Richardson v. Richardson (10), and as LORD LANGDALE held, that there might be in Mattison v. Tanfield (7), such as "equally" among the objects, and so on, but it seems to me that the other is the natural construction of the words, and that, according to the authorities, unless there be something in the context to exclude it, it must prevail. For these reasons I think that the children took as tenants in common.

Appeal dismissed.

MARTIN v. MARGHAM AND OTHERS

[VICE-CHANCELLOR'S COURT (Shadwell, V.-C.), July 16, 17, 1844]

[Reported 14 Sim. 230; 13 L.J.Ch. 392; 3 L.T.O.S. 433;

Charity—Cy-près doctrine—Failure of named purpose—Invalid direction to accumulate—Regard to objects specified in will.

A testator by will directed that the income from his estate should be accumulated to raise a fund producing a net income of £600 per annum, which was then to be applied for the benefit of named charity schools. To raise such a fund it would have been necessary to accumulate the income from his estate for over twenty-one years.

Held: the direction to accumulate could not be carried into effect, but the property would be applied cy-près, and in settling a scheme, regard would be had to the objects specified in the will.

Notes. The Accumulations Act, 1800, was repealed by the Law of Property Act, 1925, and replaced by ss. 164 to 166 of that Act; section 164 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, was amended by s. 13 of the Perpetuities and Accumulations Act, 1964.

Suit for the administration of the trusts of a will.

Samuel Butler, the testator, being possessed of considerable personal property, by his will, dated May 13, 1821, having directed that all his property not consisting of money should be converted into cash, and after the payment of his debts, be invested by the executors in the testator's name in the 3 per cent. consols, and the annual interest thereof to be disposed of in the first place to certain annuitants therein named, with a direction that as they might drop off, their respective annuities should be added to his estate to accumulate for the express purpose thereafter specified, goes on as follows:

"I now come to the plan of my great desire, which is to establish a sinking fund, to begin with a net income of £600 per annum, and in case I should not have so much at my death, my will and desire is, whatever sum I may leave at my decease in the care of my trust (trustees) that every half-year's dividend may be added to the amount of principal till it arrives at the net income of £600 per annum, and with that sum to begin my proposed sinking establishment. I should then hope that every five years' receipt of income so managed would produce an increase of income, say £150 per annum, and my will and desire is that every such increase of income, say £150 per annum, be appropriated in the care of my trust, as I shall hereafter specify, for the benefit of the parish charity schools in this country in the following order."

The testator then specified ten different charity schools in and about London, which he directed should take the benefit of his bounty; and also directed the manner in which he intended they should be regulated in reference to their internal discipline, and the prizes to be awarded to the boys, and the apprenticing them out to tradesmen. The testator having appointed his executors, requested them, when they should have duly and faithfully executed his will according to his instructions, to assign over all his property, both real and personal, belonging to him at his death, to the Vintners' Company, to the end that the same might be applied by them to the several charitable purposes thereinbefore directed.

The testator made his first codicil to his will dated May 13, 1824, wherein having expressed that the great object and tendency of his will being to serve the poor charity boys of his country, he was induced by his codicil to appoint to his already chosen trustees Lord Giffard, Master of the Rolls, and, in case of his death before him, the testator, the Master of the Rolls for the time being to continue in trust with the Vintners' Company for ever. He died on May 15, 1837, and the present suit was instituted for the purpose of carrying out the trusts of the will under the direction of the court. It appeared by the master's reports, that the testator's property amounted to about £8,000 and the various annuities charged upon that fund amounted to £200. The cause came on for further directions.

"Section 1. No person or persons shall after the passing of this Act, by any deed or deeds, surrender or surrenders, will, codicil or otherwise howsoever, settle or dispose of any real or personal property so and in such manner that the rents, issues, profits or produce thereof shall be wholly or partially accumulated for any longer term than the life or lives of any such grantor or grantors, settlor or settlers, or the term of twenty-one years from the death of any such grantor, settlor, deviser or testator, or during the minority or respective minorities of any person or persons who shall be living or in ventre sa mere at the time of the death of such grantor, deviser or testator, or during the minority or respective minorities only of any person or persons who under the uses or trusts of the deed, surrender, will or other assurances directing such accumulations would for the time being, if of full age, be entitled unto the rents, issues and profits, or the interest, dividends or annual produce so directed to be accumulated; and in every case where any accumulation shall be directed otherwise than as aforesaid, such direction shall be null and void, and the rents, issues, profits and produce of such property so directed to be accumulated shall, so long as the same shall be directed to be accumulated contrary to the provisions of this Act, go to and be received by such person or persons as would have been entitled thereto, if such accumulation had not been directed.

"Section 2. Provided always, that nothing in this Act contained shall extend to any provision for payment of debts of any grantor, settlor or deviser, or other person or persons, or to any provision for raising portions for any child or children of any grantor, settlor or deviser, or any child or children of any person taking any interest under any such conveyance, settlement or devise, or to any direction touching the produce of timber or wood upon any lands or tenements, but that all such provisions and directions shall and may be made and given as if this Act had not passed."

A Cooper and Lloyd, for the next-of-kin, contended that, according to the master's report, to raise sufficient to yield an income of £600 per annum, it would be necessary to accumulate for about thirty years, which would bring it within the mischief pointed out by the Accumulations Act, 1800.

SHADWELL, V.-C.—The general impression upon my mind is, that although the particular mode which the testator has pointed out cannot take effect literally, nor the disposition of his property in behalf of the schools to take in succession be carried out according to his own views, yet there is virtually a clear intention to benefit the schools, which precludes the next-of-kin from taking any share of the property. Where there is a general intention declared for objects of a charity, the particular mode in which the benefit is directed to take effect amounts to nothing, that is, in relation to the question whether the devotion for charitable purposes shall take effect or not; but the main question will be this, viz., whether it cannot be carried out by means of some other scheme. The testator evidently intended the charity boys to receive the benefit of his bequests. They cannot do so in the way indicated by him; therefore, the court will endeavour to effectuate the general intention as far as it can.

BRANDAO v. BARNETT AND OTHERS

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Lyndhurst, L.C., and Lord Campbell), February 25, March 3, 9, 10, August 28, 1846]

G [Reported 3 C.B. 519; 12 Cl. & Fin. 787; 7 L.T.O.S. 525;
186 E.R. 207]

Bank—Banker's lien—Judicial notice—Extension of lien to all securities deposited with banker as banker—Deposit for safe custody.

H The general lien of bankers is part of the law merchant and is to be judicially noticed. The lien extends to all securities deposited with a banker, as a banker, by a customer unless there be an express contract, or circumstances which show an implied contract, inconsistent with a lien, as, e.g., in the case of securities deposited with the banker for safe custody, or held by him for a limited period and a specified purpose pending return to the customer. In such a case the securities could not be regarded as deposited with the banker as a banker.

I Bank—Banker's lien—Implied pledge—Customer apparent, but not true, owner of securities deposited with banker.

Per LORD CAMPBELL: The right acquired by a general lien is that of an implied pledge, and where it would arise it would equally exist, the banker claiming it having acted with good faith, although the customer were the apparent, and not the true, owner of the securities deposited with the banker, which in fact belong to a stranger.

Appeal by the plaintiff from a decision of the Court of Exchequer in an action in trover in which the plaintiff sought to recover from the defendants, bankers, the possession of certain exchequer bills over which the defendants claimed to have a lien and so to be entitled to retain them against an overdraft on the account of the plaintiff's agent.

The plaintiff was a Portuguese merchant, who up to the year 1834 resided at Rio de Janeiro, but who in that year returned to Portugal, and had since resided

A at Lisbon and other towns in that country. Edward Burn, for many years before and down to his bankruptcy hereinafter mentioned, resided in London, and carried on business as a merchant, under the firm of James Burn & Co. He was the correspondent of the plaintiff, who from time to time remitted bills of exchange and money to him, and employed him upon commission to invest the proceeds in exchequer bills. Burn was also employed by other correspondents to purchase
B exchequer bills for them. The defendants were bankers in London, in co-partnership, and for many years before and since the year 1833 acted as such for Burn, who kept cash and an account with them under the style James Burn & Co.

The government paid the interest upon exchequer bills at certain periods, and, when such interest was paid the exchequer bills in respect of which it was paid were delivered up, and, unless their amount was applied for in money, new ex-
C chequer bills were issued to the holder in exchange for them.

It was the custom of bankers, in the course of their trade, to receive the interest upon exchequer bills for their customers, and to exchange the exchequer bills when interest was paid. Burn had, on various occasions prior to December, 1836, requested the defendants to receive the interest upon exchequer bills which he had bought at the request and for the account of the plaintiff, and also to receive the D new exchequer bills issued in exchange for the former. These bills were kept at the bank in a tin box of which Burn kept the key. When interest on the bills became due he went to the bank with the key of the tin box, took out of the box such of the exchequer bills as were wanted, and delivered them to the defendants, requesting them to receive the interest and to exchange the exchequer bills. Burn generally received from the defendants the new exchequer bills within a week or a
E fortnight after they were exchanged, and he then deposited the new exchequer bills in the tin box. The defendants gave credit to Burn, in his account with them, for the interest received by them on the exchequer bills, and that interest formed part of the cash balance to Burn's credit with the bankers. In November, 1836, Burn held exchequer bills to the amount of £30,400, which had been purchased with the money of the plaintiff and were locked up in the tin box at the defendants' bank, and, in pursuance of an order from the plaintiff, Burn sold part of those exchequer
F bills through a broker who knew him only in the transaction to the amount of £10,800. The proceeds of the bills were paid by the broker by cheques payable to Burn, who paid them to the defendants, as his bankers, to his account, as his own money. Burn, in pursuance of an order from the plaintiff, remitted the amount of the proceeds by bills to the brother of the plaintiff in Lisbon. By the execution
G of the above order, the amount of exchequer bills so as aforesaid purchased with the plaintiff's funds, was reduced to £19,600. Of these bills, £9,500 were delivered by Burn to Offley & Co. (no question arising in the present case regarding them), and there were then left in Burn's hands bills purchased with the money of the plaintiff to the value of £10,100, the renewals of which were the exchequer bills sought to be recovered in this action.

H In December, 1836, Burn became ill and was unable to attend to business with the result that on Jan. 21, 1837, his account with the defendants was overdrawn to the amount of £3,211 19s. 7d. In respect of this debt to them the defendants claimed to be entitled to retain the £10,100 bills just mentioned. The plaintiff thereupon began this action in trover to recover possession of the bills. At the
I trial before TINDAL, C.J., in 1840, a verdict was returned for the plaintiff, and after argument judgment was given for him. In 1843 the Court of Exchequer Chamber reversed this decision, holding (i) that the courts would take judicial notice of the general lien which bankers had, by the law-merchant, on the securities of customers in their hands, and (ii) that the exchequer bills in question, having come to the hands of the defendants as bankers, in the usual course of their business, were subject to such general lien. The plaintiff appealed to the House of Lords.

Sir T. Wilde, Serjt., W. H. Watson and M. Smith for the appellant.

Sir Fitzroy Kelly and S. Martin for the respondents.

LORD CAMPBELL.—The first question arising upon this record is whether judicial notice is to be taken of the general lien of bankers on securities of customers in their hands. The exchequer bills for which this action is brought are found to be the property of the appellant, and the respondents rest on the plea that the appellant was not possessed, etc., claiming a lien for the balance due to them from Burn.

The usage of trade by which bankers are entitled to a general lien, is not found by the special verdict; and, unless we are to take judicial notice of it, the appellant is at once entitled to judgment. But, my Lords, I am of opinion that the general lien of bankers is part of the law-merchant, and is to be judicially noticed—like the negotiability of bills of exchange, or the days of grace allowed for their payment. When a general usage has been judicially ascertained and established, it becomes part of the law-merchant, which courts of justice are bound to know and recognise. Such has been the invariable understanding and practice in Westminster Hall for a great many years; there is no decision or dictum to the contrary; and justice could not be administered, if evidence were to be given, toties quoties, to support such usages, an issue being joined upon them in each particular case.

It is hardly disputed that under the plea of "not possessed," a lien may be made available as a defence, and, therefore, if this special verdict sets forth facts which show that, by the law-merchant, the respondents have a lien upon these exchequer bills, the judgment in their favour ought to be affirmed. But I am of opinion, that, upon the facts found, there was no lien, and that the judgment ought to be reversed. I do not, however, proceed upon the ground taken by the Court of Common Pleas—that, these Exchequer bills being the property of Brandao, there was no lien as against him, although there might have been as against Burn. I think that the respondents were entitled to consider the exchequer bills as the property of Burn, without any express representation by him to that effect. Exchequer bills are negotiable securities passing by delivery. The holder of negotiable securities is to be assumed to be the owner; and third persons, acting bona fide, may treat with him as owner. It is admitted that Burn might have effectually sold these exchequer bills, or pledged them, by an express contract, without any representation that they were his own property. But the right acquired by a general lien is that of an implied pledge, and where it would arise—supposing the securities to be the property of the apparent owner—I think it equally exists, the party claiming it having acted with good faith, although they turn out to be the property of a stranger. I think that the just view was taken of this point by the judges in the Exchequer Chamber, and that they were right in holding the reasoning of the judges of the court of Common Pleas to be, in this respect, untenable.

But, my Lords, after much anxious consideration, I have come to the conclusion, that the judges in the Exchequer Chamber have erroneously decided the question on which the Court of Common Pleas expressed no opinion; and that the facts found by the special verdict, would not have entitled the respondents to a lien, if the exchequer bills had been the property of Burn. Bankers, most undoubtedly, have a general lien on all securities deposited with them, as bankers, by a customer, unless there be an express contract, or circumstances that show an implied contract, inconsistent with lien. LORD KENYON says in Davis v. Bowsher (1):

"Bankers have a general lien on all securities in their hands, for their general balance, unless there be evidence to show that any particular security was received under special circumstances which would take it out of the common rule."

And LORD DENMAN, in pronouncing judgment in the present case in the Exchequer Chamber, says:

"If, indeed, there had been an agreement, express or implied, inconsistent with a right of lien—as, to return them absolutely, at all events, to the depositor, at a certain time—the case would have been different."

It seems to me that, in the present case, there was an implied agreement on the

- A part of the defendants inconsistent with the right of lien which they claim. Your Lordships will bear in your recollection that the exchequer bills for which this action is brought are the new exchequer bills which the respondents obtained for the express and only purpose of being delivered by them to Burn, that he might deposit them in the tin box of which he kept the key. They not only were not entered in any account between Burn and the respondents, but they were not to
- B remain in the possession of the respondents who were employed merely to carry and hold till the deposit in the tin box could be conveniently accomplished. Whether this deposit was to be made the same hour in which the securities were obtained from the government, without even being placed in a drawer belonging to the respondents, or after the lapse of some days, seems to me quite immaterial, bearing in mind the purpose for which they were obtained, and for which they
- C remained in the respondents' possession. Nor can it make any difference, that on the particular occasion out of which this action originated, on account of the illness of Burn, so long a time had elapsed from the obtaining of the securities without their being demanded by him for the purpose of being locked up in the tin box; for, if the respondents had not a right of lien upon them the moment they obtained them, the actual lien clearly could not afterwards be claimed, when Burn's account
- D had been overdrawn. Nor, I presume, can any weight be attached to the circumstance that the tin box in which the exchequer bills were to be locked up, and of which Burn kept the key, remained in the house of the respondents. Were not these exchequer bills obtained by the respondents to be delivered to Burn, who was himself to be the depositary and custodian of them? Bankers have a lien on all securities deposited with them as bankers; but these exchequer bills cannot be
- E considered as deposited with the respondents as bankers.

- During the argument in the Exchequer Chamber, it was very properly admitted by counsel for the bankers that if bills of exchange were delivered to a banker merely for the purpose of being deposited in a box, there would be no lien. Does it signify whether the respondents were to deposit the securities in the box themselves, or were to deliver them for that purpose to Burn? I think, that, under
- F such circumstances, bankers acquire no lien, either upon the bills to be exchanged, or upon the bills received in exchange. It is hardly denied, that, if there had been an express undertaking by the respondents to exchange the bills and to return the new ones as soon as obtained to Burn that he might lock them up, no lien would have been acquired. But the special verdict shows the course of dealing between the parties, and states facts which raise an implied promise on the part of the
- G respondents which operates as if it were express. This seems to me to be like the case put of bank-notes given to a banker to procure a bank-post bill for a customer, or a promise by a purchaser to pay ready money, which excludes set-off. There can be no implied right inconsistent with a positive obligation. It certainly would be most inconvenient, if a lien could be claimed under such circumstances, for then an agent holding exchequer bills for another could not, although he should keep
- H them carefully guarded under lock and key, employ a person to get them exchanged who happens to be a banker, lest he might, without being aware that he was acting improperly, commit a crime for which he would be liable to very serious punishment.

Much stress was laid upon the finding that

- I "it is the custom of bankers, in the course of their trade, as such, to receive the interest upon exchequer bills for their customers, and to exchange the exchequer bills when such interest is paid," but there is no finding that the exchequer bills for which this action is brought and on which the lien is claimed were in the possession of the respondents in the course of their trade as bankers or that it was their duty as bankers to perform these offices. I think the transaction is very much like the deposit of plate, in locked chests, at a banker's. A special verdict might find that it is the custom of bankers, in the course of their trade, to receive such deposits from their customers, but I do not think that, from that finding, a general lien could be claimed on the plate chests. In both cases, a charge might be made by the bankers, if they were not otherwise remunerated for their trouble. I further beg leave to observe, that, in a course of dealing like this, where the old exchequer bills are immediately to be delivered to the government and the new exchequer bills are to be locked up in the box of the customer, it can hardly be supposed that the bankers will accept or pay bills of exchange for their customer on the credit of securities that, in the usual course of dealing, are for so short a time to be in their custody. No reliance, I think, can be placed on the circumstance of the interest received on the old exchequer bills going to the credit of the account of the customer, for, while he gives the bankers the interest to keep for him with one hand, he locks up the new exchequer bills in his tin box with the other.

Upon the whole I would humbly advise your Lordships to give judgment for the appellant. If your Lordships should concur with me, this judgment will leave untouched the rule that bankers have a general lien on securities deposited with them as bankers, but will prevent them from successfully claiming a lien on securities delivered to them for a special purpose inconsistent with the existence of the lien claimed. I move that the judgment of the court of Exchequer Chamber be reversed.

LORD LYNDHURST, L.C.—I entirely concur in the opinion which has been so clearly and so fully expressed by my noble and learned friend. With respect to some of the points in the case, no doubt whatever can for a moment be entertained. I think there is no question that, by the law-merchant, a banker has a lien upon securities deposited with him for his general balance. I consider this as part of the established law of the country. The courts will take notice of it; it is not necessary to plead it; nor is it necessary that it should be given in evidence in the particular instance. Therefore, as to that part of the case, I think it is entirely free from doubt.

The only question that remains to be considered, is, whether the facts of this case bring this deposit within the general rule. I think the argument and reasoning of my noble and learned friend are decisive on the subject, and that the case is not within the general rule. The deposit in this instance was not such, under all the circumstances, as to give the bankers a lien upon the exchequer bills. They were deposited in a box; they were kept under lock and key; the key was kept, not by the bankers, but by the party, Burn, who was holder. From time to time, he called for the purpose of taking the exchequer bills out of the box in order that the interest upon them might be received, or, when the bills were called in by the government, in order that they might be exchanged for others. Burn himself attended on those occasions; he took the bills out of the box; he delivered them for that special purpose to the bankers. They were always almost immediately delivered to him, and they were again put under lock and key in the same place of deposit.

It is impossible, considering how this business was carried on, that we can come to any other conclusion than that it was the understanding between the parties that the exchequer bills were to be returned after the interest was received, or after they were exchanged. If so, and that was the understanding—the fair inference from the transaction—it is quite clear that there could be no lien, and that the case does not come within the general rule. What my noble and learned friend has stated is, I think, perfectly correct, that, although from the accidental circumstance of the illness of Burn, these exchequer bills happened to remain for a longer period in the hands of the bankers than was usual, that accidental circumstance alone will not vary the case, or give the bankers a lien, if, under other circumstances, that lien would not have attached. I entirely concur in the judgment of my noble and learned friend.

Appeal allowed.

M'MANUS v. LANCASHIRE AND YORKSHIRE RAIL. CO.

[Reported 4 H. & N. 327; 28 L.J.Ex. 353; 33 L.T.O.S. 259; 24 J.P. 4; 5 Jur.N.S. 651; 7 W.R. 547; 157 E.R. 865, Ex. Ch.]

Carriage of Goods—Contract—Special contract—Carrier exempted from liability—Need for condition to be just and reasonable—Carrier "not responsible for any injury or damage (however caused)"—Avoidance of condition.

Carriers are under an obligation to supply vehicles which are reasonably suitable for the conveyance of animals the carriage of which they undertake. The sufficiency or insufficiency of the vehicle supplied is, generally speaking, a matter which the carrier alone can have the means of ascertaining fully, and it would be not only unreasonable but mischievous if they were to be allowed to absolve themselves from the consequence of neglecting to perform properly that which seems entirely to belong to them as a duty. It is unreasonable that the carrier should stipulate for exemption from liability for the consequences of their own negligence, however gross, or misconduct, however flagrant.

D

Where a railway company undertook the carriage of the plaintiff's horses on a ticket which was stated to be issued "subject to the owner's undertaking all risks of conveyance, loading, and unloading whatsoever, as the company will not be responsible for any injury or damage (however caused) occurring to livestock of any description travelling [on the company's railway] or in their vehicles," and the horses were injured owing to the truck in which they were carried being unsound as a result of the negligence of the company's servants,

E

Held by WILLIAMS, J., CROWDER, J., CROMPTON, J., and WILLES, J., ERLE, J., dissenting: the condition contained in the ticket was not just or reasonable, and the plaintiff was entitled to recover in an action for negligence against the company in respect of the depreciation in the value of the horses.

Heydon's Case (1584), 3 Co. Rep. 7a; 76 E.R. 637; 42 Digest 614, 143.

Appeal from the Court of Exchequer in an action for damage suffered by the plaintiff in respect of injury to horses belonging to him which he had sent to the defendant company for conveyance by their railway.

The plaintiff had occasion to send three horses from Liverpool to York. He sent

A the horses by his servant to the cattle station of the defendants' railway at Liverpool to be forwarded to York. A clerk of the company required the plaintiff to sign a ticket, which contained this condition,

"This ticket is issued subject to the owner's undertaking all risks of conveyance, loading, and unloading whatsoever, as the company will not be responsible for any injury or damage (howsoever caused) occurring to live stock of any description travelling upon the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway or in their vehicles."

B A servant of the company provided for the carriage of the horses a truck which he believed to be in a proper condition, but, in fact it was not sound and during the journey a hole was made in the bottom of the truck, and the horses were injured.

C The company had two scales of charges for horses. One was 2d. per mile for conveyance in open trucks from the cattle station, subject to the terms of non-liability of the company as in the above form set forth; the other was 4d. per mile for horses forwarded in horse-boxes from the passenger station, subject to the like special terms of contract as to the non-liability of the company in case of injury or accident. The plaintiff paid 2d. per mile for the carriage of his horses.

D The horses having been injured, the plaintiff brought this action against the company for recovery of the damage sustained by reason of the insufficiency of the trucks for the conveyance of the horses. The defendant company said that the carriage of the horses was made upon and subject to the terms that the plaintiff should undertake all risks whatever of the carriage and conveyance by the defendants of the horses, and that the defendants would not be responsible for any injury or damage, however caused, occurring to the horses while being carried and conveyed upon the railway. The case came on for trial at the Liverpool Summer Assizes, 1857, before WATSON, B., when a verdict by consent was taken for the plaintiff, with leave to move to enter the verdict for the defendants upon the ground that the defendants were not responsible for the injury and damages of which the plaintiff complained. When the matter came before the Court of Exchequer that court held that the notice in this case was reasonable, and decided in favour of the F defendants. The plaintiff appealed.

Blackburn and Brett for the plaintiff.

Unthank for the defendant company.

Cur. adv. vult.

G Feb. 16, 1859. ERLE, J.—This is an appeal from the Court of Exchequer to the Court of Exchequer Chamber, and two questions are raised: First, whether the railway company can enforce a special contract signed with the plaintiff for the carriage of horses if a judge does not think the condition therein named just and reasonable, and, secondly, whether the conditions in this contract are just and reasonable. The plaintiff contends that each question should be answered in the negative.

H With respect to the first, he relies on the construction of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854, given in Simons v. Great Western Rail. Co. (1), and adopted by the Court of Queen's Bench in Peek v. North Staffordshire Rail. Co. (2), deciding that the whole railway itself is placed under the control of the judges, so that no contract signed with a customer respecting liability for carriage shall protect the company unless the judge shall think every condition therein just, and no just condition respecting liability for carriage shall protect the company, unless it be contained in the contract signed with the customer. The defendant relies upon the construction given by the Court of Exchequer in Wise v. Great Western Rail. Co. (3), and Pardington v. South Wales Rail. Co. (4), deciding that the clause in the statute relating to conditions does not extend to special contracts.

I In my opinion, the defendants are right, and in support of that opinion I propose to distinguish the duties arising by the mutual consent of the carrier and customer as expressed in the contract, so binding the work to be done, and in terms, and the responsibility from the duty of a carrier arising by law from the profession of a carrier and from a bailment to carry. These are the duties which may attach where there is no express contract, or be superinduced beyond the terms of any contract; and as they did not originate with the will of the person making the profession or taking the bailment, so, by that will, without the will of the customer, they may be qualified and regulated in many respects. For an example of the duty created by law without a contract, or beyond a contract and regulated by it, I would cite the following case. If a person chooses to profess to be a common carrier, the law creates a duty to receive things brought for carriage, and he may be liable ex delicto for refusing to receive: Pickford v. Grand Junction Rail. Co. (5). But this duty is regulated according to his will in many respects. He may choose the kind of conveyance, the times of transit, the mode of delivery of the articles which he would profess to carry, what price he will have, when it shall be paid, and the duty to receive is always limited by his convenience to carry: see Jackson v. Rogers (6), and Johnson v. Midland Rail. Co. (7).

This right to qualify the duty of receiving according to the terms and conditions fixed by the carrier alone comprises the right to qualify the common law duty of insuring safely—a duty which has given rise to much discussion, and is now for our consideration. When a contract is not only for carriage and delivery, but also for safe delivery, either absolutely or in degree, the contractor may sue the carrier for breach of contract in common course. But we are dealing with the duty of safe delivery imposed upon the carrier either where the law of contract does not apply, as in the case of consignees of goods who were no parties to the contract for carriage, or where there was no mutual consent between the customer and the carrier upon the point. In all cases where he has accepted the goods generally, the duty of the carrier to insure the safe delivery, excepting only the act of God or of the Queen's enemies, is clear, but the duty is attached to him upon the assumption that he has had an opportunity of securing to himself remuneration adequate to the risk so cast upon him. If he has not had the opportunity, or, if the circumstances make the precaution reasonable, he may, by a special acceptance, either limit his responsibility upon conditions, or be clear of it altogether.

LORD HALE's authority is to this effect, saying:

"If a carrier will, he may make a caution for himself, which, he omitting and taking in the goods generally, he shall answer for what happens: Morse v. Stue (8), 1 Vent. at p. 238."

The carriers' notices rejecting responsibility, unless the condition of assurance be complied with, are special acceptances imposing a liability by the will of the carrier against the will of the customer. LORD MANSFIELD, in his court, so treats the right: see Gibbon v. Paynton (9) (4 Burr. at p. 2301). LORD ELLENBOROUGH so treats them, and he says that the legal right of a carrier thus to protect himself had rendered legislative interference for his protection needless: see Nicholson v. Willan (10). LORD TENTERDEN in Marsh v. Horne (11), so treats them, where a customer knew of the notice to insure, and the carrier knew of the value of the article, and the first did not offer and the other did not ask for the premium, the carrier was protected by his notice. The court says (5 B. & C. at p. 326):

"A person may engage to place goods in the course of conveyance and delivery, and yet declare that he will not be answerable for their loss."

Other cases upon carriers' notices are to the same effect; and, although those conditions are called at times special contracts, as well as special acceptances, it is clear from the context that the right in the carrier to guard himself against a party attempting to overreach him by imposing a risk without paying the premium, is always meant, which is not a contract in its true sense. After the time of these cases this protection from notice became practically lost to the carrier, by imputing the damage or loss to gross negligence, the damage or loss being some evidence of negligence, and the line between negligence and gross negligence being undefined, as was observed by LORD DENMAN, in Hinton v. Dibbin (12) (2 Q.B. at p. 662).

A The judgment of GARROW, B., declaring what was sufficient evidence of gross negligence tended to this result: see Bodenham v. Bennett (13); and this tendency was increased by the judgment of BURROUGH, J., lamenting that the doctrine of notice had ever been introduced into Westminster Hall: Smith v. Horne (14).

In deference to these cases the ruling of LORD DENMAN giving effect to carrier's notices was set aside and a new trial granted in Birkett v. Willan (15), whereupon the legislature interposed and granted to land carriers, by the Carriers Act, 1830, fair protection in respect of specified articles unless the customer insured. It granted a new right in respect of these articles; in all other respects it left the existing rights of a carrier to limit his liability either by special acceptance or special contract unaltered, and by s. 4 it was provided that no public notice or declaration should limit or affect the common law liability of a common carrier: see Walker v. York and North Midland Rail. Co. (16). The carrier's duty to receive and his right to reject, in some cases absolutely, in others conditionally, without regard to the will of the customer, and, therefore, without special contract, remained as before; and although before the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854, it was immaterial whether the carrier was said to limit his responsibility by special acceptance or by special contract, yet, as that statute, in my view, subjected the validity of the conditions imposed by special contract to the contingency of being thought just, and of conditions imposed by special contract to that of being signed, a discussion which has now become very material was, in the cases occurring in the interim between the two statutes, scarcely worth regard. These cases are much relied on by the plaintiff, and although in the court below they may be the foundation of the reasons for the decision, following the decisions of a co-ordinate court, in a superior court I hope I may, without impropriety or want of due deference, speak of them as I think.

In Wyld v. Pickford (17) the point arose. The plaintiff brought case for loss of maps by a carrier; the plea was that the defendants gave notice to the plaintiff at the time of delivery of the maps that they would not be responsible for them unless insured, that they accepted the maps on those terms, and that the maps were not insured. The plaintiff demurred to the plea, and argued that as there was no fraud, the carrier could only limit his liability by special contract, and that the plea showed no consent of the plaintiff, and, therefore, no contract. The defendants argued that a carrier could limit by special acceptance simpliciter, without the consent of the customer, and cited many clear authorities to prove it. The judgment was that the plea alleging special acceptance without any act of special contract was still good, and the ground of the judgment is remarkable. It shows that a carrier can only limit his responsibility by a special contract, and as the special acceptance in the terms of a notice does limit his liability, it must be imagined that the customer agreed with the carrier to forego his right to the common law responsibility of the carrier in consideration of the carrier foregoing his right to prepayment of the carriage by the customer. The judgment upon this point concludes thus (8 M. & W. at pp. 458, 459):

I "It is objected that there is no express averment that the plaintiff consented to these terms, but assuming he did not, the defendant did not accept the maps upon any other, and the plaintiff is in this difficulty: he is seeking to enforce the obligation upon a common carrier, because he does not refuse to pay the price of the carriage beforehand, and if he sued upon a bailment to the defendants upon special terms, it must be a bailment upon those terms upon which alone they have agreed to accept the goods."

With great deference I beg to submit that this judgment in some degree recognises the right of the carrier to stipulate, with the consent of the customer, and at all events it does not establish that a carrier has no right to protect himself if the customer refuses consent. Moreover, as the judges from LORD HALE to LORD TENTERDEN have supposed that the right of a carrier to protect himself from the extreme obligation of common law by special acceptance; as that right would be nugatory if it depended upon the customer's consent; and as there is no trace of the notion of a contract in consideration of being let off prepayment in this case, as before surmised, in my opinion, the judgment, upon the ground of special acceptance simpliciter, as the defendants' pleader pleaded, and as counsel argued, would have better accorded with the tenor of the preceding authorities.

In Walker v. York and North Midland Rail. Co. (16), the carrier limited his responsibility by special acceptance. The judgment was that he was protected thereby. The judgment, which placed a protection upon the ground of a special contract, or presumed a contract implied by the court, was rather a fiction of law for the purpose of doing right to the carrier without clashing with the last case, than as a matter of fact. The plaintiff complained of delay in delivering fish; the defendants showed a notice served upon the plaintiff that they carried fish at a low rate upon the terms of no liability for delay in the delivery, and that they accepted the goods upon these terms. The plaintiff, so far from agreeing to the terms of the notice, claimed to treat it as null and void. The judge ruled that if a carrier gave a notice to a customer of the custom of the carrier, and there was no acquiescence or dissent by the customer who sent the goods, that was a ground from which the jury might infer the customer's assent to a special contract in the terms of the notice, and so the verdict was for the defendant and the court upheld it. That case really affirms that a special acceptance by a carrier may bind the customer, but in a circuitous mode from which a jury may infer a contract by the customer contrary to his express intention. The cases relating to animals are not to the point, as they were special contracts as well as special acceptances: Austin v. Manchester, Sheffield and Lincolnshire Rail. Co. (18); and Carr v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Rail. Co. (19).

Then the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854, s. 7, was passed, regulating carriage by canals and railways. I submit that when that section became law a carrier had some employment imposing conditions upon his common law liability by special acceptance, without the consent of the customer to these conditions; and a carrier had, besides, the same free capacity to make any other lawful contracts as other subjects possess. Construing the statute with reference to this state of the law, the defendants' construction gives full effect to every word in its ordinary meaning; it also accords with the context, and the enactment as to contracts has an intelligible policy. The plaintiff's construction cannot be true unless the greater part of the words have no effect, or the context is violently transposed, or the legislature intended what seems to me iniquitous against this class of carriers. According to the defendants, the carrier's right to refuse general acceptance and impose conditions by notice, condition or declaration and other special acceptance, was in some degree in conflict with the supposed duty to receive whatever he could conveniently carry, and the law had not defined the line when the customer could sue the carrier in case he had not given anything but a qualified acceptance and so imposed unreasonable conditions. Then s. 7 declares that no notice, condition or declaration shall restrict his liability unless the condition shall be thought just and reasonable by a judge. Notice and declaration without the consent of the customer can only operate by imposing conditions. The statute recognises that they may still so operate if the conditions are thought just by a judge; and on this view full effect is given to the clause relating to conditions. After several clauses upon other matters, comes the proviso relating to contracts: "No special contract shall affect the customer unless signed." A special contract is contrasted with a general contract, and a bailment to carry with acceptance by the bailee, either absolute or qualified, is probably the general contract intended; which bailment creates, by operation of law, many duties and rights distinguishable from the contract for or in respect of acts to be done, and persons interested therein may sue thereon. But a special contract creates and defines by its own terms the course of duty of the contracting parties between themselves, the parties being as free to contract as they are to use their property in any way that the law does not forbid, and the right to contract being the vital essence of trade. According to the defendants this all-

Upon this construction all the words operate and the effect is reasonable. According to the plaintiff the law before the statute was that a carrier could in no way restrict his common law liability unless the customer assented to the special contract, so that all the rights of the carrier under the Act would have been defeated

B if the customer had offered to pre-pay the carriage; and he contended for the meaning of the enactment expressed by JERVIS, C.J., in Simons v. Great Western Rail. Co. (1), that a carrier may make special contracts binding upon his customers, provided they are signed by the customer and thought just by a judge. But, if the enactment relates to contracts only, the words "notice, condition and declaration" are unintelligible. If the liability could only be limited by a contract with the

C customer, the words "notices given by the company" and "conditions given by the company" are inappropriate. Mutual consent is the first element of contract, and the legislature cannot have thought that the assent of one side would create a contract. The use of different terms for the same idea in the same sentence is the essence of confusion; and the plaintiff promotes that confusion in supposing that the notices, conditions and declarations, in the first part of s. 7 mean the same idea

D as is adverted to by special contracts in the other part. This he does notwithstanding the certainty of the legislature in the Carriers Act, 1830, making public notices and declarations void, distinguishing them there from special contracts. If the legislature never intended to regulate personal notices and declarations, and still distinguished them from special contracts, the sequence of ideas would be reasonable, and the use of the words would be apt. The plaintiff's construction

E supposes that a proviso, which usually restrains, here operates to enlarge the enacting clause. Thus, if a meaning is to be gathered from the words and the context, they seem to afford many reasons for the defendants' view, and none for the plaintiff's. Where one of two constructions is to be chosen, expediency has some weight.

According to the defendants the carrier may limit his common law liability by conditions which are thought just, and the statute tends to give certainty to the law,

F for it defines it by referring to a judge the doubtful line between the carrier's right to qualify his acceptance and the customer's right to reject the qualification. The statute also defines part of the proof required for a special contract. According to the plaintiff the intention was that all contracts made by companies for carriage, although valid against them absolutely, shall not be enforced for them except upon the contingency of a judge thinking them just and reasonable. As to the profit which

G a carrier would make for carrying, railways like other carriers are perpetually infested by attempts to overreach them and fraud, which are only to be defeated by vigilance in making the contracts, and the protection of the law in enforcing them. An intention to make their contracts uncertain appears to have the evil of taking from that property that security which belongs to all other property in trade. The evil also is greater in proportion as the contingency is uncertain, and the test of

H "just and reasonable" in the mind of the person who happens to be the judge is peculiarly uncertain. Some judges seem to have thought it just that a carrier should always pay for every damage and loss; and other judges seem to have thought that just and reasonable as tested by the intuitive perception of right which they have themselves. Some judges seem to think that a party to a bargain should take care of his own interest, and that, if he chooses to enter into a bargain, he shall

I keep to it: other judges may attempt to question the interest of railways and customers respectively, and try the reasonableness of these contracts by this knowledge, but their situation makes this knowledge almost impossible.

Upon the argument the supposed hardship upon companies was said to be based upon the assumption that the carriers had a monopoly. JERVIS, C.J., in Simons v. Great Western Rail. Co. (1), says:

"The monopoly created by railways compels the public to employ them, and therefore the legislature has imposed security upon them."

It is true that the railway proprietors have produced accommodation so excellent A that the public prefers it to every other; but that, for that reason, the argument against monopoly should be brought against railways is not right. In monopolies the seller of a bad article by virtue of his grant compels the buyer to pay too much for it; here the buyer chooses the article on account of its goodness, and compels the seller to take too little; and the public has granted nothing to railway companies without exacting full price; their Acts, and their land, and their works, are all paid B for, subject to conditions imposed originally; they have the same right of property as other owners, and the confiscation of any of these rights is not justified by an unfounded imputation of monopoly. The notion that customers of railways require protection on account of their incapacity to resist oppression is not more true than the notion that a certain large proportion of customers of railway companies stand in need of every accommodation which the law offers. C

For these reasons I think that the plaintiff's construction is wrong, and that a special contract binds them, notwithstanding that the judges may think some of the conditions are not just or not reasonable. If the plaintiff is right upon the first question, then the second arises, whether the condition that the carrier shall undertake all risk of conveyance is just and reasonable. This condition does not extend to wilful neglect or other misfeasance. The general words respecting the company D not being responsible are added as explanatory of the express words of the condition, and are limited in the same way. This condition is imposed in respect of horses, and I can find neither authority nor principle for holding that the defendants were bound to receive living animals as common carriers. On the contrary, in Carr v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Rail. Co. (19), animals are shown not to be within the principle which affects carriers' responsibility. The tempers and habits E of the animal are probably better known by the owner than by the company, and that knowledge is essential to secure safe carriage. The treatment which would be harmless to some animals would be fatal to others, and it is more reasonable that the owner should be bound to take precaution than the company. If cattle are very wild, they may break out of the truck which would confine a tamer creature: Chippendale v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Rail. Co. (20). So if a horse is vicious F he may kick down the partition which would be strong enough for a quieter animal:
Shaw v. York and North Midland Rail. Co. (21). If the owner chooses to employ a railway instead of a road, what principle of justice or reason makes it wrong for the company to stipulate that the owner should take the risk? It is absurd to suppose that the question would depend upon a mercantile calculation of whether a payment of 2d. per mile per horse, to include a place for a man, is sufficient to pay for the risk of the journey, as well as the conveyance; and it is equally absurd to suppose G that that calculation would be within the judicial cognisance of a judge. Probably no judge knows what labour, skill and capital have been laid out in transmitting these horses, and what profit ought to be realised to make a prudent investment of capital, and what rate of profit 2d. per mile per horse is likely to give if the owner takes the risk. Unless he has that knowledge he has not the data required for H determining the bargain made by the plaintiff with the company to be so unjust as that he shall be allowed to break it off, and to put upon the company a liability which they had agreed not to take. But even if this general proposition cannot be maintained, here the plaintiff had the option of two conveyances, one at a higher price than the other, and if he chooses to take the lower price, and with it the greater risk, it is unreasonable and unjust in him to cast upon the company a loss I which might not have occurred if he had taken the more expensive accommodation.
I, therefore, answer the second question in the affirmative, adding that, in my opinion, the defendants are entitled to judgment.

May 17, 1859. WILLIAMS, J.—I will deliver the judgment of the judges who heard the arguments, with the exception of my brother ERLE, who has already delivered his judgment. Two questions were raised in this case: First, whether the clause of s. 7 of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854, making void all

A notices, conditions and declarations made and given by the company limiting their liability, unless such as the court or the judge trying the cause may adjudge to be just and reasonable, extends to cases where a special contract has been signed in conformity with the subsequent provision in the section; secondly, whether, supposing it does extend, the conditions contained in the special contract in question ought to be adjudged just and reasonable.

B As to the former of these questions, the argument which the subject admits appears to have been exhausted by the judges who gave their opinions in Peck v. North Staffordshire Rail. Co. (2), and it is sufficient for us to say that, having fully considered them, as well as the able arguments of the counsel in this court, we agree with the opinion expressed by JERVIS, C.J., in Simons v. Great Western Rail. Co. (1) (18 C.B. at pp. 829, 830) that the true construction of the Act, and
C the result of the provisions is this, namely, that

“the company may make special contracts with their customers, provided they are just and reasonable, and signed. And whereas the monopoly created by railway companies compels the public to employ them in the conveyance of their goods, the legislature has thought fit to impose a further security that the court shall see that the conditions or special contracts are just and reasonable.”

D In effect, before the statute every case in which a special limited liability was substituted for the general common law obligation of the carrier, whether by notice acquiesced in or document signed by the customers, was one of special contract, and the statute is to be construed with reference to that state of the law. It remains, therefore, to consider whether the condition or special contract in the case
E before us is just and reasonable; and we are of opinion that it is not. In order to bring the defendants within its protection, it is necessary to construe it as excluding responsibility for loss occasioned not only by all risks of whatever kind directly incident to the transit, but also for that caused by the insufficiency of the carriages provided by the defendants, though occasioned by their own negligence or misconduct. The sufficiency or insufficiency of the vehicles by which the company are
F to carry on their business is a matter, generally speaking, which they and they alone can and ought to have the means of fully ascertaining, and it would, we think, be not only unreasonable but mischievous if they were to be allowed to absolve themselves from the consequence of neglecting to perform properly that which seems entirely to belong to them as a duty. It is unreasonable that the company should stipulate for exemption from liability for the consequences of their own
G negligence, however gross, or misconduct, however flagrant; and that is what the condition under consideration professes to do. That condition is, therefore, void, and the case stands simply on the ground that the plaintiff has employed the defendants to carry his horses safely, and that they have used an inefficient and improper vehicle for that purpose, whereby the horses have been injured.

This being the opinion of the majority of the court, the judgment of the Exchequer
H must be reversed, and judgment given for the plaintiff. This is the opinion of myself, CROMPTON, CROWDER, and WILLES, JJ.

Appeal allowed.

HALL v. WRIGHT

[COURT OF EXCHEQUER CHAMBER (Pollock, C.B., Williams, Crowder and Willes, JJ., Martin, Bramwell and Watson, BB.), February 2, 4, November 26, 1859]

Breach of Promise—Defence to action—Illness of defendant—Danger to life by going through marriage ceremony or consummating marriage.

In an action for breach of promise of marriage the defendant pleaded that after the agreement to marry and before any breach thereof he became, and still was, so ill with consumption of the lungs that he was incapable, without great danger to his life, of going through the marriage ceremony or of consummating the marriage.

Held by WILLIAMS, J., MARTIN, B., CROWDER, J., and WILLES, J. (POLLOCK, C.B., BRAMWELL, B., and WATSON, B., dissenting) that those facts did not constitute a good defence to the action.

D Appeal against a decision of the Court of Queen's Bench, discharging a rule nisi, granted pursuant to leave reserved at the trial, to enter the verdict for the plaintiff on a plea on which at the trial the verdict was directed by the judge to be entered for the defendant.

E The declaration stated that on April 15, 1855, the plaintiff and the defendant agreed to marry one another within a reasonable time in that behalf, and, although a reasonable time for the marriage had elapsed and the plaintiff had always been ready and willing to marry the defendant, he had neglected and refused to marry her. In his defence the defendant said that after the agreement to marry and before any breach thereof he became, and thenceforth had been, and still was, afflicted with dangerous bodily disease which had occasioned frequent and severe bleeding from his lungs, by reason of which disease he became and still was incapable of marriage without great danger to his life, and, therefore, unfit for the married state, whereof the plaintiff had notice before the commencement of the action. The action came on to be tried before ERLE, J., at the sittings in London after Michaelmas Term, 1857, when evidence was given that the defendant had been attacked with bleeding of the lungs in 1855, and that in the autumn of 1856 he was far advanced in consumption. The medical witnesses expressed it as their opinion that at that time it would have been dangerous to his life to have married, and that any excitement would renew the hæmorrhage and in all probability prove fatal. It did not appear that the defendant knew of his real state, but there was no evidence of his having informed the plaintiff of it. On this issue the jury found for the plaintiff except as to the allegation that the plaintiff had notice before the commencement of the action of the defendant's condition. They assessed the damages at £100 contingently. Thereupon the verdict was entered for the defendant on this issue, leave being reserved for the plaintiff to move the court that the verdict on that issue be entered for the plaintiff. On Jan. 12, 1858, the plaintiff obtained a rule to show cause why the verdict obtained in the cause should not be set aside, and a verdict entered for the plaintiff for £100 damages. On June 11, 1858, the Court of Queen's Bench discharged the rule. LORD CAMPBELL, C.J., and CROMPTON, J., were of opinion that the plea on this issue was not in excuse or suspension of the performance of the promise, that the contract to marry was not dissolved by the circumstances alleged in the plea, and that the plea was, therefore, bad. Further, that, if the plea was to be taken as pleaded, by way of excuse only, without treating the contract as dissolved, it was bad for not averring that before or at the expiration of a reasonable time the defendant gave the plaintiff notice of his state of health. WIGHTMAN and ERLE, JJ., were of opinion that the plea did not admit any breach of the contract as alleged in the declaration, but showed a state of circumstances existing down to the time of plea pleaded which justified the defendant's refusal to marry, and that it was a good plea without any averment of notice to the plaintiff. CROMPTON, J., as junior judge, withdrew his judgment, A and, consequently, the rule was discharged. The plaintiff appealed.

Mellish (J. R. Davison with him) for the plaintiff.

Edward James (Henderson with him) for the defendant.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 26, 1859. The following judgments were read.

WATSON, B.—This was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench, which judgment was for the defendant. The question turns on a special plea. The action was for breach of promise of marriage, in which the declaration alleged that the defendant promised to marry the plaintiff within a reasonable time, that a reasonable time had elapsed, and that the defendant had refused. The plea C was that after making the agreement, and before any breach thereof, the defendant became and was, and henceforward hitherto had been, and still is, afflicted with a dangerous bodily disease which has caused frequent and severe bleeding from his lungs, by reason of which disease the defendant then became and still was incapable of marriage without the greatest danger to life, and, therefore, unfit for the married state, whereof the plaintiff had notice.

In the argument at the Bar in this court, and at the Bar and on the Bench of the court below, much discussion took place as to what was the meaning and effect of the plea. The plea is an excuse, namely, that before breach, and up to the time of the commencement of the action, the defendant was afflicted by a dangerous bodily disease, and was, therefore, "incapable of marriage," and, therefore, "unfit for the married state." The plea does not properly confess any breach of the promise. E
The question before us arises after verdict, and every intendment is to be made so as to support the plea, if possible. The terms are twofold. "Incapable of marriage" may mean two things—either incapable of going through the ceremony of marriage, or incapable of performing the functions required in the married state. In either view of the question I think the plea good. Certainly these words may be considered to apply to the ceremony of marriage, and then the defendant is not to pay damages by reason of a physical inability. The latter words, "unfit for the married state," are not by any means dubious. If it means the want of that which is, as LORD STOWELL expresses it, "a competency to perform the duties which the married state requires": Greenstreet (falsely called Cumyns) v. Cumyns (1) then the words "fit" or "not fit" seem to be the apt words to express this state in proceedings in the ecclesiastical court: Sparrow (falsely called Harrison) v. Harrison (2). Marriage, according to our law, as decided in the House of Lords, was a contract requiring a religious ceremony to its validity: R. v. Millis (3). According to the Rubric, the parties are to declare at the altar that there is no lawful impediment to the marriage, and that is with reference to the object and purposes of marriage as therein stated. This is declared to be the law of the Church. Here the parties in this case could not, without a falsehood, make such a solemn declaration. H
It would be no answer to say that, by modern legislation, the parties are relieved from going through the services of the Church of England. We are now declaring what the law is as to the contract of marriage. Supposing this marriage being performed, the wife may at any distance of time, presently, or at a future time, crave a decree declaring the marriage to be void. It seems to be strange that a man is liable in damages for not doing that which is against law, human and divine. I

The real ground of my opinion is that this contract is, like many other contracts incident to the statute, subject to conditions; among others, that the parties remain in health to undergo the ceremony, do not become unfit, and that the circumstances should not render it contrary to law. It was conceded on the argument, and in the court below, that insanity of mind would be an excuse, and that the insane person would not be responsible in damages. If so, why not insanity of body? In each case, as alleged, he is to answer in damages for not marrying. In each case the marriage is void. In each case it is no act of the defendant, but the act of

A God. It is not a dissolution of the contract except at election, such as a man refusing to marry on the score of the want of chastity of the intended wife. With this view of the plea it is clear that the allegation of notice was unnecessary, and need not be proved. In this declaration it is said the defendant "refused to marry." That is explained by this, that this by itself constituted no breach before the defendant's illness, and it shows that before a reasonable time had elapsed he was attacked by disease. If so, then a reasonable time had not elapsed. The term "reasonable time" refers to health under all the circumstances.

B The cases cited in the court below have little or no application, in my view of the case—namely, Paradine v. Jane (4), a covenant to repair a house; or, Co. Litt. 209, a, to enfeoff a stranger; or to load a ship, Barker v. Hodgson, (5). In these and in all like cases, the covenantor or promisor agrees to do the acts, or the acts shall be done conditionally, and, at all events, that for them he is liable if living, or his real or personal representative, as the case may be, having assets. It is clear that, in one respect, death dissolves the contract to marry: Chamberlaine v. Williamson (6). The performance of such contracts is still subject to be excused by subsequently becoming illegal. An argument much relied on is that this promise might have been made with a knowledge of the defendant's infirmity. To this there were two answers: first, the infirmity arose after the promise of marriage; secondly, it must, from the declaration, be taken to be a contract of marriage of the ordinary kind, with all its usual obligations and incidents. If it had been otherwise it should have been so alleged. For these reasons I think the judgment of the court below should be affirmed.

E BRAMWELL, B. (read by MARTIN, B.)—In this case the verdict should be entered for the defendant, if so much of the plea as is proved is an answer to the breach of contract complained of. The averment of notice was not proved, but that is immaterial unless the plea with or without it is bad. It is good if it justifies the breach complained of. It is good, therefore, if it justifies the not marrying (for a refusal to marry is not marrying) at the time when but for the reason alleged the defendant ought to have married. What are the consequences whether the contract is rescinded, or whether the defendant is liable to marry at some other time, or what else may result, I will advert to hereafter. At present the question is, Does the plea justify the particular breach alleged?

F The plea alleges that before and at the time of the breach the defendant was afflicted by bodily disease, which made him incapable of marriage without great danger of his life and unfit for the married state. The question was at first argued as to this point of unfitness for sexual intercourse. But counsel for the defendant said it meant, and it appears from the judgment of ERLE, J., that it meant, not only that, but also an incapacity to bear the fatigue and excitement of the marriage ceremony. It was proved to be true in both these meanings. I think either matter a justification for not marrying. But it is necessary to examine both, as some seem to consider the plea merely to mean unfitness for the ceremony of marriage; others the other unfitness I have mentioned. As neither fraud nor illegality is alleged, the excuse for not performing the contract must be found in the terms of the contract itself. The plea, therefore, assumes that it is a term of the contract declared on that, in the event named in the plea, the defendant should be excused from marrying, and as there is no reason why such term should be in this particular contract, unless it is in all such contracts, the question is reduced to this—is it a term in an ordinary agreement to marry that, if a man from bodily disease cannot marry without danger to his life, and is unfit for marriage from the cause mentioned at the time appointed, he shall be excused marrying then? The plea assumes it is. I think it is.

I Of course, I admit the parties might stipulate otherwise, but if they do not, I think they are implied terms of the ordinary contract. I quite agree that where parties can make their own terms, the law ought not, rightly, to imply any. But there are instances in which it is done from the necessity, or almost necessity, of the case, and if it is reasonable to do it, it is no contract to marry. Consider how it is made, and how it is proved—made without formality, usually without witnesses; perhaps without the word itself having been used, or any word of contract; an undertaking between the parties rather than a bargain come to; at least very often in a state when the feelings are much excited; proved by a variety of acts and conduct which assume the contract to exist. It seems unreasonable to deal with it as with a contract for the sale of goods, or other business transaction, though no doubt the same principle governs both. In Lowe v. Peers (7), LORD MANSFIELD said (4 Burr. at p. 2230):

“All these contracts should be looked on (as LORD HARDWICKE said in Woodhouse v. Shepley (8)) with a jealous eye. . . . These engagements are liable to many mischiefs—to many dangerous consequences.”

These mischiefs and danger would be greater if the engagement was taken to be unconditional and unqualified. That terms are implied in contracts is admitted: contracts for personal service for matters dependent on personal capacity, as to write a book or paint a picture, are conditional on the continuance of the ability mental and corporal to perform them. This very contract to marry has an implied condition that the woman shall continue chaste; other instances may be given. Similar conditions make one think that such conditions, as the plea assumes are to be implied in the ordinary contract to marry. Surely if a man said to a woman: “I have promised to marry you, I must and will, but will never live with you or treat you as a wife,” he would not be offering, but refusing to perform, his contract: Leeds v. Cook (9). The contract is a contract to marry and perform the duties of marriage.

I think it better to recognise what we all know exists, and to assume it exists for a good purpose, than to affect to ignore it. Besides, there is abundant warranty for so doing. The marriage of an impotent man is null; and two of the three reasons for matrimony given in the marriage service involve a capacity for sexual intercourse. Can it be doubted, then, that, if death were the certain result of the fatigue and excitement of the ceremony, the defendant would be excused, or that impotency supervening on the promise would excuse him? Could he be bound, in performance of his promise, to commit suicide, or go through a ceremony which would be a nullity? But if the certainty of a fatal result would excuse, so would great danger of it. If impotency would, so surely should great danger; death from the exercise of capacity, more so. But to possess the lawful means of gratifying a powerful passion, with the alternative of abstaining or perilling life, is indeed “to incur the risk of intense misery instead of mutual comfort”; and it does seem to me, with great respect, a great mistake to lose sight of these considerations and suppose happiness can be procured in such a marriage by the gratification of an innocent desire to enjoy the consortium vitæ with a man, obtain rank and station as his wife, and be dowable of his lands. Moreover, am I to think only of the woman and not of the man who might object that her wishes, however innocent, were very unreasonable towards him, in wishing him to put himself in the temptation of perilling his life, and he might even doubt the innocence of such a desire, certainly, of wishing him to go through a ceremony which might be fatal to him.

This suggests the following. If the man is not excused, but bound, is the woman bound in such a case? Impossible, one would think. But if not, it must be on account of some implied condition in the contract. It is not as though the man was in default. She could not refuse to marry in such a case on the ground that he had broken his contract by not continuing fit for marrying, for, if so, she might not only refuse to marry him, but might maintain an action against him for becoming unfit. That cannot be. He does not thereby break his contract. Yet she is excused. If so, so must he be, for if without default of one party to the contract the other has a right to refuse to perform on the happening of a certain event, it must be assumed, till the contrary appears, that the right is common to both. If in such a case she could rely on an implied condition to excuse her marrying him, why may

- A not he on one to excuse his marrying her? The contract of marriage has been assimilated to those to which it bears no resemblance. A man contracts to build a ship, and cannot. Well, that is his misfortune; a loss will be sustained by him or the shipowner, and it is convenient that, if he puts no condition on his contract, none should be implied; and that, if his contract is unconditional, he should bear the loss consequent on his nonperformance. If so, also of a contract to sell corn. But
- B in the case of a contract to marry with supervening impotency, there is a loss which must fall on both, whether the contract is fulfilled or not. It seems to me, then, that sexual intercourse is contemplated by parties who agree to marry as an essential part of their engagement. The inability for it in one party is an excuse from performance by the other—that, where such excuse exists without any default in the disabled party, it is contrary to principle to hold that an option is given to the
- C other; consequently that the right of secession in such a case is mutual.

The authorities are in favour of this view: POTHIER, TRAITE DU MARIAGE (part 2, c. 1, Art. 7, s. 61). But it is said his authority is impaired by his adding as a cause of dissolution,

“a derangement of fortune, which put him out of condition to be able to support the charges of the marriage which he had promised to contract.”

- D I own I see nothing unreasonable in this, nor anything very different from our law. People who agree to marry, not having the means, agree with the implied condition to wait till they have them—the legal expression of which is that their engagement is to marry in a reasonable time, and that does not arrive till their means are sufficient. Suppose, after the engagement, poverty falls on them; that is an excuse for not immediately marrying. Is it reasonable that the woman should wait till the man becomes able to maintain her? This reasoning may be wrong; still there is POTHIER's authority direct on the question in hand. Then there is the opinion of LORD KENYON, in Atchinson v. Baker (10), cited and approved in 1 PARSONS ON CONTRACTS, 550. Paradine v. Jane (4), and similar cases cited for the plaintiff, are misapplied. They beg this question. No doubt, if the contract made by the
- F parties is unconditional, death or disease is no excuse, but the question in this case is whether the contract is not conditional on the continuance of life and health. Why, if the defendant died before breach, could not his executors be liable? The answer is because he has not undertaken to live; neither has he to continue competent in health; and the one is as much a condition of matrimony as the other. [By the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, s. 1, an action for breach of promise survives against or for the benefit of a party to the action.] This disposes of Barker v. Hodgson (5). LORD ELLENBOROUGH's remark (3 M. & S. at p. 270), “Perhaps it is too much to say that the freighter was compellable to load his cargo,” does not mean he was excused from so doing, for the plaintiff recovered in respect of the defendant not having done so. The damages were for breach of the covenant to do it. What LORD ELLENBOROUGH means, I imagine to be that the
- H defendant was not compellable or would not have had specific performance enjoined. It is to me unintelligible how, if the man is not bound to perform the contract, he can be liable to pay damages for its non-performance. But it is said notice ought to have been given to the plaintiff. In point of right feeling I agree; but the parties here are at law with each other. The defendant says: “I have a legal answer to your legal demand.” As a rule, a man is not bound to say why, and I
- I see no reason why he should be in this case of a contract to marry. It may be the defendant communicated to the plaintiff in the most delicate way an objection to marry, but refused to say why. If she chooses to go to law with him, as on a bargain, she must abide by the rules of law applicable to all cases of bargains and contracts. I understand the opinion of CROMPTON, J., to be rather as above expressed, with this difference: he thinks that, at the utmost, all the defendant was entitled to do was to rescind the contract. But, if so, I think the plea is good. When is he to rescind? If a contract gives a right to rescind it, but expresses no time for rescinding, it need not be done till the time arrives for performance; no previous notice need be given. In truth, such a right to rescind is a right to say "no" when the time arrives for performance. It may be that a person who rescinds must give notice; but when? He does give notice when he refuses; is he bound to give it earlier—if so, why? In the not very probable case of the lady going to the altar without previous arrangement, surely he might, if afflicted as the defendant is, fairly send word, in answer to the invitation to join her, that he would not. In the more probable case of some previous request, he refuses when it is made; in other words, till he refuses there is no breach of contract, and when he refuses, he by so doing gives notice that he will not perform. Is he bound to say why? I cannot understand why he is. No doubt, if after his disability arises he goes on with the engagement, he may well be bound, as that would be evidence that the original contract was not conditioned as I think ordinary contracts to marry are, or would furnish evidence of a fresh contract. Further, if it is said that the facts proved only justify a postponement of marriage, I think the plea good. The plaintiff complains the defendant refused: the defendant says, "When I did, I had a sufficient reason." I do not understand the breach to be "you refused, and refused for ever." I do not understand such a breach in point of law. I do not understand what is meant by a plea "in excuse or suspension of the performance," as distinguished from "or in discharge of the promise." Hochster v. De La Tour (11) turns on the relation of master and servant. If I contract to do a thing and am sued for not doing it, it is a good defence to say the time for doing it has not arrived, and I take it it would be a bad replication to say, "True, but you said you would": see Avery v. Bowden (12).

The plaintiff can only be entitled to recover on these pleadings and proof on the ground that the asserted and proved incompetency is no ground for refusing to marry when the request so to do is made. I am of opinion it is. In short, the defendant here says: "You complain I refused; I admit that I did so for a good reason, namely, my performance was conditional on my continuing in a competent state, and I ceased to be so." If the plaintiff meant to say the contract was not so conditioned, she should have given evidence, in my opinion, that the contract in this case was not of the ordinary contract to marry. If she meant to say there was a new contract evidenced by the engagement continuing after the disability was known, she should have new assigned. But if she relies on and proves the common contract only, it is, in my opinion, a good answer to prove that the defendant, when he refused, laboured under either of the infirmities mentioned in this case. If I am to say whether I think the contract ended by such an event, I say I do, and on this ground—that it is so vitally for the benefit of both parties that that should be the agreement between them, that common sense requires it to be so implied. The disability of the defendant, if not incurable, was one of indefinite duration, and of a lasting character. Had it been that he broke a leg, or was afflicted with a fever which disabled him from marriage at the time appointed, I should have thought him not liable to an action for not marrying then, but bound to marry on his recovering. This last consideration seems to me to suggest an argument in favour of the contract being conditional as suggested, for in ordinary contracts, if not liable at the day appointed, the person would not be at another time; but in this contract it is absurd to suppose that, if a day was named for a marriage, and the man broke his leg, was ill of a fever, lost a parent, or from some other consideration of health or decency could not marry on the day in question, he would either be liable to an action, or wholly discharged from the promise to marry. The same good sense and convenience which would reject such a conclusion would, in my judgment, require that the contract should be construed with the conditions I attach. For these reasons, as well as those of WIGHTMAN, J., and ERLE, J., I think the judgment of the court below should be affirmed.

WILLES, J.—I am of opinion, for the reasons stated at large by LORD CAMPBELL in the court below, that the judgment therein given against his Lordship's opinion, and that of CROMPTON, J., ought to be reversed, and judgment given for the plaintiff

- A for the damages assessed in her favour by the jury, with costs. This is not a case of impotency, and I need give no opinion upon such a case. The law is clear upon the point that only impotency, permanent and incurable, such as that which results from the loss of one of the necessary organs of generation, constitutes an impediment to marriage, and not that which may be temporary or curable. The contract in this case, as stated by the plaintiff in the declaration, is admitted by the defendant in his plea to be an unconditional contract, and, being in terms an unconditional one, it is guesswork, not construction, to read it as conditional. Its performance is not impossible, and it is not enough to show, in analogy to an action upon a contract, that its performance is inconvenient, or might be dangerous. The delicacy of health alleged as an excuse is the man's misfortune, not to be visited, beyond what is inevitable, upon the woman. If either party is to have the option of breaking off the match, it ought to be the woman. The court have no right to say what is best for her. If the man were rich or distinguished, and the woman mercenary or ambitious, she might still desire to marry him for advancement in life. I do not sympathise with such a woman, if any there be. But this is not a question of sentiment; if it were, I might put the case of a real attachment, where such an illness as that stated in the plea supervening might make the woman more anxious to marry, in order to be a companion and the nurse, if she could not be the mistress, of her sweetheart. For these reasons I think the judgment of the court below ought to be reversed, and judgment given for the plaintiff.

- CROWDER, J.—The question in this case is whether the plea affords any legal answer to the declaration, and I am of opinion that it does not. The declaration is upon a contract to marry, and avers the breach of that contract by not marrying in a reasonable time. The plea, as I understand it, admits the breach as alleged in the declaration, but sets up an excuse for it, and the question to be decided is whether that excuse is a legal answer to the declaration. I think that it is quite impossible to construe the defendant's plea as alleging any physical impossibility to go through the ceremony of marriage, or any physical incapacity to perform the duties of marriage. Whether, if such allegations had existed, they need have afforded any answer to the declaration, I do not think it necessary in this case to decide, and I abstain from giving any opinion upon that point. But I am of opinion that it is no excuse for the breach of a promise to marry that the performance of the conjugal duties need be attended with danger to the defendant's life. Such a state of illness renders it matter of the greatest prudence on his part to break his contract, and to pay such damages as the jury may award against him for the breach, but, in my opinion, it is no legal answer to this action. I desire to refer to the arguments and reasoning of LORD CAMPBELL in the court below, as conclusive in my mind upon this view of the case. It would be idle for me to repeat them, and I think, therefore, the judgment should be for the plaintiff below.

- H MARTIN, B.—This is an appeal from the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench. The action is for a breach of promise to marry. The declaration is in the common form, alleging a promise to marry within a reasonable time. Among other pleas, the defendant pleaded that before breach he became, and was, and is, afflicted with a dangerous bodily disease which occasioned frequent and severe bleeding from the lungs, by reason of which disease he became and was, and is, incapable of marriage without great danger to his life, and, therefore, unfit for the marriage state; whereof the plaintiff before action (not before breach) had notice. Issue was joined upon this plea. The cause was tried before ERLE, J., and the jury found that all the averments in the plea were proved, except that as to notice. The judge directed the verdict to be entered for the defendant, giving the plaintiff leave to move to enter it for her. The other issues were found for the plaintiff, and the damages assessed contingently at £100. A rule was obtained to enter the verdict for the plaintiff; and after argument the court were equally divided, LORD CAMPBELL and CROMPTON, J., holding the plea bad, in which case, the averment in it not being proved, the plaintiff would be entitled to have the verdict entered for her, while WIGHTMAN, J., and ERLE, J., thought the plea as proved good. CROMPTON, J., being the junior judge, gave way for the purpose of this appeal, and the plaintiff's rule was discharged. A

I agree with LORD CAMPBELL and CROMPTON, J., and think the plea not good. The law of England permits an action to recover damages for the breach of the promise to marry although I am aware that many persons think such an action should not be allowed. The action is not for the specific performance—a suit which I apprehend no court in this country would entertain—but for damages for the non-performance of the contract. The plea is one in confession and avoidance of the facts alleged in it (exclusive of the notice to the plaintiff). The defendant ought to excuse or justify the breach. The judges of the Court of Queen's Bench do not seem to have been agreed as to the exact meaning of the plea. But, to put it in the most favourable way for the defendant, it may be assumed that the promise to marry involves the promise to consummate the marriage, and that the incapacity and danger to life mentioned in the plea has been caused by an inevitable misfortune, without any act or conduct of the defendant conducing to it. B C

The general rule upon the subject is that when a person by his own contract creates a duty or charge upon himself, he is bound to make it good if he may, notwithstanding any accident by inevitable necessity, because he might have provided against it by his contract: Paradine v. Jane (4), cited and acted on in Hadley v. Clarke (13), and Atkinson v. Ritchie (14): see also COMYNS' DIGEST "Assumpsit" G.; and I know of no authority, except it be Lawrence v. Twentiman (15), having any tendency to shake it, or to show that such a state of facts as alleged in the plea is an answer to an action for pecuniary damages for the breach of a contract to marry. I think it very much better to adhere to the rule than to create an arbitrary exception, for which, no doubt, plausible reasons may be given. To admit exceptions of this kind utterly destroys the certainty of law, and, in my opinion, is inconvenient. But in the present case what the defendant promised to do was to marry the plaintiff, and this he could have done. It is quite consistent with the averment in the plea that the incapacity and danger to life may have been caused by the defendant's own acts or conduct, and a case will rightly suggest itself where, after an agreement to marry, an incapacity to consummate marriage and danger to life in attempting to do so might arise in which it would seem absurd to suppose that damages could not be recovered. The supposed objection of the plaintiff would be the grossest aggravation of the cause of action. D E F

As to Lawrence v. Twentiman (15), except it be explainable in the manner suggested by LORD CAMPBELL in his judgment in this case—namely, that time was not of the essence of the contract, or that the law relating to holding intercourse with persons affected by the plague (1 Jas. 1, c. 31), made the performance of his contract illegal—I cannot agree with it. It is no doubt referred to in several books of authority, but, unless explained by others, it seems contrary to the rule of law. The placitum is to the effect that a man had contracted to build a house before a given day, but was excused because the plague had broken out and continued to the day in the very neighbourhood, but, it is added, he must build it afterwards. Unless the contract really was to build the house within a reasonable time, or the building was illegal (in which case, the decision, by reason of the existence of the plague in that neighbourhood, was right), this case cannot be sustained. How is it possible to maintain covenant by any obligation to build it afterwards? The builder never contracted to do so, and the common law could not impose such a contract upon him: see SHEPPARD'S TOUCHSTONE by PRESTON, p. 174; and Barker v. Hodgson (5), which seem to the contrary. It must be that the law deems the contract to marry to be one of pecuniary value, and assuming that it could not reasonably be enforced under the circumstances stated in the plea that the defendant should marry the plaintiff, I can see no reason why he should not compensate her for the breach of the contract. Why should the consequences of the mistake fall upon her, and not upon the defendant?: see LORD ELLENBOROUGH's judgment in Barker v. G H I

A Hodgson (5), and the dicta of LORD HOLT in Thornborow v. Whitacre (16). For these reasons I think the judgment of the court below ought to be reversed.

WILLIAMS, J.—I am also of opinion that the plea is bad. The plaintiff is, therefore, entitled to the judgment of the court. It appears to me to be a plea in confession and avoidance; that is to say, the defendant pleads that he is justified for not keeping the promise because after making it he became incapable of marriage without great danger to his life. I am of opinion that, though this may be a good reason why he should not be compelled to a specific performance of the contract, and a very good reason why he should in prudence prefer paying damages for the breach of his contract in not performing it, it is no ground for resisting the payment of damages, according to the general rule of law applicable to such contracts. The plea is insufficient in conformity with the rule cited by LORD CAMPBELL in his judgment, which is laid down in Paradine v. Jane (4), and which is established by the authority in SERJT. WILLIAMS's notes to Walton v. Waterhouse (17) (2 Wms. Saund. at p. 422). But it is alleged that the contract to marry stands on a peculiar footing, and is subject to implied conditions peculiar to themselves; and the authorities certainly afford ground for contending that if the parties in this case had been reversed the present plaintiff might have set up the bodily infirmity of the present defendant as a ground for refusing to perform her contract, just as he might have pleaded her corporeal inaptitude for marriage or want of chastity, which might have been discovered since the making of the contract.

There is no authority that I am aware of, or any good reason, for allowing one party to set up his or her corporeal infirmity or unfitness for marriage, or his or her immorality, in answer to the requisition of one who may nevertheless wish and insist on the performance of the contract. The woman would not be allowed to plead her own want of chastity if she was sued for a breach of promise of marriage, notwithstanding the man might be allowed to set it up as an answer if she were to seek to enforce the contract. It has been argued that this is not a plea in confession and avoidance, but a kind of circuitous traverse of a reasonable time having elapsed before the matter which suspended the performance of the contract. In answer to this it is enough to say I entirely agree in the view that LORD CAMPBELL, C.J., and CROMPTON, J., have taken, and I adhere to what they have said on this head. But I would add that this question, though a nice and curious one, is not likely, in my opinion, to be of great practical importance, because surely the cases must be very rare where a woman, if she is informed that the man to whom she is affianced is in such a state of health at the time of the alleged promise as to incapacitate him, and is requested to excuse him from the completion of the marriage contract, would insist on the performance of it; or where, if she were so advised, to bring an action for breach of promise of marriage, that a jury could be found who, under such circumstances, would give her more than nominal damages. In the present case the defendant broke off the marriage without informing the plaintiff that he had such grounds. For these reasons I am of opinion that the judgment should be affirmed.

POLLOCK, C.B.—After the discussion that this case has undergone, I do not think it necessary to say anything on the form of the pleadings, but I shall proceed at once to the question upon which a difference of opinion was raised among the members of this court and the court below, and that is, what is the real meaning of a contract to marry within a reasonable time, which is the contract stated in the declaration? Some learned judges think it is of the same character as any other contract, and that no waiver or conditions can be implied by the law, and that, if it be not performed in the terms expressed, the parties failing to perform it must pay damages for the breach. Other learned judges think that there are implied conditions and exceptions on the subject, and that the matter stated in this plea is one of them, and that, therefore, the defendant cannot be called on to pay damages for the non-performance, as alleged in the declaration, under the circumstances which appear upon the whole record.

It must be conceded on all hands that there are contracts to which the law implies exceptions and conditions which are not expressed. All contracts for personal services, which can be performed only during the lifetime of the party contracting, are subject to implied conditions that he shall be alive to perform it, and that should he die, his executor is not liable to an action for the breach of contract occasioned by his death: so a contract by an author to write a book within a reasonable time, or by a painter to paint a picture within a reasonable time, would, in my judgment, be deemed subject to the condition, that if the author became insane, or the painter became blind, and so incapable of performing the contract by the act of God, he is not liable personally in damages any more than his executors would be liable if he had been removed by death. In truth, the reasonable time has not arrived if the party contracting to perform the act has been deprived by illness of the means of performing it. But I should decline to put my judgment on that ground, though I think that in this case, and on this record, it would be quite sufficient. I prefer putting it on the broader ground, namely, that there is an implied exception in a contract of marriage, including the state of facts alleged in the plea and found by the jury to be true. In the case of an ordinary contract to marry, such as is presented to the court by the evidence in an action of this sort, I think no one can doubt that the continuance of life is an implied condition, though certainly not expressed.

The question then is, really, in this case: Is the condition of the continuance of health—that is, of such a state of health as makes it not improper to marry—an implied condition? I am of opinion that it is. There are conditions to be implied in such a contract on both sides. I think every one would admit that there is a condition on the part of the female that she should continue chaste. The contract contains no such expression at all; it is introduced by the law, because it is a perfectly reasonable condition and what every one must suppose the parties intended, and, perhaps, more generally—though this is not so clear and would possibly not so readily meet with the assent of everybody—but, perhaps, there may also be a condition that the conduct of the woman should not be such as to make a marriage with her improper. For instance, it has been decided in the case of want of chastity that the contract to marry cannot be enforced. Can it be enforced where the character of the woman has become referable to some other breach of good conduct or immorality? Could she enforce the contract in that case? If she yielded to other indulgences besides those of not preserving her chastity, by not keeping one particle of her sobriety, could she enforce the contract? If she forgot what was due to the laws of the country, as being dishonest, and were sentenced for some petty larceny to so many months' imprisonment and hard labour, could she then enforce the contract to marry? I should have thought certainly not.

I think that one test that may be safely applied to ascertain whether any such condition may be implied or not, is to consider what would have been the case if the man were, after making such a promise to marry, to lose by accident or disease the capacity to contract matrimony by becoming impotent. I put it in the large and perfect sense to which WILLIAMS, J., has alluded in his judgment. To such a case the decisions about impossibility I think will apply. By the act of God the contract has become void, and I may here incidentally, with reference to what fell from MARTIN, B., say that the plea in this case states that the defendant became and was, and from thenceforth has been, and still is, afflicted with a dangerous bodily disease. I apprehend, in all cases, the presumption of law is that disease or death is the visitation of God, and is so to be treated by us in considering this record. But, in the case that I am putting, of a man by accident or disease becoming altogether unfit for matrimony, the contract to marry has, in my opinion, become void, because the party cannot contract matrimony. The man may go through the ceremony of marriage, but he cannot marry. A ceremony gone through by such a man with a person of the other sex does not constitute a marriage. Assuming the fact to be so, and when the time arrived the marriage would become

- A in question and the court would have to consider whether it was a marriage or not, they would be bound to treat it as no marriage at all: the ceremony would not be binding, and would operate nothing. The contract to marry in reality is broken by the very calamity of his becoming impotent. It has been suggested that in such a case the woman may be contented with the society of the man, and that the choice ought to rest with her, and if she is willing to marry he must marry or pay damages.
- B I am of opinion that such is not the law of this country. I think, if a man were to say with truth: "By the visitation of Providence I am not capable of marriage," he cannot be called on to marry or pay damages for not marrying. I think this is an implied exception in all agreements to marry, and I think the view of the law which puts a contract to marry on the same footing as a bargain for a horse or a bale of goods is not in accordance with the general feelings of mankind, and is supported by no authority.

C I think the judgment of the court below ought to be affirmed. There being, however, a majority, four of the judges being of opinion that the judgment should be reversed and three only that it should be affirmed, the judgment of the court below is reversed and judgment given for the plaintiff.

Appeal allowed.

TODD v. FLIGHT

F [COURT OF COMMON PLEAS (Erle, C.J., Williams, Byles and Keating, JJ.), November 20, 1860]

Landlord and Tenant—Reversion—Damage to reversion—Damage through ill-repair of adjoining premises—Liability of reversioner of adjoining premises.

- G The defendant, the reversioner of premises of which the chimneys were in a ruinous and dangerous state, let the premises to B. Subsequently the chimneys fell down and damaged adjoining buildings of which the plaintiff was the reversioner.

H Held: the defendant was liable to the plaintiff for the damage sustained, notwithstanding that the premises were occupied by a tenant, as, at the time of the letting, the defendant knew that the chimneys were in a ruinous and dangerous state and so was guilty of the wrongful non-repair.

Per Curiam: If a wrong causing damage arises from nonfeasance or misfeasance of the lessor, the party suffering damage from the wrong may sue him.

Action for damages for the loss caused to the plaintiff's building by the falling down of the defendant's chimneys which were alleged to be in a ruinous state.

The plaintiff was the reversioner of a building and chapel which he leased to Francis Cuthbertson, John Henry Adams and Walter Arthur King, as tenants in possession. The defendant was the reversioner of a building adjoining the plaintiff's property and which was leased to Benjamin Batt, as tenant in occupation. The plaintiff alleged that the chimneys on the defendant's building were in a "dilapidated, decayed, ruinous, insecure and improper state" and were in danger of falling down and damaging the plaintiff's buildings; and that the defendant well knowing the state of the premises had let the building to Benjamin Batt, as tenant, and wrongfully permitted the chimneys to continue to be kept in the same state of repair until the chimneys fell down on to and damaged the plaintiff's building.

The defendant denied that the chimneys were in an insecure state and contended that the obligation to repair rested on the occupier and not on the lessor and that any damage was the liability of the occupier. The plaintiff maintained that the defendant having leased his building with the chimneys in a dangerous state, with an existing nuisance and having continued it was liable for the damage notwithstanding that he had leased the premises to a tenant.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 20, 1860. ERLE, C.J., delivered the following judgment of the court.—In this case the plaintiff's right to sue someone in respect of the damage he sustained from the fall of the defendant's chimneys was not denied, so that it is not necessary for us to advert to the authorities on the rights of parties in respect of adjoining premises, nor to say whether the writ de domo reparandâ would lie at common law,

A as said in Co. Litt. 56, a; or only by local custom, as said by LORD HOLT, C.J., in Tenant v. Goldwin (1); or to consider what were the rights on a quod permittat issued in a case of nuisance.

The point here in contest is whether the defendant is the proper party to be sued. As to this point the material allegations are that the defendant at the time the cause of action arose was the reversioner, he having demised the premises to B Batt, who was then in occupation; that the chimneys were ruinous and in danger of falling, and were known by him to be so at the time when he demised them to Batt; and that he has, therefore, kept and maintained them in such ruinous and dangerous state. Upon the facts the defendant contended that the action should be against the lessee in occupation, and not against himself, being the reversioner, and cited Cheetham v. Hampson (2), where the action was for non-repair of fences, C and was held to lie against the landlord; and also Russell v. Shenton (3), where the action was for not cleansing the drains and sewers, and was held not to lie against the landlord.

On the other hand, the plaintiff contended that in many cases the party suffering damage from a nuisance had the option of suing either the lessee in occupation or the lessor. Thus, where the damage was from the non-repair of a trap-door over D a cellar, and it appeared that it was the duty of the lessor to do this repair, as between him and the lessee, it was held that the action lay against the lessor: Payne v. Rogers (4); and where the damage arose from the wrongful act of the defendant in erecting a wall which obstructed the plaintiff's right, and the defendant had, before action brought, leased the premises to the party who was in possession, still the lessor was held liable for the continuance of the wall after the lease, because E it existed at the time of the demise: Rosewell v. Prior (5). So where the lessor demised houses, either with a privy or with the right of resorting thereto, it was held that if he demised the privy, either when it had become a nuisance, or if he had the duty of cleansing it after it became a nuisance, he might be indicted for the nuisance: R. v. Pedley (6). These cases are authorities for saying, if a wrong causing damage arises from nonfeasance or misfeasance of the lessor, the party F suffering damage from the wrong may sue him.

We are of opinion that the principle so contended for on the part of the plaintiff is the law, and common to all the cases. In Cheetham v. Hampson (2), it was held the action did not lie against the landlord for non-repair of the fences, because he had no duty to repair them, and therefore was guilty of no wrong in non-repair. So in Russell v. Shenton (3) the court affirmed the lessor not bound to cleanse the G drains during the damage, and so was guilty of no wrong. In Rich v. Basterfield (7) the lessor was held liable for the damage occasioned by smoke from the fires which the lessee chose to make, but the reasoning of the judgment assumes it to be law that the lessor may be liable in cases of nuisance if he has been guilty of a wrong, causing the smoke which made the cause of action. This is expressed in many parts of the judgment, but more particularly after commenting on R. v. H Pedley (6), CRESSWELL, J., says (4 C.B. at p. 805):

"If the lessor had demised the buildings when the nuisance existed, or had relet them after the use of the buildings had created the nuisance, or had undertaken the cleansing and had not performed it, we think he would have been made liable properly."

I In the present case it is assumed that the defendant let the houses when the chimneys were known by him to be ruinous and in danger of falling, and he kept and maintained them in that state; thus he was guilty of the wrongful non-repair that led to the damage, and after the demise the fall had arisen from no default of the lessee, but by the laws of nature. We, therefore, hold the action lies against the lessor, and our judgment is for the plaintiff.

Judgment for plaintiff.

Landlord and Tenant—Reversion—Damage to reversion—Nuisance during tenancy—Permanency of damage.

In order to give the reversioner the right to sue for nuisance during a tenancy the injury to the reversion must be of a permanent nature.

The defendant erected buildings and furnaces adjoining premises occupied by a tenant of the plaintiff, and caused fires, smoke, and noise to the great annoyance of the tenant.

Held: the causing of the noise, fires and smoke, being acts of a temporary character and such as might be discontinued at any time before the end of the tenant's term, were not sufficient to enable the plaintiff to maintain an action for injury to his reversion.

A Rule Nisi obtained by the defendant to enter a nonsuit in an action for injury to a reversionary interest in land.

The plaintiff alleged injury to his reversion by the erection of a manufactory on the adjoining property and causing considerable volumes of smoke to issue from chimneys that the defendant had there erected. The plaintiff also complained of loud noises which prevented the occupants of his house adjoining from sleeping, and of fires that were made in the open air, which caused smoke and dirt with sparks to fly over his premises.

C The action was tried before LORD CAMPBELL, C.J., who ruled that the fires in the yard being of a temporary character only, would not be considered as an injury to the reversion, and that the action could not be maintained on that account, but with reference to the fires erected in the foundry, and the smoke that issued from the chimneys, he said that this was distinguishable from Mumford v. Oxford, Worcester and Wolverhampton Rail. Co. (1), and that there was evidence to go to the jury of an injury to the reversion, but he reserved leave to move to enter a nonsuit, if the court should think there was no injury to the reversion. On the argument it was insisted that the injury done by the defendant need not be of a permanent nature, and it was sufficient to show that it was of such a description as would cause the reversion in the premises to sell for a smaller sum if brought into the market.

Serjeant Byles and Couch for the plaintiff.

O'Malley, Q.C. (with him Keane), for the defendant.

Cur. adv. vult.

E Dec. 1, 1856. CRESSWELL, J., delivered the following judgment of the court, in which after stating the facts as set out above and the arguments of counsel, he continued:—After considering the authorities, we are of opinion that since, in order to give the reversioner an action of this kind there must be some injury done to the inheritance, the necessity is involved of the injury being of a permanent character. The earliest instances of such an action are for cutting trees, subverting the soil, and erecting a dam across a stream, so as to cause it to flow over the plaintiff's land. In the two former cases the thing done was not removable during the term; in the third it was removable but being of a permanent character, it was assumed that it would remain and, therefore, it was treated as an injury to the reversion. The decision in Jesser v. Gifford (2), falls within the same principle. A window was obstructed; the obstruction was of a permanent character, and would remain unless something was done to remedy the evil. Tucker v. Newman (3) belongs to the same class.

H The buildings erected in this case did not injure the plaintiff's inheritance, and the real subject-matter of complaint, therefore, since the erection of the buildings, was causing smoke to issue from the chimneys. If the fires had not been made by the defendant he could not have sued for an injury either to the premises or to the inheritance, according to Rich v. Basterfield (4). The making of fires and causing smoke to issue was not an act of a permanent nature. It is very like Baxter v. Taylor (5), where a person trespassed asserting a right of way, and it is not distinguishable from Mumford v. Oxford, Worcester and Wolverhampton Rail. Co. (1), where the action was brought against the defendant, the occupier of certain sheds, for making engines, for noises there, which caused the tenants of the plaintiff to leave the premises and give notice to quit. The real complaint by the reversioner is, that he fears the defendant or some other occupier of the adjoining premises will continue to make fires and cause smoke to issue from the chimneys; and if the reversion would sell for less, it is not on account of anything that has been done, but the apprehension of something that would be done at a future time. According to the authorities we feel bound to say that this is not such an injury as will enable the reversioner to maintain an action; and, therefore, the rule to enter a nonsuit must be made absolute.

Rule absolute.

Distress—For rent—Distress at night—"Night"—Between sunset and sunrise—Legality.

Distress for rent may not be made at night, which for this purpose is the interval between sunset and sunrise and not between dark and daybreak.

Notes. It has been held in Werth v. London and Westminster Loan and Discount Co. (1889), 5 T.L.R. 521 at p. 522, that levying distress after sunset is an irregularity which may be waived by the tenant, but this decision was criticised in Perring & Co. v. Emerson, [1904-7] All E.R.Rep. 641 at p. 643: per WILLS, J. (see 12 HALSBURY'S LAWS (3rd Edn.) 116 (g)).

Considered: Nash v. Lucas (1867), L.R. 2 Q.B. 590.

As to when distress may be made, see 12 HALSBURY'S LAWS (3rd Edn.) 115 et seq.; and for cases see 18 DIGEST 310 et seq.

Tinckler v. Prentice (1812), 4 Taunt. 549; 128 E.R. 445; 31 Digest (Repl.) 325, 4607.

Rule Nisi obtained by the plaintiff to enter verdict in an action for wrongful distress.

At the trial before MARTIN, B., it appeared that the defendant had taken the plaintiff's goods as a distress for rent; that the distress was perfectly regular in all respects except that the entry was made shortly after sunset, but at a time when it was still perfectly light; it was contended that the distress was unlawful, as made after sunset. The judge directed a nonsuit, reserving leave to the plaintiff to move to enter a verdict for £15, at which amount damages were assessed by the jury. A rule to that effect was subsequently obtained.

Hawkins, Q.C., for the defendant, showed cause against the rule.

Lush, Q.C., and C. E. Pollock for the plaintiff, supported the rule.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 8, 1860. MARTIN, B., delivered the following judgment of the court.—A distress was made for rent a short time after sunset, and it was alleged on behalf of the plaintiff that it was an illegal distress, and entitled the plaintiff to recover, notwithstanding that the rent was due, and the distress was otherwise properly conducted. A nonsuit was entered, with leave to move to enter the verdict for £15, the sum at which damages were assessed by the jury. A rule was obtained to enter the verdict for the plaintiff, and it was argued. However, the same point afterwards arose in Nixon v. Freeman, and the point has been not less than four times argued in this court. I am to give the judgment in Tutton v. Darke, and also on that other point as to Nixon v. Freeman.

It is perfectly plain on all the authorities that a distress must be taken in the daytime; and the only question is whether daytime is to be understood to be after sunrise and before sunset, or after daybreak and before dusk? We are of opinion that sunrise and sunset forms the true limit. A vast number of cases were cited, and a vast number of authorities on burglary and actions against the hundred, and a variety of other matters, and all the cases in which the words "day" and "night" seem to have occurred; but it is sufficient to say that in COKE UPON LITTLETON 142 a, it is laid down how that is to be understood. There I find: "The lord cannot distrain in the night, but in the daytime"; and the reference to that appears

A to be the MIRROUR OF JUSTICES, c. 2, s. 26, where it is expressly laid down that daytime is after sunrise and before sunset. It is to be observed that, as far as I can recollect, there was not a single case in contradiction of that. The words "day" and "night" were used, but there was not a single case or dictum to say that day and night meant any otherwise than sunrise and sunset.

B We are, therefore, of opinion that a distress must be made between sunrise and sunset for the purpose of making it legal. I may add, that COKE UPON LITTLETON, 202 a, in speaking of a demand of rent for the purpose of saving a condition, states that the demand is to be made at a convenient time before the last sun-setting of the last day of payment. There is no ambiguity at all; and I apprehend the true time for making a distress and making a demand is before sunset.

C The question may arise, what is sun-rising or sun-setting? We do not mean to give any opinion on that. In these cases two of them were clearly before the sun had made his appearance at all; one was in the morning, and the other at night.

Clearly the sun was in no sense up when this occurred; and, therefore the rule properly is for people to distrain in the day, and not absolutely to run it so very fine between sunrise and sunset.

D I may add, there were some doubts thrown on the MIRROUR OF JUSTICES; but it has existed from the time of King Alfred, and in the reports it is spoken of in the highest possible terms by COKE as an authority not to be treated lightly. In this case, therefore, the plaintiff is entitled to the judgment of the court, and the rule will be absolute for entering the verdict for £15. That will govern the main point in Nixon v. Freeman.

Rule absolute.

ChamPERTY—Agreement to give information to enable recipient to recover property—No proceedings contemplated—Share of property recovered payable to informant—Agreement to give information and evidence if proceedings taken.

H An agreement to give information and furnish documents to a person to enable him to recover property on the terms that the informant will receive a share of the property if and when it is recovered, there being no legal proceedings pending and no stipulation is made for the commencement of any proceedings, is legal. But an agreement to give information and evidence in the event of proceedings being taken to recover the property in consideration of receiving a share of the property recovered is champertous and illegal.

Demurrers in an action to enforce an agreement.

The first count of the declaration stated that the plaintiff and one Rosaz were in possession of certain documents and information to prove that the defendant was entitled to certain property of which he was not then aware: that they then proposed to give him, the defendant, all the documents and information in their possession on his agreeing to pay to each of them one-fifth of the value of such property if it should actually come into his possession, to which proposal he agreed; that thereupon an agreement in writing was entered into, whereby the defendant, in consideration of the premises, agreed that, if by the said documents and information he should actually become possessed of any property not then in his possession and control, and of which he was not then aware, he would pay to each of them, the plaintiff and Rosaz, one-fifth of the value of the property to be recovered and possessed by him as aforesaid. It was thereby further agreed that the defendant should not be compelled to take any proceedings at law or in equity to recover the said property; that the defendant would not make known to any person the documents or information so to be communicated to him without the consent of the plaintiffs in writing; that the defendant should execute all necessary deeds for assigning the one-fifth of the property so recovered; that if the defendant did not become possessed of any property he should not be called on to pay anything; that if the defendant did not think proper to proceed to recover the property, he would return the papers, and thereupon the agreement should be cancelled.

- A The declaration further stated that on the furnishing of the said documents and evidence certain legal proceedings had been taken by the defendant, and that he had recovered thereby property to the amount of £52,000; that the plaintiff had done all things to entitle him to the payment of the fifth, but that the defendant had not paid it. There were also counts for work and labour, for money lent, and on an account stated.
- B By the seventh plea to the first count the defendant pleaded that one Townley had died intestate, possessed of considerable personal property without any of his relations being known; that administration had been granted to the Treasury Solicitor for the benefit of her Majesty; that the defendant was ignorant of his being related to Townley, or in any manner entitled to the property; that the plaintiff and Rosaz then represented to the defendant that they would supply and
- C give certain existing information and evidence, in case it should become necessary that proceedings should be taken by the defendant at law or in equity for the recovery of the property; that through or by means of such information and evidence the defendant should and might successfully recover the property, provided the defendant would enter into an agreement with the plaintiff and Rosaz to pay to each of them one-fifth of the property so recovered; that it was thereupon unlaw-
- D fully agreed between the parties that the plaintiff and Rosaz should give and supply such information and evidence, in case of its being necessary to take proceedings at law or in equity for the recovery of the property; and, if by means of such information and evidence the defendant should succeed in recovering the property, he would pay each of them one-fifth of the amount. The plea then alleged that, for the purpose of carrying out this illegal agreement, the parties entered into the supposed
- E agreement set out in the first count.
- By the eleventh plea to the whole declaration the defendant stated that, after the making of the agreement, and after the accrual of the causes of action, the plaintiff petitioned the Insolvent Debtors Court; that a vesting order had been made, that a trade assignee had been appointed, and that all his property was vested in the assignee.
- F The plaintiff demurred to all the above pleas.
- Bovill, Q.C. (with him Lush), for the defendant.*
Hill, Q.C. (Montagu Chambers, Q.C., and Milward with him), for the plaintiff.

Cur. adv. vult.

- Nov. 25, 1856. LORD CAMPBELL, C.J., delivered the following judgment of
- G the court.—In this case we must begin by considering the validity of the first count of the declaration. The defendant contends that the agreement on which it is framed is illegal, as being contrary to public policy and the laws against champerty and maintenance. But we are of opinion that nothing appears on the face of the declaration to support this objection.
- H The plaintiff alleges that Rosaz and he were in possession of certain documents and information to prove that the defendant was entitled to certain property of which the defendant was not aware, and proposed to give him all the documents and information in their possession, on defendant's agreeing to pay them each one-fifth of the value of the property if it should actually come into his possession; to that the defendant assented; and thereupon a written agreement was signed by the parties, whereby the defendant agreed that, if by the said documents and information
- I he should actually become possessed of any property, not then in his possession or control and of which he did not know, he would pay to each of the plaintiff and Rosaz one-fifth of the value of the property to be recovered and possessed by the defendant. It was also agreed that the defendant should not be compelled, for the purposes of that agreement, to take any proceedings at law or in equity to recover the property; that the defendant would not make known to any person the documents or information so communicated to him without the consent of plaintiff in writing; that the defendant would execute all necessary deeds for assigning the one-fifth of the property so recovered; that, if the defendant did not become possessed of any property, he should not be called upon to pay anything; and that, if A the defendant did not think proper to proceed to recover the property, he would return the papers, and thereupon the agreement should be cancelled.

No statute, nor decided case, nor dictum, was cited at the Bar, showing that there is any illegality in this agreement. No suit was depending; and there is no stipulation for the commencement of any suit for the recovery of this property. The plaintiff and Rosaz were merely to communicate certain documents and information B then in their possession to the defendant; and, having done so, they were to do no more. The documents and information must be presumed to be genuine and sincere. The property might well be recovered without any litigation, the documents and information communicated making out a clear and conclusive title in the defendant to recover it. At any rate, the defendant was not to be forced into litigation; and, if he did resort to litigation, the plaintiff and Rosaz were not to furnish him C with money to carry it on, or to provide him with any further evidence, or in any way to assist or to countenance him. There seems abundant consideration for the defendant's promise, both in what the plaintiff and Rosaz did, and in the advantage which the defendant was to derive therefrom. And his promise was merely to make over a portion of that which was his own. We, therefore, do not think that the agreement at all savours of maintenance or champerty, or is in any way contrary D to public policy. It does not resemble any of the cases relied upon, in which agreements have been held illegal; and there seems to be no occasion for our going over those cases and distinguishing the present from them.

However, when we come to the pleas demurred to, we think it equally clear that, giving credit to their allegations, they show the agreement to be illegal.
There can be no doubt that the defendant is at liberty to allege that the written E agreement declared upon was merely colourable, and to disclose, as a defence, the real nature of the transaction. Accordingly, the seventh plea, after stating the defendant's ignorance of his being in any way entitled to the property, goes on to allege that the plaintiff and Rosaz represented to the defendant that they would supply and give such information and evidence in case it should become necessary that proceedings should be had and taken by the defendant at law or in equity for F the recovery of the property, so that, through and by means of such information and evidence, the defendant should successfully recover the property, provided the defendant would enter into an agreement with the plaintiff and Rosaz to pay each of them one-fifth of the property so recovered; and it was thereupon unlawfully agreed between the parties that the plaintiff and Rosaz should give and supply such information and evidence, in case of proceedings being taken at law or in equity G for the recovery of the property; and that, if by means of such information and evidence the defendant should actually recover the property, he would pay each of them one-fifth of the amount.

The plea then goes on to allege that, for the purpose of carrying this illegal agreement into effect, the parties entered into the supposed agreement set out in the first count of the declaration, and shows that it was under the illegal agreement H that the property actually was recovered. Here we have maintenance in its worst aspect. The plaintiff and Rosaz, entire strangers to the property which they say the defendant has a title to, but which is in the possession of another claiming title to it, agree with him that legal proceedings shall be instituted in his name for the recovery of it, and that they will supply him, not with any specified or definite documents or information, but with evidence that should be sufficient to enable him I successfully to recover the property. Each of them is to have one-fifth of the property, when so recovered; and, unless the evidence with which they supply him is sufficient for this purpose, they are to receive nothing. They are not to employ the attorney or to advance money to carry on the litigation; but they are to supply that upon which the event of the suit must depend, evidence: and they are to supply it of such a nature and in such quantity as to ensure success. The plaintiff purchases an interest in the property in dispute, bargains for litigation to recover it, and undertakes to maintain the defendant in the suit in a manner of all others the

A most likely to lead to perjury and to a perversion of justice. Upon principle such an agreement is clearly illegal: and Stanley v. Jones (1) is an express authority to that effect. The eighth plea, pleaded to the money counts, is substantially the same as the seventh, and is, we think, equally a bar. The ninth plea is still a little stronger, and is allowed by the plaintiff's counsel to be sufficient.

Judgment for defendant.

Appeal by the plaintiff from a decision of WIGRAM, V.-C., in an action brought by the plaintiff, as assignee of a legacy, against the executors of the testator to obtain payment of the legacy out of the assets of the testator.

The testator, Aldborough Richardson, by his will dated May 16, 1825, bequeathed £2,500 to the defendant and three other trustees, on trust to pay the interest, dividends and annual produce from time to time, as the same should be received into the proper hands of Robert Hamilton for his own use and benefit, for and during his natural life. The testator thereby directed that Robert Hamilton's receipt alone from time to time should be sufficient discharges to the trustees for such dividends, etc., it being his, the testator's, desire and object that Robert Hamilton should be unable to sell or alienate his interest in the same; and from and after the decease of Robert Hamilton, in trust to transfer the principal to such person or persons as he, Robert Hamilton, should in and by his last will and testament or any codicil or codicils thereto, direct or appoint; and in default of such direction or appointment, or as to such part of the principal as should not be disposed of by any such direction or appointment, in trust for the executors or administrators of Robert Hamilton. The testator empowered the trustees to lay out the sum of £2,500 in the purchase of an annuity for the life of Robert Hamilton, to be made payable to them, the trustees, and directed that the annuity should be paid and disposed of by the trustees, in like manner and under the like restrictions as before directed concerning the dividends, etc., of the £2,500. The testator nominated the defendant and the other trustees his executors. By several codicils the testator changed the trustees and executors, and died on Dec. 26, 1831. The will and codicils were proved by the defendants.

Robert Hamilton was a first cousin of the testator's, had been in the army, and was an extravagant man, and had been greatly assisted by the testator with loans of money, for which Robert Hamilton's promissory notes had been taken by the testator; but no interest had ever been paid on the notes, and, with the exception of a sum of about £300 all the advances had been made more than six years before the testator's death. He had left the army under circumstances which induced him to seek to explain his conduct to the authorities at the Horse Guards, and for that purpose he printed a pamphlet, in which he referred to the sum of £1,100 (advanced to him by the testator, to purchase a captain's commission) as a debt due to the testator (who was then living), and which he, Hamilton, had solemnly engaged to pay. On leaving the army, he engaged in the wine trade and on Jan. 27, 1832, about a month after the testator's death, became bankrupt. The assignees applied to the executors for payment to them of his legacy, which the executors declined to pay except under the direction of the court. The assignees and creditors refused to take any proceedings against the executors, and an arrangement was then come to with Robert Hamilton, under which the fiat was annulled, and his creditors agreed to withdraw all claim to the legacy on securing to them 10s. in the pound upon the amount of their debts. In carrying out that arrangement, the legacy had, after some intermediate assignments, become vested in the plaintiff, who had filed her bill against the executors for payment of the legacy. Robert Hamilton was examined before the commissioner under his bankruptcy, and then stated that the sums advanced to him by the testator were loans and not gifts. In this suit, Sir John Hamilton, brother of Robert Hamilton, and a confidential servant of the testator, had been examined, who stated that the testator had declared that he never intended to require repayment of his advances from Robert Hamilton.

WIGRAM, V.-C., had referred it to the master to inquire whether Robert Hamilton was indebted to the testator at the time of his death. The master found the particulars of the debts, etc., of which the result is above stated. To that report the plaintiff excepted, and the cause on further directions and the exceptions were heard together. WIGRAM, V.-C., decreed that the total amount of Robert Hamilton's debt to the testator, amounting to £2,335 ought to be set off against the capital of the legacy of £2,500. From that decree the plaintiff appealed.

Malins and Rudall for the plaintiff.

Lowndes and Glasse for the defendants.

- A LORD LYNDHURST, L.C.—Two questions have been raised in the course of the argument, one of fact and the other of law. The question of fact has also divided itself into two branches—whether the debt alleged to be due to the estate of the testator by the legatee was, according to the evidence, to be considered as a gift or as a loan; or whether that which was a loan originally, had by any subsequent circumstances been converted into a gift. It appears to be clear to me that the
- B sums advanced were originally loans and not gifts. The legatee, Mr. Hamilton, was a relation of the testator and a person in whose prosperity in life he appeared to have taken an interest. Mr. Hamilton was also an extravagant and needy man, dependent in a great measure on the bounty of this relative. There was nothing, therefore, unnatural in the supposition that he should advance him sums of money by way of loan, never indeed expecting to be repaid, but nevertheless taking a
- C security for payment, and reserving to himself the right of proceeding on that security if he thought fit to do so; or, if the altered circumstances of the debtor or a change in his feelings with respect to him gave him the inclination to insist on being repaid. That is the first point in the question of these advances not being gifts. The second and most material one is to be found in the conduct of the legatee himself. It was his obvious interest to make these advances appear to be
- D gifts, and not loans; and yet they had his own admission that he considered them debts due to the testator. There was also a pamphlet published by Mr. Hamilton as a letter to Lord Fitzroy Somerset in justification of his conduct in the army; and in that letter he alleged as a defence against imputations which might have caused him to be compelled to sell his commission, that he was under a binding engagement to repay the testator the £1,100 advanced to him for the purchase of
- E his commission. If the evidence of the intentions of the testator as gathered from the construction of the will and supported by the testimony of his brother, Sir J. Hamilton, stood alone, I should have little doubt in coming to the conclusion that the loans were converted into gifts; but when they had this clear evidence of the legatee's own view of the case, I think that the weight of evidence is against the assumption that the debt did not exist at the time of the death of the testator.
- F The question then arises whether the remedy of this debt is barred by the Limitation Act, 1623; or, being so barred, whether it may not be set off against the claim for the legacy. It is quite clear that no action can be brought by the executors to recover the debt. They are expressly prohibited by the statute. The barring of the remedy for the recovery of debt does not, however, extinguish the debt. The debt remains, notwithstanding the legal obstacle to its recovery; and
- G if any circumstance exists through which the party having the claim can make the debt available to the estate entitled to the benefit of it he is bound to avail himself of it. The executors in the present instance are the trustees of the estate of the testator. The debt due by the legatee is a part of the assets of the testator. The legatee claims to have the sum paid to him out of the assets in satisfaction of a legacy. The legatee had a part of the assets, out of which the payment was to be
- H made, in his own hands. Are not the executors entitled to say: "Pay yourself as far as the money in your hands allows"? That is a payment pro tanto. That is the true principle on which such cases ought to proceed. The executors have a right to say to the legatee: "You have assets of the estate in your hands, apply them to the payment of your demand." That is the rule; and it is so set forth in a case cited in the course of the argument. In that case the debt had not been barred
- I by the statute; but it was held that a payment made in that way by the executors was a payment pro tanto.

I am, therefore, of opinion, that WIGRAM, V.-C., has come to a right conclusion on the question; but inasmuch as that learned judge has expressly stated one of the points to be a new one, on which the court had hitherto avoided a decision, I shall dismiss the appeal but give no costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Agent—Mercantile agent—Goods entrusted to mercantile agent for sale—Instructions to sell at specified price—Advances made by factor for principal—Failure of principal to make repayment—Right of agent to sell goods at lower price to reimburse himself.

A factor, who had goods of his principal in his possession for sale, made advances on account of the principal by accepting certain bills of exchange. When the bills had become due the factor gave the principal notice that he required repayment of the money expended by him, but the principal failed to repay the sum due. The principal had instructed the factor not to sell the goods at a price below a specified figure, but the factor, in order to reimburse himself for the payments made by him on the principal's account, sold them at a lower price.

Held: the factor had no right to sell the goods in breach of the principal's orders.

A Demurrer in an action of assumpsit for breach of contract.

The first count of the declaration stated that the defendant was a corn-factor at Liverpool, and in consideration that the plaintiff delivered to him a cargo consisting of 8,000 bushels of wheat to be sold and disposed of by the defendant for and on account of the plaintiff, for a reasonable commission and reward to be paid by the plaintiff to the defendant, he promised to obey the directions of the plaintiff in regard to the sale and disposal of the wheat. It was stated that the defendant sold a small portion of the cargo at 6s. 4d. per bushel and that the plaintiff thereupon ordered him not to sell any more at less than 7s. a bushel, but that the defendant sold the wheat at lower prices. There was also a second count in the same form respecting another cargo.

To the first count the defendant, by his third plea, stated that after the cargo of wheat had been consigned to him, and before the committing of the alleged breach of contract, he became and was under advances to the plaintiff in respect of the consignment of wheat to a larger amount than the value of the cargo. The sum so advanced to the plaintiff by the defendant was then due and payable, the defendant having accepted divers bills of exchange for the plaintiff on the security of the cargo before the giving of any of the orders mentioned. Before the committing of the breach of contract, the defendant gave notice to the plaintiff that he required the sum of money advanced by him to be repaid, and that, if the plaintiff did not repay him, he would sell the whole of the residue of the wheat and out of the money produced by such sale would repay himself the money advanced. A reasonable time for the repayment elapsed, but the plaintiff did not repay the advances and it was absolutely necessary for the defendant to sell the whole of the residue of the wheat to repay to himself the sum advanced, and, therefore, he sold the residue of the wheat for the prices in the count mentioned by the plaintiff, the same being the best prices he could obtain for the wheat, and that the proceeds were not sufficient to repay him the whole of the money advanced. By his fourth plea the defendant alleged that the plaintiff was indebted to him for advances on other consignments, and that he had a lien on the wheat in question for such advances, and a right to have them repaid out of the proceeds of the wheat.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 12, 1848. WILDE, C.J., delivered the following judgment of the court.—
G The substantial question in this case is whether a factor who has made advances on account of his principal, has the right to sell the goods in his hands contrary to orders of his principal, on the principal making default in repaying the advances. It is now settled law that a factor has a lien for his advances; but the defendant claimed more than a lien; he claims the right, if the principal when called on to repay the advances makes default in doing so, to sell the goods at such prices and times, in the exercise of a sound discretion, as he thinks best for his principal. No case in any English court can be produced in support of this doctrine. If it is a right, one would expect to find it enforced every day, if it existed; and the silence of our law books is a strong argument against the existence of such a right. It is true that in Graham v. Dyster (1), BAYLEY, J., in considering whether a factor, in the circumstances of that case, had authority to pledge, is reported to have said
I (6 M. & S. at p. 5):

“The fact that the plaintiff had drawn bills against the consignment, and had also drawn in like manner against other consignments, made no difference in respect to the raising an implied authority to pledge. The only difference which the practice makes, is, that it conveys to the factor the right to reimburse himself. He may sell on credit, and discount bills.”

These remarks, however, were made with reference to the factor who had express authority, which had never been revoked, to sell at his discretion; and they furnish no authority for maintaining that in a case where the principal has prohibited the sale under prescribed limits, he may notwithstanding sell. A

It is said, however, that a factor for sale has an authority as such, in the absence of all special orders to sell; and when he afterwards comes under advances, he thereby acquires an interest, and having thus an authority and an interest, the authority becomes irrevocable. The doctrine here implied—that whenever there is in the same person an authority and an interest, the authority is irrevocable—is not to be admitted without qualification. In Raleigh v. Atkinson (2), the goods had been consigned to a factor to sell, with a limit as to price; the factor had a lien on the goods for advances, and the principal, in consideration of those advances, agreed with the factor that he should sell the goods at the best market-price, and realise thereon against his advances. The court held that this authority was revocable on the ground that there was no consideration for the agreement. In that case, there was authority given and one which the principal was fully at liberty to give; and the party to whom it was given had an interest in it, yet the authority was held to be revocable. The effect of the decision was attempted in argument before us to be eluded by referring to the circumstance that the factor received the goods originally with a limit as to the price of sale; but we do not think that circumstance material, since the limit originally imposed was done away with by the authority afterwards given to sell at the best price. Such an authority requires no consideration to support it, as an authority is, in its nature, revocable by the donors of it: Vynior's Case (3). It is only when it is sought to make it irrevocable that a consideration is required to give it that effect. B C D

On the subject of an authority being rendered irrevocable, when accompanied by an interest, there is not much to be found. In Walsh v. Whitcomb (4), LORD KENYON is reported to have said (2 Esp. at p. 566): E

“There is a difference in cases of powers of attorney; in general they are revocable from their nature; but there are these exceptions: Where a power of attorney is part of a security for money, there it is not revocable; where a power of attorney was made to levy a fine as part of the security, it was held not to be revocable. The principle is applicable to every case where a power of attorney is necessary to effectuate any security, such is not revocable.” F

Gausson v. Morton (5) and Watson v. King (6), were decided in conformity to Walsh v. Whitcomb (4), and the result appears to be, that when an agreement is entered into on a sufficient consideration, whereby an authority is given for the purpose of securing some benefit to the donee of the authority, such an authority is irrevocable. This is what is usually meant by an authority coupled with an interest which is commonly said to be irrevocable. But we think this doctrine applies only to cases where the authority is given for the purpose of being a security, or, as LORD KENYON expresses it, part of the security; not to cases where the authority is given independently, and the interest of the donee of the authority arises afterwards, and is incidental only. As, for instance, in the present case, the goods were consigned to the factor for sale; that confers an implied authority to sell. Afterwards, the factor makes an advance; this is not an authority coupled with an interest, but an independent authority, and an interest subsequently arising. The making of such an advance may be a good consideration for an agreement that the authority to sell shall be no longer revocable; but such an effect will not, we think, arise independent of the agreement. There is no authority or principle in our law, that we are aware of, which leads us to think it may. G H I

If such be the law, where is it to be found? It was said in argument that it was the common practice of factors to sell in order to repay advances; if it be true that there is a well understood practice with factors to sell, that practice would furnish a ground for inferring that the advance was made on the footing of such an agreement, that the factor should have an irrevocable authority to sell, in case the principal made default. Such an inference would be a very reasonable and proper

A one; but it would be an inference of fact, and not a conclusion of law. These pleas, therefore, in which the right to sell for advances on default by the principal to repay them is treated as a conclusion of law, cannot be supported. There will, therefore, be judgment for the plaintiff on the pleas demurred to.

Judgment for plaintiff.

Bastardy—Affiliation order—Application—Competency—Prior agreement by mother to accept sum from putative father in satisfaction of future claims.

E

A putative father, before an application by the mother of a bastard child for an affiliation order under the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1844 [see now Affiliation Proceedings Act, 1957], agreed with the mother to pay her 5s. a week for the support of the child, and paid two years' amount in advance. Afterwards he paid her £10 to release him from all future payments.

Held: this was no bar to the mother's applying for, and the magistrate's making, an affiliation order, but the magistrate was bound to consider the agreement along with all the other circumstances to guide his discretion in adjudicating.

F

Notes. The provisions in the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1844, relating to affiliation proceedings have been repealed, and replaced by the Affiliation Proceedings Act, 1957. By s. 4 (2) of this latter Act, if the evidence of the mother is corroborated in some material particular by other evidence to the court's satisfaction, the court may adjudge the defendant to be the putative father of the child and "may also, if it thinks fit in all the circumstances of the case" proceed to make against him an affiliation order.

Case Stated by a Metropolitan Police Magistrate under the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1857, on an application made by Susannah Koetzow for an order under the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1844, to compel George Follit to maintain a bastard child, of which Susannah Koetzow had been delivered on Jan. 24, 1856, and of which child George Follit was alleged by her to be the putative father.

Upon the hearing of a summons issued by the magistrate on May 28, 1859, calling upon George Politt to show cause why he should not be adjudged the putative father of such child, the complainant Susannah Koetzow swore that he was the father of such child, and that the defendant had made payments to her for the maintenance of such child within twelve months of its birth, which facts were admitted by the defendant. The magistrate thereupon made the usual order to pay 2s. 6d. per week for the maintenance of such child. The defendant's attorney then contended that the defendant was not liable to maintain such bastard child, and that no order could be made for the maintenance of such child, for the reason that the defendant had previously to Oct. 23, 1858, contracted to pay to the complainant the sum of 5s. per week for the support of the child, which contract he alleged he had performed up to Oct. 23, 1858, and paid her in advance sufficient to maintain the child for two years then to come, and also that the defendant had on such last-mentioned day paid to the complainant the further sum of £10 in consideration of which the complainant had, as he stated, agreed to release the defendant from all future payments in respect of the child. The magistrate was of opinion that such contract was void as against public policy, and that he could not entertain it. He promised to consider the point, and give judgment on June 14, 1859.

On June 14, 1859, the defendant's attorney again appeared before the magistrate and urged that, even if such contract was not binding between the parties, yet the magistrate could exercise his own discretion in the matter, inasmuch as the Act of Parliament required him to decide "after considering all the circumstances of the case," and, that he might be influenced by the fact that the father had paid more than double what the magistrate had power to order for the next four or five years. Being of opinion that he had no discretion in the matter, as the defendant was proved to be the father of the said child, the magistrate refused to alter his determination. He felt strengthened in that determination by it seeming to him clear that all the clauses relating to bastards in the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1844, had but one object, namely, the maintenance and protection of the child; and, therefore, this contract to pay, or having paid, a sum of money to the mother, which may be expended or lost long before the child reaches the age when the weekly payment under a magistrate's order cease, was of no avail. The mother was only the guardian of the child, and, under circumstances, another guardian may be appointed. It seemed to him that the child and the parish to which it might become chargeable ought to be his first consideration, and that the payment of a sum of money to the mother was no answer to his assuming jurisdiction. He, therefore, made the order.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether the justice had any discretion under the Act of Parliament to entertain the contract attempted to be set up by the defendant, as aforesaid, the paternity of the child having been proved.

By the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1844, s. 3:

"After the birth of such bastard child, on the appearance of the person so summoned, or on proof that the summons was duly served on such person, or left at his last place of abode, six days at least before the petty session, the justices in such petty session shall hear the evidence of such woman, and such other evidence as she may produce, and shall also hear any evidence tendered by or on behalf of the person alleged to be the father; and if the evidence of the mother be corroborated in some material particular by other testimony, to the satisfaction of the said justices, they may adjudge the man to be the putative father of such bastard child; and they may also, if they see fit, having regard to all the circumstances of the case, proceed to make an order on the putative father for the payment to the mother of the bastard child, or to any person who may be appointed to have the custody of such child under the provisions of this Act, of a sum of money weekly and of such costs as may have been incurred in the obtaining of such order . . ."

Serjeant Parry (Gibbons with him) for the putative father.

- A SIR ALEXANDER COCKBURN, C.J.—As regards the main question, I am of opinion that what took place between the mother and the putative father was not sufficient to oust the magistrate of his jurisdiction to make the order under the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1844, s. 3. The statutable right given to the mother to apply for the order, and to the magistrate to make it, is of a peculiar character. No doubt it is entirely in the choice and discretion of the mother to apply for the order, and if she does not choose to apply, neither the parish officers nor any other person can compel her to do so. At first sight it would seem to be a personal right for her own benefit, but when the object of the legislature and the language of the statute are looked at, that view cannot prevail. The intention of the legislature was, that when once the application has been made and the order obtained, the weekly payment is to be not merely for the relief of the mother, but the main object was to be the maintenance of the child. The first section of the statute speaks of it as an order for the maintenance of the bastard child, showing that something was intended beyond the mere relief of the mother. The magistrate held that the agreement between the mother and the putative father was void; but he was going too far in determining that, for the question now to be decided is whether the agreement takes from the magistrate his discretionary power, "having regard to all the circumstances of the case," to make an order on the putative father. Looking at the policy of the statute, I do not think that a bargain of this sort between the mother of a bastard child and the putative father ousts the magistrate of his discretionary power to make an order. If by such an agreement before making an application the mother can oust the jurisdiction of the magistrate, she may also by such an agreement annul the effect of such an order after it has been made. I am, however, of opinion that she cannot do so, and under all the circumstances I think the Case should go back to the magistrate to exercise his discretionary power, taking this very material agreement into his consideration along with the other facts to guide him.

- F CROMPTON, J.—I am of the same opinion. First, was this agreement a bar to the magistrate's proceeding to make an order on the putative father? and, secondly, had the magistrate a discretion to consider this agreement in making the order? There are no words in the statute that meet a case like this. The magistrate is to look at all the circumstances of the case. The order is to be for weekly payments by the putative father. He is to consider whether an arrangement of this kind would not defeat that. The case is put on the maxim quilibet potest renunciare juri pro se introducto, and it was urged that this was given as relief to the mother, and she might release it. But is this a mere right of the mother, and is it not also for the benefit of the child? The words of the statute are for the support and maintenance of the child, and s. 7 shows that this is clearly not the right of the mother merely, for after the mother's death or incapacity, as enacted, the payment is to be enforced by the board of guardians, and made to some person appointed by the justices. The object of the statute, then, might be defeated if the mother, for an insufficient, or what perhaps is worse, a lump sum, might contract with the putative father to oust the discretion of the magistrate under the statute. I, therefore, think that this agreement was no bar to the magistrate's proceeding, and that the case must go back to him.

- I HILL, J.—It is admitted that the agreement by which the mother agreed to take upon herself the maintenance of the child, and to forbear to apply for an order on the putative father, is a good agreement, but the question is whether it takes away the power of the magistrate to make an order on him. It is necessary to see what power the magistrate has for this purpose. He has a power, first, absolutely and without any discretion to adjudicate the man to be the putative father; and, secondly, to make an order, if he sees fit, having regard to all the circumstances of the case, on the putative father for the payment to the mother of a sum of money weekly, etc. The statute treats it as a matter entirely for the discretion of the magistrate under all the circumstances. Therefore, the utmost such an agreement as this can come to is, that it is to be treated as a strong fact for the consideration of the magistrate in adjudicating as to making an order. I think that there has been a miscarriage in this case, and that the agreement is a valid one, and that the magistrate ought to have taken it into his discretion and exercised his discretion upon all the circumstances as to making an order. A

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of the same opinion. There is no enactment that the mother may release or bar her right to apply for such an order. If the order had been for her sole exclusive benefit, I should have inclined to act on the maxim quilibet potest renunciare juri pro se introducto, and to hold that, as she had released her right, she was precluded from applying for the order. But the order is not for her sole personal benefit at all: it is partly for her benefit and partly for the benefit of the child. Section 5 shows that it is not for her personal benefit, but as a means to enable her to maintain the child. It is called an order for the maintenance of the child. That being so, the mother ought not to be able to renounce the right given by the statute. The justices may in every case, if they see fit, proceed to make an order on the putative father. That is what the legislature intended, and what it has said. The Case must go back to be reconsidered. B

NOTTIDGE v. PRINCE

[VICE-CHANCELLOR'S COURT (Stuart, V.-C.), June 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, July 25, 1860]

[Reported 2 Giff. 246; 29 L.J.Ch. 857; 2 L.T. 720; 24 J.P. 726;

Undue Influence—Religion—Influence of minister over person under direct spiritual charge—Right to have gift set aside—Guardian and ward—Parent and child—Solicitor and client—Right to have gifts by ward, child, or client set aside. F

No person who stands in the relation of special confidence to another so as to acquire habitual influence over his mind can accept any gift or benefit from the person who is under the dominion of that influence without danger of having the gift set aside. If it can be shown that a sufficient protection has been interposed against the exercise of this influence, there may be a case to sustain the gift, but the principle prevails where there exists a relation which naturally creates influence over the mind. Therefore, the doctrine extends to the relation of attorney and client, of guardian and ward, of parent and child. But there does not arise from any of these relations an influence so strong as that of a minister of religion over a person under his direct spiritual charge. The strength of religious influence is far beyond that of gratitude to a guardian, trustee, or attorney, and the same ground of public utility which requires the court to guard against such influences has its most important application to that influence which is the strongest. G

Gift—Delusion or deception—Gift made under influence of deceit and spiritual domination—Invalidity—Right of recovery. H

Where a gift is made under the influence of delusion or deception it cannot be valid. Whether the delusion or deception relates to matters spiritual or matters temporal is immaterial, for, if the gift be made under the influence of a delusion, the right of restoration in either case is clear. I

- A The court taking the view that a gift had been obtained by the defendant "by imposing a belief on the mind of a weak woman that he sustained a supernatural character,"
- Held: the gift was invalid, and the plaintiff, the personal representative of the deceased donor, was entitled to recover it.

- I Action in which the plaintiff, Ralph Clarke Nottidge claimed, as the administrator of his deceased sister, Louisa Jane Nottidge, against the defendant, Henry James Prince, the transfer from the defendant to the plaintiff of two sums of three per cent. annuities, amounting together to the sum of £5,728 7s. 7d., formerly the property of Miss Nottidge.
In December, 1845, Miss Nottidge, who was then about forty-one years of age, went to reside in the neighbourhood of Weymouth, in order to be near the defendant, who was the head of an institution known as the Agapemone, in Somerset, and to place herself under his religious teaching and guidance. After some difficulties, her brother succeeded in taking her to her mother's, and, as she appeared to her friends to exhibit symptoms of insanity, in November, 1846, she was, upon the usual medical certificate, placed in confinement. She remained in confinement till May 15, 1848, when she was released by order of the Lunacy Commissioners. In 1847, the defendant and his followers had taken up their abode at the Agapemone. The transfer of stock by Miss Nottidge was made in May, 1848, immediately after her release from confinement. On Aug. 21, 1858, she died at the Agapemone intestate. The plaintiff alleged that this fund had been transferred by Miss Nottidge into the defendant's name as a result of the exercise of undue influence on his part over her, when she was under his spiritual ascendancy and in a state of religious delusion with respect to him, believing him to be the tabernacle of God upon earth, and that the Spirit of God dwelt therein, the defendant's original spirit being extinct.

Henry James Prince was educated at Lampeter College, in Wales, with the view of becoming a minister of the Church of England, and he had been ordained deacon and priest. In 1840 he became the curate of Mr. Starkey, then rector of Charlwich, in Somersetshire, and continued such for about two years, when, in consequence of his interference with the neighbouring parishes, he was deprived by the bishop of the diocese of his licence. He then obtained a curacy at Stoke, near Clare, in Suffolk, in the neighbourhood of which place Mr. Josias Nottidge, since deceased, the father of Miss Louisa Nottidge, lived. Prince became acquainted with that gentleman and his family, which consisted of his wife and four daughters, and he succeeded in acquiring great influence over the daughters. Of that curacy likewise Prince was deprived by the Bishop of Ely at the end of 1842 or early in 1843. From Stoke, Prince went to Brighton, where he took a chapel, which he called Adullam. Thither he was followed by the four Misses Nottidge, Louisa Jane, Harriet, Clara and Agnes, with whom he had in the meantime kept up his influence by means of letters written as well to them as to servants of his own whom he had left at Stoke, the letters to his servants having been written by him with the express view of their being read to the Misses Nottidge. He remained at Brighton until May, 1845, when he persuaded the young ladies, whose father had in the meantime died, leaving them sums of between £5,000 and £6,000 apiece, to leave Brighton for the purpose of accompanying him to Charlwich, where he contemplated opening a new chapel. Subsequently, at his suggestion Harriet, Clara and Agnes married three of Prince's followers. On the day of Miss Louisa Nottidge's release from confinement in 1848, she was met by Thomas, who was Harriet's husband, and he took her on the same or the following day to Prince's broker, with a view of her making a transfer to Prince of the stock then standing in her name, about £5,728 three per cent. annuities. Not knowing the amount of stock standing in her name she was then unable to make the proposed transfer, and went with Thomas to the Agapemone, on May 16 or 17, 1848. About a fortnight later she made the transfer of the above amount to Prince, having in the meantime ascertained the amount of stock to which she was entitled. By their report the Lunacy Commissioners certified that Miss Nottidge admitted she did not now pray to God, for there was no use in it. She acknowledged she believed the tabernacle of God to be upon the earth, that Prince was that tabernacle, and that the Spirit of God dwelt therein, Prince's original spirit being extinct. She said she was satisfied that there was no such person as Prince, but that the Spirit of God dwelt in his body. The commissioners said that, although no material improvement had taken place in Miss Nottidge's mental condition, and her extraordinary and irregular notions on the subject of religion, which they regarded as delusions irreconcilable with soundness of mind, were unabated, yet beyond those delusions she had exhibited no other indication of insanity. They also found that her bodily health was giving way, and there was reason to apprehend it might be seriously injured by a prolongation of her confinement.

A The defendant, in his answer, admitted that other persons besides Miss Nottidge had given him large sums of money. With respect to the transfer by Miss Nottidge, he said that she had frequently, prior to her confinement in the asylum, offered to give him this stock, but that he had always refused it; that she made the transfer to him without any solicitation on his part, and without his knowledge; that she was under no delusion with respect to him; that the gift was purely voluntary on her part, as were also the numerous other gifts he had received; that Miss Nottidge never made any payment in respect of her board during her residence at the Agapemone; that the persons who resided at the Agapemone were under no obligation to make any payment to the defendant; that everything in that respect was voluntary; that those who made no payment were not treated differently from those who did pay; that he fed and clothed many poor in the neighbourhood of the Agapemone, and gave sums varying from £1 to £100 in charity; and he claimed to be entitled to the stock transferred to his name by Miss Nottidge for his own benefit.

C With reference to the Agapemone itself, the inmates of which were between fifty and sixty in number, the defendant, in his evidence, described it as follows:

D "The establishment of the Agapemone consists of a large mansion-house having attached thereto extensive gardens, conservatories, hothouse, pleasure-grounds, and a farm, of which the defendant is the proprietor in fee-simple, consisting of about 200 acres of land, occupied by a person who cultivates and manages the same for the benefit of the members of the Agapemone. The produce of the garden, hothouses, and farm are applied to the purposes of maintaining the table and other occasions of the members of the Agapemone, and the residents in the establishment enjoy every kind of comfort which such an establishment can afford. In addition thereto carriages and horses are kept. There are numerous horses of great value, both for riding and driving, kept for the use of those resident at the Agapemone, and they occasionally ride out in a carriage drawn by four horses."

Cur. adv. vult.

July 25, 1860. STUART, V.-C., read the following judgment.—In June, 1848, the defendant, Henry James Prince, obtained from Miss Louisa Jane Nottidge the transfer into his own name of two sums, making together the sum of £5,728 7s. 7d. three per cent bank annuities. This stock was the whole of her remaining fortune and her whole means of subsistence. The defendant claims to be entitled to retain it for his own use as a free gift made to him by this lady. She died intestate in 1858. Her brother, who is the plaintiff, has instituted this suit as her legal personal representative to recover the property as her personal estate. The bill avers that the alleged gift to the defendant was obtained by misrepresentation and deception, and was made under the influence of a gross delusion, inculcated and encouraged by himself for his own purposes when she was incompetent to manage her own pecuniary affairs or effectually to apply her mind to business of any description.

H If these allegations were sufficiently proved, the defendant cannot be allowed to retain the property. Where a gift is made under the influence of delusion or deception it cannot be valid. Whether the delusion or deception relates to matters spiritual or matters temporal is immaterial, for, if the gift be made under the influence of a delusion, the right to restoration in either case is clear. There is ample evidence that the defendant exercised a powerful and undue dominion over the mind of Miss Nottidge and his other followers by assuming a false character. The character which he assumed and which he induced this lady to believe that he really sustained he has himself described in his cross-examination in the following terms:

I "God has developed through me his counsel and purpose which I have made known to others. I have declared that the Holy Ghost by me did close the day of grace and introduce the judgment. I have declared and mean that the Holy Ghost spake by me." A

To rational minds it may seem surprising that any human being could be found with an understanding so weak and degraded as to submit to the influence and guidance of a person who thus speaks of himself. But it appears that the lady in question, Miss Louisa Jane Nottidge, and three of her sisters, the daughters of a respectable country gentleman of considerable fortune, submitted themselves entirely to his dictation. He says : B

"The Nottidges called to see me after they had heard of my ministry. . . . Three of the Miss Nottidges married. They all married after I became acquainted with them. They all married persons who were associated with me, and whose opinions were the same as mine. I suppose I must say they married through my instrumentality, inasmuch as they married through my telling them that it was the will of God that they should so marry. . . . Their husbands procured their money with their consent, and they gave it to me. I think they gave me between £5,000 and £6,000 each, or thereabouts." C

These passages, from the defendant's depositions, are only a very small part of the evidence, which shows beyond all doubt that, by falsely and blasphemously pretending that he had a direct Divine mission, he imposed on these weak women and obtained a gift of the whole of their fortunes. D

As to the gift of £5,728 by Miss Louisa Nottidge, which it is the object of this suit to set aside, the case is very clear. This unfortunate lady escaped the degradation of such a marriage as had been made the means of conveying all the money of her sisters into the pocket of the defendant. Her complying disposition to part with her money under the influence of the defendant and at his bidding without recourse to marriage is shown by the fact that he at once obtained from her £50 merely by writing and sending to her a letter in these words : E

"The Lord hath need of £50 to be used for a special purpose unto His glory. The Spirit would have this made known unto you. Amen." F

His own definition as to the gift to him of the £5,728 stock is in these terms :

"Louisa, at the end of 1845, or beginning of 1846, requested me more than once to accept her money. She believed that I had special revelations upon particular subjects. She gave me all her money after she came out of the lunatic asylum." G

These statements from the defendant's own mouth prove the case of a gift obtained by imposing a belief on the mind of a weak woman that he sustained a supernatural character. This successful imposture was the influencing motive of the gift, and, therefore, vitiates it entirely. It is needless to inquire or speculate whether the defendant was himself also the victim of his own imposture. The most favourable view of his conduct would be that, under the influence of a disordered imagination, he really fancied himself to be such a supernatural being as he made these ladies believe. Even if it were possible to take this lenient view of the defendant's conduct, when the question is as to the validity of the gift, it is only necessary to show that it was bestowed under the influence of a delusion. H

A great deal of the arguments of counsel on both sides consisted in discussing the doctrine of the court as to the validity of gifts obtained under the influence of a religious or spiritual ascendancy. The grossness of the imposture in the present case has put it far beyond mere spiritual influence. But this gift must have been set aside as obtained under the influence of spiritual dominion, even if the false character assumed by the defendant had not been a part of the case. No person who stands in the relation of special confidence to another so as to acquire habitual influence over his mind can accept any gift or benefit from the person who is under the dominion of that influence without danger of having the gift set aside. If it can be shown that a sufficient protection has been interposed against the exercise I

A of this influence, there may be a case to sustain the gift, but the principle prevails where there exists a relation which naturally creates influence over the mind. Therefore, the doctrine extends to the relation of attorney and client, of guardian and ward, of parent and child. But there does not arise from any of these relations an influence so strong as that of a minister of religion over a person under his direct spiritual charge. Fortunately the exalted character of Christian ministers in this country makes the occurrence of such questions extremely rare. When LORD NORTHINGTON, in Norton v. Relly (1), set aside a gift made by a lady to a dissenting minister, he noticed that such questions seldom occur. But the principle is clearly established in this court. The strength of religious influence is far beyond that of gratitude to a guardian, trustee, or attorney, and the same ground of public utility which requires this court to guard against such influences has its most important application to that influence which is the strongest. In Roman Catholic countries, where spiritual influence has its highest dominion, public feeling has required the interposition of an absolute and imperative check. The law of France, as stated by M. POTHIER, absolutely prohibits not only all gifts by a penitent to his confessor, but all gifts to that religious community of which the confessor is a member.

D In the present case the grossness of the imposture and the weakness of the person who was imposed upon make the right of the plaintiff very clear. It is impossible to overlook one of the results of the decree, which must be made in favour of the plaintiff. He sues as legal personal representative, and when the money is restored it will be distributed among the next-of-kin. Two of the next-of-kin are still under the dominion of the defendant's influence and victims of his imposture. Another is Mrs. Thomas, the wife of one of the defendant's associates, whose marriage was effected under the defendant's influence. The disgraceful conduct pursued towards her is detailed in the evidence. It is needless now to consider what her rights are as one of the next-of-kin. When the money is restored to the plaintiff as legal personal representative, there will be sufficient means of asserting the rights of all the next-of-kin. In the meantime the duty of the court is to declare that the transfer into the name of the defendant of the several sums of stock mentioned in the bill was improperly obtained and must be set aside. The stock must be transferred to the plaintiff as legal personal representative of Miss Louisa Jane Nottidge, and all the dividends which have accrued due on it since her death paid to the plaintiff. The defendant must pay to the plaintiff all the costs of the suit.

MANGLES AND OTHERS v. DIXON AND OTHERS

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord St. Leonards, L.C., Lord Brougham, Lord Truro, Lord Devon, Lord Pomfret, and other Peers), June 17, 18, 22, 1852]

[Reported 3 H.L.Cas. 702; 19 L.T.O.S. 260; 10 E.R. 278]

Chose in Action—Assignment—Assignee's liability—Chose taken subject to all equities of assignor—Duty to make inquiries as to transaction between himself and assignor.

The assignee of a chose in action, where there has been no fraud, stands in exactly the same situation as the assignor as to the equities arising upon it, and takes it subject to all the equities of the assignor and the liabilities to which he was subject. He must be taken to be cognisant of them. It is his duty to make inquiries, and, as a general rule, the creator of the chose assigned is not bound, on receiving a simple notice of the assignment, to volunteer information. If a loss arises, it falls upon him whose duty it is to make the inquiries and who has not made them. But if the notice given by the assignee discloses that which induces the belief that he has been deceived in accepting the assignment, the person receiving the notice is bound to inform the assignee of the real circumstances, and, if he should not do so, he cannot be allowed to take advantage of the equities existing as between the assignor and himself.

Appeal against a decree of LORD COTTENHAM, L.C., reversing a decree of KNIGHT-BRUCE, V.-C., in an action for an account and declaration.

B The appellants were merchants in the city of London, and in April, 1845, through their agent, they entered into a charterparty with the agent of Messrs. Boyd & Co., shipowners, for the use of a vessel called the Fifeshire, of 463 tons burden, for a voyage to bring home a cargo of guano. The charterparty, which was dated April 23, 1845, but was executed on April 24, declared that the

C "charterers agree to hire the said vessel for the term of six calendar months from the time of the ship being ready to sail,"

and for such further term as the charterers should think proper, not exceeding eighteen months in the whole. There was the following stipulation :

D "In consideration of the foregoing, the charterers agree to pay, or cause to be paid, to the captain or owner of the said vessel, at and after the rate of 16s. per ton, old register measurement, per calendar month, and in like proportion for any fractional parts thereof, until the final discharge at a port in the United Kingdom; the payment for victualling the men is to continue as long as they are on board; the freight to be paid as follows—say, £400 by the owners' draft on the charterers, payable at four months' date from the time of the vessel being ready to proceed from Liverpool; the further sum of £600 at the expiration of four months from the date of the ship sailing, by a like draft of the owners on the charterers at four months' date; a further sum of £150 in cash at the expiration of eight months' from the time of sailing; a like payment of £150 at the expiration of every succeeding month until the termination of the employment of the ship; and the remainder, on unloading and right delivery of the cargo in the United Kingdom, by a good and approved bill on London at ninety days' date, or cash equal thereto."

F The charterers were to pay all port charges, etc.

Two other instruments were executed at the same time, the first of which was a memorandum, in the following terms :

G "Memorandum, that Messrs. Mangles, Price, and Moore, having, by a charterparty dated April 23 instant, hired the ship Fifeshire for the term and at the freight therein mentioned, it is hereby agreed between them and Mr. G. J. Ashton, that the trading which shall be carried on, and all cargo and produce which shall be sent on board the said ship in pursuance of the said charterparty, and all benefits and advantages which shall be derived therefrom, shall be for and upon the joint account and risk of the said Mangles, Price, and Moore, of the one part, and the said G. J. Ashton of the other part, in equal proportions, and that after payment or deduction of the freight and all incidental expenses, the profits or loss which shall arise shall be borne and received or paid by the said parties in equal moieties."

I This memorandum was signed by G. J. Ashton, who was the servant and nominee of Boyd & Co.

The second of these papers, dated on the same day, was a guarantee given by Boyd & Co. for the due performance of the memorandum of agreement thus entered into by Ashton, that agreement being, in fact, entered into by him on their behalf. The guarantee was in the following terms :

"To Messrs. Mangles & Co. Gentlemen—In consideration of your having agreed with Mr. George Joseph Ashton that he shall be entitled to one moiety of the profits to be earned by you in trading with the ship Fifeshire, in pursuance of the charterparty entered into between you and ourselves (Mr. George Joseph Ashton also bearing one moiety of the expenses and loss, if any, attending the same), we hereby jointly and severally guarantee and undertake and agree, from time to time, and at all times hereafter, to save you harmless, and indemnify you and each of you from and against the part or share of all such charges, expenses, and loss, as may be sustained or happen in the course of such trading, which Mr. George Joseph Ashton, by virtue of your agreement with him, would be liable and ought to pay; and also undertake and agree, from time to time, when required, to repay and reimburse to you and each of you all and every sums and sum of money which you or either of you may pay or be liable to pay for or by reason of the non-payment by Mr. George Joseph Ashton of his moiety or share of all such charges and expenses and loss, or any part thereof."

This guarantee was signed by Boyd, on behalf of himself and partners.

The appellants paid the sums of money stipulated in the charterparty and accruing due before Mar. 14, 1846, on which day they received a notice from the respondents, who were Boyd & Co.'s bankers, that, on Dec. 1, 1845, the charterparty had been deposited with them by Boyd & Co.

"for a valuable consideration in money, and the said Boyd & Co. did on that day authorize you to pay us the amount of all moneys then due, or thereafter to become due, on the said charterparty."

The respondents thereby required the appellants to pay the same. This notice was accompanied by a copy of an order dated Dec. 1, 1845, made on the margin of the charterparty, and signed by Boyd & Co., which order was in the following terms:

"Messrs. Mangles & Co. Please pay the amount of what is due from this date to Messrs. Dixon & Co., or their order."

A monthly instalment became due on May 1, 1846. It was duly demanded by the respondents' solicitor, and after some hesitation in paying it, on the ground that Boyd & Co. were then insolvent, and that the money might be demanded from the appellants by the assignees, it was paid, and a stamped receipt asked for and given. The June and July instalments were voluntarily paid. On Aug. 17, 1846, the Fifeshire arrived in London, and was taken possession of by the appellants, who sold the cargo. It was then discovered that the adventure had terminated in a loss; the appellants delivered the accounts showing the loss, contended that Boyd & Co. were liable for a moiety thereof, and offered to make up the accounts with the respondents on that footing. The respondents refused to accede to this arrangement of the business, and brought an action in the Court of Exchequer in the name of Boyd & Co. to recover the balance of the whole freight due upon the charterparty. In this action a verdict and judgment were recovered.

On Feb. 24, 1847, the appellants filed their bill in Chancery against the respondents and Boyd & Co. and their assignees in bankruptcy in which they set forth the whole of these matters, and prayed that the accounts might be taken in respect of the partnership or joint adventure between the appellants and Boyd & Co., and that it might be declared that Dixon & Co., in respect of their assignment of the charterparty, were only entitled to stand in the place of Boyd & Co. upon the footing of the agreement between the appellants and that firm, and for an injunction as to the action and the judgment thereon. The respondents in their answer denied all knowledge and notice of the agreement of Ashton and the guarantee of Boyd & Co., and insisted that, by virtue of the charterparty, the assignment thereof to them, and the order written in the margin thereof, they were entitled to the whole freight. They set forth that on May 29, 1845, they advanced to Boyd & Co. the sum of £12,000 on their promissory note of that date, payable with interest on demand; that, there being on Dec. 1, 1845, a balance of £11,000 and interest due, Boyd & Co., as a security to them, assigned the charterparty to them, and that on Mar. 14, 1846, they gave to Mangles and Co. notice of such assignment. On June

A 28, 1848, the cause was heard before KNIGHT-BRUCE, V.-C., who made a decree in favour of the appellants. An appeal was thereupon taken to LORD COTTENHAM, L.C., who reversed the decree, and ordered that the appellants' bill should be dismissed with costs. The appellants appealed to this House.

B Rolt and J. Bailey (Josiah Smith with them) for the appellants.—It is plain that the assignee of a chose in action takes it subject to all existing equities: Coles v. Jones (6). That is the case of the assignee of a bond, and yet a bond is a positive and absolute stipulation to do an act, or to pay a sum of money, apparently subject to no condition but what is stated on the face of the bond. Turton v. Benson (2) is to the same effect. It is for the assignee to show any special circumstances which take him out of the operation of that rule. None such exists here. The giving to the appellants notice of the assignment did not impose on them the obligation to give notice of their existing equities. If the respondents wanted information, they were bound to make the inquiry—they had ample materials to put them on making the inquiry. [LORD ST. LEONARDS, L.C.—Have they not a right to say that you ought to have informed them of the equities?] That might be so if any new liability was sought to be imposed on them. But that is not so here. D The respondents ought to have inquired, and their rights, to some degree, depend on the particularity of their inquiry: Ibbotson v. Rhodes (7), where an issue was directed to try what was the information given when the inquiry was made. In the court below LORD COTTENHAM said:

E “It is a well-known rule, that a party, having a secret equity, who stands by and permits the apparent owner to deal with others as if he was absolute owner, and as if there was no such secret equity, shall not be permitted to assert such secret equity against a title founded upon such apparent ownership.”

F This rule is not applicable here, for the appellants did not stand by and allow the respondents to advance their money on any such supposed ownership. The appellants knew nothing of the transactions between Boyd & Co. and the respondents, until the latter gave notice that they stood in the situation of Boyd & Co. with respect to the money due from the appellants. The freight was not assigned to the respondents independently of the equities to which the assignors were liable. The circumstances of this case resemble those of Cator v. Burke (1), where the attempt to do what is done here was met by LORD LOUGHBOROUGH with the remark that it was “turning an unassignable into an assignable security.” In Beckett v. Cordley G (8) LORD THURLOW, reviewing the cases upon this subject, said (1 Bro.C.C. at p. 357):

“There is no case in the books but where the party to whom the fraud is imputed was consant of the treaty in which the fraud was practised.”

H That was not the case here, nor is there the least proof of any intention to commit a fraud, or even to do anything in a secret manner. Priddy v. Rose (9) very much resembles the present in many circumstances, and there SIR WILLIAM GRANT said (3 Mer. at p. 107):

I “Why is a third person, who asked no question on the subject, and gave no notice of his having any interest in the matter, to tell the trustees that it was their duty towards him to have called in the debt sooner? . . . The person proposing to take the assignment could ask the trustees whether that money was paid; but the trustees had no opportunity of apprising him that it was not paid, for they knew nothing of the transaction. They have been guilty of no bad faith towards the plaintiffs; but the plaintiffs have been wanting in common prudence in not consulting the trustees before they took the assignment.”

There is no rule of law which lays it down that a person merely receiving notice of an assignment is bound to communicate to the assignee all the transactions relating to it between himself and the assignor. The assignor ought to inquire, and if he does not, then, in a case like this, where there is no pretence for imputing fraud, he must suffer the consequence of his own negligence.

Purton Cooper and Daniell for the respondents.—It is clear that Messrs. Dixon are entitled at law to the whole freight. Then arises the question whether there is any equity stated in the bill to induce the Court of Chancery to interfere and prevent them from obtaining the benefit of their legal rights. There are two equities stated in the bill. The first is that, if the effect of this instrument was to entitle Boyd & Co., or their assignees, or the persons claiming under them, to recover the whole of the freight, or more than half, that was a mistake as to the intentions of the parties which equity could correct, but equity will not correct such a mistake if the appellants have acquiesced in Boyd & Co. so dealing with the instrument, especially as regards persons who have had no notice of the mistake, and if the instrument itself has been assigned for a valuable consideration. The other equity is that this was a joint adventure both as to profit and freight, and that Boyd & Co. might, on a settlement of accounts, have to refund, but to that the answer is, that Dixons cannot be affected with a possible liability of Boyds of which they had no notice, and which was not in accordance with the terms of the instrument assigned to them. This equity could not arise until after the sale of the cargo, and the title to the payment of freight arose immediately upon the ship's arrival. In such a case, on a bill filed stating the joint speculation and the loss, equity would not recognise that loss, which, in fact, might constitute a cross-demand, but would not be a set-off in equity against a clear demand at law; and a court of equity would not interfere: Rawson v. Samuel (10). A court of equity will not interfere, on the ground of an equitable set-off, to prevent a party from recovering on a breach of contract, though such cross-demand may arise out of the contract, the breach of which is the subject of the action. Here the appellants, by allowing Boyd & Co. to hold a charterparty which apparently gave them a right to the whole of the freight, permitted them to appear to have a legal title and to deal on the footing of that legal title, and having so acted, and in that way "permitted or encouraged" the respondents to accept this charterparty as a security for the whole freight, they cannot now escape from the consequences of their own act. In Steed v. Whitaker (11), LORD HARDWICKE refused to set up an encumbrance against a settlement, because the encumbrancer, a mortgagee, had lain by and allowed the party entitled under the settlement to build upon the land without giving him notice of the mortgage. A similar principle was acted on in Troughton v. Gitley (12). In Joyce v. De Moleyns (13), it was held, that if a man advanced money, and without notice accepted as security the deeds of an estate, though the person who so gave them to him had no title thus to dispose of them, yet, having the apparent ownership, and the other bona fide taking them, the possession of them by the person so bona fide taking them as security for his advances would be protected by the court. These cases apply to and furnish the principle which must govern the decision of the present case. Whatever might be the equity in this respect between Mangles and Boyds, no notice of this secret partnership having been given to Dixons, it cannot be insisted on as against them. Under such circumstances the general rule as to the equities arising on the transfer of a chose in action do not apply. This case was properly decided on the principle laid down by this House in Duke of Beaufort v. Neeld (5), to which LORD COTTENHAM referred. There was here, as there, a representation on which third parties were induced to act, and which, therefore, gave them rights that could not afterwards be contested by those who made the representation. In that case LORD COTTENHAM would not admit a party to say that his undisclosed authority had been exceeded; nor ought the party here to be allowed to set up an undisclosed agreement in order to affect a valid instrument disclosed to third parties, and acted on by them. In Hill v. Caillovel (14), which was a strong case, for it was one of a post obit given by a young heir, LORD HARDWICKE said (1 Ves. Sen. at p. 123):

A “The rule is right, that whoever takes the assignment of a bond being a chose in action, takes it subject to all the equity in the hands of the original obligee; but length of time and circumstances may vary that, and make the case of the assignee stronger.”

B Undisclosed agreements, such as existed in this case, would certainly not weaken, but strengthen, the title of the assignee. The authority of any case may therefore be admitted which merely states the general and well-known rule, that an assignee takes subject to the equities which affect the assignor, but where special circumstances exist, as they do in this case, that general rule, though of unquestionable authority in itself, receives a modified application.

Rolt replied.

C LORD ST. LEONARDS, L.C.—This case is not so important with respect to the amount of property involved in it as it is with regard to the principle of equity which your Lordships are called upon to decide. There have been divided opinions in the court below, and your Lordships are now called upon finally to determine what is the true construction of the different instruments which have been executed, and what is the rule of equity properly applicable to the case. There are two important subjects to be considered. First, what is the real construction of the different instruments as between the parties to those instruments? And, secondly, what is the construction and operation of those instruments as between the charterers and the bankers to whom the shipowners had mortgaged, or rather made, an equitable assignment of the charterparty?

E [His Lordship dealt with the effect of the instruments as between the parties mentioned, said that there was no fraud or secrecy in the arrangement embodied in the agreement and guarantee of April 23, 1845, and continued:] If there is one rule more perfectly established in a court of equity than another, it is that whoever takes an assignment of a chose in action—which this charterparty was, for though it is not assignable in law, it is in equity—takes it subject to all the equities of the person who made the assignment. No barrister would presume to deny in any court of equity that at the time that assignment was taken, and down to the time when the notice was given, during all these months, the bankers took precisely the same interest, and were subject to the same liabilities, namely, those under the agreement and the guarantee of April 23, 1845, as were Messrs. Boyd themselves. If Messrs. Dixon had notice, it only introduced a new head of equity against them which is that they are bound by the notice which they had, for equity will not permit a man to shut his eyes to a fact of which he has been informed, and, therefore, if he has notice, he is bound by the knowledge he has thus acquired. But the rule to which I have referred applies where there is no notice, and although one may suppose Messrs. Dixon to be utterly unacquainted and uninformed of either the agreement or the guarantee, they were bound by those documents and the charterparty as forming one agreement, precisely to the same extent as Messrs. H Boyd themselves were bound at the time of the execution of the agreement. They do not ask any question of Messrs. Mangles when they do give the notice, as they had asked none when they took the security. It was not a security given for money then advanced, it was for money which had already been advanced, and in their notice they intimate that fact, for they say “for valuable consideration.” I It was, therefore, as they state it truly, for a past consideration, and this security was taken, as many such securities are daily taken in the city of London. No doubt, at the time, they thought it prudent to make themselves as secure as they could, and they took the best security which their debtor had to offer, but they took it with all the liabilities to which he was subject upon it, and your Lordships must fix them, in point of law, as being cognisant of those liabilities under the rule to which I have drawn your attention.

The important question then is this. When the notice was given, was it incumbent upon Messrs. Mangles to write back to Messrs. Dixon and to tell them that there were, besides the charterparty, the agreement and the guarantee? In the first place, who is to inquire and to take the trouble in these cases?—Who ought to do that? The person who ought to do it is undoubtedly he who is fixed with the liability. Messrs. Dixon were fixed with the liability. If they desired to remove that liability, they ought to have made due inquiry, and therefore, prima facie at least, the loss ought to fall upon him who, having the duty to inquire, has not thought proper to inquire. He has no right to speculate whether he shall obtain an answer which may disclose circumstances that he is not desirous to know, and if there is to be a loss, the loss ought to fall upon him who, being subject to the liability, and having to remove that liability if he can remove it, ought to inquire and does not inquire. I must take care and guard myself upon this important point as not for a moment meaning to say that if that notice of the bankers had shown that they had been deceived, that they were advancing money upon a ground which they misunderstood, and if the charterers, Messrs. Mangles & Co., had stood by, well knowing that circumstance, and had been silent, the result would have been the same. I agree that the case would then be altogether different. It would have been incumbent upon the Messrs. Mangles to disclose the real circumstances of the case to Messrs. Dixon; and if they did not do so, they would be just as much bound as it is now contended they ought to be bound.

Let us see how the case stands in that respect. The dealing, remember, was between Messrs. Boyd and Messrs. Dixon, without any intervention in any manner, directly or indirectly, or any inquiry of Messrs. Mangles. What was there to induce Messrs. Mangles when they received that notice to suppose that Messrs. Boyd had been committing a fraud upon Messrs. Dixon, their bankers? “Pay what is due,” they say. Messrs. Mangles, of course, intended to pay what was due. Why were they to suppose that the existence of the agreement and the guarantee had not been communicated to Messrs. Dixon, who had put trust and credit in the statement of Messrs. Boyd, advanced this sum of £12,000 upon their mere promissory note, and remained content with it for months. They subsequently take an assignment, but they do not communicate that assignment even to Messrs. Mangles for two or three months afterwards. Then they give the notice, and say: “We have told you of this transaction now, and you shall be liable to everything which we have neglected for our own security. We have neglected to inquire, we have dealt behind your back with Messrs. Boyd. We, the bankers, have dealt with our own customers without your intervention; they have incurred a great debt with us, and we have taken an assignment of this, which is not an instrument assignable, except in equity, and which imposes all the liability upon us. We did not for a long time communicate that fact to you; we have never made any inquiry whether you have had any dealings with them; but now that we give you notice of the assignment, we throw upon you at once the whole liability, and desire you to indemnify us for our own negligence, our own want of care and caution, which, duly exercised, would have prevented this.”

Certainly that is a new point. I admit the books do not establish the rule, but I think the principle is perfectly clear that where there is no fraud, nothing to lead to the conclusion in the mind of the party who receives the notice that the party who gives it has been deceived and is likely to sustain a loss, the party receiving the notice is not bound to volunteer information. I conceive that equity will not require the party who receives the notice, impertinently almost, to interfere between two parties who have dealt behind his back, and who have never made any communication to him, or even seen him, on that subject. Had Messrs. Mangles done so, they must have begun by supposing that Messrs. Boyd had cheated Messrs. Dixon, and they must have had the hardihood to say: “We are afraid that Messrs. Boyd have been committing a fraud upon you, for we do not see that you mention the agreement and the guarantee. Therefore, we are forced to tell you of them.” Suppose that Messrs. Boyd had, as the probability was, really stated the facts, it would have been a very disagreeable answer, I imagine, that would have been received by Messrs. Mangles to that communication. Your Lordships were asked

A by the learned counsel at the Bar who appeared for Messrs. Mangles—and upon the subject of character it was put as a very fair question—whether, after the turn this case has taken, the House would say that there was anything fraudulent in the transaction as between Messrs. Mangles and Messrs. Dixon, and I cannot help stating to your Lordships that my clear impression is that there is no trace of any such fraud, or any fraudulent intention, on the part of the Messrs. Mangles.

B Another view is this. It did not follow that upon the result of the transaction there would not be enough to pay Messrs. Dixon. That depended upon the success or failure of the adventure, as to which nobody knew what would take place. The adventure did not turn out successful, but nobody could anticipate that, and there is no doubt, as between Messrs. Boyd, on the one hand, and their own bankers, Messrs. Dixon, on the other, that Messrs. Dixon would have been entitled to the whole extent of the freight earned, to the whole 16s. a ton, during the whole voyage.

C The authorities upon this subject, as to liabilities, show that if a man does take an assignment of a chose in action he must take his chance as to the exact position in which the party giving it stands. Cator v. Burke (1) very strongly illustrates that. There the defendants, the Burkes, had entered into a bond of £500 to the other defendant, Hargrave, for securing £250, and Hargrave had given to them a counter bond. Hargrave then deposited the first bond with a man of the name of Dator, and Dator filed his bill in order to prevent the parties at law from setting up their counter bond. Nothing could appear more fraudulent upon the face of it than a bond and a counter bond, because there you do enable the party to deal with the bond you give him, when you know that you have a defence in your hand, namely, a counter bond, to set up as a defence to the legal obligation. Dator does not appear to have had notice. The Lords Commissioners held that there was no equity, and LORD THURLOW, on the re-hearing of the case, seemed to think that it was not satisfactory, but he decided it upon the ground that a special purpose appearing for the bond to Hargrave and it not being to give a general credit, the plaintiff was not entitled to the remedy prayed, and, therefore, he affirmed the Lords Commissioners' order of dismissal. I understand that decision to amount

F to this—that, there being no general claim, but there being a special purpose, which was properly provided for by the counter bond, the man who took an assignment of the original bond was not entitled to have any remedy against the counter bond, though he knew nothing at all of it. That is certainly the strongest case that can be upon the subject.

G In Turton v. Benson (2), Benson, upon the marriage of his daughter, advanced a sum of money and took a bond, which equity always holds as void, from the son-in-law, to return part of the marriage-portion. The bond was deposited with one Sir Theodore Janssen as an additional security for money due. Mr. Benson died. Sir Theodore's demands were afterwards paid, and then the administrator assigned the bond for the benefit of the general creditors of the deceased. SIR JOSEPH JEKYLL, M.R., declared (1 P.Wms. at p. 497):

H “that the creditors of Benson could not be in a better condition than Benson himself, and as to Sir Theodore Janssen, it was to be considered that he had no legal title to this bond, but only an equitable assignment, and, therefore, having a security which was not good in equity, he could not be in a better condition than Benson himself was; that supposing a man should assign over a satisfied bond as a security for a just debt, the assignee could not set up the bond in equity, which, being satisfied before, could receive no new force from the assignment. That it was incumbent on any one who took an assignment of a bond to be informed by the obligor concerning the quantum due upon such bond, which if he neglected to do, it was his own fault, and he should not take advantage of his own laches.”

I There are other passages to the same effect when it afterwards came on before LORD PARKER, L.C. That shows clearly, what has never been disputed, that whatever may be the state of the account, although not even one single shilling is due, the man who takes an assignment of the bond must take it just as he finds it, and he cannot insist on the legal obligation that remains; the liability at law remains just as good as ever, but there is no obligation in equity. The man who took the assignment ought to have inquired. This is the doctrine laid down in Matthews v. Wallwyn (3) and in Chambers v. Goldwin (4), which is still stronger. Where a man takes an assignment of a mortgage and gets the legal estate, even in that case he has not done sufficient for his perfect security to take it without having communication with, and obtaining the concurrence of, the mortgagor, for, whatever be the state of the account, although he gets a transfer of the legal estate, he is bound by the state of the account, and he cannot recover a shilling beyond what is actually due, although there is no endorsement of payments upon the mortgage-deed, and although he has no notice of a single shilling of the money having been paid off. The rule, therefore, is perfectly clear.

The only question that remains to be considered is the conduct of the parties in this case after the notice. The notice spoke, as I told your Lordships, of past consideration. It is admitted, as I have stated, by the Messrs. Boyd and by the bankers, that no advance was made upon the charterparty, nor after its assignment; that they made no inquiry; and the question is whether the mere payment of the monthly instalments of freight by Messrs. Mangles can or can not affect their right to have an account taken. It appears to me, for the grounds and reasons I have already stated that no question could arise from that circumstance, because they were under an absolute legal liability to pay, and not simply a legal liability between the original parties, but an equitable liability between themselves and the assignees of the charterparty. It was not merely a charterparty by which they were bound by law, but it was a true and real agreement in equity that they should pay, pending the voyage, that monthly sum of £150. And as in equity the charterparty was assignable, the assignee became in equity entitled to that £150. Therefore, it was an act done in obedience to the charterparty, and in consequence of the liability to pay what sum was due from "this date"—for those are the words used in the assignment, and, therefore, they were merely performing properly, legally, and equitably their part of the agreement. The due performance of an agreement never can be considered as the ground for fixing parties with a liability to something beyond that by which they are equitably bound.

I have paid very great attention to this case, which I am especially bound to do differing as I do from the decision of the Lord Chancellor, believing the true rule in equity to be that which I have stated. The only ground on which I understand the decision was rested was that where a man having an interest in property stands by and sees another man dealing with that property, as owner, with another person who is ignorant of the want of title in the person with whom he is dealing, equity will bind the man who stands by. Nobody denies that proposition. The Lord Chancellor referred to Duke of Beaufort v. Neeld (5). There the duke's agent, with a power to act, had instructions not to act except under certain circumstances, but he exercised the authority without disclosing those instructions, and it was held that the principal was bound. How does that apply to this case? The agent was there in the place of the principal, the instructions given to him were not disclosed; he was, therefore, an agent with full authority, and nothing could be more dangerous to the dealings of mankind than to hold that a man was not bound by the act of his agent to whom he had given full authority because the agent had secret and private instructions not to exercise his power, except in a particular case. I cannot see, my Lords, how that bears upon this case, for the facts are not identical, nor even similar. There was no standing by on the part of Messrs. Mangles when they saw Messrs. Boyd dealing with Messrs. Dixon, the bankers. They did not even know that the transaction had taken place. There cannot be a doubt that, under such circumstances, in a court of equity, Messrs. Dixon cannot, at the last moment, turn round upon Messrs. Mangles and say: "When you received notice of this, you did not tell us that there was an agreement and a guarantee of which we did not know." They could have no reason to suppose that those papers had

A not been communicated. I have come to a very clear opinion that there is no equity on the part of Messrs. Dixon as against Messrs. Mangles. The appeal must, therefore, be allowed, and the case will stand upon the decree of the vice-chancellor.

Appeal allowed.

Land—Right to support—Subjacent minerals—Damage to surface land through removal of minerals—Removal not done negligently or contrary to custom of country.

Where the surface of land and the minerals under it belong to different owners the owner of the surface is entitled to have it supported by the subjacent mineral strata. Those strata may be removed by their owner, provided that a sufficient support of the surface is left, but, if the surface subsides and is damaged by the removal of those strata, although the operation has not been conducted negligently or contrary to the custom of the country, the owner of the surface may maintain an action against the owner of the minerals for the damage sustained by the subsidence. Unless the surface be entitled to support from the minerals underneath, it cannot be enjoyed as property, and in certain circumstances, as where the mineral strata approach the surface and are of great thickness, it might be entirely destroyed.

Rule Nisi obtained by the defendant, the secretary of the Durham Coal Co., to enter a verdict for himself in an action on the case for injury to the plaintiff's closes by working the mines below them without leaving sufficient support, tried before COLERIDGE, J., at the Lent Assizes, 1849, for the county of Durham, when a verdict was taken for the plaintiff, leave being reserved to the defendant to move to enter the verdict for himself. A rule was, accordingly, obtained by the defendant. E Watson and J. Addison for the plaintiff, showed cause against the rule.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 21, 1850. LORD CAMPBELL, C.J., read the following judgment of the court.—This is an action upon the case. The declaration alleges that the plaintiff was possessed of divers closes of pasture and arable land, situate, etc., yet that the Durham Coal Co. wrongfully, carelessly, negligently, and improperly, and without leaving any proper or sufficient pillars or supports in that behalf, and contrary to the custom and course of practice of mining used and approved of in the country where the mines thereafter mentioned are situate, worked certain coalmines, under and contiguous to the said closes, and dug for and got and moved the coals, minerals, earth, and soil of and in the said mines, so that by reason thereof the soil and surface of the said closes sunk in, cracked, swagged, and gave way, and thereby were greatly damaged. The only material plea was Not Guilty. The cause coming on to be tried before COLERIDGE, J., at the Spring Assizes for the county of Durham in 1849, it appeared that the plaintiff was possessed of the closes described in the declaration, and that the Durham Coal Co. (who may sue and be sued by their secretary) were lessees under the Bishop of Durham of the coalmines mentioned; but there was no other evidence whatever as to the tenure or title either of the surface or of the minerals. It appeared that the company had taken the coals under the plaintiff's closes without leaving any sufficient pillars to support the surface, whereby the closes had swagged and sunk, and had been considerably injured, but that, supposing the surface and the minerals to have belonged to the same person, these operations had not been conducted carelessly or negligently, or contrary to the custom of the country. The jury found that the company had worked carefully and according to the custom of the country, but without leaving sufficient pillars or supports; and a verdict was entered for the plaintiff for £110 damages. G H I

A with leave to move to enter a verdict for the defendants if the court should be of opinion that under these circumstances the action was not maintainable.

The case was very learnedly and ably argued before us in Trinity Term last, and on account of the great importance of the question, we took time to consider our judgment. For the defendants, it was contended that, after the special finding of the jury, the declaration is defective in not alleging that the plaintiff was entitled to have his closes supported by the subjacent strata. But we are of opinion that such an allegation is unnecessary to raise the question in this action whether the company, although they did not work the mines negligently or contrary to the custom of the country, were bound to leave props to support the surface. If the easement which the plaintiff claims exists, it does not arise from any special grant or reservation, but is of common right created by the law, so that we are bound to take notice of its existence. In pleading it is enough to state the facts from which a right or a duty arises. The carefully prepared declaration in Earl of Lonsdale v. Littleddale (1), for disturbing the right of the owner of the surface of lands to the support of the mineral strata belonging to another contains no express allegation of the right, and if the omission had been considered important, it probably would have been relied upon rather than the objection that a peer of Parliament was not liable to be sued in the Court of King's Bench by bill.

We have, therefore, to consider whether, when the surface of land (by which is here meant the soil lying over the minerals) belongs to one man and the minerals belong to another, no evidence of title appearing to regulate or qualify their rights of enjoyment, the owners of the minerals may remove them without leaving support sufficient to maintain the surface in its natural state. This case is entirely relieved from the consideration how far the rights and liabilities of the owners of adjoining tenements are affected by the erection of buildings, for the plaintiff claims no greater degree of support for his lands than they must have required and enjoyed since the glebe subsisted in its present form. Where portions of the freehold, lying one over another, perpendicularly belong to different individuals and constitute, as it were, separate closes, the degree of support to which the upper is entitled from the lower has, as yet, by no means been distinctly defined, but in the case of adjoining closes, which belong to different persons from the surface to the centre of the earth, the law of England has long settled the degree of lateral support which each may claim from the other, and the principle upon which this rests may guide us to a safe solution of the question now before us.

In 2 ROLLE'S ABRIDGMENT, tit. "Trespas" (I.) pl. 1, p. 564, it is said :

G "If A. seised in fee of copyhold next adjoining land of B. erect a new house on his copyhold land and part of the house is erected on the confines of his land next adjoining the land of B. if B. afterwards digs his land near to the foundation of the house of A. but not touching the land of A. whereby the foundation of the house and the house itself fall into the pit, still no action lies at the suit of A. against B.; because this was the fault of A. himself, that he built his house so near to the land of B.; for he could not by his act hinder B. from making the most profitable use of B.'s own land. But, semble, that a man who has land next adjoining to my land cannot dig his land so near to my land, that thereby my land shall fall into his pit; and for this, if an action be brought, it would lie."

I (I may remark that the circumstance that A.'s land was copyhold is immaterial, and nothing turns on that). This doctrine is recognised by LORD CHIEF BARON COMYN'S in COMYNS' DIGEST, tit. "Action on the case for a nuisance" (A.); by LORD TENTERDEN, in Wyatt v. Harrison (2); and by other great authorities. It stands on natural justice, and is essential to the protection and enjoyment of property in the soil. Although it places a restraint on what a man may do with his own property, it is in accordance with the precept, sic utere tuo ut alienum non lædas. As is well observed by a modern writer in GALE ON EASEMENTS :

"If the neighbouring owners might excavate their soil on every side up to their boundary-line to an indefinite depth, land thus deprived of support on all sides could not stand by its own coherence alone."

This right to lateral support from the adjoining soil is not like the support of one building upon another, supposed to be gained by grant, but is a right of property passing with the soil.

If the owner of two adjoining closes conveys away one of them, the alienee, without any grant for the purpose, is entitled to the lateral support of the other close the very instant the conveyance is executed as much as after the expiration of twenty years or any longer period. Pari ratione, where there are separate freeholds, from the surface of the land and the minerals belonging to different owners, we are of opinion that the owner of the surface, while unencumbered by buildings, and in its natural state, is entitled to have it supported by the subjacent mineral strata. Those strata may, of course, be removed by the owner of them, so that a sufficient support is left, but if the surface subsides and is injured by the removal of those strata, although (on the supposition that the surface and the minerals belong to the same owner) the operation may not have been conducted negligently or contrary to the custom of the country, the owner of the surface may maintain an action against the owner of the minerals for the damage sustained by the subsidence. Unless the surface-close be entitled to the support from the close underneath, corresponding to the lateral support to which it is entitled from the adjoining surface-close, it cannot be securely enjoyed as property, and under certain circumstances, as where the mineral strata approach the surface, and are of great thickness, it might be entirely destroyed.

We likewise think that the rule giving the right of support to the surface which is above the minerals, in the absence of any express grant, reservation, or covenant, must be laid down generally, without reference to the nature of the strata, or the difficulty of propping up the surface, or the comparative value of the surface and the minerals. We are not aware of any principle upon which qualifications could be added to the rule, and the attempt to introduce them would lead to uncertainty and litigation. Greater inconvenience cannot arise from this rule in any case than that which may be experienced where the surface belongs to one owner and the minerals to another who cannot take any portion of them without the consent of the owner of the surface. In such cases, a hope of reciprocal advantage will bring about a compromise, advantageous to the parties and to the public. Something has been said of a right of "reasonable support" for the surface; but we cannot measure out degrees to which the right may extend, and the only reasonable support is that which will protect the surface from subsidence and keep it securely at its ancient and natural level.

The defendant's counsel have argued that the analogy of the support to which one superficial close is entitled from the adjoining superficial close cannot apply where the surface and the minerals are separate tenements belonging to different owners, because there must have been unity of title of the surface and the minerals, and the rights of the parties must depend upon the contents of the deeds by which they were severed. But in contemplation of law, all property in land having been in the Crown, it is easy to conceive that at the same time the original grant of the surface was made to one and of the minerals under it to another, without an express grant or reservation of any easement. Suppose (what has generally been the fact) that there has been in a subject unity of title from the surface to the centre, if the surface and the minerals are vested in different owners without any deeds appearing to regulate their respective rights, we see no difficulty in presuming that the severance took place in a manner which would confer upon the owner of the surface a right to the support of the minerals. If the owner of the entirety is supposed to have alienated the surface, reserving the minerals, he cannot be presumed to have reserved to himself, in derogation of the grant, the power of removing all the minerals without leaving a support for the surface; and if he is supposed to have alienated the minerals, reserving the surface, he cannot be presumed to have

A parted with the right to that support for the surface by the minerals which it had ever before enjoyed. Perhaps it may be said that if the grantor of minerals, reserving the surface, seeks to limit the right of the grantee to remove them, he is acting in derogation of his grant, and is seeking to hinder the grantee from doing what he likes with his own.

B But, generally speaking, mines may be profitably worked, leaving a support to the surface by pillars or ribs of the minerals, although not so profitably as if the whole of the minerals be removed, and a man must so use his own as not to injure his neighbour. The books of law reports abound with decisions restraining a man's acting upon his own property where the necessary or probable consequence of such acts is to do damage to others. The case of common occurrence nearest to the present is where the upper storey of a house belongs to one man and the lower to another. The owner of the upper storey, without any express grant or enjoyment for any given time, has a right to the support of the lower storey. If this arises, as has been said, from an implied grant or covenant, why is not a similar grant or covenant to be implied in favour of the owner of the surface of land against the owner of the minerals? If the owner of an entire house, conveying away the lower storey only, is, without any express reservation, entitled to the support of the lower storey for the benefit of the upper storey, why should not an owner of land, who conveys away the minerals only, be entitled to the support of the minerals for the benefit of the surface?

I will now refer to the cases which were cited in the argument, and I think that none of them will be found in any degree to impugn the doctrine on which our decision rests. In Bateson v. Green (3), BULLER, J., says (5 Term Rep. at p. 416):

E "Where there are two distinct rights claimed by different parties, which encroach on each other in the enjoyment of them, the question is, which of the two rights is subservient to the other?"

It was held, that the lord may dig clay-pits on a common, or empower others to do so, without leaving sufficient herbage for the commoners if such right can be proved to have been always exercised by the lord. So here, the right of the owner of the minerals to remove them may be subservient to the right of the owner of the surface to have it supported by them. Peyton v. London Corpn. (4), was cited, to show the necessity of introducing into the declaration an averment that the plaintiff was entitled to the easement or right which is the foundation of the action. But the easement there claimed was a right of support of one building upon another which could only arise from a grant actual or implied, and there LORD TENTERDEN says (9 B. & C. at p. 735):

G "The declaration in this case does not allege as a fact that the plaintiffs were entitled to have their house supported by the defendant's house; nor does it, in our opinion, contain any allegation from which a title to such support can be inferred as matter of law."

H In the case at Bar, we are of opinion that the declaration alleges facts from which the law infers the right to support which the plaintiff claims.

Wyatt v. Harrison (2) decided that the owner of a house recently erected on the extremity of his land could not maintain an action against the owner of the adjoining land for digging in his own land so near to the plaintiff's house that the house fell down, but the reason given is that the plaintiff could not, by putting an additional weight upon his land and so increasing the lateral pressure upon the defendant's land, render unlawful any operation in the defendant's land which before would have caused no damage; and the court intimated an opinion that the action would have been maintainable, not only if the defendant's digging would have made the plaintiff's land crumble down unloaded by any building, but even if the house had stood twenty years. Where a house has been supported more than twenty years by land belonging to another proprietor with his knowledge, and he digs near the foundation of the house, whereby it falls, he is liable to an action at the suit of the owner of the house. Although there may be some difficulty in distinguishing whence the grant of the easement in respect of the house is to be presumed, as the owner of the adjoining land cannot prevent its being built and may not be able to disturb the enjoyment of it without the most serious loss or inconvenience to himself, the law favours the preservation of enjoyments acquired by the labour of one man and acquiesced in by another who has the power to interrupt them; and as, on the supposition of a grant, the right to light may be gained from not erecting a wall to obstruct it, the right to support for a new building erected near the extremity of the owner's land may be explained on the same principle. A B

In Dodd v. Holme (5), where there was a good deal of discussion respecting the rights of owners of adjoining lands or houses, no point of law was determined, as the case turned upon the allegation in the declaration that

“the defendant dug carelessly, negligently, unskilfully, and improperly, whereby the foundations of the walls of the plaintiff's house gave way.” C

The plaintiff's house was proved to have been in a very bad condition; but LORD DENMAN said that the defendant had no right to accelerate its fall. The Court of Exchequer, in Partridge v. Scott (6), concurred in the law before laid down in this court, that a right to the support of the foundation of a house from the adjoining land belonging to another proprietor can only be acquired by grant, and that where a house was built on excavated land, a grant is not to be presumed till the house has stood twenty years after notice of the excavation to the person supposed to have made the grant, but nothing fell from any of the judges questioning the right to support which land, while it remains in its natural state, has been said to be entitled to from the adjoining land of another proprietor. Some land of the plaintiff's not covered by buildings had likewise sunk, in consequence of the defendant's operations in his own land, but the court, in directing the verdict to be entered for the defendant on the whole declaration, seems to have thought that the sinking of the plaintiff's land was consequential upon the fall of the houses, or would not have taken place if his own land had not been excavated. The judges in the Exchequer Chamber held, upon a writ of error from the Court of Common Pleas in Chadwick v. Trower (7), that the mere circumstance of juxtaposition does not render it necessary for a person who pulls down his wall to give notice of his intention to the owner of an adjoining wall which rests upon it, and that he is not even liable for carelessly pulling down his wall if he had not notice of the existence of the adjoining wall. But this decision proceeds upon the want of any allegation or proof of a right of the plaintiff to have his wall supported by the defendant's, and does not touch the rights or obligations of contemporaneous proprietors, where the tenement to be supported remains in its natural condition. D E F G

Next comes the valuable case of Harris v. Ryding (8), which would be a direct authority in favour of the present plaintiff if it did not leave some uncertainty as to the effect of the averment in the declaration of the working “carelessly, negligently, and improperly,” and whether the plaintiff was considered absolutely entitled to have his land supported by the subjacent strata to whatever degree the affording of this support might interfere with the defendant's right to work the minerals. There, one seised in fee of land conveyed away the surface, reserving to himself the minerals, with power to enter upon the surface to work them, and it is said that the court held that, under this reservation, he was not entitled to take all the minerals, but only so much as he could get, leaving a reasonable support to the surface. The case was decided upon the demurrer to certain pleas justifying under the reservation, and the declaration alleged “careless, negligent, and improper working,” which there must be considered as admitted, whereas here it is negatived by the verdict. But the barons, in the very comprehensive and masterly judgments which they delivered seriatim, seem all to have thought that the reservation of the minerals would not have justified the defendant in depriving the surface of a complete support, however carefully he might have proceeded in removing them. LORD ABINGER says (5 M. & W. at p. 67): H I

A "The plea is no answer; because it does not set forth any sufficient ground to justify the defendant in working the mines in such a manner as not to leave sufficient support for the land above, which is alleged by the declaration to be a careless, negligent, and improper mode of working them."

PARKE, B., observes (ibid. at p. 71):

B "It never could have been in the contemplation of the parties, that by virtue of this reservation of the mines the grantor should be entitled to take the whole of the coal, and let down the surface, or injure the enjoyment of it. . . . The plea is clearly bad, because the defendants do not assign that, in taking away the coal, they did leave a sufficient support for the surface in its then state."

ALDERSON, B., said (ibid. at p. 73):

C "The question is whether the grantor is not to get the minerals which belong to him, and which he has reserved to himself the right of getting in that reasonable and ordinary mode in which he would be authorised to get them, provided he leaves a proper support for the land which the other party is to enjoy."

D My brother MAULE, then a judge of the Court of Exchequer, says, in the course of his luminous judgment (ibid. at p. 76):

"The right of the defendant to get the mines is the right of the mineowner as against the owner of the land which is above it; that right appears to me to be very analogous to that of a person having a room in a house over another man's room, or an acre of land adjoining another man's acre of land."

E Then PARKE, B., that he might not be misunderstood as to the right of the owner of the surface, added (ibid.):

"I do not mean to say that all the coal does not belong to the defendants, but that they cannot get it without leaving sufficient support."

F It seems to have been the unanimous opinion of the court that there existed the natural easement of support for the upper soil from the lower soil beneath, and that the entire removal of the interior strata, however skilfully done, would be actionable if productive of damage by withdrawing that degree of support to which the owner of the surface was entitled, the duty of the owner of the servient tenements forbidding him to do any act whereby the enjoyment of the easement could be disturbed.

G Counsel for the defendants relied much upon Acton v. Blundell (9), in which it was held that the landowner who, by mining operations in his own land, diverts the subterraneous current of water, is not liable to an action at the suit of the owner of adjoining land whose well is thereby left dry, but the right to running water and the right to have land supported are so totally distinct, and depend upon such different principles, that there can be no occasion to show at greater length how the decision is inapplicable.

H I have now to mention Hilton v. Lord Granville (10). If well decided, the plaintiff is justified in relying upon it, for it is strongly in point. This court there held that a prescription, or a custom within a manor, for the lord who is seised in fee of the mines and collieries therein to work them under any dwelling-houses, buildings and lands, portions of the manor, doing no unnecessary damage and paying to the tenants and occupiers of the surface of the land damaged thereby a reasonable compensation for the use of the surface of the land, "but without making compensation for any damage occasioned to any dwelling-houses or other buildings," within or parcel of the manor, by or for the purpose of working the said mines and collieries, is void as being unreasonable. LORD DENMAN said:

"A claim destructive of the subject-matter of the grant cannot be set up by any usage. Even if the grant could be produced in specie, reserving a right in the lord to deprive the grantee of the enjoyment of the thing granted, such a clause must be rejected, as repugnant and absurd. That the prescription or custom here pleaded has this destructive effect, and is so repugnant and void, appears to us too clear from the simple statement to admit of illustration by argument."

The most recent case referred to was Smith v. Kenrick (11), in which the Court of Common Pleas, after great deliberation, held that it is the right of each of the owners of adjoining mines, where neither mine is subject to any servitude to the other, to work his whole mine, as far as the flow of water is concerned, in the manner which he deems most convenient and beneficial to himself, although the natural consequence may be that some prejudice will accrue to the owner of the adjoining mine, so that such prejudice does not arise from the negligent or malicious conduct of his neighbour. But no question arose there respecting any right to support, the controversy being only respecting the obligation to protect the adjoining mine from water, which may flow into it by the force of gravitation, and in the very learned judgment of the court delivered by my brother CRESSWELL, there is nothing laid down to countenance the doctrine that in a case circumstanced like this which we have to determine the owner of the minerals may, if not chargeable with malice or negligence, remove them so as not to destroy or damage the surface, which belongs to another.

We have attempted, without success, to obtain from the codes or jurists of other nations information and assistance respecting the rights and obligations of persons to whom sections of the soil divided horizontally belong as separate properties. This penury, where the subject of servitudes is so copiously and discriminately treated, probably proceeds from the subdivision of the surface of land and the minerals under it into separate holdings being peculiar to England. Had such subdivision been known in countries under the jurisdiction of the Roman civil law, its incidental rights and duties must have been exactly defined when we discover the right of adjoining proprietors of land to support from lateral pressure leading to such minute regulations as the following :

"Si quis sepem ad alienum prædium fixerit infoderitque, terminum ne excedito; si maceriam, pedem relinquito; si vero domum, pedes duos; si sepulchrum aut scrobem foderit quantum profunditatis habuerint, tantum spatii relinquito, si puteum, passûs latitudinem." (L. 15, H. Fin. reg.)

The Code Napoléon likewise recognises the support to which the owners of adjoining lands are reciprocally entitled, but contains nothing which touches the question for our decision more closely than the following article on Natural Servitudes :

"Les fondes inférieurs sont assujettis envers ceux qui sont plus élevés à recevoir les eaux qui en découlent naturellement sans que la main de l'homme y ait contribué. Le propriétaire supérieur ne peut rien faire qui aggrave la servitude du fond inférieur." (Book II, tit. iv, ch. 1, art. 640.)

But reference is here made to adjoining fields on a declivity, not to the surface of land and the minerals being held by different proprietors. The American lawyers write learnedly on the support which may be claimed for land from lateral pressure and for buildings which have long rested against each other, but are silent as to the support which the owner of the surface of land may claim from the subjacent strata when possessed by another, see KENT'S COMMENTARIES, part VI, lecture iii, vol. 3, p. 434, Ed. 1840. However, in ERSKINE'S INSTITUTES OF THE LAW OF SCOTLAND, treating of the servitude oneris ferendi, that very learned author has the following passage, which well illustrates the principle on which our decision is founded :

"Where a house is divided into different floors or stories, each floor belonging to a different owner, which frequently happens in the city of Edinburgh, the proprietor of the ground-floor is bound, by the nature and condition of his property, without any servitude, not only to bear the weight of the upper storey but to repair his own property, that it may be capable of bearing the weight. The proprietor of the ground-storey is obliged to uphold it for the support of

A the upper, and the owner of the upper must uphold that as a roof or cover to the lower."

For these reasons, we are all of opinion that the present action is maintainable, notwithstanding the negation of negligence in the working of the mines, and that the rule to enter a verdict for the defendant must be discharged. I need hardly say that we do not mean to lay down any rule applicable to a case where the prima facie rights and liabilities of the owner of the surface of the land and of the subjacent strata are varied by the production of title deeds or by other evidence.

Rule discharged.

BAKER v. BRADLEY AND OTHERS

D [COURT OF APPEAL IN CHANCERY (Knight-Bruce and Turner, L.JJ.), July 25, November 5, 6, 7, 20, 1855]

[Reported 7 De G.M. & G. 597; 25 L.J.Ch. 7; 26 L.T.O.S. 160;
2 Jur.N.S. 98; 4 W.R. 78; 44 E.R. 233]

Family Arrangement—Transaction regarded with favour by court—Considerations on either side not weighed minutely.

E Undue Influence—Parent and child—Bounty from son to father—Transaction viewed by court with jealousy—Child guarded from parental influence—Need for independent advice—Claim in respect of sums paid for son's maintenance, education, and advancement, and expenditure on trust property.

Transactions between parent and child may proceed upon arrangements between them for the settlement of property or of rights of property in which they are interested. The court regards such transactions with favour. It does not minutely weigh the considerations on one side or the other. Even ignorance of rights, if equal on both sides, may not avail to impeach the transaction. If, however, the transaction is one of bounty from the child to the parent, soon after the child has attained the age of twenty-one, the court views it with jealousy, and anxiously interposes its protection to guard the child from the exercise of parental influence. It is essential that in any such transaction the child should have received independent advice. It would be attended with the greatest danger to allow debts of the father to be charged on the estate of the son in respect of sums spent by the father on the maintenance, education, and advancement of the son, or of expenditure on the trust property, however much that property had benefited thereby. A father could have no claim against his son in respect of such matters.

Appeal by the plaintiff, William Baylis Baker, from an order of STUART, V.-C., dismissing a bill filed by him for the purpose of having a mortgage, dated Sept. 2, 1848, to the defendant J. Bradley, for securing the sum of £1,300 and interest, and another mortgage of the same date to John Lovegrove (now vested in the defendants Thomas Cuff Adams, Joseph Lovegrove and William Cottier, his representatives) for securing the sum of £500 and interest, declared to be absolutely void as against him, and delivered up to be cancelled. He also sought a declaration that another mortgage, dated Oct. 28, 1850, to the defendant Joseph Lovegrove, for securing the sum of £700 and interest, ought to stand as a security against him for so much only of the £700 as was due from him to the defendant Joseph Lovegrove at the date of that mortgage. Charles Baker and Ann his wife, the father and mother of the plaintiff, were also made defendants to the suit. H

By his will dated Aug. 25, 1835, William Baylis gave certain messuages and hereditaments of which he was seised to Thomas Clutterbuck Croome, as follows : I

"To hold the same to the said Thomas Clutterbuck Croome, his heirs and assigns for ever, to the use of and in trust for my said daughter Ann Baker and her assigns for and during the term of her natural life, and to permit and suffer

A her to receive the rents and income to arise therefrom during the term of her natural life separate and apart from her present or any future husband, and not subject to his debts, engagements or control; and I declare that the receipts of my said daughter Ann Baker alone, or of some person or persons authorised by her to receive any payment of the said rents and income, after such payment shall have become due, notwithstanding her said present or any future marriage, shall alone be good discharges for the said rents and income, or for so much thereof as shall be thereby acknowledged to have been received. And from and immediately after the determination of the estate hereinbefore limited to the use of and in trust for the said Ann Baker for her life as aforesaid, then to the said Thomas Clutterbuck Croome and his heirs during the natural life of my said daughter, in trust to support the contingent uses and estates hereinafter limited, yet to permit and suffer the said Ann Baker to receive and take the rents and income to arise from the said hereditaments during the term of her natural life as aforesaid, and from and immediately after the decease of the said Ann Baker, then to the use of and in trust for the said Charles Baker, if he shall survive the said Ann Baker, for and during the term of his natural life, to enable him to support himself and to support and bring up the children of the said Ann Baker; and in case the said Charles Baker should die in the lifetime of the said Ann Baker, and if she should marry any future husband who should happen to survive her, then to the use of and in trust for any future husband of the said Ann Baker who may happen to survive her, for and during the term of his natural life; and from and immediately after the decease of the survivor of them the said Ann Baker and the said Charles Baker, and of any future husband of the said Ann Baker, if such future husband shall survive her, then to the use of all and every or any one or more of the children, grandchildren or other issue of the said Ann Baker by the said Charles Baker, or by any future husband (such grandchildren, issue to be born before any appointment shall be made to them respectively) in such manner and form, and, if more than one, in such parts, shares and proportions, and with such limitations over, or substitutions in favour of any one of the others of the said children, grandchildren and issue respectively, and at such time or times, age or ages, day or days, and in such contingencies, and under and subject to such directions and regulations for maintenance, education and advancement, and to such conditions as the said Ann Baker, notwithstanding her present or any future husband, at any time or times and from time to time by any deed or deeds to be signed, sealed and delivered by her in the presence of two or more credible witnesses, to be with or without power of revocation and new appointment, or by her last will and testament in writing or any writing in the nature of a last will and testament, or any codicil or codicils to be respectively signed and published by her in the presence of and attested by three or more credible witnesses, shall direct, limit or appoint, or give and devise the same; and from and until default of and from time to time, and subject to such direction, limitation and appointment, gift or devise, then to the use of and in trust for the child of the said Ann Baker, if only one, whether male or female, and for all the children of the said Ann Baker, both male and female, if more than one, and whether by her present or any future husband, to be equally divided between or among them, share and share alike as tenants in common and not as joint tenants, and the heirs of the body and several and respective bodies of the same children respectively lawfully issuing, with cross remainders in tail between and among such children of the said Ann Baker; and in default of such issue, then to the same uses, upon the same trusts, and for the same estates as are hereinafter devised to the said Thomas Clutterbuck Croome, to the use of and in trust for my daughter Mary Baylis and her children, and the issue of such children; and in default of issue of all the children of the said Ann Baker and of the said Mary Baylis, then to the use of and in trust for the said Ann Baker, her heirs and assigns absolutely."

The testator then devised other estates to his daughter Mary Baylis upon similar trusts, and in default of children of the said Mary Baylis, then on the same trusts in favour of Ann Baker and her children, and failing children of Ann Baker, to Mary Baylis absolutely. He appointed Ann Baker and Mary Baylis executrixes of his will. A

The testator died soon after the date of his will. The plaintiff William Baylis Baker was the only child of the testator's daughter, the defendant Ann, the wife of the defendant C. Baker. He was an infant at the time of the testator's death, and attained twenty-one on May 25, 1848. His mother, the defendant Ann Baker, was at this time about fifty-three years of age; and his aunt, Mary Baylis, who had been married to Mr. Holder, was then a widow without children, and about forty-six years old. During the minority of the plaintiff the defendants C. Baker and Ann his wife borrowed the sum of £1,000 from the defendant J. Bradley, and the sum of £500 from John Lovegrove, a solicitor at Gloucester, upon mortgages of Mr. and Mrs. Baker's life interests in the estates devised by the will of William Baylis, the defendant Ann Baker conveying her life estate as if she was not restricted from anticipating and the recitals of the will of William Baylis contained in the mortgages not referring to the receipt clause following the limitations to the separate use of the defendant Ann Baker and Mary Baylis. Part of the sum of £1,000 secured by Bradley's mortgage was (together with a further sum of £100 advanced by him to the defendant Baker) further secured by an assignment of the defendant Baker's furniture, and both the sums of £1,000 and £500 were also secured by policies of insurance upon Baker's life. From the evidence it appeared that in 1844 the defendant C. Baker suggested to the defendant Bradley that his policy might be dropped in case the plaintiff, upon attaining twenty-one, would charge the £1,000 upon his interest in the estates, and that the defendant Bradley agreed to the suggestion. B C D E

John Lovegrove died in March, 1848, and it appeared that both shortly before and after his death, and before the plaintiff attained twenty-one, the defendant Joseph Lovegrove (who was a solicitor and one of the executors of John Lovegrove) on behalf of himself and his co-executors, and of the defendant Bradley, entered into communication with the defendant C. Baker upon the subject of the plaintiff's charging the mortgage monies due to Bradley and John Lovegrove's estate on his interest in the mortgaged premises. There did not appear, however, to have been any direct communication between the plaintiff and Lovegrove until May 30, 1848, five days after the plaintiff had attained twenty-one. On that day the plaintiff went with the defendant C. Baker, his father, with whom he was then living, to the office of Joseph Lovegrove, and there signed a memorandum, which recited that the plaintiff, under the will of the testator, after the decease of his mother and any husband she might leave surviving, subject to a power of appointment, was entitled to certain hereditaments therein comprised, and also to those devised to Mary Baylis. The memorandum also recited Lovegrove's mortgage and Bradley's deed. It recited the loan of £1,000 upon the bill of sale, and that £500 was now due to the executors of Lovegrove and £1,100 to Bradley, and that a large proportion of the above sums had been applied by the father and mother of the plaintiff in his maintenance, education and advancement in life, as he did thereby admit and acknowledge. The memorandum then proceeded as follows: F G H

"Now he the said William Baylis Baker doth hereby undertake, promise and agree to and with the said T. C. Adams, Joseph Lovegrove and William Cother the younger, and the said J. Bradley respectively, that he the said W. B. Baker will, whenever thereunto requested by them the said T. C. Adams, J. Lovegrove and W. Cother the younger, and J. Bradley, or any or either of them, at his own costs and charges, make, do, execute and perfect all such acts, deeds and assurances as may be deemed necessary for securing to them respectively, or their respective executors, administrators and assigns, the repayment of the said several principal sums so respectively due as aforesaid, together with I

C. Adams, J. Lovegrove, W. Cother the younger and J. Bradley respectively all principal and interest monies which may be due to them respectively on the before-mentioned securities."

- After the plaintiff had signed this memorandum application was made to the defendant Bradley to advance the further sum of £200, which he agreed to do, and a deed of appointment by the plaintiff's mother, in his favour, of the fee of the estates and two of the mortgage deeds in question, viz., those of Sept. 2, 1848, were prepared. On Aug. 24, 1848, the engrossments of these deeds were read over to the plaintiff and his father at the office of Mr. Joseph Lovegrove. The plaintiff had no other adviser, and it was not alleged that any advice was given to him as to any claims which his father had upon him, and no suggestion was made to him that his mother's life estate was subject to any restriction against anticipation, the case of the defendants being that up to this time, at least, it was not supposed
- E by any of the parties that the will operated any such restriction. On Sept. 1 and 2, 1848, the above-mentioned deed of appointment and the mortgage deeds were executed, and the £200 was advanced by Bradley. The mortgage deeds were both dated Sept. 2, 1848. One was made between Charles Baker and Ann his wife, of the first part, the plaintiff, of the second part, and John Bradley, of the third part. It recited the will and the memorandum of May 30, 1848, the plaintiff admitting
- F that the sum of £1,000 was then due to Bradley, and £500 to the executors of John Lovegrove, from Charles Baker and Ann his wife, together with a further sum of £100 lent by J. Bradley to Charles Baker. By the first witnessing part of the deed (in consideration of £200 paid by Bradley to Charles Baker and to the plaintiff) Charles Baker covenanted for the repayment of the same, and also that the estate of himself and his wife under the will should be charged therewith. By a
- G further witnessing part it was expressed that, in pursuance of the agreement and in consideration of the premises, the plaintiff thereby granted, conveyed, assigned and confirmed unto Bradley, his heirs and assigns, all and singular the estates devised under the testator's will, including those firstly given to Ann Baker, and those secondly given to Mary Baylis, and all the estate and interest of the plaintiff comprised in the deed of appointment of Sept. 1, 1848, as a security for the sums of £1,000, £100 and £200, making together £1,300. The deed contained a covenant on the part of the plaintiff to pay the above sums and interest, and a power of sale. The other mortgage deed of even date was executed by Mr. and Mrs. Baker and the plaintiff in favour of the executors of Joseph Lovegrove to secure £500. The receipt clause by Mrs. Baker was omitted in the recitals of both the mortgage deeds. The policies of insurance for securing the mortgage moneys were then allowed to drop. The plaintiff afterwards, in November, 1848, borrowed from a lady of the name of Mary Taylor a further sum of £300 upon mortgage of his reversionary interest, and this mortgage was approved by a separate solicitor on the part of the plaintiff. It was dated Nov. 4, 1848. A

In December, 1849, the defendant Joseph Lovegrove applied to Croome, the devisee under the will who had possession of the title-deeds of the estates, for the delivery of them to the mortgagees, and in consequence of this application counsel was consulted on the will and advised that the life interest of Mary Baker was subject to a restriction against anticipation. The fact of counsel having thus advised appeared upon the evidence to have become known to the plaintiff in June, 1850. In consequence of this opinion of counsel, the delivery of the deeds by Croome was not further pressed. Pending and subsequent to the application for the deeds, the plaintiff attempted to raise further moneys upon the security of his reversionary interest through the medium of another solicitor, Mr. Howard, and ultimately of Mr. Lovegrove, but these attempts failed. It appeared that the plaintiff had at this time a copy of the will in his possession. The plaintiff having failed in his attempt to raise further moneys, he and his father borrowed small sums from time to time of the defendant Joseph Lovegrove, some of which appeared to have been advanced to the father at the instigation of the plaintiff. Ultimately, having become embarrassed in their affairs, the plaintiff and his father applied to the defendant Lovegrove for an advance of £700 to extricate them from their difficulties, and he agreed to make the advance upon the security of a mortgage and upon the assurance of the plaintiff and his father that no advantage should be taken of the supposed defect pointed out by the opinion of counsel arising from the provision against anticipation. A mortgage, dated Oct. 28, 1850, was thereupon prepared and executed. At the time of the execution of this mortgage it had not been ascertained what payments were to be made on account of the plaintiff and his father, and the account as to the application of the £700 was not, therefore, then settled. In December, 1850, it was settled between the plaintiff's father and the defendant Lovegrove, and the balance paid to the plaintiff's father. The account was subsequently sent to the plaintiff and acknowledged by him to be correct, with the exception of a very small item. B C D E

On May 18, 1852, the plaintiff filed his bill in the present suit, alleging that in the abstracts of the will of William Baylis, made with a view to the deeds of September, 1848, the proviso against anticipation by the said Ann Baker, as well as the similar proviso against anticipation by Mary Baylis, were entirely omitted, and that there was nothing on the face of such abstract to cause any suspicion that the original will of the said William Baylis did in fact contain any such proviso against anticipation, or that Ann Baker was in any way restrained and prevented from executing valid and effectual charges upon her life estate under the said will. The bill stated that the F G

"Plaintiff was advised that such omission was a fraud upon the plaintiff, and that by reason of the youth and inexperience and want of legal advice, and also of the parental control exercised over him, with the full knowledge and concurrence of the defendants, and also by reason of such fraud, the two indentures of Sept. 2, 1848, ought to be declared null and void, and decreed to be delivered up to be cancelled, so far as the plaintiff might be affected thereby." H

The bill did not set out the agreement of May 30, 1848.

The vice-chancellor held that the agreement was good as a family arrangement, and, doubting the correctness of the report of Field v. Evans (1) that the omission in the recitals in the securities of the clause in the will was immaterial, as that clause did not, in his Honour's opinion, operate as a restraint upon anticipation. I
The plaintiff appealed.

Nov. 20, 1855. The following judgments were read.

KNIGHT-BRUCE, L.J.—The bill in this case was filed in May, 1852, the plaintiff, who attained his majority on May 24 or 25, 1848, having soon afterwards in that year and in the year 1850 signed an agreement and executed certain deeds which, by way of suretyship for his father, professed to make, and (if equitably as well as legally valid) made the person and property of the plaintiff liable for certain debts of his father (one of the defendants).

B

The main question in the cause is whether, so far, these instruments bind the plaintiff legally and equitably, or are in equity void against him—a question in considering which it was right to endeavour to form an opinion as to the true construction of the will of his maternal grandfather, Mr. Baylis, with respect to the life interest of the plaintiff's mother in the property in which her life interest and his interest by way of remainder under the will were, by the instruments that I have mentioned, professed to be charged. For if the life interest of the plaintiff's mother under the will was alienable by her during her coverture, it is obvious, when we look at what had occurred before 1848, that her position and that of her family, so far as it was liable to be affected by hers, were very different in and after April and May, 1848, from what a contrary state of things known to exist would have rendered them; and this, independently of the not unimportant consideration that her life interest if alienable was made liable to exonerate the plaintiff and his property partially at least from the debts of her involved and embarrassed husband, but, if otherwise, of course not. It is undisputed and unquestionable on the evidence that the plaintiff became a party to each of the instruments of 1848 in the belief that her life interest under the will was alienable by her during her coverture, and, therefore, that she and her property and family were affected accordingly.

Having attentively considered Mr. Baylis's will, the view that I take of it is that, as to the life interest which it gave to Mrs. Baker, the plaintiff's mother, it restrained her from anticipation during her coverture. So reading the will of Mr. Baylis, I consider it to be established that the plaintiff became a party to the instruments of 1848 under a misapprehension, material and important in its nature. Another view of the will, which I think erroneous, was, perhaps, taken—and perhaps honestly taken—in 1848 by some or all of the other parties to those instruments. But the defendant Mr. Joseph Lovegrove, the mortgagee of 1850, and one of the mortgagees of 1848, is a solicitor, and was in that character professionally concerned for the other mortgagees in the transaction of 1848. Nor can any one of the parties to this suit, I conceive, deny that in and before September, 1848, they all had at least constructive notice of the whole contents of the will. But the plaintiff, who, if in any part of the transactions of 1848 and 1850, he had any solicitor or adviser, had not any other than Mr. Joseph Lovegrove, and was not before the year 1850 apprised that the restraint on alienation existed, or might be reasonably contended to exist, according to the correct construction of the will, was in 1848 caused or allowed to sign and execute the instruments of that year under the erroneous impression which I have mentioned.

H

There are, however, other circumstances damaging to the instruments, so far as they purport to make the plaintiff a surety. The deeds proceed on the notion of the clear validity of the appointment of Sept. 1, 1848, made by Mrs. Baker in the plaintiff's favour, an appointment which, if its validity or invalidity could and ought to be determined on the materials before the court in the present suit, must, in my opinion, be deemed bad and worthless, for its motive and object seem to me to have been to make the inheritance of the property comprised in it subservient to the purposes of the father and his creditors in a transaction in which the mother and the son seem merely to have been used as the father's instruments under the guidance of Mr. Joseph Lovegrove, the lawyer of the father's creditors. The power under which the appointment was made extends to grandchildren, and, if it has not been well exercised, may be exercised hereafter so as to exclude the plaintiff. Again, the almost indescribable document of May 30, 1848, prepared and attested by Mr. Lovegrove in that month, was gravely treated in the following September as if it bound the plaintiff, or been anything more than waste paper as against him and his property. He executed the deeds of September, 1848, under the false impression that the instrument of May was effectual against him, and I am not sure that any one of the parties to the eccentric arrangement of that year was in that year of a different opinion. But it seems impossible to suppose that Mr. Joseph Lovegrove could have believed in the truth of the strange suggestion that the father had a demand on the son or his property for his maintenance, education, and advancement, nor, of course, is there, or was there, any pretence for saying that the father's expenditure on the property (however beneficial to it) created any demand between them. Assuredly neither the father nor Mr. Joseph Lovegrove ought to have endeavoured to induce the plaintiff to sign or execute, or ought indeed to have abstained from recommending him not to sign or execute, any one of the deeds of 1848. Of course, the astonishing agreement of May is not a matter to be dealt with except as a thing prejudicing the case of the mortgagees of 1848, from whom it seems to me to take away such chance, if any, as they might otherwise have had, of retaining the plaintiff or his property in the position of surety for his father.

Upon the whole, if not independently of that agreement, yet certainly that agreement being taken into account, the plaintiff has, in my opinion, with respect to the disputed mortgage deeds of 1848, established a case, on his part, of misapprehension, imprudence, inexperience, unadvisedness, ignorance and subjection to unduly exercised influence, in all which Mr. Joseph Lovegrove's participation, and to all which his privity, must prevent the other mortgagees from effectually contending that they were not throughout apprised of the true circumstances—a case, I say, sufficient on these grounds, in my opinion, to render it incumbent on a court of equity to relieve the plaintiff and his property from all the obligations of suretyship for his father which were with such a remarkable want of propriety imposed on the plaintiff in 1848.

The same observations apply with equal force, or not importantly less strongly, to the security for £700 of October, 1850. It was the duty of the defendant, Mr. Lovegrove, who at least after 1848, if not in and after 1848, had been acting as solicitor for the plaintiff, not to take that security from the plaintiff without affording him more information and better advice than he had, and so far as it affects him or his property by way of suretyship for his father, it cannot, in my judgment, be allowed to stand. It is true that counsel's opinion upon the construction of Mr. Baylis's will was known to the plaintiff before July, 1850, and, therefore, before he gave the defendant, Mr. Lovegrove, the security of October, 1850, for £700, but the defendant Mr. Lovegrove, who made the plaintiff's mother a party to the security, and in the transaction treated her as not restrained from anticipation, cannot, in my opinion, support it against the plaintiff, on the ground that he then had notice either that she was so restrained or that the point was doubtful.

It was suggested in the argument that the transaction of 1848, impeached by the bill, might be supported against the plaintiff as amounting to a family arrangement. If, in the French language, he were described as having been well arranged in those operations, I should probably not dissent from the phrase, but I cannot agree that, according to the sense ascribed by English courts of equity to the term "family arrangement," or that according to Pullen v. Ready (2), Gordon v. Gordon (3), Tweddell v. Tweddell (4), or any of the authorities cited in Palmer v. Wheeler (5) and Harvey v. Cooke (6), and in Mr. SWANSTON's notes to Davis v. Uphill (7) and Dunnage v. White (8), there was in the present instance, in 1848, a family arrangement, or an arrangement binding on the plaintiff, a witless lad, who in those transactions appears to me to have been a mere prey ensnared and plundered by hands from which he ought to have received guidance and protection.

A for report, and concluded:] The result appears to me to be that we should discharge the order dismissing the bill and declare the several instruments of mortgage or security of September, 1848, and October, 1850, void in equity against the plaintiff, save as concerning the indenture of Sept. 2, 1848, to which the defendant Bradley is a party, so far, if at all, as that indenture is a security to the defendant Bradley for such, if any, part of the £1,300 as was bona fide advanced to and
B received by the plaintiff, and, save as concerning the indenture of October 1850, so far as that indenture is a security to the defendant Mr. Lovegrove, for so much of the sum of £700 mentioned in it as, independently of that indenture, formed a bona fide debt from the plaintiff to the defendant Mr. Lovegrove or was advanced by him upon the plaintiff's express request.

C TURNER, L.J., stated the facts and continued: Upon these facts, which are mainly, if not wholly, taken from the statements of the defendants themselves, two questions appear to me to arise—(i) whether the mortgages of September, 1848, and October, 1850, were originally valid in equity as against the plaintiff, and (ii) if they were originally invalid against him, has there been any such confirmation or acquiescence on his part as precludes his title to relief?

D In considering the first of these questions it is, I think, necessary in the first place to inquire what was the nature and character of the transactions out of which these mortgages arose, for upon the answer to that inquiry it must, as I apprehend, depend what are the principles which ought to be applied to the determination of the case. Transactions between parent and child may proceed upon arrangements
E between them for the settlement of property, or of their rights in property in which they are interested. In such cases this court regards the transactions with favour. It does not minutely weigh the considerations on one side or the other. Even ignorance of rights, if equal on both sides, may not avail to impeach the transaction. On the other hand, the transaction may be one of bounty from the child to the parent, soon after the child has attained twenty-one. In such cases this court views the transaction with jealousy, and anxiously interposes its protection to guard the

What, then, was the true character of the deeds of Sept. 2, 1848? The vice-chancellor seems to have considered them as in the nature of a family arrangement, but with great respect to his Honour's judgment I cannot so regard them. They were, as I view them, deeds contrived for the purpose of charging the debts of the father upon the estate of the son, and unless the alleged outlay by the father upon the property, or his expenditure in the maintenance and education of his son, could be made the ground of claim by the father against the son, there was not, so far as I can see, any subject of bargain between them. It would, I think, be attended with the greatest danger to permit claims of this description to be made the subject of bargain between parent and child, or to treat arrangements founded on such claims as entitled to the same favourable consideration as the court extends to family
G arrangements. I am not prepared to go that length. I think these deeds can be looked at in no other light than as deeds of gift from the plaintiff to his father. Were they originally valid if viewed in that light? The plaintiff attained twenty-one on May 25, 1848. On May 30 he signs the undertaking of that date (infra). It is true that some material interval elapses before the deeds are executed, but during that interval he is fettered by the undertaking. He has no independent advice. The H father's solicitor, and the father's solicitor alone, acts in the transaction. If the case had even rested here, I think it would have been sufficiently difficult to maintain these deeds, but there are considerations of still greater importance affecting their validity. They proceed upon the assumption that the plaintiff's mother had the power of alienating her life interest, and if she had that power her interest was by the deeds made liable for the sums secured, and would, as between the plaintiff and his mother, have been bound to contribute, if not have been primarily liable for the payment of the sums secured. It is not even pretended that the plaintiff was advised upon this question. On the contrary, the case of the defendants is that up to this period it was assumed by all parties that the life estate of the mother A was alienable.

The case, perhaps, might well be disposed of upon the single ground that the alienability of the life estate upon the faith of which the plaintiff executed these deeds was open to doubt, and that the plaintiff was not duly advised upon that doubt, but the question of the alienability of the life estate has been fully argued before us, and I shall not, therefore, hesitate to give my opinion upon it. I concur B with my learned brother in the opinion that, upon the true construction of this will, the plaintiff's mother was restrained from anticipation. [His LORDSHIP gave the reasons for his decision on this point which it is not necessary to deal with here.] Upon the whole, looking to the age and position of this plaintiff when the deeds of September, 1848, were executed, to the undertaking of May 30, which, though not alleged by the bill, is in evidence before us and cannot be disregarded as part of the C case, to the want of legal advice, to the doubt upon the construction of the will, and to the construction itself, I am of opinion that, without reference to any question of confirmation, the deeds of Sept. 2, 1848, cannot be maintained. An additional sum of £200, however, was advanced by the defendant Bradley upon the mortgage of this date in his favour being executed, and it does not appear that the plaintiff did not receive some part of this sum. He cannot of course get back his estate without D refunding what, if anything, he so received. There must be an inquiry, therefore, upon this point if the defendants desire it.

We come then to the question as to the original validity of the deed of Oct. 24, 1850. This deed is not disputed by the plaintiff as to so much of the £700 as was due from him to the defendant Joseph Lovegrove. The question is whether it can be maintained against the plaintiff as to so much of the £700 as was due from his father. This is a transaction, not between father and son, but between solicitor and client. The deed is prepared by Mr. Joseph Lovegrove. The plaintiff had no independent advice upon it. His estate is made liable for the debt due to Mr. Lovegrove from the father. The undertaking of May 30 is, as I collect from the answer, recited in the deed. No advice is given as to that instrument, or the nature of the claims upon which it is founded. A strong case would, I think, be required E to support such a deed, even if there was nothing more to impeach it. But by this deed the mother's estate also purports to be conveyed as a security for the debt, and we are of opinion that the deed was inoperative as to her. It is true that the plaintiff must be taken to have been at this time aware that counsel had advised that the mother was restricted from alienation, but how can this deed be considered otherwise than as a representation by Mr. Lovegrove that, notwithstanding that G opinion, the mother's estate could be bound. That representation proves to be unfounded, and under such circumstances and between such parties I think that, apart from any question of confirmation, this deed cannot be supported beyond the extent to which the plaintiff has submitted to be bound by it, and any further advances which may have been made to the father upon the plaintiff's request.

[His LORDSHIP added that no case of acquiescence or confirmation had been made H out on the facts which would preclude the plaintiffs from relief.]

Appeal allowed.

HARRISON AND ANOTHER v. GUEST

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Campbell, L.C., Lord Brougham, Lord Wensleydale and Lord Cranworth), July 6, 9, 1860]

Sale of Land—Conveyance—Setting aside—Inadequacy of consideration—Irrregularity of statement of consideration—Amendment of conveyance.

Where no fiduciary relation exists between two parties dealing for the sale and purchase of an estate, mere inadequacy of consideration or irregularity in the statement of it in the conveyance is not sufficient to impeach the contract.

It would, however, be a ground for amending the conveyance.

Undue Influence—Guardian and ward—Parent and child—Purchase by guardian or parent of property from ward or child—Right of vendor to have legal protection—Setting aside conveyance—Burden of proof.

If persons standing in a fiduciary relation to one another deal as vendor and purchaser, the court expects the purchaser, if the purchase is complained of by the vendor, to show that the vendor had due protection afforded him—thus, if a guardian purchases of his ward, though that relation may have ceased only for a short time so that the influence of the guardian may be supposed to exist, or a parent purchases of his child, the burden of proof is upon him to show that his quondam ward, or the child, was protected. In such a case the court throws the burden of proof upon him who sets up the transaction against the person whom he was bound to protect, but where no such relation exists the burden of proof is upon the vendor to show that he was imposed upon. He cannot be heard to say that he had no professional adviser, but must show a contrivance or management on the part of the purchaser to prevent his having that advice.

Appeal from an order of LORD CRANWORTH, L.C., in an action to set aside the sale and conveyance of a property which, it is alleged, the respondent had by fraud procured from one John Hunt, a predecessor in title of the appellants.

John Hunt, a man in a humble situation and without education, was the owner of a small copyhold property, situated at Broadwas, in the county of Worcester, consisting of thirteen acres of land, and having a small house, stable, and shed erected thereon. It had been mortgaged in 1819 to secure to Mary Ann, the wife of S. B. Butler, the repayment of a principal sum of £300, with interest at five per cent. per annum. In 1828 Hunt made a will devising the property to the two appellants. Up to September, 1849, Hunt lived in the house and farmed the land, but, illness having then rendered him incapable of continuing to labour, he let the house and land at the rent of £35 a year to one Harper, with whom he became a lodger. In the course of 1853, being then seventy-one years of age, finding himself getting worse, and requiring more attention than he could receive from his tenant, he made an offer first to a Mr. Evans, and afterwards to the respondent, a man of fortune in that parish and neighbourhood, respecting the property. The offer in substance was that Hunt should be installed as an inmate in the Yew Tree farmhouse, occupied by Ballard, a tenant of Guest's, should have his lodging, washing, and attendance there, and should have his dinners from Mr. Guest's table. Some years before that time the respondent had offered to purchase the property from Hunt, but Hunt, who was then working it, declined to sell, and no further negotiations took place between them till this offer in July, 1853. C

The appellants in their bill alleged, in substance, that the respondent urged Hunt to go and live at Ballard's house and promised to support him there, to pay off the mortgage debt and take the security of the copyhold estate for that debt and for what should be advanced for the maintenance of Hunt; that Hunt consented to this arrangement, and was, on Sept. 30 removed to Ballard's house; that on the same day the mortgage debt of £300 (together with £6 5s. for interest then due, and £7 10s. for six months' interest in advance) was paid off; that on Oct. 6 following the mortgagees were called on to execute, and did execute, as parties with Hunt, the deed by which the property was conveyed to the respondent. That deed recited the payment of £313 15s. to the mortgagees, and that Hunt had contracted to assign the property to the respondent upon such payment, and upon his entering into the covenants thereafter contained, "for the lodging, maintenance, and support of the said John Hunt during his life." It alleged the assignment by the mortgagees, and witnessed that, in consideration of the payment of the further sum of £10 by Guest to Hunt, and of the covenants to be performed by Guest, Hunt assigned to Guest. It then set forth the covenants in these terms, that: F

"he [Guest] shall and will henceforth from time to time, and at all times during the continuance of the natural life of the said John Hunt, provide the said John Hunt with good, sufficient, and suitable meat, drink, board, and lodging, and the washing of his clothes, and bedding, and attendance. And, moreover, that in case the said E. B. Guest shall at any time hereafter neglect or refuse to provide the said John Hunt with sufficient and suitable meat, drink, board, lodging, washing, and attendance, then and in such case the said E. B. Guest shall and will pay or allow unto the said John Hunt the sum of 12s. per week in lieu of providing him the said John Hunt with meat, drink, board, lodging, washing, and attendance as aforesaid." I

A There was then a proviso that Guest was not bound to supply Hunt with "medicine or any other extra attendance in the case of sickness, or with wine or spirits," nor to be "liable for funeral expenses."

The bill alleged that in these transactions Hunt was entirely without professional advice; that the deed was not read over or explained to him; that he was charged £9 18s. 4d. for costs as if he had been a mortgagor and not a vendor; and that the
B business was hurried over with extraordinary haste and no abstract of title was prepared as was usual in the purchase of landed property, but that Guest, in his eagerness to get possession of the title-deeds, never inspected them, but paid off the mortgage at once. The bill also alleged, that at the time of executing the indentures, Hunt did not know nor understand that he was selling the estate; that the respondent asserted that he was to give £600 as the consideration for the estate,
C £100 of which (after payment of the mortgage) were to be paid to Hunt in money, and the surplus retained to answer the covenant as to board and lodging, but that the £100 never were paid to Hunt; that he never received any other consideration for the indenture than maintenance and lodging for a few weeks; and that the property, at the date of the indenture, was of the full value of £700. The bill, after alleging that the respondent had taken possession of certain personal property
D of Hunt, prayed that the indenture of Oct. 6, 1853, might be declared null and void, or only stand as a security for the advances made by Guest to Hunt, and that accounts might be directed, and for further relief.

The respondent, by his answer, as to the imputed haste, said that Hunt pressed for the immediate execution of the arrangement as he was very uncomfortable where he then was; that the respondent's offer had been to purchase the estate
E out-and-out; that that was refused by Hunt, who was urgent about his own personal comforts being provided for, and who insisted upon the arrangement as to board and lodging. The respondent admitted that Hunt was without professional advice, but alleged that he had been recommended to have a solicitor of his own, which he declined. The respondent denied all fraud or that he had hurried or pressed on the arrangement. He denied that he had ever said that Hunt was to have £100 in F money, or that Hunt had been charged with anything but what was usually paid by vendors, and he declared that Hunt well knew he was parting with the estate. The respondent alleged that he was :

"to give £600 as the consideration for the estate, and that, after paying off the £300 mortgage, the surplus of the said sum of £600 was to be retained by me to answer the covenant in the bill mentioned."

G He further alleged that John Hunt, up to the time of his death, was fully lodged and maintained according to the terms of the arrangement. Evidence was taken in the cause, and there was a great deal of conflicting testimony as to the state of Hunt's mental faculties.

The cause was heard before KINDERSLEY, V.-C., who pronounced a decree declaring the indenture of Oct. 6 fraudulent and void as an absolute conveyance, but
H directed it to stand as a security for the amount advanced by the respondent in satisfaction of the mortgage, with interest, and accounts were directed. On appeal, in May, 1855, LORD CRANWORTH, L.C., reversed the decree of the vice-chancellor. In the course of his judgment the learned Lord Chancellor said: The bill in this case is filed to set aside a conveyance of a small copyhold property upon the ground
I that it was obtained by what this court considers as a fraudulent contrivance. The main fraud suggested in the bill is that Mr. Hunt thought what he was executing was a mortgage, and not an absolute conveyance. That is alleged twice in the bill, for I take the allegation at the beginning to amount to the same thing. It is said in the fourth paragraph :

"And at the same time the defendant represented to the said John Hunt that he, the said defendant, would pay off the said mortgage-debt and be satisfied with the security of the said copyhold estate for the mortgage-debt, and what he, the defendant, should advance for the maintenance of the said John Hunt."

I think that was meant substantially to amount to an allegation that Mr. Hunt thought it was a mortgage he was executing, and that is put beyond doubt by the subsequent allegation :

“that the said John Hunt was not aware that he was thereby making an absolute conveyance of the said copyhold estate, or at least he did not know that he was selling the estate for the consideration mentioned in the said indenture.”

It is said further that this is a fraud because Mr. Hunt was a man of imbecile mind; and not only that he had no professional adviser, but the absence of professional advice was, if not caused, encouraged and promoted by the act of Mr. Guest, who is represented to have forced the transaction upon him. Then it is said he had not that which he was to have, namely, £100 in money, and that the consideration which he in point of fact had or had secured to him, was not properly secured, because it was not an absolute covenant to maintain him, but that which amounted, either in terms to an absolute covenant to maintain him, or if that should not be done, there was a covenant to pay a certain small weekly sum. The learned vice-chancellor proceeded upon the ground that the transaction was fraudulent, and one which ought to be set aside.

Since this case was commenced, I have looked, as far as I could in a cursory way, to the judgment of the vice-chancellor, and I think I collect the ground on which he proceeded, but not having quite satisfied myself that I have fully comprehended his view of the case, I will not finally dispose of it without attentively considering it. At the same time I am bound to say that in some of the propositions on which I think I have collected he acted, I cannot concur. If persons standing in a certain relation to one another deal as vendor and purchaser, if there is a particular relation subsisting between them, the court expects the person who is the purchaser, if the purchase is complained of by the seller, to show that the seller had due protection afforded him. Thus if a guardian purchases of a young man—his ward—though that relation may have ceased only for a short time, so that the influence the guardian may be supposed to have may be thought to continue—and when I say “guardian” it extends to a parent and if he purchases from his ward, the court expects that the guardian so purchasing will be able to show that due protection was given to the ward. The burden of proof is on him, and it is no answer to say: “I have obtained the conveyance, now show me that it was wrongfully obtained.” This court says that he must show that it was rightly obtained. That is one illustration, and many others may be stated, such as an attorney buying of, or selling to, his client. Where there is a fiduciary relation subsisting, the court throws the burden of proof upon him who sets up the transaction against the person whom he was bound to protect. But I do not think that extends to the case of one person purchasing from another when they are at arms’ length or where no such relation subsists. There, if a purchase has been obtained, and the person from whom it has been obtained seeks to set it aside, the burden of proof is upon him to show that he has been imposed upon. It is not for him to say: “I had no professional advice,” unless he can show there has been some contrivance or management on the part of the person who was dealing with him, to prevent him having that advice. The affairs of mankind could not go on if we were not to act upon that doctrine.

What I take it influenced a good deal the mind of the vice-chancellor was that a person selling his property sold it for a consideration which turned out to be, and I should have thought from the very beginning upon the face of it was, a very meagre and inadequate consideration. The property sold was a small copyhold estate, which was represented as being of the value of between £600 and £700, and it was subject to a mortgage for £300, on which a small arrear of interest was due. The seller was a person who, in point of fact, did not live for more than a couple of months after the sale—not three months after the commencement of the treaty—not six weeks after the actual conveyance; and what he took as the consideration was merely a covenant or agreement on the part of the vendor—the squire of the parish, he being a yeoman living in the parish—that he (Hunt) should have board

A and lodging and a person to attend him. He was in a very infirm state of health, and he said to the squire: "I find myself very old, and all I care about is, that I should have comfort for the rest of my life, and I will let you have the property if you afford that to me." It seems that the squire had been endeavouring often to purchase the property of him, I take it, at a fair price. There is no suggestion that he wanted to get it at an unfair price, and Hunt said: "I will not sell it to you upon
B any terms for a pecuniary consideration, but you shall have it if you will agree to take care that I shall have a parlour (as he calls it, in a particular house) for the rest of my life, that I have a woman to attend adequately to my wants in my unfortunate state of health, and that I shall be well kept, and that everything I have shall come from your own table during the rest of my life." We know he only lived a few weeks after this, and that was a consideration, in truth, only of the
C value of a very few pounds, perhaps £10 or £20. Even if we looked to the chance of the life of a healthy man, he could not have lived many years. The estate, cleared of the mortgage, would yield a rent of £15 a year, and even making an allowance for repairs, the consideration would seem to be very inadequate. That, however, is nothing if the parties were in a situation to judge for themselves; and that makes very material the question in what state of mind Hunt was at the time
D he entered into this bargain? I think, after looking at the evidence, I cannot entertain any very serious doubt in my mind that he perfectly understood all that he was about. Indeed, I think the vice-chancellor said he did not attribute to him anything like an imbecile state of mind; on the contrary, he said he was rather a keen and cunning old man, and that is the impression on my mind.

[His LORDSHIP referred to the evidence and said that he found no want of mental
E ability on the part of Hunt to enter into a contract, said it appeared that the fact that he had no legal adviser of his own was due to his own act, and continued:] All he wanted was security. There may be a doubt whether the terms of the deed were perfectly well adapted for securing all that he was intended to have, but I agree that that is no ground for setting aside the transaction, and still less for setting it aside as being fraudulent. If the parties had misconceived the effect of F what they were doing, it might have afforded very good ground for rectifying the deed. The act of God has made that perfectly unnecessary, and there is nothing to rectify, but there is no ground whatever for setting aside the deed upon the suggestion that there was any fraud. I come to the conclusion, therefore, that there is no evidence showing that Hunt thought that this was not what it was, or that he did not fully understand the effect of the act he was engaged in. I think it clear that
G he did distinctly know what he was doing, that he did not think it was a mortgage, but that he knew it was a conveyance, and that he meant it should be a conveyance.

Unable as I am to discover any obligation on Mr. Guest's part to say that Hunt should have more by way of consideration than he had asked for himself, and unable as I am to discover anything alluding to the notion that there was any endeavour
H to keep from him professional advice—on the contrary, being satisfied that there was, as far as there could be, a desire that he should have professional advice, having come to the conclusion that there was no imposition practised upon him, but that he was left to form his own judgment, that no haste whatever was exhibited, but that he was left to take his own time, and that he, nevertheless, persevered in his inclination, and perfectly well understood what he was doing, I
I confess I am unable to arrive at the conclusion at which the vice-chancellor has come. Therefore, I think that this bill ought to have been dismissed; but not with costs.

The bill was, therefore, dismissed and the appellants appealed to the House of Lords.

Shapter and Hindmarch (Swanston with them) for the appellants.

Bailey and Glasse (Edlerpon with him) for the respondent.

LORD CAMPBELL, L.C.—This case has been argued very zealously and very ably, but, having listened to that argument, I am clearly of opinion that your Lordships ought to affirm the judgment of the court below. The bill is filed for the purpose of setting aside a conveyance on the ground of fraud on the part of Mr. Guest. It is alleged that he induced Mr. Hunt, the owner of the property to which the conveyance relates, to believe that the property was merely to be mortgaged as a security for money that was to be laid out by Mr. Guest in repayment of a mortgage then existing upon the property, and in providing for Hunt for the rest of his life, so that Hunt was cheated out of his estate by being induced to sign an absolute conveyance of it. That is not in the slightest degree proved, nor do I find any ground for imputing any fraud of any sort to Mr. Guest. I think that the conveyance was improperly framed, and I censure that. Mr. Guest is punished by this suit for having resorted to that artifice, because it is quite clear that he wished that the conveyance should not disclose the real transaction. He thought that it would have a better appearance when the title came afterwards to be examined if this pecuniary consideration appeared. But, setting that aside, which I must condemn, I see nothing in his conduct in the slightest degree to be blamed.

The offer came in the first instance from Hunt to him. Instead of its being snapped at by Mr. Guest, he goes to Scarborough, and tells Hunt that he had better take time to consider it. What was finally agreed between them, and I think quite deliberately, was what Hunt was determined upon—he would not sell this property, but he wished to enter into an engagement whereby, during his life, he should be sure of a comfortable maintenance. He first of all enters into negotiation with Evans for that purpose; that goes off, and then he comes and asks Mr. Guest, who seven years before had expressed a wish to get possession of this property, and this bargain was entered into, Hunt being at the time, according to the evidence, perfectly unimpaired in his faculties. It is quite clear that there was a bargain. Hunt over and over again stated to various people what the bargain was—that in consideration of the conveyance of this copyhold land to Mr. Guest he was to have a parlour in the Yew Tree Farm, and to be fed from the table of Mr. Guest. That bargain being so entered into, it was carried into effect; he was transferred to Yew Tree Farm, and he was fed in a manner entirely to his satisfaction.

That being so, if the conveyance had truly stated what had taken place, there would not have been the smallest colour for setting it aside, but, as it stands, it represents the transaction in a manner very much to be lamented, and to those who did not know what the real transaction was it was an excuse for an attempt to set aside the conveyance, although I cannot help wondering that this specific charge of fraud should have been made, of which there is not the slightest evidence, and that, after the answer had been given, it should still have been persevered in. If this was the genuine bona fide bargain entered into between Hunt and Guest, any difference in the statement of the transaction as to the nature of the agreement would not be a ground for setting aside the conveyance, though it would be a ground for a bill to reform it. But this is not a bill to reform it; this is a bill to set it aside, and it seems to me that there is no sufficient ground for setting it aside. I must, therefore, advise your Lordships to dismiss this appeal, and affirm the decree.

LORD BROUGHAM.—I entirely agree with my noble and learned friend in his view of the case in all its parts, and I should not say one word, except to express my very great approbation of the zeal with which this poor man's cause has been supported at your Lordships' Bar, and I state this only to express my opinion, from long experience, unvarying in that respect, that this is not an exception that Mr. Shapter has made to the ordinary course of our profession, but that he has followed the constant course of the profession in dealing with all such pauper cases.

LORD WENSLEYDALE.—I entirely agree with the opinion of my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack, and concur entirely in all the observations that he has made upon this case. There is no case of fraud made out, nor is there any

A fiduciary relation established between Mr. Guest and Hunt, so as to entitle Hunt to particular care and attention. He was a man perfectly free to enter into the contract, perfectly in possession of his faculties, according to the weight of evidence, and he was dealt with perfectly fairly upon the occasion. The error which has been alluded to in the mode of framing the conveyance, I think, is not to be attributed to fraud, though it would have been a good ground for reforming the deed if that had been sought by the bill.

LORD CRANWORTH.—I will only say that I see no reason whatever to depart from the observations that I made when the case was before me in the Court of Chancery. The only observation I would now add is that I think this case may afford a useful warning to persons in framing deeds, because it strikes me, as it did when the case first came before me, that, if the exact truth had been told, nobody would have dreamed of there being fraud in the case. It is only because the parties between them thought to make the matter clear, or to clench it by stating something that was untrue, that all this unfortunate litigation has arisen.

Appeal dismissed.

Contract—Implied term—Use of subject-matter agreed in previous contract—Knowledge by person acquiring subject-matter of contract—Subject-matter not to be used in breach of earlier contract.

Shipping—Charterparty—Mortgage of ship with notice of charterparty—Mortgagee restrained from exercising power of sale during charterparty.

Where a man has acquired property with a full knowledge of a previous existing contract legally entered into providing that the property should be used in a particular manner he should not be allowed to apply or use the property otherwise than in accordance with the previous contract or to the damage of the person with whom that contract was made.

The defendant became a mortgagee of a ship of which the plaintiff was the charterer, and he took the mortgage with express notice of the charterparty. On an application by the plaintiff for an injunction to restrain the defendant from exercising his power of sale under the mortgage or interfering with the ship until after the voyage for which she had been chartered,

Held: as the defendant took with notice of the charterparty the plaintiff was entitled to an interim injunction on the terms sought.

Appeal by the plaintiff from an order of PAGE-WOOD, V.-C., dated Nov. 25, 1858, refusing to grant an interim injunction to restrain the defendant George Tallentire Gibson, and all persons claiming through or under him, from removing a vessel called the Allerton to Newcastle, or otherwise interfering to interrupt a voyage mentioned in the bill, or from selling, transferring or disposing of the vessel otherwise than subject to the burden of a charterparty of Oct. 23, 1857. E

The bill and the affidavits in support of the motion stated, that by a charterparty dated Oct. 23, 1857, and made between Henry Trewitt Curry, one of the defendants, described as the owner of the Allerton, then in the port of Shields, of the one part, and the plaintiff of the other part, it was agreed that the Allerton should load a cargo of coal at one of the collieries in the river Tyne, and being so loaded should proceed to Suez and deliver the same. The freight to be paid at the rate of £60 per keel of 21 tons 4 cwt.; one-third by charterer's acceptance at three months, and one-third by like acceptance at six months from the sailing of the vessel from her loading port, and the remainder on the right delivery of the cargo. When the charterparty was entered into the defendant Curry was acting as owner, and was in possession of the vessel under a contract for the purchase of her. A considerable delay took place in the completion of the purchase, and that in consequence thereof a corresponding delay was occasioned in the dispatch of the vessel from her port of lading. On Jan. 6, 1858, the defendant Curry became the registered owner of the vessel, and on Jan. 12, 1858, he mortgaged her to the defendant Gibson to secure a sum of £1,500 and interest, and the mortgage was registered on the 20th of the same month. Previously to and at the date of the mortgage the defendant Gibson had full notice of the charterparty, and, in fact, advanced the sum intended to be secured by the mortgage in order to enable the defendant Curry to perform the charterparty and earn the freight made payable thereby. F

Shortly afterwards the vessel was dispatched with a cargo of coal on her voyage to Suez, and thereupon the plaintiff accepted bills drawn by Curry for £980 8s., being the amount payable under the charterparty, which bills were discounted, and the amount of them was paid over to Gibson, or was under some arrangement with him, and by his direction applied to the discharge of part of the purchase-money of the vessel. The vessel met with bad weather in the Channel, and being much damaged was obliged to put into Penzance for repairs, at which port she was when G

A the bill was filed, in the hands of Mr. W. D. Mathews, a shipwright, who claimed a lien upon her for the value of the repairs. Gibson threatened and intended to sell the vessel under his power of sale without reference to her engagement under the charterparty, and with that view he sent instructions to Matthews to allow her to be removed out of dock and sent back to Newcastle-upon-Tyne as soon as the repairs were completed, which would be in a few days.

B The prayer of the bill was, that it might be declared that the charterparty of Oct. 23, 1857, ought to be specifically performed, and that the defendant Curry might be decreed to perform it accordingly, the plaintiff submitting to perform the same on his part, and that an injunction might be granted to restrain Curry from permitting the vessel and cargo to remain at Penzance or any place other than Suez, and also for an injunction against the defendant Gibson in the terms stated
C at the beginning of the case.

Amphlett, Q.C., and E. Macnaghten for the plaintiff.

Rolt, Q.C., and Bedwell for the defendant Gibson.

KNIGHT-BRUCE, L.J.—If the acts of the defendant Gibson of which the plaintiff complained had been done by the other defendant, and if the plaintiff had
D continued quiescent, it would have been the duty of this court not to have granted the injunction. Of this both principle and precedent I have no doubt. The question then is, is there under the present circumstances any title to an injunction against Mr. Gibson in the plaintiff? I am of the opinion that this question must be answered in the plaintiff's favour; and this is so whether there is or is not a right of action at law—upon which I do not desire to express, nor do I express, any

Where a man has acquired property, with a full knowledge of a previous existing contract, legally entered into, that that property should be used in a particular manner, the acquirer should not be allowed to apply or use the property otherwise than under the contract, or to the damage of the person with whom that earlier contract had been made. This rule, recognised and adopted as it is by the English
F law, is possibly liable to exceptions, but none of them appear to apply to the present case. Mr. Gibson could have no better title than any other person now becoming interested in the ship, for the mortgage had been taken by him with express notice of the charterparty to the plaintiff; and by that charterparty he is, as to all liabilities, though I do not say as to all damage, effectually bound.

It has been contended that the charterparty did not alter the property in the vessel, but altered the manner in which the vessel was to be used; but if so, why
G should not a court of equity interfere to prevent a positive breach of contract? This court possesses such a power, and any system of laws in which no similar power existed must be indeed very defective. There must, therefore, in my opinion, be granted an injunction to prevent the defendant Mr. Gibson from removing the vessel to Newcastle, or from impeding in any manner her voyage to Suez.

H TURNER, L.J.—I agree with the opinion that the injunction now asked for ought to be granted. There are difficult and important questions to be decided at the hearing, which cannot be properly gone into upon an interlocutory application like that before the court. They appear to me to be three in number: (i) whether the plaintiff is entitled to the specific performance of the contract contained in the
I charterparty; (ii) whether, if not entitled to that specific performance, the defendant ought not to be restrained from interfering with the vessel until the voyage for which she was chartered at the time of his mortgage should have been performed; and (iii), whether Curry had or had not a right of recovering damages against the defendant Gibson, and whether that right would or would not accrue to the plaintiff through Curry. It is impossible that any of these questions can be decided except at the hearing of the cause. For these reasons I am of the opinion that there must be an injunction to restrain the defendant Gibson and his agents from removing the vessel to Newcastle, or interfering to interrupt or prevent her voyage to Suez, the plaintiff at the same time undertaking to abide by any order the court might think proper to make as to damages; the injunction and the undertaking to be continued until the hearing of the cause. A

Order accordingly.

Deed—Execution—Non-execution by covenantee—Right of covenantee to sue.

In an action of covenant on a mortgage deed it was objected that, as the deed contained cross-covenants by the mortgagee and the mortgagor, but was executed by the mortgagee alone, the mortgagor was not liable. D

Held: this was different from the case of a lease, and was governed by the general rule of law that where a party had a covenant made to him and he covenanted in his turn he might sue on the covenant made to him though he himself had not executed the instrument containing it, and, therefore, the mortgagor was liable. Application by the defendant for a rule nisi for a new trial on the ground of misdirection, the improper admission of evidence and also why the record should not be altered back to the state in which it was after a first amendment at the trial, in an action of covenant. H

The action was tried before TALFOURD, J., at Westminster, where a verdict was found for the plaintiff for £1,800 and odd. The declaration was in covenant on a mortgage-deed by which the covenantor undertook to re-invest £1,800 stock in consols. It contained no claim of interest. The only plea on the record was non est factum.

It appearing at the trial that there was no demand of interest in the declaration, the judge, on request, amended the record, by inserting a count for interest. On objection raised by defendant to the stamp, the plaintiff abandoned his claim for interest, on which the judge again altered the record, by restoring it to the state in which it was before the amendment. The deed was dated June 15, 1852, and it was proved that there was but one copy of it; the only party who executed it was the mortgagor. The deed was stamped with a £2 5s. stamp; and, on observing this, it was objected for the defendant that the stamp was not sufficient, for two I

A reasons: First, because the sum was of indefinite amount, the contract being to re-invest £1,800 consols, at whatever price they might be when the time for re-investment should expire; secondly, the stamp was insufficient under the Statute 13 & 14 Vict., c. 97, even though it should prove that the amount to be secured was no more than £1,800. The trial was on Saturday, and the learned judge adjourned the cause to twelve o'clock on Monday. In the meantime, the plaintiff took the deed to the commissioners at Somerset House, who affixed the proper stamp; and, when the trial was resumed on Monday, the deed was put in duly stamped. It was thereupon objected for the defendant that the deed was for an indefinite amount; and, therefore, as now produced, the stamp was insufficient. The learned judge ruled that, the commissioners having had the whole document before them, and affixed their stamp, the objection was not good, and defendant estopped from making it. The defendant also objected that the mortgagees, not having executed the deed, could not recover on it. This objection was likewise overruled, and a verdict was entered for the plaintiff for £1,800.

Ogle for the defendant moved for a rule nisi.

JERVIS, C.J.—It has been contended that, as the deed contains cross-covenants by the mortgagor and mortgagees, the mortgagor is not liable, because the mortgagees did not execute the deed; and Swatman v. Ambler (1) has been relied upon as supporting that view, and a statement of it and its effect given by counsel, which can hardly weigh much with the court. In that case there was a plea denying the lessor's execution of the lease (for it was the case of a lease), and, therefore, it does not interfere with this case, which must be left to the general rule of law; and that rule is this—that where a party has a covenant made to him, and he in turn is to make covenant, he may sue on the covenant made to him, even though he himself has not executed it. But that is not so with a lease, as is well pointed out by PARKE, B., in Pitman v. Woodbury (2), referred to in Swatman v. Ambler (1). I cannot, however, do better than to read his own words (3 Exch. at pp. 11, 12):

F “But with respect to leases by indenture, the older authorities show that the covenants which depend upon the interest of the lease, and are made because the covenantor has that interest, such as those to repair and pay rent during the terms, are not obligatory if the lessor does not execute—not because the lessor is not a party, but because that interest has not been created to which such covenants are annexed, and during which only they operate: as such covenants undoubtedly do not, if the term ends by surrender, and are suspended by G eviction by the lessor, so they do not begin to operate unless the term commences; the foundation of the covenant failing, the covenant fails also.”

This extract well points out the distinction between that and the present case, and the covenantee may here sue, though the covenantor has not executed the deed. There are, therefore, no grounds for the rule.

H CRESSWELL, J.—I am of the same opinion. This case is clearly distinguishable from Swatman v. Ambler (1). It is somewhat remarkable, with respect to the statement of counsel for the defendant of what fell from the judges in that case, that the judgment is a written one, so that if those dicta did fall from the learned judges, they did not think fit to repeat them.

I WILLIAMS, J.—I am of the same opinion. The main point to be decided in this case is settled and the rule laid down in COMYNS' DIGEST, tit. “Fait,” (C.2), where it is said:

“If one party executes his part of an indenture, it shall be his deed, though the other does not execute his part;”

and this case is governed by it.

Appeal by the defendant from a decision of the Court of Queen's Bench (LORD DENMAN, C.J., PATTESON, COLERIDGE and WIGHTMAN, JJ.), reported 4 Q.B. 235, n., on a special verdict, in an action of assumpsit founded on a special agreement.

A The declaration stated that a commission of bankruptcy had issued against John Waters, Arthur Jones and David Jones; that before and at the time of issuing the fiat, Waters was indebted to the plaintiff in £53 7s. 2d.; that £40 6s. 6d. was due to the plaintiff for work, etc., in preparing a marriage settlement, and that Waters and D. Jones were indebted to the plaintiff in £527 5s. for work, etc., by the plaintiff as their solicitor in respect of the Pembrey works; that the plaintiff had proved the first debt against Waters's estate, the second against D. Jones's, and the third against the separate estate of Waters and D. Jones, but had received no dividend, of which the defendant had notice; that in consideration of the premises, and that plaintiff, at defendant's request, would expunge the three proofs, and would agree to look to the trustees of the marriage settlement for payment of the second debt, the defendant promised to pay him the first and third debts. The declaration then averred that the plaintiff authorized such proofs to be expunged, and agreed to look to the trustees, and that the proofs were accordingly expunged; and that, although the two first-mentioned debts had been duly paid according to the agreement above-mentioned, yet the defendant had not paid, or arranged any mode of paying, the third debt. There was a second count on an account stated. The defendant pleaded

D (i) Non assumpsit; (ii) As to the first count, that the contract was duly rescinded; (iii) Also as to the first count, that the promise was special to answer for the debts of other persons, and that no agreement or memorandum was made in writing, or signed by the defendant or his agent, according to the Statute of Frauds, s. 4. On these pleas issues were taken.

E At the trial before COLERIDGE, J., the plaintiff was nonsuited, but on motion for a new trial a special verdict was found, with leave of the court, and the verdict was to be entered for the plaintiff for £527 5s. and interest as the court might direct. The Court of Queen's Bench founded their view of the facts of the case on the ground that it was impossible to ascertain with certainty whether the letter set forth in the verdict, and which was alleged to constitute the undertaking of the defendant, did create a personal liability in him or not, and that the special verdict disclosed

F evidence from which inferences might fairly be drawn in favour of either conclusion. The inference which the court actually drew from the facts was that the defendant had only a special authority, clearly limited in extent by the principals, and falling short of sanctioning the particular undertaking; that no action would, therefore, lie on the undertaking against the principal, and, consequently, that the defendant must be held to have made himself personally liable.

G The letter from the defendant to the plaintiff on which the action was grounded was as follows :

"Church Street, Nov. 26, 1844.

H "My dear Sir, Your bill of costs against Mr. John Waters for business connected with the marriage settlement, amounting to £53 7s. 2d. I undertake to have paid to you. Perhaps I may be enabled to hand you the money tomorrow. The lease or leases of Treventy, etc., you will have the goodness to hold for Messrs. Sir James Esdaile & Co. who claim to be entitled to the benefit resulting therefrom.

"Pembrey Works.

I "Your bill of charges in this matter, amounting to £527 5s. I also undertake (on behalf of Messrs. Esdaile & Co.) to pay, and will arrange with you the time and mode immediately after the dividend meetings; in the meantime, and until this be completed, the documents you hold will be sufficient security. For the amounts thus secured (including Mr. D. Jones's, which you have agreed to look to the trustees under the marriage settlement for), I beg to inclose an authority to the commissioners under the bankruptcy of Waters, Jones & Co. to expunge from your proofs. I forwarded the draft agreement with Messrs. Esdaile & Co. on Thursday, the 13th instant, and have not yet received it back. I, however, consider the principle as agreed on, and will lose no time in having it forwarded so as to act on it with respect to the appropriation of the dividends. With respect, I remain, etc.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 22, 1845. TINDAL, C.J., delivered the following judgment of the court.—
The only question for the determination of this court arises on the first issue joined between the parties, namely, whether, on the facts found by the jury in their special verdict as to the issue on the plea of non assumpsit, the jury ought to find that the defendant did promise in the manner and form the plaintiff has alleged. For, as to the second and last issues, in which the Court of Queen's Bench have directed the verdict to be entered for the plaintiff, and have given judgment accordingly, there was no real question made in the course of the argument before us that the verdict as to those pleas or the judgment thereon ought to be disturbed; nor, indeed, is there any valid ground of objection against either.

As to the first issue, the Court of Queen's Bench, when the matter was argued before them in the form of a Special Case, came to the conclusion that the letter written by the defendant on Nov. 26, 1834, on which the action is grounded, was framed in such terms as to make it impossible to ascertain with certainty, merely from the language in the letter, whether it created a personal liability by the defendant or not, and that the Special Case disclosed evidence from which the inferences might fairly be drawn in favour of either conclusion. But that court at the same time, reasoning on the facts which were placed before them in the Special Case, and availing themselves of the power of drawing inferences from the facts stated, arrived at the conclusion that the defendant had only a special authority, clearly limited in extent by the principals and falling short of sanctioning the particular undertaking; that no action would, therefore, lie on the undertaking against the principals; and, consequently, that the defendant must be held to have made himself personally liable. We, sitting as a court of error, are, on well-recognised principles of law, strictly restrained to the facts found by the jury and stated in the special verdict; and looking at the terms of the letter itself, and, still more, calling in aid of its construction the correspondence in the special verdict which preceded and gave rise to that letter and which may be considered as part of the same transaction, we think that it imports on the face of it an undertaking made by the defendant as agent for the Esdailes; and that the special verdict does not state, either directly or by necessary implication from the facts found, the want of authority on his part to make such undertaking, or any excess of his authority in making it.

As to the first point, the very terms of the letter itself, "I . . . undertake (on behalf of Messrs. Esdaile & Co.) to pay," would seem to us, in their natural meaning, to point rather to a promise made by one person as agent for another than as intended to bind the parties speaking in the character of principals; for, on the latter supposition, there would appear to be no reason whatever for mentioning the names of the principals. To say the least, however, the expression is capable of bearing misconstruction; and, when contrasted with the expression used by the defendant in the part of the same letter immediately preceding, namely, "Your bill of costs . . . amounting to £53 7s. 2d. I undertake to have paid to you," the distinction taken between the two modes of expression strongly confirms the interpretation which we think it demanded for itself. But the letter written by the defendant to the plaintiff, and dated Nov. 11, 1834, informs him that Messrs. Esdaile cannot have the deeds of the Pembrey estates without the payment of the plaintiff's bill, i.e., the £527 5s. mentioned in the declaration, which the defendant states he has already told the plaintiff Messrs. Esdaile would do; and he then continues: "I am now ready to enter into any agreement to that effect." The plaintiff, by his answer to that letter, written on Nov. 17, with respect to the above-mentioned debt of £527 5s. states himself ready to enter into such agreement as the defendant had

A proposed, and to sign a written authority to enable him to expunge the proof of the debt; leaving it to be settled and paid by Messrs. Esdaile & Co., according to such agreement, and that letter then further states that, as to the bills amounting to £53 7s. 2d., he will deliver up some leases, on which he claims a lien, "with many thanks for the promise to have the amount paid to me." On comparing together the language of the letter of Nov. 26 with the language of that to which we have
B just adverted, we think that the necessary result is that the undertaking on which the action was brought was, as we have before stated, an undertaking given by the defendant, as agent of Messrs. Esdaile, and not given in his own individual capacity, and that it was so understood to be given by the parties themselves.

On the part of the plaintiff, however, it was contended by counsel that, in point of law, the letter of Nov. 26 must necessarily import an undertaking by the defendant, in his own individual capacity, and that it could not be construed as an undertaking which should bind the principal. If such should be the necessary construction in point of law, there would be an end of all further doubt; but we think none of the cases referred to establish that position. In Appleton v. Binks (1), on which the most reliance was placed, the only point decided was that a man who covenanted for himself and his heirs under his own hand and seal for the act of another, should be personally liable, though he described himself as agent in the deed; a very different proposition from that now before us, for the question before us is that, if a person enter into a contract in writing, and describes himself as agent, and naming his principal, whether the principal shall be bound, provided the agent had authority to enter into the contract on his behalf; a point which we consider too clear to admit of doubt or argument. If, then, this contract, on its legal construction, be
E as it appears to us it is, a contract entered into by the agent on behalf of his principal, the only ground on which the agent could become personally liable on his contract is that laid down by STORY, J., in his COMMENTARIES ON THE LAW OF AGENCY, so often referred to in the course of the argument. But even if the law be as is there laid down, in order to create or let in such personal liability, the want of authority on the part of the agent must be found by the jury; and, as the letter
F of Nov. 26 is the plaintiff's evidence, and the only evidence by which he affects the defendant, whether as agent or principal, and as such liability is on the face of the letter the liability of agent, we think that the burden is imposed on the plaintiff of showing by clear proof that there was no such agency or authority as is stated in such letter, or that his authority, such as it was, has been exceeded.

We all agree, however, in thinking that, on the facts stated in this special verdict, such defect of authority is neither found by the jury directly, nor is it to be inferred
G by necessary implication from the facts found. We, therefore, think that the judgment of the court below, so far as relates to the first issue, is to be reversed, and the judgment thereon entered for the defendant; and as to the residue, the judgment is to be affirmed.

Appeal partly allowed.

SHARMAN v. SANDERS AND OTHERS

[COURT OF COMMON PLEAS (Jervis, C.J., Maule, Cresswell and Williams, JJ.), January 26, 1853]

[Reported 13 C.B. 166; 22 L.J.C.P. 86; 20 L.T.O.S. 247; 17 Jur. 765; 1 W.R. 152; 138 E.R. 1161]

Master and Servant—Wages—Truck Acts—“Artificer”—Personal service—Truck Act, 1831 (1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 37), s. 3, s. 4.

An “artificer” within the Truck Act, 1831, is a person who contracts for the use of his own personal services.

The plaintiff was employed at an iron works in carting, tipping and burning ironstone at a fixed price per ton to be paid monthly. He hired men to work under him at a fixed sum per day payable weekly, and he sometimes worked with the hired men, but was not bound by his contract to give his personal services.

Held: as it was no part of his contract to give his personal services he was not an “artificer” within s. 3 of the Truck Act, 1831, although he did part of the work himself, and he was unable to recover from his employers, under s. 4 of the Act, the amount of wages which had been paid in goods either for himself or for the hired men.

Notes. The expression “artificer” in the Truck Act, 1831, has been extended by s. 2 of the Truck Amendment Act, 1887 (9 HALSBURY’S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 40), so as to include any workman as defined by s. 10 of the Employers and Workmen Act, 1875 (9 HALSBURY’S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 28). The Payment of Wages Act, 1960, relaxes the Truck Acts, 1831 to 1940, by enabling wages in certain cases to be paid otherwise than in cash, viz., by cheque or like method; and the Truck Act, 1831, is modified by s. 6 (1) of the Act of 1960 (40 HALSBURY’S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 296).

Rule Nisi obtained by the plaintiff for a new trial in an action of assumpsit for work and labour done by the plaintiff as an artificer, workman and labourer, in the manufacture of iron and carting, tipping and unloading iron and ironstone; and the plaintiff claimed wages for the work done.

The defendants, the employers, pleaded that payment had been made in goods which had been delivered by the defendants to the plaintiff who had accepted them in full satisfaction and discharge. The plaintiff, in reply, stated that he was an artificer within the meaning of the Truck Act, 1831; that goods delivered by way of payment was contrary to that Act and that he was entitled to recover wages under s. 4 of that Act. The defendants, by rejoinder, denied that the plaintiff was an artificer and issue was joined on this.

At the trial before TALFOURD, J., it was proved that the defendants owned the Stanton-by-Dale Ironworks and employed the plaintiff from June, 1850, to June,

A 1851, in carting, tipping and burning ironstone. By the contract the plaintiff was to be paid a fixed price per ton and to employ men under him. The plaintiff usually hired about nine or ten men, as the work required, at a fixed daily sum to be paid weekly, but the defendants settled with the plaintiff monthly. The plaintiff stated in evidence that he was employed to work as a labourer with the other men and that he was liable to be dismissed at a month's notice, but the defendants' evidence was that the personal service of the plaintiff formed no part of the contract and that so long as the work was properly done the defendants had no right of complaint, even though the plaintiff might be continually absent. It was proved that the plaintiff did sometimes work with the other men but his attendance was irregular. The defendants had a shop adjoining the works and gave the plaintiff a book of tickets which he filled up and gave to the men he hired in lieu of wages. C These tickets were cashed by the cashier in the shop and the arrangement was that a fixed proportion of the sum cashed was to be spent in purchase of goods in the shop. Both the plaintiff and the other men had received goods in this way, and the plaintiff claimed that the amount received in goods should be paid in wages.

TALFOURD, J., directed the jury that the plaintiff was not an artificer within the meaning of the Truck Act, 1831, unless it was an ingredient in his contract that his personal services should be given and that if he should fulfil his contract and yet be personally absent altogether he was not entitled to the protection of that Act. The jury found that the plaintiff was not an artificer within the Act and a verdict was given for the defendants. Subsequently the plaintiff obtained a rule nisi for a new trial on the ground of misdirection.

E Serjeant Byles (Willmore and Willes with him) for the defendants, showed cause against the rule.

Macaulay, Q.C., and Bittleston for the plaintiff, supported the rule.

JERVIS, C.J.—The difficulty which the learned counsel for the plaintiff have had to struggle with, arises from Riley v. Warden (1). Though there may be some distinction between that case and the present, inasmuch as there materials may have been supplied, whereas this is a pure contract for labour, and nothing else, still the principle which the Court of Exchequer there lay down must govern this case. To be an "artificer" within the meaning of the Truck Act, 1831, the party must be personally engaged in the performance of labour for which he is to receive wages, and that must have reference to the original contract. TALFOURD, J., left the case to the jury precisely as it was put by COLERIDGE, J., in Riley v. Warden (1). We are bound by the authority of that case, even if we were disposed to question the propriety of the decision, which I for one am not. I think this rule must be discharged.

MAULE, J.—I am of the same opinion. I am not disposed to question the decision of the Court of Exchequer in Riley v. Warden (1). Whether some of the expressions there used may not be open to criticism, I will not say: the substance of the decision is clearly right, viz., that the intention of the Truck Act, 1831, was to afford protection to a class of persons not very able to protect themselves. The law does not often interfere to prevent persons who have attained their majority from contracting in any way they think proper. Generally speaking, the rule is, that people may contract as they please, to be paid at once or at a future day, in cash or by goods. That is the general law of the land. But occasionally there occur in the course of experience cases in which it is found desirable to depart from that general principle—cases of particular inconvenience in particular trades or employments, and with reference to particular classes: for instance, in the case of seamen, whose contracts are the subject of special legislative provisions—the law considering that particular class of men to be in a state of perpetual pupillage. The Truck Act, 1831, does not say that the restriction it imposes shall apply to all trades or employments; but it has been found that, in respect of some trades, the leaving the parties the unfettered right to contract in respect of labour in such way as they may choose, is replete with mischief and inconvenience. The persons the Act was meant to benefit are those who hire themselves to labour with their hands for daily or weekly wages. More people, no doubt, are comprehended within it than that; but it is that sort of people to whom the Act was intended to apply. I do not think it was at all designed for the protection of persons taking contracts for labour to be done by others—persons who speculate upon the state of the labour market. The letter of the Act, also, in my opinion falls short of comprehending persons of that description. I do not think the plaintiff falls within the definition of an artificer given by the interpretation clause; he not being a workman, labourer or other person engaged in the performance of any work, employment, or operation contemplated by the statute; for, the whole context shows it was only intended to apply to those who are actually and personally engaged or employed to do the work. When the procuring work to be done by the hands of others comprehends the whole of what a man contracts for, the circumstance of his doing some portion of the work himself, does not bring him within the statute. There must be a contract by which he binds himself to do it. I think that both the letter and the spirit of the Act of Parliament are consistent with the decision of the Court of Exchequer in Riley v. Warden (1), which has not been successfully distinguished from the present case. I, therefore, think that this rule should be discharged.

CRESSWELL, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. The summing-up of TALFOURD, J., was strictly in harmony with the decision to which the Court of Exchequer very properly came in Riley v. Warden (1).

WILLIAMS, J., concurred.

Rule discharged.

MOORE v. DARTON

[VICE-CHANCELLOR'S COURT (Knight-Bruce, V.-C.), June 13, 1851]

[Reported 4 De G. & Sm. 517; 20 L.J.Ch. 626; 18 L.T.O.S. 24;
64 E.R. 938]

Gift—Donatio mortis causa—Delivery of receipt for money to agent of debtor by creditor expressing wish that debt be cancelled—Effect of Wills Act, 1837.

Trust—Inter vivos—Declaration—Document giving title to money handed to cestui que trust.

On a settlement of accounts between D., a creditor, and M., a debtor, M. gave D. two signed receipts, one for £500 and the other for £100, both sums to bear interest at 4 per cent. The £100 was expressed to be paid to S. on the death of D., but the interest was to be paid to D. and this receipt was also signed by D., as approving it. D. became ill, took the two receipts from a drawer, and gave them to S., directing that in case of her death the £600 was to be cancelled except as to the £100 which was to be paid to S.

Held: (i) as regards the £100 a sufficient declaration of trust inter vivos had been made; (ii) delivery of the receipt for £500, although made to S. and not to M., was on the evidence made to S. as agent for M., which was equivalent to delivery to M. and sufficient to make a donatio mortis causa; (iii) the Wills Act, 1837, had not abolished a donatio mortis causa.

Notes. Section 4 of the Revenue Act, 1845, by which a donatio mortis causa was deemed a legacy for the purpose of duty, was repealed by the Finance Act, 1949, s. 52 (10), Sched. 11 (28 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 527, 529).

Exceptions filed by the plaintiff to the master's report in the administration of the estate of Miss Betty Darton, the question being whether the delivery of two documents amounted to a donatio mortis causa. The master in his report held that the delivery of the documents did not constitute a donatio mortis causa.

E Between Miss Darton and Mr. Moore, a trustee for her life and also for her friend, Ann Dye, who later became Ann Shaw, there were accounts which after Mr. Moore's death were continued with William Moore, the present plaintiff. On Oct. 22, 1843, the accounts were closed and William Moore signed and handed Miss Darton the two following documents:

F "Received, Oct. 22, 1843, of Miss Darton, £500 to bear interest at four per cent. per annum, but not to be drawn at less than six months' notice.

£500 William Moore."

"Received, Oct. 22, 1843, of Miss Darton, for the use of Ann Dye, £100, to be paid to her at Miss Darton's decease, but the interest at four per cent. to be paid to Miss Darton.

G I approve the above. Betty Darton."

On June 28, 1845, Miss Darton was confined to her bed by extreme illness, and (according to the testimony of Ann Dye, afterwards Ann Shaw, who was the only witness examined) believing that she would not live long, was assisted to her drawer containing her papers, and taking out the two receipts delivered them to Ann Shaw, saying: "Now mind and take care of them, and that they do not come into the hands of Mr. Darton" [her nephew, the defendant]. She directed that in case of her death the £600 was to be cancelled, except as to the £100 which it was intended should be paid by Mr. Moore to Ann Shaw, in consideration of her long acquaintance and friendship. The receipts remained in the custody of Ann Shaw until Miss Darton's death.

I Swanston and Moxon for the plaintiff, supported the exceptions.

Marshall for other parties.

KNIGHT-BRUCE, V.-C.—It is not necessary to consider the question of donatio mortis causa, so far as the £100 is concerned, as, in my opinion, an effectual declaration of trust inter vivos was created. The document relating to that sum was apparently contemporaneous with the creation of the debt. Moore was a trustee for Betty Darton during her life, and for Ann Shaw afterwards. The question with regard to the £500 is not so simple. It is by no means clear that the Wills Act, 1837, did not intend to put an end entirely to gifts mortis causa, as it has done, with the exception of soldiers and sailors in actual service, with regard to nuncupative wills. It has, however, never been so decided, nor has it even been argued in any reported case, and I shall, therefore, decide the question without reference to the Wills Act, 1837; and I shall do so the more readily as s. 4 of the Revenue Act, 1845, has, so far as a mere revenue Act could do so, put a construction on the Wills Act, 1837, by imposing a duty on every donatio mortis causa. The next question, therefore, is whether the evidence showed that, as to the £500 there was a donatio mortis causa. The document was placed in the hands of Ann Shaw, and not in those of Moore; but I think the evidence is sufficient to show that it was placed in her hands as agent for him, and that the delivery was equivalent to a delivery to him, and was sufficient to make a gift mortis causa. If, therefore, by law, an interest is capable of being created mortis causa, it is so in the present instance. I have no intention to contravene anything decided by any of the very eminent judges [LORD HARDWICKE, LORD ROSSLYN, LORD ELDON] whose names have been mentioned, and I think that in holding that there is a donatio mortis causa created, I do not decide anything contrary to the decisions of those judges, nor to the rules of the civil law, nor to the principles of the law of this country. The exceptions must be allowed.

Exceptions allowed.

Criminal Law—Larceny—Larceny by servant—Constructive possession of master—Goods collected from station and carted to master's house—Part of goods disposed of during journey.

R. was sent with his master's cart and sacks to collect half a ton of coal from the station wharf and to cart it to the master's house. The coal was delivered, put into sacks, and loaded on the cart, and the bill was made out to the master. During the journey to the master's house R. disposed of some of the coal to P.

Held: the master had constructive possession of the coal when it was loaded on the cart at the station, and R. was guilty of larceny and not embezzlement.

Notes. Section 13 of the Criminal Procedure Act, 1851, has been repealed by the Criminal Statutes Repeal Act, 1861, repealed by S.L.R., 1950, s. 1, Sched. 1 (29 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 810, 829). But s. 44 (2) of the Larceny Act, 1916 (5 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 1039) allows alternative verdicts to be given in cases of larceny and embezzlement. Larceny is defined by s. 1 of the Larceny Act, 1916 (5 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 1012) and larceny and embezzlement by clerks and servants is dealt with by s. 17 of the Larceny Act, 1916 (5 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 1021).

F Appeal against conviction of larceny on the ground that the conviction was wrong in law, on the ground that, if any offence had been committed, it was embezzlement and not larceny as the goods had never been in the possession of the master, but had been in the exclusive possession of the appellant as servant.

The appellant, Abraham Reed, was charged at Kent Quarter Sessions, sitting on Jan. 4, 1853, with feloniously stealing two cwts. of coal, the property of William Newton, his master, on Dec. 6; and James Peerless, who was acquitted, was charged in the same indictment with receiving the coal knowing it to have been stolen. The appellant was employed by William Newton who sold coal by retail. On Dec. 6, 1852, Newton directed the appellant to go to Edenbridge station to collect half a ton of coal and to bring it back to Newton's house. Peerless lived about 500 yards off the direct route from the station to Newton's house. The appellant set out about 9 a.m. and should have returned about 4 p.m., but as he did not do so Newton went in search of him about 6.30 p.m., and found him outside Peerless's house where the appellant and Peerless were taking coal from the cart in a truck basket into Peerless's house. The appellant said that he had received an order from Peerless to deliver him half a cwt. of coal. But the appellant had never told Newton of such an order and had no authority from Newton to sell any coal.

I When Newton brought the coal home in the cart it was found to weigh two and three-quarters cwts. short of the half ton which the appellant had been ordered to collect from the station. Later that evening Newton went to Peerless and asked him what coal he had received from the cart and he said half a cwt. and that it had been carried from the cart in a sack. Next day Newton went to Peerless's house and found about half or three-quarters of a cwt. of coal. In cross-examination Newton said that he thought that Peerless had had some coal about a fortnight previously. James Holman, a wharfinger, proved that the appellant had collected half a ton of coal at the station and produced the order as entered to Newton.

At the close of the case for the prosecution, counsel for the appellant submitted that there was no case to go to the jury on the charge of larceny, inasmuch as the possession of the coal left at Peerless's had never been in the possession of Newton, the master. Counsel on the part of the prosecution contended that the coal was constructively in the possession of Newton, and that the offence was properly charged as larceny; but that, under s. 13 of the Criminal Procedure Act, 1851, it was immaterial whether the offence were larceny or embezzlement, as the jury might find a verdict either for larceny or embezzlement. Counsel for the appellant then proposed that it should be left to the jury as a charge of embezzlement; but to this counsel for the prosecution objected, on the ground that the receiver must then be acquitted. The court were of opinion that there was constructive possession in the master, and left the case to the jury as a case of larceny upon the evidence, who thereupon found the appellant Abraham Reed guilty. Counsel for the appellant then applied to the court to submit the case to the Court for the Consideration of Crown Cases Reserved, contending that the conviction was wrong in law; as, if any offence had been committed, it was embezzlement, and not larceny. The court acceded to the application.

This case was first argued on April 23, 1853, before JERVIS, C.J., PARKE and ALDERSON, BB., WIGHTMAN and CRESSWELL, JJ., when the court took time to consider their judgment. The court afterwards directed that the case should be argued before all the judges; and, in pursuance of that direction, the case was again heard on Nov. 19, 1853.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 21, 1854. LORD CAMPBELL, C.J., read the following judgment.—I am of opinion that the appellant has been properly convicted of larceny. There can be no doubt that, in such a case, the goods must have been in the actual or the constructive possession of the master; and that, if the master had not otherwise the possession of them than by the bare receipt of his servant upon the delivery of another for the master's use, although as against third persons this is in law a receipt of the goods by the master, yet in respect of the servant himself this will not support a charge of larceny, because as to him there was no tortious taking in the first instance, and consequently no trespass. Therefore, if there had been a quantity of coals delivered to the servant for the master, and the servant, having remained in the personal possession of them, as by carrying them on his back in a bag, without anything having been done to determine his original exclusive possession, had converted them animo furandi, he would have been guilty of embezzlement, and not of larceny. But if the servant has done anything which determines his original exclusive possession of the goods, so that the master thereby comes constructively into possession, and the servant afterwards converts them animo furandi, he is guilty of larceny, and not merely of a breach of trust at common law, or of embezzlement under the statute. On this supposition he subsequently takes the goods tortiously in converting them, and commits a trespass. We have, therefore, to consider whether the exclusive possession of the coals continued with the servant down to the time of the conversion.

I am of opinion that this exclusive possession was determined when the coals were deposited in the master's cart, in the same manner as if they had been deposited in the master's cellar, of which the servant had the charge. The master was undoubtedly in possession of the cart at the time when the coals were deposited in it; and if the servant had carried off the cart animo furandi, he would have been guilty of larceny. That is expressly determined in R. v. Robinson (1). There seems considerable difficulty in contending that, if the master was in possession of the cart, he was not in possession of the coals which it contained, the coals being his property, and deposited there by his order, for his use. Counsel for the appellant argued that the goods received by a servant for his master remain in the

A exclusive possession of the servant till they have reached their ultimate destination. But he was unable, notwithstanding his learning and ingenuity, to give any definition of "ultimate destination," when so used. He admitted that the master's constructive possession would begin before the coals were deposited in the cellar, when the cart containing the coals had stopped at his door, and even when it had entered his gate. But I consider the point of time to be regarded is that when the

B coals were deposited in the cart. Thenceforth the servant had only the custody or charge of the coals, as a butler has of his master's plate, or a groom has of his master's horse. To this conclusion, with the most sincere deference to any of my learned brothers who may at any time have taken a different view—to this conclusion I should have come on principle; and I think that R. v. Spears (2) is an express authority for it.

C The following is an exact copy of the statement of that case, signed by BULLER, J., in pp. 181, 182 and 183 of Vol. 2 of the Black Book, containing the decisions of the judges in Crown cases, deposited with the Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench for the time being :

"John Spears was convicted before me at Kingston, for stealing forty bushels of oats of James Broune & Co., in a barge on the Thames. Broune & Co. sent the prisoner with their barge to Wilson, a corn meter, for as much oats only as the barge would carry, and which were to be brought in loose bulk. The prisoner received from Wilson 220 quarters in loose bulk, and five quarters in sacks; the prisoner ordering that quantity to be put into sacks. The quantity in the sacks was afterwards embezzled by the prisoner; and the question reserved for the opinion of the judges is whether this was felony, the oats never having been in the possession of the prosecutor; or whether it was not like the case of a servant receiving change or buying a thing for his master, but never delivering it."

Then there is a reference made to DYER, 5, and 1 SHOW. 52; and then this is signed by BULLER, J.: and then is added, "April 25, 1798. Conviction affirmed." That is an exact copy from the Black Book. What follows of course is new. In that case the question arose, whether the corn, while in the prosecutor's barge, in which it was to be brought by the prisoner to the prosecutor's granary, was to be considered in the possession of the prosecutor; and the judges unanimously held, that from the time of its being put into the barge it was in the prosecutor's possession, although the prisoner had the custody or charge of it. That case has been met at the Bar by a suggestion that the whole cargo of corn, of which the quantity put on board this barge was a part, was or might have been purchased by the prosecutor, so that he might have had a title and constructive possession before the delivery to the prisoner. But the very statement of the case in the Black Book, and the authorities referred to, show that the judges turned their attention to the question whether the exclusive possession of the servant had not been determined before conversion; and during the argument of R. v. Walsh (3) we have the ratio decidendi in R. v. Spears (2) explicitly stated by one of the judges who concurred in the decision :

"HEATH, J.—That case went upon the ground that the corn was in the prosecutor's barge, which was the same thing as if it had been in his granary."

I Read "cart" for "barge," "coals" for "corn," and "cellar" for "granary," and the two cases are for this purpose precisely the same. There is no conflicting authority; for in all the cases relied upon by counsel for the appellant, the exclusive personal possession of the servant had continued down to the time of the wrongful conversion.

It is said there is great subtlety in giving such an effect to the deposit of the coals in the master's cart; but the objection rests on a subtlety wholly unconnected with the moral guilt of the servant, for as to that it must be quite immaterial whether the property in the coals had or had not vested in the master prior to the time when they were delivered to the servant. We are to determine whether this would have been a case of larceny at common law before there was any statute against embezzlement; and I do not think that there would have been any reproach to the administration of justice, in holding that the subtlety arising from the prosecutor having had no property in the subject of the larceny before its delivery to the servant, who stole it, was sufficiently answered by the subtlety that when the servant had once parted with the personal possession of it, so that a constructive possession by the master began, the servant who subsequently stole it should be liable to be punished, as if there had been a prior property and possession in the master, and that the servant should be adjudged liable to be punished for a crime, instead of being allowed to say that he had only committed a breach of trust, for which he might be sued in a civil action. In approaching the confines of different offences created by common law or by statute, nice distinctions must arise, and must be dealt with. In the present case it is satisfactory to think that the ends of justice are effectually gained by affirming the conviction; for the only objection to it is founded upon an argument that the appellant ought to have been convicted of another offence of the same character, for which he would have been liable to the same punishment.

JERVIS, C.J.—I concur in the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice. It is admitted that the cart is in the possession of the servant for a special purpose; if he had taken the cart, he would have been guilty of larceny; if the cart has for this purpose continued the cart of the master, the delivery of the coals is a delivery to the master, and makes the offence a larceny.

PARKE, B.—I certainly had differed from the view of this case which has been taken by the Lord Chief Justice at a time when it was uncertain what R. v. Spears (2) actually was, and treating this case as res nova. The book in which the opinions of the judges are written, and which is always in the custody of the Lord Chief Justice, was mislaid; and R. v. Spears (2) was differently reported in the two editions of LEACH, and also in EAST'S CROWN LAW; and that case could not for a long time be found. However, since it has been found, I have satisfied myself; and I entertain no doubt upon it. I should have delivered my reasons at length; but it is unnecessary now to do so. R. v. Abrahath (4) and R. v. Spears (2) having been discovered, and having read that case with the explanation of HEATH, J., I find the point decided; and though, therefore, if this was res nova, I should have pronounced an opinion that this was not larceny, but as that case is a decided authority, by the authority of that case I am bound; and it is unnecessary for me to deliver my reasons at any greater length.

Conviction affirmed.

WRIGHT AND ANOTHER v. SCOTT

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Cranworth, L.C., Lord Brougham and Lord St. Leonards), July 16, 1855]

[Reported 26 L.T.O.S. 180]

Compulsory Purchase—Exercise of powers—Right of trustees to construct any works incidental to or necessary for works which they were empowered to construct.

Public trustees were empowered by statute to acquire land compulsorily for the purpose of improving the navigation of a river and to construct "wharves, quays and other works" on land so acquired. On land of the appellants acquired under these powers it was proposed to construct a wharf after widening the river and a large shed to be used for the purpose of that wharf. The appellants objected that the construction of the shed was not within the trustees' statutory powers.

Held: in the absence of express prohibition from so doing the trustees had power to do anything incidental to or necessary for the works which they were expressly empowered by statute to construct; the legislature by "wharfs and quays" must have intended that all adjuncts necessary and convenient for that purpose should be included; and, therefore, the trustees had power to construct the proposed works.

Notes. As to the construction of statutory enabling powers, see 36 HALSBURY'S LAWS (3rd Edn.) 436; and for cases see 42 DIGEST 681, 682.

Appeal from a decision of the Court of Session holding that the respondents, trustees of the River Clyde navigation, were entitled to erect a certain shed or sheds upon the wharfs which were in course of construction under authority of various Acts of Parliament, their right to do so being resisted by the appellants, Wright and Connell.

The question arose in the following circumstances. Under various Acts of Parliament prior to the Act of 6 Geo. 4, c. cxvii, powers had been given to the trustees of the Clyde harbour from time to time to improve the navigation of that river. Much more extended powers were given by the Act of 6 Geo. 4, c. cxvii, which were still further enlarged by the Act of 3 & 4 Vict., c. cxviii, under which Act, reciting all the former Acts, certain persons, the former trustees and others, were to continue to be trustees. Directions were, in the first instance, given for meetings of the trustees and the mode in which they should conduct their business; and then by s. 11 it was enacted, that the trustees by themselves or their agents or workmen were empowered and authorised

"not only to execute and continue the several works authorised by the said recited Acts, but also, under the provisions and restrictions hereinafter enacted, to make, execute, construct, finish, maintain and keep in repair the additional works upon, in or along the river and in connection with the harbour delineated or represented on the map or plan hereinafter mentioned, and likewise the wet dock and other works and improvements hereby authorised to be made, and for those purposes to enter upon and take the lands."

The Act contained the usual powers given in the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, enabling the trustees, when they wanted lands for the purpose of the making of the harbour, to acquire such lands compulsorily.

Under the provisions of this Act the trustees had in fact taken a certain piece of land with buildings upon it belonging to Wright and Connell, adjoining the River Clyde, and upon that land the trustees were preparing, first of all to widen the river, according to the directions of the Act, a certain width, and then to the south of the river thus extended, to form a wharf. Upon that wharf they were proposing to erect a very extensive building which they called a shed, occupying nearly the whole of the land taken from Wright and Connell, and which would be of a permanent character, and they were also proposing to erect a wall. They asserted that they had a right to erect sheds under the authority of the Act of Parliament. In the conveyance of the land, the appellants reserved to themselves certain rights, as they retained other lands adjacent to those taken by the trustees, which were

"to obtain water from the Clyde for the use of their said remaining lands by means of pipes laid at their own expense at a proper depth beneath the surface, and also to have reasonable access for all the buildings to be erected on their said remaining ground, to and from the wharfs and quays, so soon as the same shall be formed opposite to their remaining property for the use thereof."

The Act of Parliament contained certain provisions applicable to proprietors like the appellants whose lands had been thus taken by the trustees. In s. 21 there was a proviso :

"that as soon as the trustees shall, from time to time, carry into effect the proper improvements, the right of the landowners severally to use and occupy the ground or soil within the improved lines shall respectively cease and determine as regards the ground or soil occupied by such improvements; and it shall not at any time be lawful to the said trustees to interpose any grounds, works or other erections between the properties respectively of the said landowners, and the waterway or channel of the river, excepting parallel dykes or water-walls for confining or regulating the channel of the said river, and such beacons, perches or other such works upon the said dykes as may be necessary for the guidance or information of parties navigating the said river."

Section 23 enacted that

"nothing herein contained shall hinder or prevent the trustees, under the authority hereby granted, from, inter alia, acquiring the grounds and other heritages belonging to any of the landowners before named, for the construction of the wharves, quays and other works for the enlargement of the said harbour, delineated on the said map or plan; and that after the acquisition of such ground, the boundary line between the said harbour, wharves, quays and other works, and the properties of the adjacent landowners shall (excepting when any public or private road or passage may exist) . . ."

be as marked by certain dotted lines.

The Court of Session held that the Clyde trustees were entitled to build the proposed shed; and Wright and Connell appealed from that decision.

Rolt, Q.C., Palmer, Q.C., and Stuart for the appellant.

The Lord Advocate (Moncrieff) and the Solicitor-General (Bethell) for the respondent.

LORD CRANWORTH, L.C., stated the facts, and continued: In this case the main reliance of the appellants is on s. 21 of the Act of 3 & 4 Vict., c. cxviii, under which the trustees are authorised to improve the navigation of the River Clyde. But what follows in s. 23 seems to me to show conclusively that that does not at all impede or prevent the trustees from using any portion of the land which they were authorised by the Act to take for the purpose of adding to the quays or wharfs of the harbour. It does not prevent them from interposing any works or erections between the river and the lands of those who shall remain proprietors below the land that they are taking, or from making works or doing what may be necessary for the harbour, they being authorised to make the harbour with the quays and wharfs along it. It appears to me that s. 23 is clear upon the point—nothing is to prevent the trustees from doing whatever they are authorised to do for the purpose of erecting and making the wharfs. That being so, let us see whether there is any inconsistency between the two clauses. There is none whatever.

The Act says, for the purpose of improving the navigation, you may widen the river up to a given line. You may take any land up to that line for the purpose of

A widening the navigation. There is no restriction. You may do that in the city of Glasgow as well as anywhere else. You may do that all along, deepening the river to any depth exceeding seventeen feet; but in doing that you shall not interfere with the free access of the riparian proprietors, as they are called, but you shall give to them all reasonable access, such as they had before. But nothing in that proviso, which compels you to give them reasonable access, shall prevent you from

B doing that which, by s. 23 of the Act, you are authorised to do: namely, to make wharfs and quays for the convenience of that portion of the harbour included within the dotted lines, in the town or city of Glasgow. That makes the whole thing intelligible. You are, if you are merely widening the river, to widen it; but, in widening it, you will be likely to impede the access that persons previously had. You shall not do that; you shall give them reasonable access; but though you shall

C give reasonable access to all persons which you will be taking away in widening the river, that shall not prevent you, within the limits of the city of Glasgow, taking any land that you please for the purpose of making wharfs and quays, and so on.

The force of that was so strongly felt, that it was necessary for the appellants to argue that the power to make wharfs, quays and other works for the enlargement of the harbour, did not authorise the erection of buildings upon the quays. I think

D that that would be a very forced construction. I do not care what definition you find in JOHNSON'S DICTIONARY of a wharf or quay. You must see what the legislature must have meant, when they authorised the making at Glasgow of wharfs and quays, for the more convenient use, by merchants, sending their ships and loading and unloading goods there. Of course the legislature, by "wharfs and quays," must have meant wharfs and quays, with all the adjuncts that were convenient for the

E purpose; and I confess that even if we could not have spelled out from any other part of the Act that it was the intention of the legislature to authorise such erections, I should have been very apt to hold that, upon the mere authority "to erect wharfs and quays for the convenience of Her Majesty's subjects," we must understand wharfs and quays now made according to the most approved scientific principles. Observe to what an absurd extent any other limited construction than that

F would lead. In one of the clauses, which seems to have been framed with mere tautological repetition, lamp-posts are ordered. Is it to be said that in making a wharf and quay you are not to erect a lamp-post upon it? Yet the construction contended for must go that length. I do not know that the iron rings which you see upon a wharf are, strictly speaking, part of a wharf. I dare say, if you look at the definition of the word "wharf," you would not find iron rings included. But it

G is absurd to suppose that the trustees are to fence off and build up against the river, and that they could not put that which was necessary for a ship or boat to fasten itself with. I do not know that there is any authority to make steps down to the river. I think that these considerations would have led me to the conclusion that it must have been intended by the legislature to make wharfs and quays in the mode which the trustees should deem most convenient for Her Majesty's subjects.

H I think that we may, if it be necessary, looking at this case in the sort of spirit in which it has been looked at, find that there is an express intention on the part of the legislature that the trustees should be enabled to erect, what is called in the different Acts, sheds for the convenient use of persons loading and unloading their goods. Reference was particularly made to s. 27, which authorises not merely the erection of wharfs and quays, but the making of a large wet dock, called Windmill-croft. There, it is said, the words "sheds" does occur, because the trustees are to

I make, complete, repair, and maintain the wet dock, delineated on the said map or plan, as intended to be constructed on the said lands, "together with all and every quay and quays, wharf or wharfs, locks, cuts, entrances, cranes, sheds, engines, bridges, lamp-posts, works and other matters and things necessary to, or connected with, such dock." The argument was this—sheds being enumerated there, you cannot understand that the legislature would suppose that the making of a shed was included in a mere authority to make a dock, or to make a dock with works connected therewith. But very little weight can be attributed to the use of unnecessary or tautological expressions of this sort. For observe, that among the other things which the trustees are authorised to make for a wet dock, are "entrances." Could it be possibly imagined that the legislature meant to authorise the making of a wet dock without an entrance? And yet the word "entrance" is expressly stated. An entrance to the dock is there given as a word in addition to the dock, just as the word "shed" and the word "cranes" and other words are given; from which I only infer that you cannot adduce anything from the occasional use here and there of those words in the Act which would be implied in the more general words, and from their omission in the other part of the Act. It is only another instance among many of the loose way in which these Acts of Parliament are framed.

It was observed by the counsel for the respondent, that s. 59 expressly states this :

"that the powers and authorities granted by the said recited Acts to the trustees to exact and levy, among other things, shed duties, that is, duties for the use of sheds, or with the clauses and provisions contained in the said Acts in relation thereto, shall be, and the same are hereby repealed, and the trustees under the present Act shall be, and they are hereby authorised and empowered to demand, exact and recover from all and every person or persons importing or exporting goods at the said quays or wet docks, for the sheds, cranes and weighing machines, constructed or to be constructed at the said harbour or dock, the rates and duties specified in schedules A, B and C, hereto annexed."

The only way in which that can be possibly met is this, by saying that there was an authority to construct sheds at the wet dock, and that those words, "sheds to be constructed" must refer to sheds to be constructed at the wet dock, or to sheds hereafter to be constructed, but not yet constructed, upon lands which were included in the former Act. I think that that is an extremely narrow construction of an Act of this sort.

I can only read the Act as showing that the legislature clearly contemplated that sheds had been constructed, not merely at the wet docks, but in the harbour or dock, the harbour there excluding the wet dock; and that they might hereafter be constructed and duties levied upon them. I do not rely upon the subsequent language of the Act 9 & 10 Viet., c. cxliii. There may be weight in that, but it does not strike my mind as throwing any very great light upon the subject. It is said that there is an interpretation clause there, which makes the words "other works" include sheds, and that the two Acts of Parliament are united together, so that the words "other works" in the former Act may be read retrospectively to include sheds. I should feel very great difficulty in coming to that conclusion if it rested upon that. It is merely a further illustration of the point, that the legislature considered the general word "works" to include everything. But I do not specifically rely upon that as deciding the case at all one way or the other.

LORD BROUGHAM concurred.

LORD ST. LEONARDS, after stating various clauses of the Act, said : It is now contended that you are to spell through a number of Acts of Parliament in order to show what is the particular use to which a company acquiring land under an Act of Parliament is to apply that land. I entirely agree that land acquired under an Act of Parliament could not be applied to the purpose directly opposed to that Act of Parliament. Companies are not to abuse their powers; and, under pretence of buying land for a harbour, they are not to construct a railway, for example, or to use it for any other totally different purpose. But within their Act of Parliament, and to the extent of their powers and to the extent to which they choose to exercise those powers within the Act of Parliament, I should be clearly of opinion, unless there is some express prohibition, that acquiring the land under the Act of Parliament for the purposes of the Act, they may do with that land just as any other proprietor would do, always admitting that it is not to be applied to any works foreign to the Act itself.

A Supposing, for instance, that a company thought it necessary to build a station, and that they had got the land, is it necessary that they should have power to build a particular station? It is constantly the habit of railway companies to build a station. Supposing that these trustees thought it necessary to erect a shed anywhere for the purposes of the trade, I should be of opinion that, unless they were expressly prohibited, they would have a perfect right to do so; to erect a shed, or

B do anything of that sort which is incidental to the execution of their works, or which they deem necessary in the execution of their works, and which they erect bona fide in the exercise of their powers. The limit of that power would be a matter with which any man who sells land to them has no more right to interfere, than any stranger going along the street; and it will not do to come into a court of justice and endeavour not to look at the contract—not to look at the general scope

C of the Acts, but to pick out and dwell upon some particular provisions, in order to show that the particular dedication of a particular piece of ground has not been exactly pointed out and defined by the Act of Parliament. [His LORDSHIP then stated other grounds for his decision.]

Appeal dismissed.

ROBBINS v. HEATH AND OTHERS

[COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH (Lord Denman, C.J., Patteson, Coleridge and Wightman, JJ.), January 31, 1848]

[Reported 11 Q.B. 257; 2 New Pract. Cas. 433; 10 L.T.O.S. 371;

Solicitor—London agent—Relations with country solicitor's client—Client's money held by London agent—Liability to repay to client.

Although in ordinary circumstances there is no privity of contract between a client and his country solicitor's London agent, yet in a case where the London agent holds money to which the client is entitled the court may, in the exercise

G of its jurisdiction over its officers, order such money to be paid to the client.

G

A country solicitor was employed to obtain judgment and execution on a warrant of attorney. His London agents issued writs of execution and sent them to the undersheriff in the country, with a direction to call on the country solicitor for instructions. The levy was made and the proceeds were paid by the undersheriff to the bankers of the London agents, he having first sent to the country solicitor and not found him at home. The London agents then wrote to the country solicitor informing him that the money had been remitted to them, and inquiring what they should do with it. The answer to that letter was not produced, but a second letter from the London agents to the country solicitor was produced in which they expressed their surprise at being required to refund that money and their intention of retaining it to satisfy a general balance due from the country solicitor to them. The country solicitor expressly stated that the London agents held the money without his authority and against his consent. On a summary application to compel the London agents to repay the money to the plaintiff,

Held: although in ordinary circumstances there was no privity between the London agent and the client in the country so as to make the former responsible to the latter for the client's money received by him in his character as London agent and in the ordinary course of his business as such, in the circumstances of this case he was bound to refund the money which he had received, because it came into his hands accidentally and not merely in his character of London agent.

Application by the defendants, to set aside a rule obtained on motion by the plaintiff calling on Fennell, Child & Kelly, a firm of London solicitors, to show cause why they should not pay over to the plaintiff in this action the sum of £166 3s.

The affidavits on which the rule was obtained stated that the plaintiff had signed judgment on a warrant of attorney in Wiltshire, and that the defendants, being the London agents of one Slade, the plaintiff's solicitor at Devizes, had been instructed by him to issue writs of execution; that they had done so accordingly, and had sent the writs to the undersheriff with a direction to call on Slade for instructions; that the levy was made and £166 3s. realised; that the undersheriff called on Slade, but not finding him at home, remitted the proceeds to the bankers of Fennells' in London; that Fennells' thereupon wrote to Slade, informing him that the money had been remitted, and asking what they should do with it. Subsequently they sent another letter expressing their surprise at being required to refund it, and their intention to apply it to the payment of the general balance due from Slade to them. These letters, and some others, were set out in the affidavits, but the letter written by Slade in answer to the first of the two was not produced or set out in the affidavits on either side. There was a distinct affidavit that Fennells' held the money without the authority and against the will of Slade.

LORD DENMAN, C.J.—This is one of the cases contemplated in our judgment in Robbins v. Fennell (1), where the London agent might make himself liable to the client for sums received by him.

This money did not come into the hands of the London agents merely as such London agents. It came directly from the undersheriff to them, and out of the ordinary course; indeed so much out of the ordinary course that they immediately wrote to the country solicitor to know what they are to do with it. The answer to that letter is of course in their hands but they do not produce it. Then comes another letter from them, in which they say, "We are surprised at your requiring us to refund it." That is the short state of facts. The money was not received by Fennells' at all in the course of their engagement and connection with the country solicitor but by some accident it got into their hands, as it might into the hands of a stranger.

My only doubt has been whether, as there has been a trial and the matter has been in some degree discussed and submitted to a jury, there ought not to be a new action brought; but that would be imposing great expense on the parties and I think that the case is now made out and that we ought to say that these defendants, having by an improper use of the money deprived the plaintiff of it, are bound to

A refund it. I agree with counsel for the plaintiff, that where money is improperly received, the privity is out of the question.

B PATTESON, J.—If this had been a case of money received by the defendants as London agents in the ordinary course of their business as such, the application must have been refused on the ground that there is no privity between the London agent and the client in the country, because I agree with LORD DENMAN that no distinction can be drawn between an action and a summary application in this respect. It is clear, however, that this money was not received by them in the ordinary course of their business as London agents.

C [HIS LORDSHIP stated the facts and referred to the second letter from the defendants to the country solicitor, Slade]. Now that distinguishes this from Robbins v. Fennell (1), in which I do not mean to say that the nonsuit was wrong. That action was founded entirely on the privity supposed to exist between the client in the country and the London agent, as such; and there being no such privity, the nonsuit was right. But there are special circumstances which prevent this application from resting entirely on that supposed privity and it, therefore, is not governed by that decision.

D COLERIDGE and WIGHTMAN, JJ., concurred.

Rule absolute.

Application by the defendant for a rule nisi to set aside the verdict for the plaintiff and enter it for him, or for a new trial in an action brought by the plaintiff for damages for injury caused to her house as a result of excavation by the defendant under his adjoining house thereby depriving the plaintiff's house of support.

The first count of the declaration stated that the plaintiff was entitled to a messuage or dwelling-house, and was entitled to have the same supported by certain land and premises of the defendant adjoining thereto, yet the defendant wrongfully and unlawfully dug, excavated, and made a drain, hole, and tunnel, and removed and took away part of the said land of the defendant, and thereby deprived the said messuage of the plaintiff of the support which she was entitled to have, whereby the walls and parts of the dwelling-house cracked, gave way, and subsided. The second count charged the defendant with having negligently, carelessly, and improperly dug, excavated, and tunnelled a certain drain, whereby the walls of the plaintiff became undermined, weakened, and dilapidated, and cracked and subsided. The defendant pleaded that the plaintiff was not entitled to have her dwelling-house supported by the land and premises of the defendant adjoining thereto.

At the trial before POLLOCK, C.B., it appeared that the plaintiff was the owner of the lease of the house, 6, Alfred Place, Camden Town, and the defendant was the leaseholder of the adjoining house, 5. The plaintiff derived her title as follows, as proved at the trial. Alfred Batson was the freeholder of the ground, and S. O. Pierce the original lessee. Pierce subleased to E. Watmough for ninety-nine years, from December, 1846; on Aug. 28, 1847, Watmough mortgaged the two houses (5 and 6) to J. B. Brown, and on Oct. 20, 1847, this mortgage was assigned to H. Halliday; and on Sept. 20, 1848, Watmough attorned to and became the tenant of Halliday, the mortgagee. Watmough having made default in payment of the mortgage debt, Halliday, on June 15, 1849, put the premises (No. 6) up to auction, and the plaintiff purchased them, and they were assigned to her by Halliday, under a power of sale contained in the mortgage deed, by deed dated July 11, 1849. The defendant derived his title in the same way, and the assignment to him bore date Sept. 3, 1849.

The defendant, being desirous to make a communication between his premises and the common sewer in front of the houses, dug a drain through his house, and so near to the party wall, that the adjoining house subsided and received considerable damage, for which injury this action was brought. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, damages £25, leave being reserved to the defendant to move to enter a verdict for him, if the court should be of opinion that there was no such right to the support of the adjoining soil as alleged in the declaration.

Lush moved for a rule to set aside the plaintiff's verdict or for a new trial on the ground that the verdict was against the evidence.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 12, 1853. POLLOCK, C.B., delivered the following judgment of the court.—In this case the rule will not be granted on the point reserved, because it seems very clear that where a number of houses are built on a spot of ground, all belonging to the same person, being all built together, and obviously requiring the mutual support of each of the others for the purpose of their common protection and security, whether the owner first parts with one and then another, or parts with two together, which he afterwards subdivides either by mortgage, or sale, or devise, or any other way, still the mutual support should seem necessary—it is a matter of common sense; and the circumstance whether the houses were separated by one act at one time, or at different times, never could make any difference as to what ought to be the result, inasmuch as the houses were originally built depending on each other, and each required the assistance of the others. As I said before, it seems a matter of plain common sense that that support must continue, and that no man who should become possessed of any one of the houses should be in a situation to say, "You are not entitled to the protection of my house, and I will pull the house down and let the houses on each side collapse and fall into ruin." It seems impos-

A sible not to come to the conclusion that the law must be, in strictness, in accordance with what is so plain and sensible.

There is a case, Pinnington v. Galland (1), decided in this court, which came to much the same result. However, that was in respect to a right of way, and not to a right of support. We are all of opinion that where houses have thus been erected in common by the same owner on a spot of ground, necessarily requiring mutual support, there is, either by a presumed grant or by a presumed reservation, a right to such mutual support, so that the person who sells one reserves to himself that right, either in one way or the other—the same mutual dependence of each house on the rest remains. Therefore, there is no foundation for the point reserved—that the house had not a right to the support of the neighbour house, and on this ground the rule will be refused.

C Upon the point reserved, if the court had been of opinion that under such circumstances there was no evidence that one house was entitled to the support of the other, a rule would have been granted to enter a verdict for the defendant.

There was another point that was raised—namely, the damages being £25, and the injury probably as much as between £100 and £200. Counsel seems to object that the verdict of the jury must have been some compromise or other, which required revision. It appears to us, however, that although there are cases where the principle would prevail, as, for instance, if there were an action on a bill of exchange, and there were only one plea, that the bill was forged, and the jury found the verdict for the plaintiff, damages one farthing, compromising the matter by finding that the bill was not forged, and yet giving the plaintiff only one farthing—the court, I think, would there see that there had been a total refusal on the part of the jury fairly to discharge their duty, and the verdict would be necessarily and wholly inconsistent. That, however, is not the case where the damages are large. I remember pressing on the jury that they were by no means to consider all the damage that was found as the result of this injury, because it seems to have arisen from the houses being built on a foundation which gave way—there was some colour to that view of the subject.

F The court, therefore, are of opinion that, even if they were to grant a rule, it could not be except on payment of costs; and with that condition, and with those terms, counsel said expressly that he did not desire to have the rule. Therefore, there will be no rule on that ground; and the rule will be refused on the other, inasmuch as the court think that the point reserved ought to be decided in favour of the plaintiff.

G

Rule refused.

VALPY AND OTHERS, ASSIGNEES OF BATE AND OTHERS v. MANLEY

[COURT OF COMMON PLEAS (Tindal, C.J., Coltman, Cresswell and Erle, JJ.), May 6, 1845]

[Reported 1 C.B. 594; 14 L.J.C.P. 204; 5 L.T.O.S. 94;
9 Jur. 452; 135 E.R. 673]

Money Had and Received—Payment under duress—Threat of seizure of goods—Payment to avert sale under fi. fa.—Recovery of money paid.

Where a person has just and reasonable ground for apprehending that his goods may be seized in execution under a writ of fi. fa. and pays a sum of money to a person in possession, not, to the knowledge of the sheriff, in satisfaction of the writ, but to avert the sale of the goods and his consequent loss of them, the payment is not a voluntary payment, but is made under duress, and an action for money had and received will lie at the suit of the payor to recover the money paid.

Per CRESSWELL, J. [on the question of duress]: A threat to seize and sell would have the same effect as an actual seizure.

C Rule Nisi obtained by the defendant to enter a nonsuit in an action of assumpsit for money had and received by the defendant to the use of the plaintiffs, as assignees of Bate & Co., bankrupts.

Until their bankruptcy, Bate & Co. carried on the business of brewers at Rudgeley, in Staffordshire. On July 10, 1844, a writ of fi. fa. issued upon a judgment obtained against Bate & Co. at the suit of one Garnston. This writ was sent to the office of the defendant, the sheriff of Staffordshire, at Stafford, where it was received on the 11th. A warrant was immediately granted and put into the hands of an officer, who went with an assistant to the premises of Bate & Co. for the purpose of levying under it. On arriving there, the officer was informed that Bate & Co. had that day (July 11) executed a deed conveying all their property and effects to trustees, in trust for the benefit of their creditors. The officer thereupon forebore to make any actual seizure, but said that he considered himself in possession and would come every day to make claim until he knew whether or not the sheriff would interplead, and he left his assistant with the warrant at Rudgeley. On July 14, a fiat in bankruptcy issued against Bate & Co., and a messenger entered and remained in possession. On Aug. 15 the officer went in under the sheriff's warrant, and made an inventory of the property, breaking open a cartshed and taking out a wagon. On Sept. 2, the messenger under the fiat being still in possession, the assignees sent a clerk to the under-sheriff's office at Stafford, to inquire whether or not the sheriff intended to sell, and, upon the under-sheriff saying that he did, the clerk paid the amount claimed on the writ under protest.

In an action by the assignees to recover the money as money had and received by the defendant to their use, on the part of the defendant it was insisted that that which was done on July 11 amounted to a seizure, but the learned judge expressed a strong opinion to the contrary, and it was then contended that the payment was voluntarily made by the assignees, with full knowledge of all the facts, and, therefore, that they were not entitled to recover back the money. For the assignees it was submitted that the payment was not voluntary, but was made for the purpose of releasing the property from a sort of duress. The action came for trial before ERLE, J., who was of opinion that the wrongful seizure of the goods of another did not render a payment to obtain their release a payment made under duress. His Lordship took the view that the owner of the goods must be taken to know his legal rights, and that, if they are invaded he had his remedy by action. A verdict was taken for the plaintiffs, damages £373 6s. 9d., with liberty to the defendant to move to enter a nonsuit, if the court should be of opinion that the action was not maintainable.

Serjt. Talfourd obtained a rule nisi accordingly, referring to Lindon v. Hooper (8), Atlee v. Backhouse (6), Parker v. Great Western Rail. Co. (9), and Lackington v. Elliott (10).

Sir T. Wilde, Serjt. (with him J. P. Wilde), for the plaintiffs, showed cause against the rule.

Serjt. Talfourd (with him F. V. Lee), for the defendant, supported the rule.

TINDAL, C.J.—I am of opinion that the verdict in this case was right, and ought not to be disturbed. The question is, whether the payment made by the plaintiffs on Sept. 2, was a voluntary payment or a payment under a species of duress. It seems to me that all the circumstances show that, when the assignees made the payment, they had just and reasonable ground for apprehending that the sheriff would proceed to a sale that might have operated injuriously to their interests, unless the money were paid. The payment, therefore, was not voluntary, but was made for the purpose of averting a threatened evil. A

The whole facts that were in evidence point that way. In the first place, the officer was armed with a writ under which he had power to seize the property. In the next place, though the officer had not actually made a levy before the date of the fiat, he had been upon the premises and had said that he considered himself in possession and would come every day to make claim, until he knew whether or not the sheriff would interplead; and on Aug. 15 he broke open the door of a cartshed, took a wagon, and made an inventory of all the property on the premises. The officer making this sort of continual claim, and insisting that he has made an actual seizure—though it turns out that he has not—I think, that, as against the sheriff, we may assume that he was in possession. All the cases show that, where a party is in, claiming under legal process, the owner of the goods, contending that the possession is illegal, and paying money to avert the evil and inconvenience of a sale, may recover it back in an action for money had and received if the claim turns out to have been unfounded. Without going through the authorities, it is enough to say that this case falls within the exception in the dictum of Lord KENYON, in Fulham v. Down (1) (6 Esp. at p. 26, n.) that: B

“where a voluntary payment is made of an illegal demand, the party knowing the demand to be illegal, without an immediate and urgent necessity (or, unless to redeem or preserve your person or goods), it is not the subject of an action for money had and received” C

—a form of expression which clearly assumes, that, if there be an immediate and urgent necessity, or the payment is made for the purpose of redeeming or preserving one's person or goods, the right to bring this sort of action exists. Nor am I able to distinguish this case from Snowdon v. Davis (2). D

I am not aware that there is any difficulty or impropriety in laying it down, that, where money is voluntarily paid with full knowledge of all the circumstances, the party intending to give up his right, he cannot afterwards bring an action for money had and received, but that it is otherwise where, at the time of paying the money, the party gives notice that he intends to resist the claim, and that he yields to it merely for the purpose of relieving himself from the inconvenience of having his goods sold. E

COLTMAN, J.—I am of the same opinion. Snowdon v. Davis (2) is a full authority for our present decision. It was a very remarkable case. A writ of distringas had issued out of the Exchequer, directed to the sheriff of Berkshire, requiring him to distrain the inhabitants of the borough of New Windsor by their lands and chattels, and to answer the issues of such lands, so that they should appear to render an account as in an annexed schedule. The schedule referred to was, in substance: F

“Upon the inhabitants of the borough of New Windsor, for the deficiency of G. Dixon and J. Snow, collectors in the said borough, the several sums of £7 8s. 2d., and £74 2s.” G

Upon this writ the sheriff issued a warrant to his bailiff, the defendant, commanding him to distrain the inhabitants of New Windsor for the insufficiency of Dixon and Snow, for the sums of £7 8s. 2d., and £74 2s. The defendant seems to have misunderstood the effect of the warrant. It authorised him to levy issues of one shilling in the pound, whereas he thought it authorised the levy of the full amount of the sums therein mentioned, and he, accordingly, demanded those sums of the H

A plaintiff, an inhabitant of the borough, who paid them, obtaining from the defendant a receipt for so much money by him distrained under the writ. A second distringas issued under which the sheriff issued his warrant to the defendant to distrain upon Dixon and Snow £132 14s. 7d. Upon this latter warrant the defendant demanded of the plaintiff the £132 14s. 7d., and also £6 12s. 5d. for issues. The plaintiff refusing to pay, the defendant seized his goods; whereupon B the plaintiff paid both sums, the defendant giving him a receipt for the money as received under the writ, viz. "distringas, £132 14s. 7d., issues £6 12s. 5d." The first payment there was made under circumstances similar to those of the present case, and the court held, that, inasmuch as the money was paid under the terror of a distress to an officer apparently clothed with some sort of legal authority to receive it, the plaintiff was entitled to recover it back in an action for money had and received, notwithstanding it had been paid over by the officer to the sheriff, and by the sheriff to the Exchequer. C

If that case had stood upon the second warrant alone, I think it would have supported our judgment, for, I cannot see much difference between an actual seizure and a threat to seize. The case altogether is a distinct authority to show that the payment in the present case was not a voluntary payment.

D CRESSWELL, J.—I also am of opinion that this verdict ought to stand, and that the payment in question was not a voluntary payment, but a payment made under that sort of duress which entitles the party making it to bring an action to recover it back.

Two or three classes of cases have been adverted to in the course of the argument. E In Marriot v. Hampton (8), where money had been paid by the plaintiff to the defendants under the compulsion of legal process, and it was afterwards discovered not to have been due, it was held, that the plaintiff could not recover it back in an action for money had and received. LORD KENYON observed (7 Term Rep. at p. 269):

F "If this action could be maintained, I know not what cause of action could ever be at rest. After a recovery by process of law, there must be an end of litigation, otherwise there would be no security for any person."

Hamlet v. Richardson (4) is to the same effect. Another class of cases tending to the same result is that to which Longridge v. Dorville (5) and Atlee v. Backhouse (6) belong, where money paid for the settlement of a doubtful claim was held G not to be recoverable back.

The present case, however, does not range itself within either of those classes. Here the plaintiffs did not submit to the demand in the sense that would make the payment voluntary. The money was paid, not in satisfaction of the writ, but to induce the sheriff to refrain from putting into execution his threat to sell the property. It has been contended that there was no duress, but I think that what H the sheriff did clearly amounted to duress. He claimed to have seized the goods in time. The assignees asserted that there had been no seizure before the issuing of the fiat. The sheriff proceeded to make an inventory, insisted on his possession, and threatened to follow that up by a sale. If he had actually seized the goods at the time the payment was made, the payment would clearly have been a payment I on compulsion, and that which he did was quite sufficient to prevent its being considered a voluntary payment. I entirely agree with COLTMAN, J., in the application of the decision in Snowdon v. Davis (2) to the present case, and that a threat to seize and sell would have the same effect as an actual seizure. Carter v. Carter (7) is also an authority to show that this was not a voluntary payment. It was there held that a payment of a ground rent by the occupier in default of the mesne tenant is not the less a compulsory payment because the occupier makes it without waiting to be distrained upon. The only distinction between that case and the present is that there the taking by the superior landlord would have been lawful, whereas here a seizure and sale by the sheriff would have been wrongful, because there had been no levy before the issuing of the fiat. It would be an odd thing to hold that money paid under a threat to do something that might rightfully be done may be recovered back, but that, where the threat is to do something that would be wrongful, the same result is not to follow. Moreover, I think the sheriff can hardly be allowed to say that he had not seized the goods, seeing that the officer throughout insisted that he was in possession.

The payment having been made, not in satisfaction of the writ, but to avert a sale, and with notice to the sheriff that his right to receive the money would be disputed, I think the plaintiffs are not precluded from maintaining this action.

ERLE, J.—I also think that this rule should be discharged, on the ground that the conduct of the sheriff's officer precludes the sheriff from contending that the payment was voluntary.

Rule discharged.

Limitation of Action—Landlord and tenant—Rent—Extinguishment of claim from effluxion of time—Recovery of arrears.

In any case where a claim to rent is extinguished by operation of a statute of limitations no arrears accruing due before the day on which the extinguishment takes effect can be recovered after that day.

Notes. The Real Property Limitation Act, 1939, was repealed by the Limitation Act, 1939, s. 31 (6) of which replaces the relevant provisions of s. 34 of the 1833 Act. The relevant period of limitation is now to be found in s. 4 of the 1939 Act.

Action of Replevin for a cart distrained in a barn in the parish of West Isley, Berkshire.

- B The defendant avowed the taking of the cart, goods, and chattels in the barn, and justly, because at the material time, the barn was parcel of a certain tenement called Hodcott Farm, and holden of the manor of Stratfield Mortimer, within the county of Berkshire by fealty, and the rent of 9s. yearly, to be paid at the feast day of St. Michael in every year, according to the old style and computation of time formerly used in this kingdom, of which manor the defendant before and at the material time was the owner, and thereof lawfully possessed; and because the plaintiff held and occupied the barn, with the appurtenances, at the material time and because the sum of £2 14s. of the rent aforesaid, for six years next before and ending at the feast day of St. Michael, which was in the year of Our Lord, 1844, according to the old style, was then due, in arrear, and unpaid, to the defendant; he, the defendant, well avowed the taking of the cart, goods, and chattels in the barn, so being parcel of the aforesaid tenement called Hodcott Farm, and holden of the manor of Stratfield Mortimer as aforesaid, and justly, as a distress for the aforesaid rent so then being due, in arrear, and unpaid to the defendant, according to the form of the statute in such case made and provided. Verification and prayer of judgment, and a return of the said cart, goods, and chattels, together with defendant's damages, costs, and charges in this behalf, according to the form of the statute in such case made and provided, to be adjudged to him.
- E Pleas in bar: first, that by reason of anything in the said avowry alleged, the defendant ought not to avow the taking of the said cart, goods, and chattels in the said declaration mentioned, because the plaintiff said that the barn was not parcel of the tenement called Hodcott Farm, as in the avowry alleged, concluding to the contrary. Second, the barn was not holden of the said manor, as in the avowry alleged. Third, that the defendant was not the owner and possessed of the manor, as in the avowry alleged. Fourth, that no part of the rent was due or in arrear, as in the avowry alleged. Issues thereon.
- F

- At the trial, at the Berkshire Assizes, 1846, before MAULE, J., it was proved for the defendant, that for the period between Michaelmas, 1784, and Michaelmas, 1824, the yearly rent in question had been paid for Hodcott Farm by its owners, or their tenants in possession, to the defendant and his ancestors, lords of the manor of Stratfield Mortimer, as held in free tenure of that manor. On Jan. 15, 1825, eight years' arrears, due at Michaelmas, 1824, were paid by the then occupier, by the direction of his landlord, to the defendant's agent. Repeated applications on behalf of the defendant were afterwards made for payment of subsequent arrears, but without success; and on May 15, 1845, the defendant distrained on the plaintiff's cart, while standing in a barn, shown to be parcel of Hodcott Farm, for six years' arrears, due at Michaelmas, 1844. The defendant tendered evidence to prove the existence of the manor, and its having been in his possession and that of his ancestors, for more than sixty years, when the plaintiff's counsel interposed, contending that "the right and title" of the defendant to the rent was extinguished by lapse of time, under the operation of ss. 2, 3 & 34 of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833, which transferred the estate in the rent to the plaintiff.
- G
- H

- I For the defendant it was answered, first, that the twenty years mentioned in ss. 2 and 3 began to run, not from the time when the last payment of rent was made, but from Michaelmas, 1825, till which time no rent was due, so that the right to distrain or sue for any arrear of the rent "first" accrued to the defendant then, viz., within twenty years before the distress was taken; and, secondly, that if it did not, the plaintiff should have pleaded specially in bar, that the right to make the distress did not first accrue to the defendant within twenty years next before the distress was in fact made, or in the terms used in James v. Salter (6). MAULE, J., expressed his opinion in favour of the defendant on the first point, and was inclined to think that, if the statute did in fact operate as a bar, it should have been pleaded. He also noticed that s. 34 did not provide anything as to arrears of the rent extinguished by it. He directed a verdict for the defendant, with leave to move to enter a verdict for the plaintiff for £4 4s. (the costs of the replevin bond). Verdict for the defendant for £2 14s. the amount of six years' arrears, the cart being found to be of the same value. A

The plaintiff subsequently moved, pursuant to leave reserved, to enter a verdict. The court entered a verdict accordingly, but recommended a special verdict in order that the opinion of a court of error might be taken. The case was afterwards argued in this court. B

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 7, 1850. PATTESON, J., delivered the following judgment of the court.—This was the case of a distress made by the defendant for the arrears of an ancient quit-rent issuing out of a tenement held of the defendant as lord of the manor of Isley, Stratfield Mortimer, by a fealty and 9s. rent. Such a rent is clearly within ss. 2, 3 and 34 of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833, and the question turns entirely on the construction to be put on those sections. C

The last payment was made on Jan. 25, 1825, for rent due on Oct. 11, 1824. The distress in respect of which this action is brought, was made on May 13, 1845. If the twenty years mentioned in ss. 2 and 3 had then expired, the right and title of the defendant to the rent had become extinguished by s. 34, and the tenement was no longer held of the manor at a rent of 9s. per annum. The question, therefore, was properly raised on the issue of non tenuit, without pleading the lapse of twenty years specially. Notwithstanding the saving for disabilities in s. 16, the necessity to plead the Statute of Limitations applies to cases where the remedy only is taken away, and in which the defence is by way of confession and avoidance—not where the right and title to the thing is extinguished and gone, and the defence is by denial of the right. D

With respect to the argument that the case falls within the reason which has been sometimes given for requiring the Statute of Limitations to be pleaded—namely, that the exception in favour of persons under disability might not be rendered useless, and they taken by surprise at the trial by finding the Statute of Limitations then first relied on—it is to be observed that the true reason for requiring the statute to be pleaded is that it confesses and avoids the declaration, and, therefore, is not comprehended within any plea which merely denies the whole or any part of the declaration: see Gale v. Capern (1), and Margetts v. Bays (2). The general rule that matter in confession and avoidance could not be given in evidence under a plea merely negative was subject to an exception, real or apparent, in actions of assumpsit, in which many matters which might have been pleaded in confession and avoidance were, before the new rules, allowed to be shown under the general issue; and probably the reason for requiring the Statute of Limitations to be pleaded in assumpsits, and not allowing it to be comprehended among those matters in confession and avoidance which might be shown under the general issue, may have been the inconvenience suggested in this argument. E

However, in the present case the defence is, not that the cause of action did indeed accrue, but not within the time of limitation, but that the tenure alleged in the avowry was extinguished and put an end to before the time of the distress. Great difficulties undoubtedly present themselves to our minds in endeavouring to ascertain the meaning of the legislature in ss. 2 and 3 of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833, and those difficulties have been pressed on us by counsel with great force and ability; and we feel that it is impossible by any construction to avoid some apparent incongruity; but, on the best consideration which we can give to the case, we are compelled, by the express words of s. 3, to hold that the construction put on them by the court below is the correct one. F

The defendant was himself the person who received the last rent, and who remained entitled thereto. Taking such of the words of ss. 2 and 3 as are applicable to this case, we find it enacted that no person shall make a distress to recover G

A any rent but within twenty years next after the time at which the right to make such distress shall have first accrued to the person making the same. The right to make such distress shall be deemed to have accrued at such time as is thereafter mentioned, that is to say, when the person claiming such rent shall have been in receipt of such rent, and shall while entitled thereto have discontinued such receipt, then such rent shall be deemed to have first accrued at the last time at which the rent was so received. In this case the "last time" was on Jan. 25, 1825, more than twenty years before the distress in question was made. It is obvious, that as the rent due on Oct. 11, 1824, had been paid, and that no further rent was due until Oct. 11, 1825, the right to make a distress by the express words of the statute must be deemed to have first accrued, and the twenty years, therefore, to have commenced many months before any rent which could be distrained for was due; and we are asked to put some construction on the words which shall avoid this apparent absurdity. We cannot derive any assistance from the other words of s. 3, namely, "at the time of such dispossession or discontinuance of possession," for they are not applicable to the rent, but to land only; and, therefore, unless we give to the words "at the last time at which such rent was so received," their plain and direct meaning, we must read them as if they were "at the first time at which such rent being due has not been received," a meaning of which the words as they stand in the statute are not capable.

One of the arguments adduced to guide us to some such construction was that by adhering to the literal meaning of the words of the statute we should be obliged to hold that, if a lease for fifty years, rendering rent, was made, and no rent received for twenty years, all right to the rent for the remaining thirty years would be extinguished, and yet the right to have the land at the end of the fifty years would remain. But that is not so, for these sections do not apply to leases on which a conventional rent was reserved, as was held by the Court of Exchequer in Grant v. Ellis (3). The two main objections to the construction adopted by the court below are, first, that it requires the limitation of twenty years against a right of action or distress to begin, in the case of rent, from a time before the right to bring the action or distrain has accrued, which, it was argued, was something so anomalous and unreasonable that it raised a presumption against such being the real intention of the Act; and, secondly, that a person coming under disability between the time when the right of action is deemed to have first accrued, and the time when it actually did first accrue, would not be protected by the saving in s. 16.

G It may be convenient, with a view to these objections, to consider what was the law respecting limitations of claims to real property, particularly of rent, before the passing of the Act in question. Those limitations depended on the Limitation Act, 1540, and the Limitation Act, 1623. The latter statute limited the entry, and consequently ejectment, to twenty years after the right and title of entry accrued and limited formedons in descender, or remainder, or reversion, to twenty years after the title and cause of action first descended or fell. This statute had no application to distress, or to any action of rent, except the action of formedon. Real actions in general, and distress for rent, were limited at the time of the passing of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833, as far as they were subject to limitation by the Limitation Act, 1540. Sections 1, 2 and 3 of this Act limited the time for bringing writs of right on the seisin of an ancestor to sixty years, possessory actions on the seisin of the ancestors to fifty years, and all actions on the seisin of the demandant to thirty years, respectively; each of these terms began from the time of the seisin of the ancestors or the demandant, and not from the time of the first accruing of the action; and in case of rent, the seisin to maintain such an action must be actual seisin by receipt of rent: LITTLETON, ss. 235 and 465. So that under this statute the limitations for real actions for recovering any rent ran from the last receipt, and not from the accruing of the cause of action. By s. 4 of the Limitation Act, 1540, it is provided:

"that no person shall hereafter make any avowry or cognisance for any rent, suit, or service, and allege any seisin of any rent, suit, or service, in the same avowry or cognisance, in the possession of his or their ancestors, or predecessor, or predecessors, or in his own possession, or in the possession of any other, whose estate he shall pretend or claim to have above fifty years next before the making of the said avowry or cognisances."

By s. 6, if the avowant could not prove "the seisin within the time appointed, if the same seisin was traversed, he was barred; and it was by these sections only that the time for making the distress for rent, was limited down to the time of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833.

On these sections it was held, that they did not extend to a rent created by deed, or reserved on a gift in tail, as to which there was no term of limitation: Sir William Foster's case (4). It was also determined that these sections did not require seisin in fact, but would be satisfied by seisin in law which, before the statute, was sufficient to enable the person so seised to distrain, although not to maintain an assize; for which seisin, in fact, by payment, was necessary. But whether the seisin was one, in fact, as by payment of rent, or in law, as by attornment, or by actual seisin of some other service than the rent, as fealty, or by the acquisition of an estate which authorised a distress without attornment, as by devise, the time of limitation ran not from the accruing of the right to distrain, but from the time of the seisin in fact or in law, which time might be before the right to distrain accrued: Bevil's Case (5); LITTLETON, ss. 565 and 585; and see the Administration of Justice Act, 1705, ss. 9 and 10 [repealed by Law of Property Act, 1925].

It may also be remarked, that in appointing the seisin as the point at which the limitation should begin, the Limitation Act, 1540, follows the still older Statute of Limitations, the Statute of Merton, 1235 (20 Hen. 3, c. 8), and the Statute of Westminster, 1275 (3 Edw. 1, c. 29), fixing the limitation from the time of seisin in real actions, and that of the second Statute of Westminster, 1285 (13 Edw. 1, c. 2), limiting the time for the distress for service in like manner. The present Act, therefore, in directing the limitation to run from the time before the right accrued, would not be adopting any new principle, but would be conformable to the law which prevailed from the time of Henry 3, until the present. The form, indeed, in which this intention is expressed, is somewhat strange and paradoxical, in directing a right of action to be deemed to have first accrued, when none has accrued at all. But the words of the Act are certainly capable of this sense, which is, indeed, the most obvious one; and a similar arbitrary use of language is not without example in recent legislation; and the substance and effect of the provision in pointing out the time from which the limitation is to run, is nothing more than might be expected, by looking to the law as it had long existed, and precedents of legislation on the subject.

There does not, therefore, seem to be in this respect such a contradiction between the probable intent of the legislature and the construction of the words of the Act adopted by the Court of Exchequer as makes it necessary to have recourse to a forced construction to reconcile the words and the intent. The inconvenience of a person coming under disability after the receipt of rent and before the right of action accrued was strongly pressed, and is indeed more substantial. However, it is to be observed that the legislature, in passing this Act, has, in much more important instances, left the right of persons under disability unprotected, inasmuch as s. 42, which bars the recovery of arrears after six years, has no proviso, in favour of such persons. The circumstance, therefore, of their not being perfectly protected by s. 16 does not afford a ground for presuming against a construction which involves that consequence.

We do not think it necessary to review some other arguments and possible cases which were put at the Bar, nor to pursue the reasoning on them which will be found in the report of this case in 16 M. & W. 547. We proceed on the words of ss. 2 and

A 3 of the statute which are plain, and to which we do not feel ourselves justified in giving any other meaning than that which was given to them by the court below. The judgment, therefore, must be affirmed.

Appeal dismissed.

Mandamus will not lie to command an impossible thing, even though the impossibility may have arisen from the laches of the respondents to the application for the writ. Accordingly, the fact that compulsory powers, vested in a railway company, to acquire land had expired was an answer to a mandamus to command the purchase of land necessary for constructing a branch line.

Demurrer to the return to a writ of mandamus commanding the defendants, the London and North Western Rail. Co., to purchase the lands necessary for making one of their branch railways, and to make and complete the same, alleging a demand on June 18, 1849. The return thereto set forth (among other things) that by the special Act of Parliament authorising the construction of the line in question, the defendants' compulsory powers for taking land, had expired before the day on which the writ was tested, namely on July 27, 1849. The Crown demurred to the return. D E

Knowles for the Crown.

Sir Fitzroy Kelly for the defendants.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 7, 1851. LORD CAMPBELL, C.J., delivered the following judgment of the court.—We are of opinion that the defendants are entitled to our judgment. The objection that the powers of the defendant company for the compulsory purchase of land had expired before the writ of mandamus issued, or was applied for, seems to us to be clearly decisive. We are not called on, therefore, to decide the more doubtful questions whether there lay on the defendant company an obligation to make and complete the road, which might have been enforced by mandamus, or whether the return sufficiently shows a want of funds for that purpose; or how far this want of funds would be an answer. F G

This writ of mandamus, which is tested April 22, 1850, commands the company immediately to purchase the lands necessary for making, constructing, executing, and completing the Birtle Branch railway, and extension thereof, and to make, construct, and complete the same Birtle Branch railway, and extension thereof, in pursuance of the powers and authorities contained in the recited Act of Parliament. This special Act (9 & 10 Vict., c. cclxii) which received the royal assent on July 27, 1846, enacts, by s. 18, H

“that the powers of the company for the compulsory purchase of land for the purposes of this Act, shall not be exercised after the expiration of three years from the passing of this Act”;

and, by s. 20, that the I

“works hereby authorised shall be completed within five years from the passing of this Act and, on the expiration of such period.”

the powers granted to the company for executing the same shall cease to be exercised except as to so much of the same respectively as shall have been completed. The power effectually to obey the command in the writ having expired in July,

A 1849, ought we, in the Queen's name, to have given that command in April, 1850? On full consideration, we think not.

A writ of mandamus supposes the required act to be possible and to be obligatory, when the writ issues. Generally speaking, the writ suggests acts showing the obligation and the possibility of fulfilling it and a return pursuing the suggestion and traversing it is good: R. v. Essex Sewers Comrs. (1); R. v. Round (2); R. v. Williams (3); R. v. Penrice (4). The supposed obligation here is founded on public Acts of Parliament, which are cited in the return and of which we are bound to take judicial notice. If they show that the company have no longer the power to do the act commanded, the writ is bad. What power have the defendants now to purchase the lands necessary for making a line of railway of several miles in length? On the return to a peremptory mandamus going as is prayed, no excuse can afterwards be made and the defendants must implicitly and fully obey it and abide any penalty attached to it. Supposing that they were bound to pay any price which might be demanded, however exorbitant, can it be reasonable and would it be supposed that all the landowners along the line would willingly sell at any price and that none of them are under disability to sell?

Counsel for the Crown contended that the return should have shown an application to all the landowners and a refusal by them; but such a return and the issues arising from it, would be highly inconvenient; and if all had promised to sell without a binding contract having been entered into, they might afterwards have changed their minds, and the defendants might be subject to perpetual imprisonment for not doing what the law forbade them to do. It was then said that they had violated the Acts of Parliament by not duly completing the whole of the railway and that they ought not to be allowed to make objection which amounts to taking advantage of their own wrong. However, assuming that they were under the obligation contended for and that they are liable to be punished by indictment for a breach of it, how can we say that the remedy now is to command them to do what they have no longer the power to do, however obedient they may be inclined to be?

Reliance was very properly placed on R. v. Birmingham and Gloucester Rail. Co. (5), which, at first sight, seems an authority in favour of the mandamus; but, when properly explained, it will be found, on this point, to be entitled to little weight. The great struggle there was whether a turnpike road, when restored, must be made as wide as it formerly was. There the notice to do the act had been given as nearly as possible to the time of the act to be done, namely, to restore the turnpike road to its former width which apparently required no purchase of land either voluntary or compulsory. In the present case the prosecutors were guilty of laches by giving no notice to do the act until the power of doing it was nearly expired and not applying for a mandamus until a considerable time after the power expired. In the former case the company might reasonably have been expected to be able to do the act without powers for compulsory purchase, but in the present case this is a mere impossibility. We, therefore, think, as much on principle as authority, our judgment must be for the defendants.

Judgment for defendants.

Rule Nisi obtained by the plaintiff to rescind an order of WILLIAMS, J., made on the application of the personal representative of the defendant, setting aside a judgment signed by the plaintiff, and execution upon it.

The ground of the order was that the defendant had died about half-past nine in the morning of May 28, and the judgment had been marked the same day, immediately after the office opened, or about a quarter-past eleven.

I

Lush, Q.C., for the defendant, showed cause against the rule.

Malcolm for the plaintiff, supported the rule.

POLLOCK, C.B.—It appears that the defendant in this case died about half-past nine on the morning of May 28, before the judgment office was opened. As soon, however, as the office opened, the plaintiff signed judgment. WILLIAMS, J., made an order setting aside the judgment; and on the application of counsel for the

A plaintiff we granted a rule to show cause why that order should not be rescinded. Counsel showing cause against the rule contends that the judgment was improperly signed, the defendant being dead at the time.

All the authorities on the subject are collected in R. v. Edwards (1), and the decision of this court, which was afterwards confirmed in the Exchequer Chamber, lays down the rule on which this case must be decided. In that case the question B was whether a fraction of a day could be considered with reference to the time of issuing an extent and an adjudication in bankruptcy. This court held (MARTIN, B., dissenting) that the right of the Crown must prevail, and that an act of the Crown must prevail, although posterior in point of time to an act done by a subject in an earlier period of the day. That decision was confirmed by the unanimous judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber; but in the judgment which was delivered by C COLERIDGE, J., the maxim is not based on the ground that the right of the Crown should prevail, but on the broad principle that, whether between the Crown and the subject, or between subject and subject, judicial acts must be considered to have taken place at the earliest possible period of the day on which they are done, and take precedence of all other acts which may occur on the same day, though they may precede it in point of time marked by hours and minutes. It was admitted in D that case that the court will inquire at what time a party did a particular act, and take notice of the hour of the day; but the rule is laid down otherwise as regards judicial proceedings. Shelley's Case (2) is there cited, where a recovery suffered on the first day of the term was held good, although the party had died that morning before the court sat.

I consider R. v. Edwards (1) is a direct authority which binds us, and it decides E that when a judicial proceeding takes place it must be considered to have occurred at the earliest period of the day. As the signing the judgment in this case was a judicial act, it must be considered to have been done at the earliest period of the day; and, therefore, the death of the party before the office was opened does not invalidate the judgment. Under the old system, a judgment, if signed in term, was dated from the first day of term, and if signed out of term, from the first day of the F preceding term, and in such a case the death of the party before the judgment was actually signed would not affect it. The Statute of Frauds altered the law in this respect, to prevent lands which had been sold being retrospectively effected by a judgment which had no existence when the sale took place. The Statute of Frauds provides that a judgment shall operate only from the day on which it was signed, and provides that the day on which it is signed shall be marked; but it makes no G distinction between the hours of the same day.

In Chick v. Smith (3), a fi. fa., issued after the death of the party, was set aside, and we are informed that it was on the authority of that case, WILLIAMS, J., made the order now in question. It is suggested such a decision is more consistent with common sense. It is, of course, desirable that the decision of the court should be as consistent as possible with plain common sense; but it is impossible for us to H overrule what is the established practice, and what must be taken to be the law of the land as affecting the right of suitors; if the plaintiff satisfies us that by the practice of the courts a judicial act is considered as being done at the earliest moment, and is not affected by anything done in the course of the same day, it is the right of the suitor that we should decide in accordance with the established practice. It may be said that our decision is founded on what is called a fiction, I but the effect of it is to prevent and render unnecessary inquiries as to the exact moment of time at which acts occurred, which would very often be extremely difficult or impossible. The rule is now clear that judicial proceeding shall take precedence, and shall not be defeated by any mere act of the party. It appears to me that this rule must be made absolute, on the ground that the judgment was well signed, the defendant having been alive on the day on which it was signed.

MARTIN, B.—I am of the same opinion. When the rule was moved for, I thought the case was clearly governed by R. v. Edwards (1).

BRAMWELL, B.—I am of the same opinion. That case must decide; the only principle, however, on which the rule can be supported is, that we must give judicial acts precedence. A WATSON, B., concurred.

Rule absolute.

Lien—Repairer's lien—Costs of repair unpaid—Retention of chattel repaired—Right of repairer to expenses of detention.

No person who, having a lien on a chattel, chooses to keep it for the purpose of enforcing his lien can make any claim against the proprietor of the chattel for the expenses of its detention. The respondents, who were shipowners, sent a ship to the appellants, a firm of shipwrights and dock owners, to be repaired on the terms of paying a certain rate for materials used and from 120 to 150 guineas for the cost of the graving dock for the job. When the ship was repaired the respondents delayed to pay the cost, and the appellants sent notice that they would claim £21 per day for the use of the dock until the money was paid and the ship removed. In an action by the respondents to recover the sum of £567, being the dock charges after the repairs were completed, E

Held: no person had a right to add to his lien on a chattel a charge for keeping it until the debt was paid, and, therefore, the appellants had no right at common law, nor was it a term to be implied in the contract, to be paid a sum per day while the ship was detained by them until the price of repairs was paid. Appeal by the defendants, Somes Bros., from a decision of the Court of Exchequer Chamber (SIR ALEXANDER COCKBURN, C.J., WILLIAMS and CROWDER, JJ., BRAMWELL, WATSON and CHANNELL, BB.), reported E.B. & E. 367, affirming a decision of the Court of Queen's Bench (LORD CAMPBELL, C.J., WIGHTMAN, ERLE and CROMPTON, JJ.), reported E.B. & E. 353, on a Special Case stated by order of

A ERLE, J., in an action for money had and received in which the plaintiffs, the British Empire Shipping Co., claimed to recover back the sum of £567 paid under protest, and which action except as to that item was referred to arbitration.

The respondents, the British Empire Shipping Co., being the owners of the ship British Empire, negotiated with the appellants, Somes Bros., who were shipwrights, having a dock and shipyard at Blackwall, for the repair of the ship.

B In answer to the inquiries of the respondents the appellants stated the several prices that would be charged for the materials employed in the repair of the ship, and that the cost of the use of their graving dock for the job would be from 120 to 150 guineas. The respondents on Sept. 1, 1856, sent the ship to be repaired on the terms stated by the appellants, who accordingly took the ship into their dock, and by the orders of the company executed extensive repairs of the ship.

C The repairs were complete, and the ship would have been ready to go out of dock in the early part of November, 1856, but the respondents were not then ready to pay the appellants' charges for the repairs. The respondents offered to give the appellants bills of exchange for their charges for the repairs, which offer was declined, and with a view to enabling the respondents to propose some other way of payment, they requested the appellants to send them a proximate account of what would be coming due to the appellants, including a charge for the hire of the dock, which account was sent.

Some negotiation then took place with reference to the payment of the appellants' charges, in the course of which the appellants informed the respondents that they should expect the amount of their charges to be either paid in cash or secured by a mortgage of the ship before the ship left their dock. The respondents, not having

E made any arrangements for paying the appellants' charges, and not having granted the mortgage, the appellants on Nov. 25, 1856, gave notice to the respondents that they should charge them £21 a day for the hire of the dock. It was admitted that this sum was a reasonable charge, but if too much, it might be reduced by the arbitrator. The respondents then proposed to refer the amount of the charges to arbitration. Such proposal the appellants declined, and the respondents promised to grant a mortgage, but did not do so. They also promised to pay the charges of the appellants in cash, which was not done.

On Dec. 18, 1856, Cotterill & Sons, the respondents' solicitors, sent the following letter to the appellants:

G "Gentlemen,—On behalf of the British Empire Shipping Co. (Ltd.), we hereby give you notice with reference to your claim for repairs done upon and to the ship British Empire, and your refusal to deliver up the said ship, that we, on behalf of the said company, are prepared to pay you whatever sum you demand under protest, and for the sole purpose of obtaining delivery and possession of the said ship, and that the said company will take such steps as they may be advised to recover re-payment of such sum as may be so paid or any part thereof, as also such damages as the said company may have sustained or may hereafter sustain by reason of your retention of, and refusal to deliver up, the said ship. Awaiting to hear from you when you will be prepared to deliver up the said ship and the amount you claim. We are, etc.

COTTERILL & SONS."

The same day the following reply was sent:

I "Dear Sirs,—In reference to your note this day delivered to my clients, Messrs. Somes, I beg to reiterate to you that they have been always willing and ready to deliver up the vessel upon payment of their just demand, and they have afforded you every opportunity for settlement in their power. The full amount of their claim being partially dependent upon the period the ship may remain in the dock, their account requires of course to be made up accordingly. I understand that the tides will not suit for undocking this large vessel before Wednesday next, and you shall be furnished tomorrow with the total amount which will be claimed as due to that time, including the charge for undocking, etc., and to ensure due preparations being made for that day, in case the tide will suit, it will be expedient for your clients to pay the amount not later than Monday next.—I am, etc.,

EDW. SAXTON."

On Dec. 19 a complete account of the charges was sent, amounting to £8,816 15s. 2d. In this account were contained the following charges :

"Hire of dry dock	£150	0	0

The respondents, on Dec. 22 paid the sum of £8,816 15s. 2d. comprising these items, and the ship was taken out of the appellants' dock on Dec. 24.

The present action was brought by the respondents for money had and received, to recover back so much of the sum of £8,816 15s. 2d., as was in excess of the sum for which the appellants, Somes Bros., had a right to detain the ship; the respondents contending that the appellants' charge for the work was excessive, and that they had no right to detain the ship for anything but what was really due on a quantum meruit for work, labour, and materials. By order of ERLE, J., a Case was stated as to the allowance or disallowance of the item of £567, claimed in the account for the occupation of the dock from Nov. 27 to Dec. 24, during which period the ship was detained under the appellants' claim of lien. The respondents contended that the appellants had no right to detain the ship for any expense incurred or inconvenience sustained by the appellants when enforcing their lien in the circumstances described, and that what was paid in respect of this item to obtain possession of the ship was money extorted from them by the appellants. They further contended that even if the appellants were entitled to detain the ship for something in respect of this item £21 a day was excessive in amount. Nevertheless, for the purpose of this Case, and for such purpose only, it was to be assumed that the sum of £21 per day was a reasonable charge. The question for the opinion of the court was whether the appellants were entitled to retain the sum paid to them in respect of this item of £567 on the above assumption.

The Court of Queen's Bench was of opinion that the appellants were not entitled to retain the sum of £524 9s. 6d. The Court of Exchequer Chamber affirmed this judgment. The appellants appealed.

M. Smith, Q.C., and T. Jones for the appellants.

Bovill, Q.C., and Honyman for the respondents.

LORD CRANWORTH, stated the facts, as set out above, and continued: The question in this case is whether, on the whole of the correspondence and that which took place before the repairs were completed as well as that which took place afterwards, it is a fair inference that there was a contract on the part of the respondents to pay a reasonable sum for the use of the dock, provided the ship was left there after the repairs were completed. It was admitted that although, where goods are delivered to have any work done on them—and of course, among other things, a ship to have great repairs done on it—the person doing those repairs has a lien on the goods for the amount of the sum charged, yet that is confined to a lien for the amount of the sum charged, and the party doing the repairs cannot say, "I will add to this lien a charge for the use of my dock while I am keeping the goods (in this case the ship) not for your benefit, but for my own." If not admitted it must be taken to be now decided that, at common law, there is no right to such a demand, and the question to be considered is this: Aye or no, do the letters which are in evidence, and which constitute part of the case, show that there was a special contract to give such a lien? That is attempted to be deduced mainly from the first letter to which I have referred, which gives a sort of rough estimate, and states that the cost of use of the graving dock for the job will be from 120 guineas to 150 guineas; and further from the letter subsequently written on Nov. 25, after the repairs had been done, in which the appellants, the persons who had done the repairs, state: "We also give you notice that we shall charge the owners of the ship £21, per diem for the hire of our dry dock from the time our account was

A delivered." However, they modify that afterwards; they do not charge it from the time the account was delivered, but charge it from the time when this notice had been given.

It is admitted this sum would not have been an unreasonable sum if it was a matter in respect of which such a lien could be claimed; but first the Court of Queen's Bench unanimously, and afterwards the Court of Exchequer Chamber B unanimously, held that there was no such contract to be inferred from anything that had passed between the parties. Those courts gave, however, no opinion as to what would have been the right of the appellants if they had claimed no lien, but had said to the respondents when the repairs were completed, "Your ship is fit to be taken away; it incumbers our dock and you must take it away," but had left it an unreasonable time, namely, twenty-seven days occupying the dock. Neither C court has expressed an opinion as to whether there might not have been, by natural inference, an obligation on the part of the owners to pay a reasonable sum for the use of the dock for the time that she was so improperly left there. However, the question is only this, whether the appellants, retaining the ship, not for the benefit of owners but for their own benefit, in order the better to enforce the payment of their demand, could then say, "We will add our demand for the use of the dock D during that time to our lien for the repairs." The Courts of Queen's Bench and Exchequer Chamber held, and I humbly submit to your Lordships perfectly correctly held, that they had no such right.

Then, a point has been raised here which I think was also raised in the courts below, although it does not appear in the report of the judgment, that even supposing the appellants had no right to add to their lien this extra sum of £567 E for the use of their dock, it is yet to be questioned whether it was correct on the part of the respondents to say: "What is the whole amount of your demand? £8,816 odd. Well, we pay it to you, but remember, whatever portion of your demand you are wrongfully taking we shall seek to recover back again;" and whether, when there was an improper claim made, they ought not themselves to have found what was the right sum, and to have tendered that in order to make the appellants (as it F was called in the argument) wrongdoers. In my opinion, the appellants must, for this purpose, be considered wrongdoers from the very moment when they said, "We will not give you up your ship till you pay something ultra that which you are bound to pay." It does not lie in their mouths to say that it was wrong on the part of the shipowners to pay a sum demanded by the appellants, but which they had no right to demand. It is impossible to contend that any such argument can G lie in their mouths. Therefore, whether this point was argued below or not is immaterial—it does not seem to me to vary the case. I shall, therefore, move that the judgment of the court below be affirmed.

LORD WENSLEYDALE.—I am entirely of the same opinion. Two principal points have been made in this case. The first is, whether, if a person who has a H lien on any chattel choose to keep it for the purpose of enforcing his lien, he can make any claim against the proprietor of that chattel for so keeping it. No authority can be found for such a proposition, and I am clearly of opinion that no person has by law a right to add to his lien on a chattel a charge for keeping it till the debt is paid; that is, in truth, keeping it for his own benefit, not for the benefit of the person whose chattel is in his possession. That was the opinion of all the I judges of the Courts of Queen's Bench and Exchequer Chamber, and I think their opinion is perfectly right.

The second point which has been made is, that from the circumstances of this case, there is a contract to pay not merely for the completion of the ship, not merely for the repairing job, but a contract to pay for the hire of the dock for so long a time as the vessel should be there. We are at liberty to draw such inferences as we think ought to be drawn from the facts, and I am clearly of opinion that no such inference can be drawn in this case. The only foundation for it is, that after the appellants sent their estimate for the necessary repairs of the ship, the respondents sent by their agent a request that they would give the particulars of what they would charge for each article; and they write to say : A

"Your calculations to repair the ship British Empire and Mr. Preston's letter dated 16th, have been duly laid before the directors, when the suggestion of Mr. Preston not to repair the ship by contract was duly considered. They now request me to ascertain at what price you would furnish the materials we should require to complete the repairs, viz., pitch, pine, yellow pine, American elm per cubic foot, oakum, pitch per cwt., iron work . . [and] graving dock charges when you can take her in depth of water next week." B

In answer to that inquiry a letter was written by the appellants, from which it is said there is to be implied a demand on their part and a consequent contract, for the hire of the dock independently of the charge for the repairing job for so long a time as the ship shall remain in the dock. I think it is perfectly clear that that letter can imply no such contract. The answer to that inquiry states in detail the price of American red elm, and so on, and then it concludes thus : "The cost of using the graving dock for the job will be from 120 to 150 guineas;" that is to say, "we cannot calculate precisely the length of time that it will require to use the dock for making the repairs, and, therefore, we make a sort of calculation, and the gross sum it will probably cost will be 120 to 150 guineas." There is no statement that the owners are to pay £21 a day for the time that the vessel should remain there; and it would be quite absurd that if a person employed another to repair a ship, he would be considered as undertaking to pay so much a day for whatever length of time may be consumed in making the repairs. There is nothing in any part of the correspondence that leads to that conclusion. I am, therefore, clearly of opinion that there is not made out here an agreement on the part of the respondents to pay the appellants the cost of the hire of the graving dock. C D E

Then it was objected that there was no particular time at which it can be said that the appellants were wrongdoers in refusing to deliver up the vessel. They send in their bill, including in their charges the sum of £567 for the time the vessel had actually been in the dock, and then objections were made to that charge. Then on behalf of the appellants a letter is written to the respondents on Dec. 13, 1856, in these terms : "The full amount of their claim" (that is, the claim for the job) being partially dependent upon the period the ship may remain in their dock (that is, without reference to the repairs), their account requires of course to be made up accordingly"; that is, the charge for whatever length of time the ship is in the dock. Then on the following day a letter is written, saying that they shall make the claim altogether of £8,816 15s. 2d.; that includes this claim of £567 for the use of the dock. Then the respondents say : F G

"We pay under protest and for the sole purpose of obtaining delivery and possession of the ship British Empire; and we hereby further give you notice that the company will take such steps as they may be advised to recover repayment of the said sum of £8,816 15s. 2d., or any part thereof, as also such damages as the said company may have sustained, or may hereafter sustain, by reason of your refusal to deliver up the said ship." H

That sum was paid under protest, and it includes the sum of £567, to which the appellants had no right by common law, and no right by contract. Therefore, I am clearly of opinion that in this case they have made a demand which they had no right to make, for keeping possession of the ship till their charge for dock hire was paid. They have by these means obtained money which they had no right to obtain, and consequently an action for money had and received will lie. I

LORD CHELMSFORD.—I entirely agree in the opinions expressed by my noble and learned friends, and as they have gone so fully into the case, I think it quite unnecessary for me to add anything.

Appeal dismissed.

Fatal Accident—Damages—Measure—Expectation of pecuniary benefit from continuance of life.

Under the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846, damages are not to be given as a solatium or merely in respect of the loss of a legal right. They should be calculated with reference to the amount of a reasonable expectation of pecuniary benefit from the continuance of the life.

Rule Nisi obtained by the defendants to enter a nonsuit or for a new trial in an action brought by the plaintiff, as administrator of his son, under the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846 (Lord Campbell's Act), to recover compensation in consequence of his son having lost his life by the negligence of the defendants.

At the trial before BRAMWELL, B., it appeared that the plaintiff was a night porter at St. Thomas's Hospital, and one of his duties was to carry up coals to the different wards, for which he received 3s. 6d. a week, but in consequence of his age and infirmities he became unable to do this himself, and for a year and a half previous to his son's death the son had been in the habit of coming from time to time to do it for him, the 3s. 6d. per week being still paid to the plaintiff; there was also some evidence of the son having occasionally assisted the father with small presents. The judge left it to the jury to say whether the plaintiff had any reasonable expectation of benefit from the continuance of his son's life, and if so, to what extent. The jury were of opinion that he had, and, accordingly, returned a verdict for the plaintiff, with damages £75, and leave was reserved to the defendants to move to enter a nonsuit if the court should be of opinion that the action was not maintainable. The defendants obtained a rule nisi accordingly on the ground that the damages were excessive.

G. Francis for the plaintiff, showed cause against the rule.

Edwin James, Q.C. (Petersdorff with him), for the defendants, supported the rule.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 7, 1858. POLLOCK, C.B., delivered the following judgment of the court.—This was an application to enter a nonsuit, or for a new trial on the ground of excessive damages. The contention of the defendants was, that they were not liable for any damage, except legal pecuniary damage; and that, if the defendants were liable, the damages were excessive. The plaintiff, as administrator of his son, sued under the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846, and he claimed that in consequence of the negligence of the defendants his son's death had been caused; and the question was whether he was entitled to maintain the action, it being contended that it was necessary that the plaintiff should show a legal damage, and that on the evidence he had not shown any.

The statute does not in terms say on what principle the action given is to be maintainable, nor on what principle the damages are to be assessed; and the only way to ascertain what the principle is to be referred to, or to which we are to give effect, is to show what it does not mean for the purpose of ascertaining what it does mean. It is clear that the damages must be shown, for the jury are to give such damages as they think proportionate to the injury. It has been held that these damages are not to be given as a solatium, but are to be given in reference to pecuniary loss: see Blake v. Midland Rail. Co. (1). It is also clear that the damages are not to be given merely in reference to the loss of a legal right, where they are to be distributed between relations only, and not to all individuals sustaining such a loss; and, accordingly, the practice has been, not to ascertain what benefit could have been enforced by the claimants had the deceased lived, and give damage limited thereby. If, then, the damages are not to be calculated on either of these principles, nothing remains except that they should be calculated in reference to a reasonable expectation of pecuniary benefit, either of a right or otherwise, from the continuance of the life.

No doubt the manner in which the action has been held sustainable with reference to a wife or children, where the husband or the father might undoubtedly have exercised considerable judgment as to what he would do, and where he was under no legal obligation of doing it, for which the jury have undoubtedly, with the full sanction of all the courts, given liberal compensation. Whether the plaintiff had any such reasonable expectation of benefit from the continuance of his son's life, and, if so, to what extent, were the questions left in this case to the jury. The proper question then was left, if there was any evidence in support of the affirmative of it, and we think that there was. The plaintiff was old and infirm; the son was young, earning good wages, and apparently well disposed to assist his father, as, in fact, he had so assisted him to the extent of 3s. 6d. a week. We do not see that it is necessary that actual benefit should have been derived; reasonable expectation is enough, and such reasonable expectation might well exist, though when, the father not being actually in need, the son had never done anything for him. On the other hand, the jury ought not to make a mere guess in the matter, but ought to be reasonably satisfied that there has been a loss of a reasonable expectation of a sensible and pecuniary benefit.

We think, therefore, the action is maintainable; but it appearing to us that the damages are excessive, we think that there ought to be a new trial.

Rule absolute for new trial.

UPTON v. TOWNEND

[COURT OF COMMON PLEAS (Jervis, C.J., Williams, Crowder and Willes, JJ.), November 8, 9, 1855]

Landlord and Tenant—Eviction—Act done by landlord with intention of depriving tenant of enjoyment of demised premises—Re-building of premises—Tenant deprived of part.

Although the word "eviction" was at one time used to denote an expulsion from property by the assertion of a title paramount or by process of law, the term is now applied to every class of expulsion, and may be taken to mean, not a mere trespass and nothing more, but something of a grave and permanent character done by the landlord with the intention of depriving the tenant of the enjoyment of the demised premises. The question whether or not there has been an eviction, therefore, depends on the circumstances of the case and is a question of fact.

D

The tenant of premises, which he had sublet, concurred with the landlord in their being re-built after a fire in such a way that the sub-tenant was deprived of part of the land sub-demised to him.

Held: the tenant had done an act of a permanent character, without the assent of the sub-tenant, which showed an intention to oust him from the demised premises; accordingly, he must be taken to have evicted the sub-tenant and a claim by him for subsequent rent failed.

Declaration for money payable for use and occupation of premises and on accounts stated. The defendant pleaded as to £72 10s., payment into court, and, as to the residue, a denial of the debt. The plaintiff accepted payment in satisfaction pro tanto, and joined issue as to the residue. D

The action was tried on Dec. 13, 1854, at Guildhall, before JERVIS, C.J., when a verdict was found for plaintiff for damages, £72 10s., subject to a Case stated for the opinion of the court whether the plaintiff was entitled to recover the further sum of £72 10s. or any part of it.

On Dec. 1, 1836, the Goldsmiths' Company being seised in fee of the tenements hereinafter mentioned, by indenture demised to the plaintiff for twenty-one years from Mar. 25, 1836, the house and premises No. 5, Bread Street, London, subject to the annual rent of £270 12s. 6d., payable quarterly on the usual days, and to payments to the company on Mar. 25 each year of certain money for fire insurance. The company covenanted to keep in force insurance to the amount of £2,500 against loss or damage by fire, and that, in the event of such loss or damage, the sums payable in respect thereof under the insurance, were to be applied towards rebuilding and repairing. On May 30, 1846, the plaintiff demised to the defendant for seven years from Mar. 25, 1846, all those warehouses, etc., on the ground-floor and basement of No. 5, Bread Street, at a rent of £230, payable quarterly. On April 18, 1849, by a memorandum in writing subscribed by the plaintiff and the defendant, the plaintiff agreed to let to the defendant the first-floor front warehouse or room of No. 5 for three years from Lady Day, 1849, and so on for so long as both parties should agree, at a rent of £60 payable quarterly, and at the expiration of the lease already granted to the defendant of the ground-floor and basement warehouses, to grant a lease of the first-floor front room for such term as plaintiff had agreed to do by the lease dated May 30, 1846, at the rent of £60 per annum. On Sept. 25, 1852, the defendant, by notice in writing, required the plaintiff to execute to the defendant, on or before Mar. 25 then next, a new lease of the premises demised by indenture of May 30, 1846. After the expiration of the term granted by the lease of May 30, 1846, the defendant continued in possession of the premises thereby demised, and of the premises agreed to be let by the memorandum of April 18, 1849, and the defendant continued to pay and the plaintiff to accept rent for the two sets of premises. At the time of the fire hereinafter mentioned, the plaintiff was the tenant from the Goldsmiths' Company, of the house No. 4½, Bread Street, adjoining No. 5, under a demise made to one Francis Nalder, of date June 14, 1849, for a term unexpired at the time of the fire. E F G H I

On Dec. 31, 1853, No. 5 and the adjoining building No. 4½ were wholly consumed by fire with the exception of the larger portion of the party-wall separating No. 4½ and the premises occupied by the defendant. The Goldsmiths' Company signified their intention to rebuild, the rebuilding was proceeded with, and it was completed in December, 1854. On May 4, 1854, by an agreement made between Philip Hardwick, the architect for the company, and the plaintiff, Hardwick agreed that as soon as the building should be completed, the company would demise to the plaintiff all that plot of ground situate on the western side of Bread Street, as described in the plan attached to the agreement, together with the messuage and premises intended to be built thereon as thereafter mentioned for 24 years from Lady Day, 1854, at the yearly rent of £270 12s. 6d. for the first three years, and the yearly rent of £500 for the residue of the term. Hardwick further agreed within the first year of the term to erect two warehouses according to the plans and specifications signed by him and the plaintiff. The plot of ground mentioned in the agreement comprised the ground formerly covered by Nos. 4½ and 5 Bread Street. After that agreement, and before June 24, 1854, Hardwick pulled down what remained of the party-wall which divided No. 4½ from the premises occupied by the defendant, and built on the sites formerly occupied by Nos. 4½ and 5, the two new warehouses. On May 4, 1854, the plaintiff surrendered to the company all the premises described by the indenture of Dec. 1, 1836, and on Oct. 19, 1854, the company demised to the plaintiff for twenty-four years from Mar. 25, 1854, at a rent of £270 12s. 6d., for the first three years of the term, and £500 for the remaining twenty-one years, the two new warehouses. The defendant never authorised or consented to the plan signed by the plaintiff and Hardwick, which in fact resulted in his being deprived of part of the premises demised to him, or the agreement of May 4, 1854, or the lease of Oct. 19, 1854, and had not since the fire occupied any part of the premises held by him under the lease of May 30, 1846 and agreement of April 18, 1849. On June 7, 1854, his attorney wrote to the plaintiff protesting that the new premises would be altogether different from those leased by him to the defendant, and threatening legal proceedings. The defendant had not paid any rent except the sum of £72 10s. paid into court and considered as satisfying the quarterly payments due on Mar. 25, 1854.

On May 23, 1854, the plaintiff entered into an agreement by which he agreed to let the two new warehouses—the new No. 5 Bread Street—to T. and M. Hutchinson & Spiller for three years from Sept. 29, 1854, at a rent of £530.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 9, 1855. JERVIS, C.J.—I am of opinion that there must be judgment for the defendant. The view the court takes of the question of eviction renders it unnecessary to express any opinion as to the effect of the surrender, or upon the other matters which have been suggested in the course of the arguments. The simple question, then, is whether there was an eviction by Upton of Townend, the tenant, from a part of the premises demised, before June 24, 1854, so as to operate a suspension of the rent. It is not denied that an eviction of the tenant from a part of the demised premises is for the present purpose the same as an eviction from the whole. In dealing with the question whether there has in this case been an eviction in fact, and whether the plaintiff was a party to it, we are by the concession of the parties put in the position of a jury, and are at liberty to draw such inferences of fact from the circumstances stated as a jury would be warranted in drawing.

It is extremely difficult at the present day to define with technical accuracy what is an eviction. Latterly, the word has been used to denote that which formerly it was not intended to express. In the language of pleading the party evicted was said to be expelled, amoved, and put out. The word eviction—from evincere, to evict, to dispossess by a judicial course—was formerly used to denote an expulsion by the assertion of a title paramount and by process of law. But that sort of eviction is not necessary to constitute a suspension of the rent, because it is now well settled, that, if the tenant loses the benefit of the enjoyment of any portion of the demised premises, by the act of the landlord, the rent is thereby suspended. The term

"eviction" is now popularly applied to every class of expulsion or amotion. Getting rid thus of the old notion of eviction, I think it may now be taken to mean this—not a mere trespass and nothing more, but something of a grave and permanent character done by the landlord with the intention of depriving the tenant of the enjoyment of the demised premises. If that may in law amount to an eviction, the jury would very naturally cut the knot by finding whether or not the act done by the landlord is of that character and done with that intention.

Smith v. Raleigh (1), in its circumstances, approaches very nearly to the present case. There the tenant railed off a portion of the garden which had been demised with the house at one entire rent for the purpose of erecting a building for the accommodation of his other tenants, and it was held to amount to an eviction. There, as here it has been suggested, the tenant might have taken down the railing, and rased the building—treating the landlord's act as a mere trespass. But, inasmuch as it was done with the intention of permanently depriving the tenant of the enjoyment of a portion of the subject-matter of the demise, and the rent issuing out of the whole, the entire rent was suspended by the landlord's act of withdrawing a portion from the tenant's occupation. So, Hunt v. Cope (2), where the question arose upon the form of pleading, shows to a certain extent that, if the facts there relied on had been pleaded in a technical form as an eviction, it would have gone to the jury, and they would have said whether or not the circumstances did amount to an eviction. The question, therefore, of eviction or no eviction depends upon the circumstances, and is in all cases to be decided by the jury.

Sitting here with the power to draw inferences as a jury would, I can entertain no doubt in the present case. The defendant has, it is suggested, less commodious premises than he had before. Be it so: the landlord had no right to give him a less space than he had before. The tenant might very well say: "I am entitled to have the thing which was originally demised to me, neither more nor less; and, as you have deprived me of that, I am exonerated from my tenancy." In his case, therefore, there can be no question that there has been an ouster in fact from a portion of the thing demised.

The only remaining question is whether the plaintiff has by his conduct made himself a party to that which in point of fact amounts to an eviction and that, I think, admits of no doubt. It appears from the Case that the Goldsmiths' Company had entered into a covenant with the plaintiff to let to him certain premises which comprised those which were subsequently underlet to the defendant, and also covenanted to insure the premises in a certain sum, and to re-build them in the event of their destruction by fire. As between the plaintiff and the Goldsmiths' Company, therefore, the effect of the covenant was, to enable the plaintiff to compel the company to restore the buildings exactly as they stood before. We may assume that the parties—that is, the plaintiff and the company's representative—met for the purpose of ascertaining in what manner that should be done; that the matter was discussed between them; and that the plaintiff, the only person who could compel the company to restore the premises as they were, authorised them to deviate from the original plan. He must, therefore, be taken to have constituted the company his agents for the purpose of re-building in the form so agreed upon.

On May 23, 1854, the plaintiff entered into an agreement to let the new premises to Hutchinsons & Spiller. This clearly was an act of a permanent character done by the landlord without the assent of the tenant, showing an intention to oust him from the possession of the premises. As matter of fact, therefore, it seems to me that there is enough to satisfy us that there has been an eviction of the tenants, with the consent and procurement of the landlord so as to disentitle the latter to maintain this action, and, consequently, I am of opinion that our judgment must be for the defendant.

WILLIAMS, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. As to the last point, I agree with the observations of my Lord, and do not think it necessary to add anything. Assuming that the acts done by Mr. Hardwick, the architect of the Gold-

A smiths' Company are identical with the acts of the plaintiff, the question is narrowed to the inquiry whether those acts amount to an eviction of part of the demised premises, so as to operate a suspension of the rent. It appears to me that they do.

B Considering how frequently transactions of this sort are taking place, it is somewhat remarkable that so little is to be found in the books upon the subject of eviction. There clearly are some acts of interference by the landlord with the tenant's enjoyment of the premises which do not amount to an eviction, but which may be either mere acts of trespass or eviction according to the intention with which they are done. If those acts amount to a clear indication of intention on the landlord's part that the tenant shall no longer continue to hold the premises, they would constitute an eviction.

C We have been much pressed by counsel for the plaintiff, in the course of the argument, with a reference to the state of things at the time the acts here complained of were done, viz., that the premises had been burnt down, and were incapable of any beneficial occupation. But it must be borne in mind that it is the plaintiff who has to make out that he is entitled to maintain an action for use and occupation. There has been no actual occupation, and the question is whether D there has been an eviction with respect to the tenant's constructive occupation. In Hall v. Burgess (3), a tenant from year to year, at a rent payable half-yearly, without giving any notice to the landlord, quitted the premises at the expiration of the current year. Before the next half year expired the landlord let the premises to another tenant, who occupied the same. It was held, that the landlord was not entitled to recover rent from the first tenant from the expiration of the current E year, when he quitted the premises, to the time when the landlord re-let the same to the second tenant. HOLROYD, J., there says :

F "Before the [Distress for Rent Act, 1737], the landlord's remedy by action for his rent must have been upon the demise, and he could only recover according to it. The tenant's endeavour to give up the premises in this case was unavailing, and the possession was not altered until the subsequent letting by the landlord. That letting, therefore, was an eviction of the tenant, and, had this action for rent been brought upon the demise, the defendant might have pleaded the eviction as a bar."

G The same principle appears to have been decided by LORD ELLENBOROUGH in Burn v. Phelps (4). There the defendant, being tenant to the plaintiff of premises in Worcestershire, at £130 per annum, underlet the premises to Badger and several other under-tenants. During this tenancy and the under-tenancies the plaintiff gave notice to Badger and the other under-tenants to quit, and Badger in fact quitted. The premises occupied by him, worth £60 per annum, remained un-occupied for one year at the expiration of which the defendant again under-let them to another tenant and continued in possession of the whole by his under-tenants. H The defendant paid into court a sum which covered all the rent claimed except the £60, which he insisted was not due to the plaintiff. LORD ELLENBOROUGH expressed an opinion, that, under the circumstances the plaintiff was guilty of an eviction as to the premises occupied by Badger, at the least, and suggested that an eviction might have been pleaded to the whole demand.

I How can it be doubted that the acts done by the agent of the Goldsmiths' Company were acts of interference with the defendant's rights as a tenant, rendering it incompatible for him to hold according to the terms of his demise, and that those acts were done with the intention of no longer permitting the tenant to enjoy the premises as he was entitled to enjoy them? I feel no doubt whatever that the facts disclosed in this case do amount to what the law calls an eviction, and, consequently, that the plaintiff's right to sue for the rent is gone.

CROWDER, J.—I am of the same opinion. The question is whether the defendant has been evicted from part of the demised premises so as to disentitle the plaintiff to sue for the rent accruing between Mar. 25 and June 24. It seems that there is no very distinct definition of eviction in any of the books as employed with reference to acts done by a landlord towards his tenant. As to the acts of a stranger, it is very well defined. Eviction, properly so called, is a wrongful act by the landlord, which operates the expulsion or amotion of the tenant from the land. The question here is whether there has been an eviction as it is popularly called, a putting out or depriving the tenant of the subject-matter of the demise.

The nearest case which I have heard cited is Smith v. Raleigh (1). The act there complained of doubtless was an act of trespass—and indeed every entry by a landlord upon the possession of his tenant must include a trespass—but LORD ELLENBOROUGH considered it to amount to an eviction. It seems to me that there is in the present case strong evidence of that species of eviction. The fallacy of the argument of counsel for the plaintiff was that he rested the conduct of the landlord entirely upon the assent given by him to the plan for re-building proposed to him by the architect of the Goldsmiths' Company. It is necessary, however, to look at all the circumstances. The Goldsmiths' Company were bound to re-build. The plaintiff had a right to have the premises restored in the same position in which they were before the fire. Having himself proposed a plan differing from the original structure, he afterwards assents to Mr. Hardwick's plan, and accepts a lease of the premises erected pursuant to it.

By the agreement of May 23, 1854, he actually let a portion of the premises to other persons, including a part of what had formerly composed the defendant's demise. That clearly was an act done by the landlord amounting to an expulsion or amotion of the tenant, and a preventing him from occupying the premises according to the demise. Although, therefore, I agree that it is not every act of trespass by a landlord that will amount to an eviction, I think that the defendant has been substantially and permanently deprived of the subject-matter of the demise so as to entitle him to say that he has not had the occupation of that to which he was entitled.

WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. There is nothing in the argument that the Goldsmiths' Company ought not to be considered as the agents of the plaintiff in doing the acts complained of. It is not necessary that the relation of principal and agent, in the sense of one commanding and the other obeying, should subsist in order to make one responsible for the tortious act of another; it is enough if it be shown to have been by his procurement and with his assent. The cases where the liability of one for the wrongful act of another has turned upon the relation of principal and agent are quite consistent with the party's liability irrespective of any such relation. If I agree with a builder to build me a house according to a certain plan, he would be an independent contractor and I should not be liable to strangers for any wrongful act unnecessarily done by him in the performance of his work, but clearly I would be jointly liable with him for a trespass on the land if it turned out that I had no right to build upon it.

Counsel for the plaintiff has likened eviction to a disseisin. Assuming that to be correct, I find it laid down in Co. Litt. 180, b, that,

"if A. disseise one to the use of B., who knoweth not of it, and B. assent to it, in this case till the agreement A. was tenant of the land, and after agreement B. is tenant of the land, but both of them be disseisors; for, omnis rati habitio retrotrahitur et mandato equiparatur. And it is worthy of the observation, and implied also in the latter 'etc.,' that, seeing coadjutors, counsellors, commanders, etc., are all disseisors, that, albeit the disseisor which is tenant dieth, yet the assise lieth against the coadjutor, counsellor, commander, etc., and the tenant of the land, though he be no disseisor."

Several cases are referred to in the note to Co. Litt. 181, a, as to trespassers by procurement.

Here, the circumstances, as to this point, are these. The Goldsmiths' Company were bound by covenant with the plaintiff to expend £2,500 in building up the premises as they were before the fire. Having that right, he proposed a plan—a

A totally different one. The architect of the company proposed another, departing still further from the original plan of the building. To that the plaintiff assented, signed the plan, and agreed to take a new lease of the premises when re-built according to that plan. It is clear, therefore, that the plaintiff counselled and procured the re-building according to that plan and is answerable for it.

If the plaintiff is liable for what has been done, does it amount to an eviction?

B I am of opinion that it does, as being an act of a permanent character done by the landlord in order to deprive, and which had the effect of depriving, the tenant of the use of the thing demised or of a part of it. I cannot agree with counsel for the plaintiff, that there must necessarily be a going upon the land, and an actual expulsion of the tenant from the possession. That part of his argument is not supported either by principle or by authority.

C Many cases are collected in VINER'S ABRIDGEMENT, Rent (I, a), which show that it is not necessary that there should be an actual bodily expulsion of the tenant from the land. Thus, in Cibel and Hills Case (5) (1 Leon. at p. 110):

"It was given in evidence [of an entry, etc., for the suspension of rent], that on the land demised was a brick-kiln and a small cottage, and that the lessor entered and went to the cottage and took some of the bricks, and untiled the cottage. But it was proved that the lessor had reserved the bricks and tiles, which in truth were there ready made at the time of the lease granted, and that he did not untile the brick-kiln house, but that it fell by tempest; and so the plaintiff did nothing, but came upon the land to carry away his own goods; and also he used the bricks and tiles on the reparation of the house. And, as to the extra tenet, which was parcel of the issue, the lessor did not continue upon the land, but went off from it, and relinquished the possession. But the court held, the continuing the possession or not was not material; for, if he once does anything amounting to an entry, though he departs presently, yet the possession is in him sufficient to suspend the rent, and he shall be said extra tenere the defendant, the lessee, till he has done an act amounting to a re-entry."

F In Co. LITT. 331, b., I find this incidentally laid down as to disseisins, in a passage cited from BRACON (lib. 4, fo. 238):

"Per hoc autem quod dicitur in brevi ultimæ præsentationis deforceant, videtur quibusdam quod querens innuat per hoc quod deforceans sit in seisinâ, sicut in brevi de recto, sed reverâ non est ita, sed satis deforceat qui possessorem uti seisina non permiserit omnino vel minus commode impediât præsentando, appellando, impertrando, secundum quod dicitur de disseisitore, satisfacit disseisina, qui uti non permisit possessorem vel minus commode licet omnino non expellat."

H It is not true, therefore, as suggested, that the older authorities required an actual expulsion to constitute disseisin. In the same book, 153, b., the distinction between a mere act of wrong and a dispossession is pointed out in the following terms:

"Omnis disseisina est transgressio, sed non omnis transgressio est disseisina. Si eo animo forte ingrediatur fundum alienum, non quod sibi usurpet teneamentum vel jura, non facit disseisinam, sed transgressionem, etc. Quærendum est à judice quo animo hoc fecerit, etc."

I An entry upon the land of another, and an expulsion of or a substantial interference with the enjoyment of the land by the tenant—as in the case of a diversion of the entire stream from a mill, or preventing a man from having access to his land, or entering his orchard and cutting down all the fruit trees—though the wrongdoer do not remain upon the land, appear to me to be equally cases of eviction, if the tenant in consequence ceases to occupy. This also appears to have constituted a disseisin, from Co. LITT. 161, a., where it is said:

"He that disturbs a man of the meane disseiseth him of the thing itself; as, the turning of the whole stream that runs to a mill, is a disseisin of the mill itself.

So it is if a man be disturbed to enter and manure his land, this is a disseisin of the land itself; for, qui adimit medium dirimit finem, and qui obstruit aditum destruit commodum."

Supposing that, as counsel for the plaintiff contends, the law of disseisin is analogous to that of eviction, the argument from analogy appears to be in favour of the defendants. What are the facts? Instead of the thing demised to the defendant, a wall was built upon part of the land; that wall is a permanent structure and excludes him from the occupation of the portion of the land upon which it stands, and he has not occupied the rest. All the conditions of eviction are, therefore, in his case fulfilled. It seems to me, therefore, that the defendant was, by an act of the landlord, which was intended to be and was of a permanent character, deprived of the perfect and convenient use of the thing demised. He was virtually expelled and amoved from the subject-matter of the demise, and that expulsion and amotion occurred before and continued until the rent now sought to be recovered would have become due. No rent, therefore, became payable. For these reasons, I agree with the rest of the court in thinking that the defendant is entitled to judgment.

Judgment for defendant.

UPTON v. GREENLEES

Landlord and Tenant—Eviction—Act done by landlord with intention of depriving tenant of enjoyment of demised premises—Land added to property let to tenant.

In this case, which was argued at the same time as Upton v. Townend, the plaintiff had let to Greenlees premises adjacent to those he had demised to Townend, and the removal of the wall had resulted in a piece of land being added to that let to Greenlees.

JERVIS, C.J.—In re-building the messuages, a portion has been added to what the tenant had before. But still the question arises: Is it the thing demised? The landlord has no right to impose upon his tenant a thing different from that which he undertook to let to him. It seems to me, therefore, that, though there is that distinction between the cases of Townend and Greenlees, the one is as much a deprivation of the enjoyment of the thing demised as the other. There clearly is evidence whence the court must infer that, by the act of somebody, the tenants have been deprived of the enjoyment of the premises demised to them respectively.

WILLIAMS, J., agreed.

CROWDER, J.—In the case of Greenlees the new building allots him a somewhat larger space than he had before, but still it is depriving him of the occupation of the thing demised.

WILLES, J.—In the case of Greenlees the same space that he had before was left open, but the wall has been removed four or five feet from the old boundary. He, therefore, could not use his premises without incurring the constant danger of committing a trespass on the land of another, and he was deprived of the protection and support of the boundary wall and hindered from restoring the place to the state in which he was entitled to enjoy it. And he has not in fact occupied any part of the land.

Further Consideration of a suit instituted by persons claiming as next-of-kin it having been established that they were next-of-kin and that the sum of £2,064 17s. 1d. was in the hands of the defendant Reynolds, the Solicitor to the Treasury.

Lieutenant Dewell died at Gosport, in 1826, intestate, and, as was supposed, without leaving any next-of-kin as claimants to his estate which consisted of a sum of £1,023 9s. 4d., and some long annuities. The then Solicitor to the Treasury, Mr. Maule, on the nomination of the Crown, took out administration, received the dividends upon the annuities up to 1827, paid the costs of administering the estate amounting to £257 5s. 9d., and then sold the annuities, and handed the proceeds of the annuities and the residue of the £1,023 9s. 4d., amounting together to about £2,000, to the King's Proctor. In 1856 the plaintiff commenced proceedings by a summons in chambers, and succeeded in establishing his claim as next-of-kin to the intestate. The defendant, Mr. Reynolds, was the present Solicitor to the Treasury, and the question now to be determined was whether the Crown was liable to refund the property of which it had taken possession, with interest on the balances in the hands of the defendant, and, if so, from what time? A KINDERSLEY, V.C.—I cannot consider that the cases which have been cited govern the present case. They may be useful for guiding the court as to the principle to be adopted, but certainly none of them seems to decide the question raised here. Turner v. Maule (1) might have decided it, but it did not. In that case the question was raised on the footing of the principle of an administrator being liable for interest on balances improperly retained in his hands; but when the matter in the course of the proceedings came to be discussed, the court, upon discovering that it was a question of an actual sale of a large sum of stock—I think some £39,000 odd, and at a given period—said, that it was not a question of interest on balances, but a question whether there was not a sale of stock by an administrator, which there was no reason for and which ought not to have been made, and, therefore, the court put it to counsel whether they would be satisfied to have interest at £4 per cent. on the proceeds of that sum of stock which ought not to have been sold out, not expressing an opinion one way or the other on the question of the liability to interest on balances retained. C

It appears to me that where, as in this case, a particular individual—always the Solicitor to the Treasury—is nominated by the Crown as the person to whom the Crown desires that administration should be granted, and administration is granted under that authority, the administration expresses it to be for the use and benefit of the Crown, but the individual is to all intents and purposes the administrator. It is exactly the same thing as when a person entitled to administration is abroad and appoints an attorney or agent here authorising the grant of administration to that individual for his benefit. In Chambers v. Bicknell (2), the party who was entitled to the administration was abroad and the form of the letters of administration in that case—which was just the same as where administration is granted to the nominee of the Crown, after the usual words was as follows: D

“And we do by these presents, ordain, depute and constitute you administrator of all and singular the goods, chattels and credits of the said deceased with the said will annexed for the use and benefit of the said Ann Chambers, now residing at Surat, in the presidency of Bombay, in the East Indies; and until she shall duly apply for and obtain letters of administration (with the said will annexed) of the goods of the said deceased to be granted to her.” E

That is exactly the form mutatis mutandis of the grant of letters of administration to the nominee of the Crown where the Crown by reason of there being no next-of-kin of the intestate is entitled to the property of the intestate. What has been determined with regard to an administrator who is the attorney of a party abroad entitled to the administration? In Chambers v. Bicknell (2) it has been determined that that individual, though the nominee of the party abroad, and though his letters of administration may be determined wherever the party for whose use they were granted chooses to come in and apply for letters of administration for himself, yet so long as those letters of administration remain unrevoked, he is to all intents and purposes, as far as regards the claims and demands of any person beneficially entitled, the administrator exactly in the same manner as if he had obtained the administration in his own right. F

As I think that ruling lies at the root of the whole case, I will refer to the vice-chancellor's judgment upon it. He says (2 Hare, at pp. 538-540): G

“It appears that administration of the estate of the testator has been granted to the defendant as the attorney of the widow, and for her use and benefit; and a doubt has been suggested whether the grant in this form places Bicknell, the H

A defendant, in such a position that the court can act against him at the suit of the other parties beneficially interested in the estate, or at least can so act in the absence of the widow. It was said that he held the money as her agent, and was accountable to her and to her alone. The case of De la Viesca v. Lubbock (3) has been referred to, upon which case I am not called on, nor do I presume, to make any observations. The vice-chancellor seems to have held

B that where administration has been granted to the attorney of a person for the use and benefit of that person, the latter may sue the administrator in this country without making the parties beneficially interested parties to the suit, and without taking out letters of administration in this country. That case certainly affirms the proposition that Bicknell is to be considered as the agent of the widow and accountable to her. I do not think that it bears further on the

C point now before me. The question then arises whether the plaintiff is entitled to sue Bicknell or not. The case of Anstruther v. Chalmer (4), is a very important case on this subject. Catherine Anstruther having made her will, died, and Elizabeth Campbell, her sister and only next-of-kin, by her power of attorney authorised Chalmer and Frazer to obtain the administration of the testatrix's estate from the ecclesiastical court as her attorneys, and they accordingly obtained such administration as attorneys of Elizabeth Campbell, and, as

D in the present case, 'for the use and benefit' of that person. The question was thereupon raised, whether the letters of administration being expressed to be granted to Frazer and Chalmer for the use and benefit of Elizabeth Campbell, that circumstance did not exclude the parties beneficially interested in the estate from any claim against the attorneys, that is, whether they were not

E merely agents. Sir Anthony Hart directed the case to stand over, that it might be ascertained whether the question had not been decided by the ecclesiastical court in the form in which the letters of administration had been granted. A certificate from the deputy-registrar of the Prerogative Court was afterwards produced, which stated in substance that the words used in the grant of letters of administration were invariably used when it was made under a power of

F attorney from the parties entitled to representation, and that these words did not exclude the claim of others to share in the estate. It could not exclude those beneficially interested, and it was decided in that case that the plaintiff might sue. I am of opinion that the plaintiff may in this case also sustain a suit against the administrator notwithstanding the character in which he has taken upon him that office. The suit, however, must be properly framed."

G That decision clearly decides that when the administrator to whom the administration has been granted is merely the attorney of a third person, who is entitled to the administration, but is abroad, the person to whom the letters of administration are granted is to all intents and purposes full administrator, exactly as if he had taken out the administration in his own right, so far as relates to the liability

H of any other person who may have a claim or a beneficial interest in the estate; and unquestionably such a person would be liable to an action by creditors. And such a person would, if the administration was with the will annexed, be liable to the claim of legatees, and, of course, to the claim of residuary legatees, or to the claim of persons standing in the situation of next-of-kin.

I It appears to me that, that foundation being laid, I cannot distinguish between that case and the case where the administration is granted to Mr. Maule or Mr. Reynolds, as the nominee of the Crown. The form of administration is the same—the purposes of administration are the same. It is true that the administration is granted for the use and benefit—in the very terms of a grant—of the person in whose behalf the grant is made. But when the administrator is constituted, that administrator is liable to all the claims of persons who are entitled to claim against the estate or to claim an interest in the estate, and it cannot be questioned for a moment but that, if a creditor of this intestate had brought an action against Mr. Maule to recover a debt due from this intestate, Mr. Maule would have been liable to that action exactly in the same manner as any other administrator would be. A

 If it were otherwise, what monstrous injustice would be done to the subject by reason of the grant having been made to the nominee of the Crown.

We now come to this case. At the time when administration was granted it was supposed that there were no next-of-kin of the intestate, and upon that assumption it was supposed the Crown was beneficially entitled to the whole residuary personal estate, and so was entitled to nominate the administrator. In the eye of the law B it is physically impossible for the Sovereign to take out administration in propria persona—it would be beneath his dignity so to do, and it is never done; but the Sovereign is the individual who is entitled to administration. The Crown being entitled, it is suggested that Mr. Reynolds is merely the agent of the Crown.
 True, in one sense, he is merely the agent of the Crown. The Crown being entitled to administer and being beneficially interested in the property, nominates C this person, and this person is undoubtedly accountable to the Crown if it turns out that there is no next-of-kin. The Crown may compel an account from the party as agent. I will assume, independently of the character of administrator, the Crown might even bring an action at law against him. Still I apprehend there is no reason to doubt but that the Crown might, by the Attorney-General, file a bill against this party as administrator and compel that administrator to account. D
 It appears to me immaterial whether the Crown has the right to treat the administrator as agent or to treat him as administrator. The third person—that is, if there be such next-of-kin—must have a right, and can have no other right, but to treat this individual as the administrator.

Then, what is the duty of the Crown? It has been suggested that there is a duty in the Crown to administer. If there were any Act of Parliament or some E provision of the common law which imposed upon the Crown, when a person died intestate and the next-of-kin did not within some short time turn up, the duty, not for its own benefit, but for the benefit of persons who might ultimately turn out to be entitled, to take out administration in order to preserve the effects, then indeed there would be a duty on the part of the Crown to take out such administration. What is suggested as the duty of the Crown does not apply to this particular F case, because it was before this property under recent legislation became the property of the public. How can you say that the Crown has a duty to enforce rights which are properly personal to itself? It has no duty any more than a duty in an individual to enforce his own personal rights. True, there is a duty in the Crown to recover that which belongs to the public, but to whom is that duty G owing? It is owing to the public who may be the persons beneficially entitled to it if there are no next-of-kin, but there is no duty to protect the property for the next-of-kin; therefore, if the Crown thought fit not to take out administration or to nominate a person to whom administration should be granted and let the property take its own chance, the next-of-kin never could say: "The Crown has not done its duty to me," because there is no duty to the next-of-kin. So it does not appear to me it can stand at all upon the footing of any duty on the part of the Crown. H

Let me first of all regard this individual as the administrator and as if he had taken out administration in his own name and not as the nominee of the Crown or for the benefit of the Crown or for the benefit of anybody, but simply as administrator. What is the rule of this court with regard to such an administrator?
 I need not say where there is a will and an executor is under the direction of the will to invest, he must invest, but in this case there is no will, and, therefore, no I direction to invest. In the case of an executor where there is a will, or in the case of an administrator where there is no will, is there not a duty on the part of the executor or administrator, in the absence of any direction or a positive trust, to invest and not to retain the money in his hands? It appears to me clearly that there is. Otherwise what mischievous consequences would arise. One of the next-of-kin takes out administration, he receives, it may be, a very large personal estate, he keeps that in his own pocket, it may be, for years before it is ascertained who are the other next-of-kin, and then he says to the other next-of-kin: "I have had

A this in my pocket—there was no obligation in me to invest, and there is your money without interest.” He has no right, I apprehend, to keep this money wrapped up in a napkin; still less has he a right to keep it in his pocket, when you must assume he is getting the benefit of it. If the persons beneficially interested could make out that he has employed it in his trade, they would have a right to demand that he should account to them for the profits which he had made by

B using the money in his business. If you can show that he has used it in his trade, although you cannot make out what is the profit which he has derived, you have the right to charge him with 4 per cent. as a compensation for the profits he has made. No doubt there must be a benefit, because every man who has a large sum in his hands derives a benefit from it, either in the shape of investment, or getting him credit in some shape or other, and the persons beneficially entitled have a right

C to say that he shall be charged with interest upon it. If it is necessary to retain certain sums in his hands, because there are sums which are expected to have to be paid, shortly due from creditors or other persons in respect of the estate, he may be well justified in not making any investment, but whenever it comes up to the point that he has a large sum in his hands which is not required for any purpose, it appears to me that he is bound to invest in [trust investments].

D That I conceive to be the position of an ordinary administrator. I cannot distinguish this case from the case of an ordinary administrator. What has been done in the present case is this. At a certain period Mr. Reynolds handed over the £2,000—we will say the balance—to the King’s Proctor for the benefit of the Crown. Supposing now, to take an analogous case, an administrator, or an executor where there is an intestacy as to the residue, on the supposition that A. is next-of-kin

E is asked by A. to hand over the property to him. What would such an administrator or executor be entitled to do? What would be his duty? He would be entitled to say: “I cannot recognise your right—it is a doubtful one—it depends upon a pedigree, and I cannot take upon myself the risk of deciding that you are entitled to that. If I do, I make myself personally responsible. As it is impossible for me to hand over this money to you with safety to myself, institute a suit and take proceedings, and then I am perfectly willing to deal with it in any way the court thinks fit.” If the court desires it to be done, and it is done, however wrong the court may be as to that party being the next-of-kin, the administrator is perfectly safe in following the directions of the court. But if he takes on himself to hand over the property to A., the claimant, he takes on himself the risk of being personally responsible for it to the persons who may turn out to be the actual next-of-

G kin. He may take the risk. He may say: “I will hand it over to you if you will give me an indemnity.” Indemnity implies a risk, and if the party to whom he has handed over the money turns out to be the person not entitled, but somebody else turns out to be the next-of-kin, he, the administrator, remains liable, and he may have his remedy over.

H It appears to me that the position of Mr. Reynolds as the administrator in this case is precisely analogous to that of an administrator who has handed over the property to the person supposed to be entitled upon an indemnity, and, although there is not the actual form of an indemnity passing from the Crown to the Crown’s nominee, to whom administration is granted as a matter of course, the administrator is indemnified by the Crown. He is entirely under the direction of the Crown, and, therefore, indemnified by the Crown. Surely in such a case the Crown is respon-

I sible—responsible, it may be, only indirectly, through the administrator. If you once regard the administrator as being for every purpose as merely representing the Crown, then it is the Crown as administrator who has retained the balance in its own hands, and it appears to me to come within the principle to which I have alluded. It does appear to me, subject to the question as to the time and the sums in respect of which interest is to be charged, that there is a liability to interest on the balance. If it were not so, I think that injustice would be done as between the Crown and individuals. When we talk of the Crown now, which means the public, it is very hard and unreasonable that the public should have the benefit, without paying for it, of moneys which did not belong to it but belonged to A. from the death of the intestate. It would be very unreasonable and unjust that the public should have the benefit of those moneys, which is the same thing as if the public was getting interest upon the money or employing it at interest, and then at any time afterwards saying to the party who turns out to be beneficially entitled; "True, we have had the use of these moneys, but you ought to have come sooner; and although we have had the benefit, you shall have nothing but the dry principal." I do not see the equity or legal justice of that. It appears to me to be contrary to all analogy and principle. A B

In the present case there is a double ingredient. There is a portion of the property which consists not of property invested, and another part which was property yielding an income. It is true, the part which was yielding an income was a terminable property, that is to say, long annuities. No doubt, if this had been the case of property which was the subject of a will, where there was a tenancy for life and remainder, there would be an obligation under ordinary circumstances upon the party who was the administrator or executor to convert it and invest it. But I see no such obligation in this case, where the administrator has nothing to do but to hold the property which is not unproductive and receive such profit as may arise. The sale of the stock took place about the latter end of the year 1827, and the money arising from that sale was not wanted for any purpose whatever. The total amount of debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, outgoing expenses of every kind, and administration expenses, amounted to £257 5s. 9d., and the total amount of what was actually received in money, other than what arose from the proceeds of the sale of stock down to the end of the year 1826 is £1,023 9s. 4d., leaving a balance of £766 3s. 9d. at the end of the year 1826. At that time every debt and every testamentary expense and outgoing had been satisfied, and, therefore, there was a clear balance at that time not wanted to be retained for any apparent or apprehended purpose. It appears to me, upon principle, that interest at 4 per cent. ought to be charged on that balance from that time, and on the long annuities from the sale thereof in the following year. C D E

Order accordingly. F

NELSON AND OTHERS v. STOCKER

[COURT OF APPEAL IN CHANCERY (Knight-Bruce and Turner, L.JJ.), May 31, June 1, 30, 1859]

[Reported 4 De G. & J. 458; 28 L.J.Ch. 760; 33 L.T.O.S. 277; 5 Jur.N.S. 751; 7 W.R. 603; 45 E.R. 178]

Infant—False representation—Representation false to knowledge of person to whom made—Effect on plea of infancy—Representation by infant that he is of full age—Action on settlement entered into by him.

Per TURNER, L.J.: Infants are no more entitled than adults are to gain benefits to themselves by fraud. On the question whether a false representation made by an infant, e.g., that he is of full age, to a person who knows it to be false can be said to be a fraud, and such a fraud as will take away the privilege of infancy, there can be no doubt that it is morally wrong in an infant of competent age, as it is in any other person, to make any false representation whatever, but the court cannot enforce the observance of obligations or duties which rest on moral grounds only. Some wrong or injury must be shown to the party complaining in order to call the court into action, and I do not see how any wrong or injury can be said to have been done to any person to whom a false representation is made when the person to whom it is made knows it to be false. If the representation is known to be false, the person to whom it is made cannot be deceived by it. . . . The privilege of infancy is a legal privilege. On the one hand, it cannot be used by infants for the purposes of fraud. On the other hand, it cannot be allowed to be infringed by persons who, knowing of the infancy, must be taken also to know of the legal consequences which attach to it.

Appeal from a decision of STUART, V.-C., on a bill filed on behalf of certain infants by Mr. Henry Wise, their next friend, to enforce a covenant entered into by the defendant, their stepfather, for their benefit.

Mrs. Anne Perkins Nelson, the mother of the infants, after the death of her first husband, J. H. Nelson, and up to the time of her marriage with the defendant, William Burbank Stocker, carried on the business of a pawnbroker at Newport, Monmouthshire. Shortly before her second marriage an indenture of settlement, dated Oct. 10, 1850, and made between the defendant, of the first part, Mrs. Nelson of the second part, and Ebenezer Vaughan Jenkins, a trustee, of the third part, was executed. It recited that Mrs. Nelson had four children by her first husband; that she had carried on business at Newport as a pawnbroker and had employed in that business a capital of upwards of £1,000; and that in view of the intended marriage between Mrs. Nelson and Stocker it was agreed that the defendant, Stocker, should enter into a covenant for the payment to the trustee of the sum of £1,000 and interest, and that the trustee should stand possessed of that sum and interest upon and for the trusts thereafter appearing. It then witnessed that, in consideration of the intended marriage and of the agreement, the defendant would pay to the trustee the sum of £1,000. It was provided that it should not be lawful for the trustee during the lifetime of Mrs. Nelson to compel payment of the £1,000 unless required so to do by her. The trusts relating to the £1,000 were then declared during the joint lives of the defendant and Mrs. Nelson for her separate use, and if she survived the defendant, for herself absolutely, but if she should die in the lifetime of the defendant, then for her four children in manner therein mentioned.
The marriage was solemnised on Oct. 18, 1850, and the defendant immediately took possession of the stock and continued the pawnbroking business.

Mrs. Stocker died on Aug. 11, 1857, leaving three children (the plaintiffs) by her former marriage, one having died. On Aug. 17, the trustee of the settlement wrote to the defendant requesting payment of the £1,000. To this the defendant's solicitor replied by the following letter:

"Newport, Monday, Aug. 20, 1857.

"Sir,—Mr. Stocker has placed your letter to him in my hands, with instructions to reply that at the time the settlement in question was made he was a minor, and, therefore, not competent to bind himself by deed, and now that he is of full age and more competent to judge of the propriety of executing such a settlement, he declines to be bound by the document in question. I may add that from the time of his majority he has always expressed and acted upon that determination."

The bill alleged that at the time of the execution of the settlement and of his marriage the defendant represented himself to Mrs. Nelson as being of full age, and that she executed the settlement on the faith of that representation. It prayed

A that the defendant might be decreed to pay to the trustee and next friend of the plaintiffs the sum of £1,000 and interest from Mrs. Stocker's death.

The defendant, by his answer, said that he was not of full age at the time of the execution of the settlement and that of the marriage; he was then only seventeen years of age, having been born in 1832. Previously to his signing the settlement, he thought that the solicitor asked him, in the course of conversation, whether he B was of age, and he replied, as was then the fact, that he thought he was, but he did not then know that the question was of any importance. In the register of his marriage the defendant was described as "of full age." The defendant's mother and aunt proved that he was born on Nov. 29, 1832. The defendant, by his affidavit, further said that he had never at any time since he had attained the age of twenty-one adopted or confirmed the settlement, but, on the contrary, he had always, since C he discovered what his age was at the time of the marriage—which discovery he made within a year after the date of the settlement—refused to be bound by it, and he denied that the marriage was solemnised on the faith of any representation whatever as to his age.

STUART, V.-C., held that the defendant could not be allowed to set up his infancy as a bar to the settlement, and that, both on the ground of misrepresentation and D also that of acquiescence subsequently to his attaining twenty-one he was bound by it. He ordered that the defendant should pay the gross sum of £1,000 within three months, with liberty to make any proposals in chambers as to the security for the same; but that, as it appeared that he had maintained the infant plaintiffs since the death of Mrs. Stocker, no interest was to be paid on the £1,000. From this decree the defendant appealed.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 30, 1859. KNIGHT-BRUCE, L.J.—It being established in the cause that the defendant did not attain his majority before the latter part of the year 1853, F he is prima facie not bound by the instrument of settlement signed and sealed by him in the year 1850, the year of his marriage, which it is the object of the suit to enforce against him. The plaintiffs, however, say that the defendant is bound by the instrument because, as the plaintiffs contend, he, with knowledge of his true age, misrepresented his age to his now deceased wife, and caused her, when the G settlement was agreed to, when it was prepared and signed, and when they married, to believe him not to be a minor. The plaintiffs say that she accepted the settlement in that faith, and married in that belief—a faith and belief induced by the defendant's fraud. The plaintiffs also say that, independently of any question of fraud before the marriage, the defendant's conduct after the marriage, and especially after his majority, amounted to a confirmation by him of the settlement, and that, H on both grounds or one of them, he is barred from denying his liability to make it good.

It appears to me, upon the whole of the evidence, however, that the defendant's deceased wife is not shown to have been defrauded or deceived by the defendant in any respect before their marriage. I believe that at the time of the marriage and previous to it—before the instrument of settlement was signed by either of them, and before it was prepared—she was aware of his minority, and that the case I stands substantially upon the same footing, so far as the parties to the present record are concerned, as if the fact of his infancy had been stated on the face of the settlement. With regard to confirmation, independently of the difficulty placed, perhaps, in the plaintiffs' way by the Prescription Act, 1832, as well as the nature of the document which they seek to enforce against the defendant, I conceive that the plaintiffs' claim in this respect, whether excluded or not excluded by the mode in which the bill is framed, fails on the evidence. I think that there is no confirmation, no agreement to confirm, nor conduct tantamount to proof. The rights of the defendant seem to me to remain as they did on the day after his marriage. A

I am of opinion, therefore, that the bill is without foundation, but that it is not a case for costs.

TURNER, L.J.—The evidence in the cause seems to me to establish beyond all doubt that at the date of the settlement and that of the marriage the defendant was only between seventeen and eighteen years of age, and Anne Stocker was a widow of the age of thirty-two. As I read the evidence, it further establishes in favour of the plaintiffs that the defendant, before the execution of the settlement, was asked by the solicitor who prepared it whether he was of age, and replied that he thought that he was; and in favour of the defendant, that Anne Stocker herself knew before the marriage that the defendant was not of age. This, in my judgment, is the true result of the evidence in the cause, and it is upon these facts that STUART, V.-C., has decreed the payment of the £1,000. The defendant has appealed from the decree. C

If the case had depended simply upon the point of the defendant having represented himself to be of age when he was not of age, I should have felt no doubt about it, for it would be too much to call upon the court to believe that this defendant could really have thought himself to be of age at the date of the settlement when he was under eighteen years of age, and if he did not so think, the representation he made to the solicitor was false and fraudulent. Infants are no more entitled than adults are to gain benefits to themselves by fraud, and had the case, therefore, depended upon this point alone, I should have agreed most fully with the decision of STUART, V.-C. It is not, however, upon the question of false representation alone that the decision of the case, in my judgment, depends. It is scarcely less difficult to believe that Anne Stocker did not know that the defendant was under age at the time of the settlement and of the marriage than that the defendant himself did not know it. In fact, the evidence proves that she knew it. The question, therefore, seems to me to be, not whether the representation made by the defendant was false, but whether a false representation made to a person who knows it to be false can be said to be a fraud, and such a fraud as will take away the privilege of infancy. There can be no doubt that it is morally wrong in an infant of competent age, as it is in any other person, to make any false representation whatever, but the court cannot enforce the observance of obligations or duties which rest upon moral grounds only. Some wrong or injury must be shown to the party complaining in order to call the court into action, and I do not see how any wrong or injury can be said to have been done to any person to whom a false representation is made when the person to whom it is made knows it to be false. If the representation is known to be false, the person to whom it is made cannot be deceived by it. E F

Looking at the case in this point of view, it opens a question of great general importance. The law has for the wisest reason thrown around infants a protection against acts done by them during their infancy, and the policy of the law cannot be maintained if this privilege of infancy be allowed to be broken in upon on slight and insufficient grounds. If the contracts of infants with persons who know them to be under age are held not to be binding on the ground that the infants represented themselves to be of age, there will hardly be a case in which the plea of infancy will be of any avail, and the door will be open to all frauds against infants which the law was intended to protect them from. The privilege of infancy is a legal privilege.
On the one hand, it cannot be used by infants for the purposes of fraud. On the other hand, it cannot, I think, be allowed to be infringed by persons who, knowing of the infancy, must be taken also to know of the legal consequences which attach to it. This decree, so far as I am aware, is in this respect of the first impression, and I am not prepared to support a precedent which goes so far to destroy the legal privileges of infants. STUART, V.-C., seems, as I collect from his judgment, to have considered the knowledge imputed to Anne Stocker to have been of no importance, because the representation was made to the solicitor, but, according to the evidence, the solicitor was employed by her—he was her agent in the transaction. The G H I

A settlement was prepared at her instance and for her benefit, and if the representation made to Anne Stocker herself would not have rendered the covenant binding upon the defendant, I do not see how the representation made to her agent can have that effect. It may be said, indeed, that the solicitor, had he been informed of the infancy, would have advised some different settlement, but I do not see how this can improve the plaintiffs' case. If there was a false representation made in such circumstances as would render the covenant binding upon the defendant, it would equally do so whether a different settlement would have been made or not. It is, indeed, a mere speculation whether a different settlement, or even any settlement, would have been made if the infancy had been disclosed to the solicitor, and it must be remembered, with reference to this point, that, assuming, as I do, that Anne Stocker knew of the infancy, it was her duty—no less her duty than it was the duty of the defendant—to have apprised the solicitor of the fact, and that if, on the one hand, there was false representation on the part of the defendant, there was, on the other hand, suppression on the part of Anne Stocker.

It was much insisted upon, on the part of the plaintiffs, that there had been adoption and confirmation by the defendant, but this is wholly denied by the answer, and I can find no evidence of it beyond the fact that the defendant took possession of the business and stock-in-trade and has continued in possession of it. This was, however, property to which the defendant became entitled jure mariti, and not by virtue of the settlement [this was before the Married Women's Property Act, 1882]. Upon the whole case, much as I disapprove the conduct of this defendant, I cannot go the length of saying that he is bound by this covenant, and I am of opinion, therefore, that this bill ought to have been dismissed.

Appeal allowed.

VALPY AND OTHERS v. SANDERS AND ANOTHER

[COURT OF COMMON PLEAS (Wilde, C.J., Maule, Cresswell and Williams, JJ.), January 22, 24, May 12, 1848]

Bankruptcy—Property available for distribution—Conversion of bankrupt's goods—Recovery by trustee.

Where a person converts the goods of a bankrupt and the trustee in bankruptcy demands payment from that person as on a sale by the bankrupt, the trustee is not precluded from suing in trover when payment is refused.

The defendants bought goods at A.'s shop after notice that A. had committed an act of bankruptcy by absconding, and claimed to set off against the price a debt due to them from A. A fiat having afterwards issued against A., his assignees demanded payment for the goods bought by the defendants.

Held: the assignees did not thereby so affirm the sale as to disentitle them to maintain trover for the goods on a subsequent demand and refusal.

Rule Nisi obtained by the plaintiffs to set aside a nonsuit and enter a verdict for them in an action of trover brought by the plaintiffs, assignees of the estate and effects of Thomas Sutton, a bankrupt, for goods, alleged in the first count to have come into the defendants' possession before the bankruptcy, and in the second count, after the bankruptcy of Sutton. The defendants pleaded not guilty, and not possessed. C

At the trial before PATTESON, J., at Warwickshire Assizes, it appeared that Thomas Sutton, the bankrupt, carried on the business of a draper at Atherstone, in the county of Warwick. On Feb. 23, 1846, he committed an act of bankruptcy, by absconding to America. A fiat in bankruptcy issued against him on Mar. 3; the adjudication took place on Mar. 5; and on Mar. 24 the plaintiffs were appointed assignees. The defendants were wine-merchants carrying on business in partnership together at Atherstone. At the time of his absconding, the bankrupt was indebted to the defendants for wine. On Feb. 25 and 27—the defendants having then full knowledge that the bankrupt had absented himself—Mrs. Sanders, the second defendant, went to the shop, where the business was still going on under the direction of the plaintiffs, and looked out goods to the amount of £5 6s. 5d. on the first occasion, and £6 4s. 11d. on the second. The first parcel the second defendant took away with her; the second was sent to the defendants' house on Feb. 28. The shopman who delivered the last-mentioned goods demanded the money for them, whereupon the second defendant observed that she did not understand that she was to pay for the goods, and desired the man to call again in an hour. When he called again, she declined either to pay the money, or to restore the goods. D

On April 9, the plaintiffs' agent sent in a bill of parcels or invoice of the goods purchased, enclosed in a letter, addressed to the defendants, as follows: E

“April 9, 1846. “In re Sutton, a bankrupt. G

“Gentlemen,—I am directed to apply to you for the sum of £11 11s. 4d. for goods supplied to you on Feb. 25 and 27 last, which be pleased to remit to me without loss of time.”

On April 23, the following letter was sent to the defendants by the solicitor of the assignees: H

“Rugby, April 23, 1846.

“Gentlemen,—I am directed by Mr. Sutton's assignees to apply to you for the payment of the sum of £11 11s. 10d.: and you will be so good as to pay the same to me, with 5s. for this letter, by Thursday next, as, in case of non-payment, I have positive instructions to sue you for the same.”

To this letter the defendants' solicitors sent the following reply: I “Atherstone, April 28, 1846.

“Dear Sir,—Messrs. Sanders & Sanford consulted us on the subject of the claim made against them by the assignees of T. Sutton, as appears in your letter to them of the 23rd instant. We carefully considered all the circumstances, and advised that they were not liable to pay that claim, but were legally entitled to set off the amount of their claim on the bankrupt's estate. Since that time, we have taken the opinion of Mr. J. B. on the matter; and he

A concurs with us: and, if it be determined to bring an action, we will accept service of the writ, and appear."

At the trial it was contended on the part of the defendants that, by the delivery of the bill of parcels on April 9, and the demand of payment as for goods sold and delivered by the bankrupt, the plaintiffs had affirmed the sale, and could not afterwards disaffirm it, and bring trover. The jury having found that the
B defendants had notice of Sutton's bankruptcy after the purchase of the first parcel of goods, and before the purchase of the last parcel, the judge directed a nonsuit. He held that the plaintiffs, having treated the transaction as a sale, it was not competent to them afterwards to turn round and treat it as a tort. He reserved leave to the plaintiffs to move to enter a verdict for £6 4s. 11d., if the court should be of opinion that the action was maintainable. The plaintiffs obtained a rule
C accordingly.

Whitehurst and Mellor for the defendants showed cause against the rule.

Waddington (with whom was Humfrey) supported the rule.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 12, 1848. WILDE, C.J., delivered the following judgment of the court.—

D This was an action of trover brought by the plaintiffs, as assignees of Sutton, a bankrupt, for the purpose of recovering the value of certain goods which had belonged to the bankrupt, and which had been sold by the bankrupt's shopman after an act of bankruptcy committed by the bankrupt who had absconded, and after notice of the act of bankruptcy received by the defendants. Subsequently to the plaintiffs' appointment as assignees, their agent sent a bill of parcels to the E defendants, as for goods sold by the bankrupt to the defendants; and the plaintiffs' solicitor demanded payment of the amount of such bill of parcels. The defendants refused to pay for the goods, whereupon the plaintiffs demanded the goods, and, on the defendants' refusal to deliver them, the present action of trover was brought.

At the trial, it was contended on the part of the defendants that, by the delivery of the bill of parcels and demand of payments as for goods sold and delivered by the
F bankrupt, the plaintiffs had affirmed the sale, and could not afterwards disaffirm it and maintain trover. On this objection the plaintiffs were nonsuited, leave being given to them to move to enter a verdict in their favour for the amount demanded if the court should be of opinion that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover. It appears by the judge's report of the evidence, that the sale was made by the bankrupt's servant after his [the bankrupt's] absconding and altogether without authority, and after notice of the act of bankruptcy. It is, therefore, clear that the defendant,
G by receiving the goods under such unauthorised sale, was guilty of a conversion as against the assignees of the bankrupt. There was no evidence to show that the plaintiffs, or their agents, had any notice that the bankrupt was indebted to the defendants at the time of the delivery of the bill of parcels, or at the time the demand was made for payment; and it was proved that, before the delivery of the H goods, the shopman who sold them informed the defendants that the goods must be paid for to the estate of the bankrupt. In these circumstances, the plaintiffs obtained the present rule nisi to set aside the nonsuit and to enter a verdict for them. On the argument of the rule, the principal point discussed was, whether the plaintiffs had, by the acts before mentioned, affirmed the sale by the shopman as a sale by their agent and so precluded themselves from maintaining an action
I of trover.

The court is of opinion that such was not the effect of those acts and that the utmost effect to be given to them is, that they amounted only to a qualified offer to adopt such sale, that is, if the defendant would pay for the goods; and that, when the defendant refused to pay for them, it was competent to the plaintiffs to repudiate the sale altogether, and bring the present action. In Brewer and Gregory v. Sparrow (1), assignees were held to have adopted the dealings of the defendant with the estate of the bankrupt, which had taken place after an act of bankruptcy and with notice, by adjusting an account of receipts and payments in respect of such dealings, and by receiving the balance due on the result of such an account —treating all the transactions as valid. But, in Morris v. Robinson (2), where a quantity of indigo had been shipped at Calcutta, on freight, and had been improperly sold under the order of the Vice-Admiralty Court at the Mauritius, and the proceeds paid into court, the owner of the indigo was held entitled to maintain trover against the defendants, who had purchased and received thirty-two chests of the indigo so sold, notwithstanding the plaintiff's agent, under a power of attorney executed by the plaintiff, had made an unsuccessful application to the Vice-Admiralty Court to obtain the proceeds paid into court of certain other of the chests of indigo sold under the same circumstances as those purchased by the defendants. In Burn v. Morris (3), where trover was brought for a £20 bank-note which the plaintiff had lost, and which the defendant had received from a woman who had found it and exchanged it at the bank, notwithstanding the plaintiff had received from the woman who so found it the sum of £7, being part of the proceeds which had been obtained by the defendant by the exchange of the note at the bank —the £7 being allowed only in reduction of damages. On Brewer and Gregory v. Sparrow (1) being cited, the court said that case was distinguishable by the fact that the assignees had there received a sum as the whole balance due to them upon the footing of the account. Again, in Hurst v. Gwennap (4), goods had been delivered by a bankrupt to the defendant, on sale or return, after an act of bankruptcy but without notice. The assignees, after their appointment, required the defendant to say whether he would keep the goods or not; the defendant elected to keep them, whereupon the assignees delivered a bill of parcels, as on a sale by the bankrupt to the defendant, and demanded payment of the amount. The defendant refused to pay, claiming a set-off, as in the present case; whereupon the assignees, without further demand, brought trover and were held entitled to recover. The court confirmed the ruling of LORD ELLENBOROUGH at nisi prius.

We are, therefore, of opinion that the plaintiffs, by demanding payment for the goods, as on a sale by the bankrupt—which demand was not acquiesced in by the defendants—did not preclude themselves from maintaining trover on the defendants' refusal to pay according to such demand. The plaintiffs are, therefore, entitled to make the rule absolute for entering the verdict for them for the value of the goods so received by the defendants under the circumstances before stated.

Rule absolute.

Demurrer to the declaration in an action by the holder of a cheque against the payee and endorser claiming £15.

The declaration stated that one T. S. Bodenham, on Mar. 10, 1859, made his draft or order in writing for the payment of money, commonly called a cheque on a banker, and directed it to certain persons trading as bankers, by the name and style of the Union Bank of London, and thereby required them to pay to the defendant or bearer the sum of £11; and then delivered the draft or order to the defendant, who then endorsed and delivered it to the plaintiff, who then became and was and still is the lawful bearer thereof. The draft or order was duly presented for payment and was dishonoured, of which the defendant had due notice, but did not pay the same. The plaintiff claimed £15. The defendant demurred to the declaration. Joinder in demurrer. D E

Cur. adv. vult.

May 1, 1860. ERLE, C.J.—In my opinion this is a good declaration. The action is brought by the holder of a cheque on a banker against the payee and endorser. The declaration states [HIS LORDSHIP stated the declaration as above]. To this there is a demurrer, and the principal point made by counsel for the defendant in support of the demurrer was, that a cheque was not to be called a bill of exchange so as to be capable of being sued upon and creating a liability in the endorser to the person who may be holder of the document. Certainly the analogy holds between cheques and bills of exchange in a great many respects. The banker might, for ought I know, accept the cheque. A cheque has all the incidents of a bill of exchange as regards passing by delivery, and of being as cash in the hand of a party taking it bona fide and for value. Having then several of the incidents which appertain to bills of exchange, has a cheque the incident of passing by endorsement? that is to say, when the endorsement is made, not by a mere affixing of the party's name on the back of the document, but an affixing of the name animo endorsandi, with the intention to pass a title to the cheque, and to incur the liabilities of an endorser of a negotiable instrument. Here it seems to me that the endorsement must have been made with that intention, and therefore our judgment in favour of the plaintiff will be at least in accordance with the intention of the parties to the cheque. But I also think that we act in accordance with the principles of law in holding that a cheque is a negotiable instrument. F G H I

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. I conceive that a cheque is in the nature of an inland bill of exchange, and has nearly all the incidents of ordinary bills of exchange. In one respect a cheque differs from a bill of exchange, for it is in the nature of an appropriation of money in the banker's hands for the purpose of discharging a liability of the drawer to a third person; it is not necessary that there should be money of the drawer's in the hands of the drawee of a bill of exchange.

- A There is another minor difference as to staleness; the drawer is not prejudiced by any delay in presenting his cheque to the banker unless in the meantime the banker has become insolvent. Counsel for the defendant was mistaken when he supposed that the negotiability of bills of exchange inland drawn depended on the statute 9 Will. 3, c. 17 [repealed by Bills of Exchange Act, 1882]; they had been so negotiated for many years previously to that date. Even the notes and bonds
- B of foreign princes and states are all negotiable instruments in this country, and persons who take them for value are entitled to render them available. That seems to be so clear upon the decisions that I think it would be impossible to hold that cheques are not in at least an equally favourable position; and to me it is clear that a cheque is, in fact, in the class of an ordinary bill of exchange; and, if so, why cannot it be endorsed? Since the endorsement—that is an endorsement animo
- C endorsandi—must be proved (Wayman v. Bend (1)), no inconvenience can ensue from our holding this. In STORY ON PROMISSORY NOTES, s. 132, it is laid down:

“Although a note payable to bearer is transferable by mere delivery, it may also be transferred by endorsement of the payee, or of any other subsequent holder.”

- D It is very true that when a man's name is written on the back of an instrument without the intention to endorse, and so make himself liable upon it, he is not so liable; for though it may be said he has put his name on the back of the cheque, that is a writing on the back, but it is not an endorsement in the legal sense of the term; and so in the case of a bank-note, a party who writes his name on the back is not liable on it if he wrote without intending to endorse. The writing must
- E always be done animo endorsandi in order to make it effectual to bind the endorser. I do no injustice to counsel for the defendant when I say that his argument would have been of more authority if addressed to this court a hundred years ago than it could be expected to have in these times.

KEATING, J.—I consider that this cheque is a negotiable instrument, and that the plaintiff has a right to sue upon it, and that our judgment ought to be for him.

Maintenance of Action—Contract by proprietors of land to fight claims made for tithes on their land and to employ attorney for this purpose—Common link of interest between proprietors—Claim by attorney for work done.

Jesus College, who were the lessees of certain tithes, gave notice to the proprietors and the tenants of the land demanding that the occupiers of the land pay their tithes in kind. The proprietors held a meeting at which it was resolved to resist the claim of the college "and support the present moduses; that the expenses incurred in such proceedings shall be borne and paid by the proprietors in proportion to the value of their estates;" and that the plaintiff who was an attorney "be requested to take such steps as may be considered necessary." This resolution was signed by the defendant and six other proprietors of the land. At the time of the agreement it was uncertain whether the college would proceed by one or several bills in equity, but subsequently nine bills were filed and seven issues were directed against the occupiers of the different farms. The plaintiff in his capacity of attorney did work defending certain of the suits and in due course presented his account. The defendant refused to pay on the grounds that the work was done in pursuance of an agreement which amounted to maintenance.

Held: the agreement was not illegal and did not amount to maintenance since there was reasonable evidence of a common link of interest uniting the proprietors of the land in question at the time they made the agreement.

Rule Nisi obtained by the defendant to enter a nonsuit or a verdict for him in an action brought by the plaintiff one Findon against the defendant Sir G. Phillips for the balance due to him on his bill of costs for work done as attorney for the

A defendant, in defending certain tithe suits relating to lands in the parish of Tredington of which the defendant and others were the proprietors.

At the trial before WIGHTMAN, J., at the last Spring Assizes for the county of Worcester, it appeared that the lands in Tredington consisted of what were denominated the Old and the New inclosures, the former of which, from time of living testimony, had been exempted from the payment of tithes in kind, there being paid instead of them a certain sum varying in amount, for each of the several farms within the parish; whereas for the New inclosures tithes in kind were paid, or a composition entered into. In 1832, the principal, fellows, etc., of Jesus College, Oxford, being patrons of the living, and also lessees of the tithes, gave notice to the tenants and proprietors of the Old inclosures to set out their tithes in kind. In consequence of this notice having been given, the proprietors of land in Tredington held a meeting together upon the subject of this claim by the college, and at that meeting it was resolved

D "that the proprietors do resist the claim of the college, and support the present moduses, and that the expenses incurred in such proceedings shall be borne and paid by the proprietors, in proportion to the value of their estates, and that Messrs. Findon and Wood be requested to take such steps as may be considered necessary."

This resolution was signed by the defendant and six other landowners in the parish of Tredington. At the time of making this agreement, it was uncertain whether the college would proceed by one or several bills in equity. Nine bills, however, were subsequently filed, and seven issues were directed by the Lord Chief Baron to be tried against the occupiers of the different farms. These issues were set down for trial at Worcester Assizes, and the first of the issues was accordingly tried, but during the time that the jury were deliberating upon the first issue, and the second was in the course of trial, it was agreed by the counsel on both sides that the result of all the issues should depend upon the verdict in the first. The jury, however, being unable to agree, were discharged without returning any verdict. The plaintiff afterwards brought the present action for the balance due to him on his bill of costs.

It was objected at the trial, that the agreement was illegal, as amounting to maintenance on the part of the different parties signing it. The learned judge, however, was of opinion that it was not illegal; that the landowners had a common interest in resisting the claim to tithes, on the ground that the old inclosed lands had never paid tithes before; and he accordingly directed the jury to find for the plaintiff, reserving leave to the defendant to move to enter a nonsuit or a verdict for him. The defendant obtained a rule accordingly.

Serjeant Talfourd, Whitehurst and Butt for the plaintiff, showed cause against the rule.

H Kelly, R. V. Richards and W. J. Alexander for the defendant, supported the rule.

LORD ABINGER, C.B.—I am of opinion that this rule ought to be discharged. I will put the case in the most naked form, for the purpose of applying what I have always considered as a maxim of law recognised and established. Suppose a man employs an attorney to defend an action in which he has no interest, and the attorney defends the action accordingly, does it lie in the mouth of the person who employs him to say he was guilty of maintenance in employing him? Every man who has been in a court of law has heard the maxim that a man cannot take advantage of his own wrong. In this case, however, I do not resort to that maxim, except to show that the present is rather an unusual defence. This is said to be a case of maintenance at common law, where an action is brought against a man who admits himself to have been a party to the contract, but alleges that he has committed the crime of maintenance; and as that allegation is to the prejudice of another person, we ought to hold him to strict proof of the fact. The plea alleges the agreement to be corrupt and illegal; the replication denies that it was illegal or corrupt, in the manner and form alleged by the plea. A

I do not think that, in order to determine the question, we are bound to look at the ultimate results of the particular suits, but that we ought to see whether there was any ground on which the parties making this agreement might reasonably suppose that they had a common interest in resisting the claim of the college. That claim was a general claim of tithe in kind from all the defendants; the defences to which would depend upon the answers put in. Suppose the answer in each case claimed a distinct modus for the specific land occupied by each defendant, and claimed it in the exact terms of a modus—"from time whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary;" and suppose that all the parishioners making this agreement were satisfied that, as far as the parol evidence was concerned, and as far as human memory could go back, and ancient receipts could show, they could prove the payment of the particular moduses on which they meant to rely, far beyond the time necessary in such cases. I put this case as being a stronger one than the present, because here the opinion really entertained by these parties was, that all the inclosures were of that antiquity as to show that the moduses had been paid for enclosed lands. If the college could show that these lands had once been common, and had been inclosed within the time of legal memory, they would give an answer to all the moduses; in that respect all the occupiers and proprietors had a common interest, to show that these lands were ancient inclosures, or it might turn out that the college was able in some instances to prove that the lands were not ancient inclosures, and in others that the defendant succeeded in proving the lands to be ancient inclosures. It is a case of the same nature as if they had all claimed certain abbey lands, because then the question would be whether each could prove that his lands were of that description. In that case the issues would be found according to the various proofs in the cases; but still there would be a reason why they had one common interest in making a common defence. B

If any ground can be fairly suggested for making this contract legal, we ought to adopt it in favour of the party who makes the defence, in order to acquit him of the imputation that he casts upon himself. The contract does not necessarily imply any thing that the law calls maintenance. The law of maintenance, as I understand it upon the modern constructions, is confined to cases where a man improperly, and for the purpose of stirring up litigation and strife, encourages others either to bring actions, or to make defences which they have no right to make. I do not like to give an opinion upon an abstract case, and, therefore, am not desirous to consider it; but if a man were to see a poor person in the street oppressed and abused, and without the means of obtaining redress, and furnished him with money or employed an attorney to obtain redress for his wrongs, it would require a very strong argument to convince me that that man could be said to be stirring up litigation and strife, and to be guilty of the crime of maintenance: I am not prepared to say, that, in modern times, courts of justice ought to come to that conclusion. However, I give no opinion upon that point. In this case I proceed upon the ground, that there was reasonable evidence of a common link of interest uniting the proprietors of the lands in question, at the time they made the agreement. F
H

GURNEY, B.—When the parties entered into this agreement, they seem to have had reasonable ground of belief that they had all one common interest in proving the lands for which the moduses were claimed to be ancient inclosures; and, being of that opinion, I think it follows that there is nothing illegal in the agreement, and, therefore, that this rule must be discharged. I

ROLFE, B.—I am of the same opinion. The only hesitation I have had in the case has arisen from the fear, that the indignation one feels against so unrighteous a defence as the present might lead me into bending the law more than ought to be done. But I think the law here appears to concur with the honesty of the case.

- A It seems that, Jesus College being the lessees of these tithes, and having set up a demand for payment of them in kind, the landowners, not having been accustomed to pay them, met to consider what was to be done. It appears it was stated at the meeting, that if one modus failed the whole must fail. That, perhaps, was wrong; but if it was the bona fide opinion of the proprietors, and they thought it was something in the nature of a farm modus, and that it was apportioned in different shares among the different landowners of the district, and that they had a common interest in it, and, having formed that opinion, they entered into this agreement, the only question on these pleadings is, was that or was it not a legal agreement? What is the agreement? It is an agreement by the proprietors of the land to resist the claim of the college to the payment of tithes in kind, and to support the present moduses. I may observe that these parties were not, in truth, the occupiers—not the parties who really were to pay the tithes, but the landlords. But whatever may be the law of maintenance in modern days, and however it is to be restricted, I do not believe that, in the most stringent times, the act of a landlord in protecting his interest in lands in the occupation of his tenants would be called maintenance, because it is, in truth, protecting his own actual reversionary interest. Any lawful construction must be placed upon this agreement, rather than one that renders it criminal; and the natural construction is, that the proprietors supposed that all the tenants would be included in the proceeding; then, so far from their conduct being illegal, it is merely an arrangement, that, as there is one proceeding against all, they will pay in proportion to their interests. That being the agreement entered into, and the traverse being whether in truth that agreement was or was not illegal, it seems to me to be clear that it was not illegal, and consequently that this rule ought to be discharged.

Rule discharged.

Fire—Accidental fire—Liability of owner of premises—Fire started negligently allowed to spread to adjoining owner's premises—Fires Prevention (Metropolis) Act, 1774 (14 Geo. 3, c. 78), s. 86.

H

By s. 86 of the Fires Prevention (Metropolis) Act, 1774: "...no action, suit or process whatever shall be had, maintained or prosecuted against any person in whose house, chamber, stable, barn or other building, or on whose estate any fire shall . . . accidentally begin. . . ."

This section provides no defence where the fire was produced negligently or where it was started deliberately.

I

The plaintiff and the defendant were the owners of adjoining land. The defendant started a fire on his land, and negligently permitted it to spread to the plaintiff's land where it caused damage and necessitated expenditure by the plaintiff to have it extinguished.

Held: the defendant was liable to the plaintiff at common law for the damage caused and money spent.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 11, 1847. LORD DENMAN, C.J., delivered the following judgment of the court.—This was a motion in arrest of judgment, on a declaration stating that the plaintiff was possessed of a close in which certain hedges and gates were standing, and several trees growing, that the defendant was possessed of an adjoining close, and that the defendant made and kept a fire in his close in such a negligent manner, and at a time when, by reason of the then state of the wind and weather, it was dangerous and improper so to do, that, through the negligence and improper conduct of himself and his servants, and for want of due care and caution, the said fire extended itself out of his close into plaintiff's, and the plaintiff's trees, hedges, fences, etc., were burnt and destroyed. F

The ancient law, or rather custom of England, appears to have been, that a person in whose house a fire originated, which afterwards spread to his neighbour's property and destroyed it, must make good the loss; and it is well established that, where the fire was occasioned by a servant's negligence, the owner, the master of the house where it began, is answerable for the consequences to the sufferer. Turberville v. Stamp (1), the last decided case before the statute 6 Ann. c. 58, makes this plain, and declares the same principle where the fire originates in the defendant's close. The Act contemplates the probability of fires in cities and towns arising from three causes, the want of water, the imperfection of party walls, and the negligence of servants. The Act provided some means for supplying these material defects: but the third section was directed against the moral one, the carelessness or negligence of servants, which (it observes) often causes fires: and it imposes on the servant by whose negligence the fire may have been occasioned a fine of £100, to be distributed among the sufferers at the discretion of the churchwardens, or imprisonment for eighteen months in case of non-payment. The clause, raising the same sum whatever the extent of suffering and the number of the sufferers, and inflicting the same penalty to whatever degree the negligence may have been culpable, without any power to lower the fine or shorten the imprisonment, can scarcely be supposed to have undergone much consideration on the part of the legislature. G

A The most usual cause of fires was assumed to be the negligence of servants: and the enactment might operate to induce habits of caution in that important class. The same statute, in s. 6, enacts that, after a day named, no action shall be maintained against any person in whose house or chamber any fire shall accidentally begin, nor shall any recompense be made by such person for any damage suffered or occasioned thereby.

B Both provisions seem to have found favour with the legislature; for both were re-enacted by 12 Geo. 3, c. 73, and the Fires Prevention (Metropolis) Act, 1774; the latter by s. 86 adding, to the words "house or chamber," "stable, barn, or other building;" and also the words "or on whose estate."

C No terms can be more comprehensive. We cannot doubt that PARKE, B., in Richards v. Easto (2), rightly viewed it as a general law. And, though the word "estate" is used in a sense very different from that which it bears in the language of the law, it clearly applies to land not built upon, and makes the owner of such land liable in the same manner as it had previously the owner of buildings.

D The question then is upon the meaning and effect of the word "accidentally," here applied to fire. And here a very singular doubt has arisen from the mode in which this enactment is discussed by SIR WILLIAM BLACKSTONE in his COMMENTARIES. The passage is introduced by that learned writer incidentally, as an illustration of the principle on which masters are held responsible for the acts of their servants (vol. 1, p. 431):

E "Upon this principle, by the common law, if a servant kept his master's fire negligently, so that his neighbour's house was burned down thereby, an action lay against the master; because this negligence happened in his service. . . . But now the common law is altered by statute 6 Ann., c. [58, ss. 3, 6] which ordains that no action shall be maintained against any, in whose house or chamber any fire shall accidentally begin; for their own loss is sufficient punishment for their own or their servant's carelessness."

F This reason, by the way, is not stated in the Act of Parliament, and must be allowed to be very far from satisfactory; because the principle on which actions are maintainable is not the punishment of guilty persons, but compensation to innocent sufferers. Besides, making servants punishable for fires resulting from their negligence is no exemption of masters from responsibility for the same fault; for fires which accidentally begin are not fires produced by negligence.

G It would, therefore, appear that BLACKSTONE had drawn a conclusion from the enactment cited, which it by no means sustains. LORD LYNTHURST, however, has in some degree sanctioned by his high authority the inference thus drawn by BLACKSTONE, in the remarks by which he prefaced his decision against Lord Canterbury's petition of right (Viscount Canterbury v. A.-G. (3)). We must, however, observe that those remarks are wholly unnecessary for the decision to which he came, and indeed are stated rather as arguments with which that petitioner would H have had to contend, if his cause had come to a hearing on the merits, than as expressing a deliberate opinion.

I It is true that, in strictness, the word accidental may be employed in contradistinction to wilful, and so the same fire might both begin accidentally and be the result of negligence. But it may equally mean a fire produced by mere chance, or incapable of being traced to any cause, and so would stand opposed to the negligence of either servants or masters. When we find it used in statutes which do not speak of wilful fires but make an important provision with respect to such as are accidental, and consider how great a change in the law would be effected, and how great encouragement would be given to that carelessness of which masters may be guilty as well as servants, we must say that we think the plaintiff's construction much the more reasonable of the two.

LORD LYNTHURST in Viscount Canterbury v. A.-G. (3) remarked on the absence of decisions on this point. Yet he mentions two cases, both surely entitled to great weight, one tried before ALDERSON, J., in Berkshire [cited in argument by SERJEANT

TALFOURD in 4 Scott, at p. 248] the other, Vaughan v. Menlove (4) before PATTESON, J., in Shropshire, which latter was very fully discussed on a rule to show cause, and decided by the whole Court of Common Pleas. In both these cases a plaintiff recovered damages for a fire spreading to his corn from the defendant's field through the negligence of the defendant and his servants. His Lordship says that the Fires Prevention (Metropolis) Act, 1774, escaped notice on those occasions. But, if we ask how it came to be overlooked, since it would have furnished a complete and easy defence, the only answer can be the universal impression of the eminent lawyers, both at the Bar and on the Bench, who took part in the argument and judgment, that s. 86 of that Act respecting accidental fires cannot apply to such as are produced by negligence.

It may be further observed, with reference to this doctrine, that the exemption given by this enactment cannot apply. Its words suppose the fire to begin accidentally on the estate of him from whose estate it spreads. This fire did not begin accidentally, but was knowingly lighted by the defendant himself.

Judgment for plaintiff.

Slander—Privilege—Military inquiry—Information given by defendant to officer under duty to inquire and to receive information—Question for jury whether information relevant to inquiry.

The plaintiff had been the commanding officer of an irregular corps of cavalry during the Crimean war and the defendant was the civil commissioner attending the corps. Immediately after the plaintiff had given up his command the general officer commanding directed a colonel to inquire into and report on the condition of the corps, and the colonel was referred to the defendant for information. The defendant was authorised to give the information, and he gave certain information to the colonel who passed it on in a letter to the general. The defendant admitted that the letter contained in substance the information he had given to the colonel and that the contents of the letter were defamatory of the plaintiff, but he claimed that what passed between the colonel and himself was privileged.

Held: it was a question of fact for the jury whether the communication the defendant made to the colonel was relevant to the inquiry that the colonel had to make and in which the defendant was to assist him.

Evidence—Document—Privilege—State paper—Injury to public service—Possibility of injury—Determination by head of Government Department.

If the production of a State paper would be injurious to the public service, the general public service must be considered paramount to the individual interest of a suitor in a court of justice. Whether the production of the document would be injurious to the public service must be determined, not by the judge, but by the head of the Department having the custody of the paper. If he states that in his opinion the production of the document would be injurious to the public service, the judge ought not to compel the production of it.

Rule Nisi obtained by the plaintiff to set aside the verdict for the defendant and for a new trial in an action for slander brought by the plaintiff, General Beatson against the defendant Mr. Skene. The most important part of the slander alleged was contained in the following passage:

- G "When General Smith arrived at the Dardanelles, General Beatson assembled the commanding officers of regiments, and actually endeavoured to persuade them to make a mutiny in their regiments against General Smith, and against the authority of General Vivian."

At the trial before BRAMWELL, B., and a jury, verdict was given for the defendant with leave reserved to the plaintiff to move the full court. In pursuance of such leave a rule nisi was obtained on the following grounds: (i) that there was no evidence to prove a prima facie case of privilege and that the judge should have directed the jury accordingly; (ii) that the judge should have ordered the production by the Secretary of State for War of certain letters and notes in his possession; and (iii) that the verdict was against the weight of the evidence.

- H Bovill, Q.C., Lush, Q.C., and Garth for the defendant, showed cause against the rule.

E. James, Q.C., Hawkins, Q.C., and Gray for the plaintiff, supported the rule.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 2, 1860. POLLOCK, C.B., delivered the following judgment of the court.—This was an action for slander tried before BRAMWELL, B., during Hilary Term last. The alleged slander was the speaking of certain words by the defendant to Colonel (now General) Shirley, in February, 1856.

The plaintiff had been the general commanding an irregular corps of cavalry during the war in the Crimea. He gave up his command in September, 1855. The defendant was the civil commissioner attending the corps. General Vivian, under whose general command the corps was placed prior to September, 1855, directed Colonel Shirley to inquire into and report the condition of the corps, and referred him to the defendant for information, writing also to the defendant to give it. Colonel Shirley wrote a letter to General Vivian in consequence. The defendant adopted the contents of that letter as containing the substance of his communication to Colonel Shirley, and admitted his responsibility to the contents of the letter, if any there were. That letter contained matter which, if spoken, must be deemed slanderous, unless the occasion on which it was uttered furnished a justification. The plaintiff, therefore, was entitled to a verdict, unless the defence set up could be established—viz., that what passed between the defendant and Colonel Shirley was a privileged communication. The jury found a verdict for the defendant. In the following term a motion was made for a new trial on three grounds: first, that the learned judge had declined to compel the production of certain documents; secondly, that he had misdirected the jury; thirdly, that the verdict was against the evidence.

With respect to the first point, it appeared that the Secretary of State for War, Mr. Sidney Herbert, had been subpoenaed to produce certain letters written by the plaintiff to him, and also the minutes of a court of inquiry as to Colonel Shirley's conduct in writing the letter in question to General Vivian. Mr. Sidney Herbert attended at the trial, but objected to produce the documents, on the ground that his doing so would be injurious to the public service. The learned judge refused to compel their production on Mr. Sidney Herbert making this statement, and this forms the first ground upon which the rule for a new trial was obtained. Now, it turns out, on referring to the date and nature of the documents called for, that not one of them could have been given in evidence on the trial had they been actually produced. Seven of the letters were written long before the conversation complained of took place, and the defendant was in no way a party or privy to the writing of any of them. As to the notes or minutes of what passed on the inquiry, they had been taken by a person who was not present at the trial to prove their correctness, and therefore the mere notes were certainly not admissible as evidence. It may be further remarked that no prejudice could have been sustained by the plaintiff, inasmuch as the defendant admitted on the inquiry that he had spoken the words, as was proved at the trial by a witness who took a note of what passed on that occasion. Nor was any doubt or question raised at the trial as to the fact that the conversation complained of had taken place. Under these circumstances we are all of opinion that the non-production of these documents furnished no ground for a new trial. Indeed, had the documents been produced and received in evidence, and the verdict had been for the plaintiff instead of (as it was) for the defendant, the reception of the evidence (if objected to) would have been a ground for a new trial; but inasmuch as BRAMWELL, B., did not at the trial take this view of the case, but declined to compel the production of the evidence on the ground that the Secretary for War stated that the production of the documents would be injurious to the public service, we think it due to BRAMWELL, B., and to the importance of the question to express the entire concurrence of a majority of the court in that ruling of his.

We are all of opinion that it cannot be laid down that all public documents of every sort, including treaties with foreign powers, and all the correspondence that may precede or accompany them, and all communications to the heads of departments, are to be produced and made public whenever a suitor in a court of justice thinks that his case requires such production. It is manifest, we think, that there must be a limit to the duty or the power of compelling the production of papers which are connected with acts of State. As an instance we would put the case of a British Minister at a foreign court writing in that capacity a letter to the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs in this country containing matter injurious to the reputation of a foreigner, or possibly a British subject; can it be contended that

- A the person referred to would have a right to compel the production of the letter in order to take the opinion of a jury whether the injurious matter was written maliciously or not? We are of opinion that, if the production of a State paper would be injurious to the public service, the general public interest must be considered paramount to the individual interest of a suitor in a court of justice; and the question then arises, How is this to be determined? It is manifest it must be
- B determined either by the presiding judge or by the responsible servant of the Crown in whose custody the paper is. The judge would be unable to determine it without ascertaining what the document was, and why the publication of it would be injurious to the public service—an inquiry which cannot take place in private, and which taking place in public may do all the mischief which it is proposed to guard against.
- C It appears to us, therefore, that the question whether the production of the document would be injurious to the public service must be determined, not by the judge, but by the head of the Department having the custody of the paper; and if he is in attendance and states that in his opinion the production of the document would be injurious to the public service, we think the judge ought not to compel the production of it. The administration of justice is only a part of the general conduct of
- D the affairs of any State or nation, and we think that it is (with respect to the production or nonproduction of a State paper in a court of justice) subordinate to the general welfare of the community. If the head of the Department does not attend personally to say that the production of the document will be injurious, but sends the document to be produced or not as the judge may think proper, or, as was the case in Dickson v. Earl of Wilton (1), before LORD CAMPBELL, when a subordinate
- E was sent with the document with instructions to object, but nothing more, then indeed the case may be different—the judge may compel the production of it.
- MARTIN, B., does not entirely agree with us as to the general view we have taken of this question. He is of opinion that whenever the judge is satisfied that the document may be made public without prejudice to the public service, the judge ought to compel its production, notwithstanding the reluctance of the head of the
- F Department to produce it; and perhaps cases might arise where the matter would be so clear that the judge might well ask for it in spite of some official scruples as to producing it; but this must be considered rather as an extreme case, and extreme cases throw very little light upon the practical rules of life.
- The second ground upon which the rule for a new trial was obtained was the misdirection of the learned judge. The misdirection complained of was, that the
- G judge left it to the jury to say whether the communication the defendant made to Colonel Shirley was relevant to the inquiry that Colonel Shirley had to make, and in which the defendant was to assist him. It was argued that the judge ought to have told the jury it was not, and that he ought to have directed them to find a verdict for the plaintiff. We are of opinion that the direction was right. Colonel Shirley
- H had been directed to inquire into the condition of the corps, and had been referred to the defendant for information, and the defendant had been directed to give him the information. It is impossible to say that the condition of the corps in February, 1855, might not be affected, which would depend in some manner upon the circumstances attending the transfer of the command in the previous autumn. The doubt, as far as there is any, is rather the other way—whether the judge ought not to have
- I told the jury as a matter of law that the communication was relevant to the inquiry Colonel Shirley had to make, which it certainly might have been. The question, however, involved matters of fact, and was, therefore, properly left to the jury, and we see no reason to be dissatisfied with their finding.

It was further contended that, assuming the question was properly left to the jury, their verdict was against the evidence in the cause, and great reliance was placed on the summing-up of the learned judge, which certainly was very much in favour of the plaintiff. The jury, however, found for the defendant, and, with the concurrence of BRAMWELL, B., we think that they were right. The plaintiff's counsel relied on expressions used by the defendant in giving his own account of the matter on cross-examination, such as that "he volunteered the statement"; that "the communication was not official," and similar expressions. The answer to this is, that when once a confidential relation is established between two persons with regard to an inquiry of a private nature, whatever takes place between them relevant to the same subject, though at a time and place different from those at which the confidential relation began, may be entitled to protection, as well as what passed at the original interview, and it is a question for the jury whether any further conversation on the same subject, though apparently casual and voluntary, does not take place under the influence of the confidential relation already established between them, and is, therefore, entitled to the same protection. No doubt, the jury acted on this view, and we think they were quite justified in doing so. The result is, that all the grounds for a new trial fail, and the rule must be discharged.

Rule discharged.

Slander—Evidence—Special meaning of words—Questions to be put by counsel.

The proper course for a counsel who proposes to get rid of the plain and obvious meaning of words imputed to a defendant as spoken of the plaintiff is to ask the witness, not "What did you understand by these words?", but "Was there anything to prevent these words from conveying the meaning which ordinarily they would convey?" If there was, evidence of that may be given, and when it appears that something occurred by which the witness understood the words in a sense different from their ordinary meaning, the question then may be put: "What did you understand by them?"

Rule Nisi obtained by the plaintiffs for a new trial of an action tried by POLLOCK,

A C.B., and brought by the plaintiffs against the defendant for slander in the way of their business.

The two plaintiffs were partners in a firm of glass merchants and they had had various business dealings with the defendant who was also a glass merchant. The defendant told a witness that he had written to his agents to settle his account with the plaintiffs and stop supplies. He said he had done this because the first plaintiff was not to be trusted. When the witness said his firm had bills from the plaintiffs the defendant said: "Then you must look sharp to get those bills met by them." Counsel for the plaintiff sought to ask the witness at the trial: "What did you understand by that?" but the question was held to be inadmissible, and judgment was subsequently entered for the defendant. The plaintiffs obtained a rule nisi for a new trial on the ground that the question was improperly rejected.

C Sir Frederic Thesiger and T. Jones for the defendant, showed cause against the rule.

M. Chambers and Bovill for the plaintiffs, supported the rule.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 5, 1848. POLLOCK, C.B., delivered the following judgment of the court.—
D In this case a motion was made for a new trial, on the ground of the improper rejection of evidence. The case was moved by counsel for the plaintiffs on the ground that he was not allowed to put the following question to a witness who heard part of the conversation: "What did you understand by that?" I stated to the learned counsel, at the time that the trial was going on, that I did not reject the question altogether, but that, in my judgment, he could not put the question in that shape; and he declined to put it in any other, but applied to the court for a rule for a new trial. The court granted a rule, and the case was fully argued.

E We are of opinion that the question could not be so put. There can be no doubt that words may be understood by bystanders to import something very different from their obvious meaning. The bystanders may perceive that what is uttered is uttered in an ironical sense, and, therefore, that it may mean directly the reverse of what it professes to mean. Something may have previously passed which gives a peculiar character and meaning to some expression; and some word which ordinarily or popularly is used in one sense may, from something that has gone before, be restricted and confined to a particular sense, or may mean something different from that which it ordinarily and usually does mean. But the proper course for a
F counsel who proposes so to get rid of the plain and obvious meaning of words
G imputed to a defendant, as spoken of the plaintiff, is to ask the witness, not "What did you understand by those words?" but "Was there anything to prevent those words from conveying the meaning which ordinarily they would convey?" If it appears that something occurred by which the witness understood the words in a sense different from their ordinary meaning, evidence of that may be given; and then, when you have laid the foundation for it, the question may be put, "What H did you understand by them?" when I believe we may say that generally no question ought to be put in such a form as possibly to lead to an illegal answer. Taken by itself, and without more, the understanding of a person who hears an expression is not the legal mode by which it is to be explained. If words are uttered or printed, the ordinary sense of those words is to be taken to be the meaning of the speaker; but no doubt a foundation may be laid by showing something else which I has occurred; some other matter may be introduced, and then, when that has been done, the witness may be asked, with reference to that other matter, what was the sense in which he understood the words. But the mere question: "What did you understand with reference to such an expression?" we think is not the correct mode of putting the question. The rule, therefore, for a new trial must be discharged.

Rule discharged.

Will—Legacy—Priority—Charge on real estate—Legacies followed by gift of residuary realty and personalty—Mortgage of realty.

If there is a general gift of legacies and then the testator gives the rest and residue of his property, real and personal, the legacies come out of the realty.

A testator by will bequeathed to M. £1,000 and to A. £5,000, and "as to all the rest of my real and personal property, I bequeath and devise the same to my son M. in the fullest manner I can with liberty to him to dispose of the same as he thinks proper." Twenty-one years after the testator's death M. mortgaged the real estate which was subsequently sold, and the question arose whether the legacies were a charge upon the real estate which had priority over the mortgage.

Held: the legacies were a charge upon the real estate, and no power was given in the will to M. to mortgage the estate free from the legacies.

I

Appeal from a decision of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland and the Lord Justice of the Court of Appeal in Ireland (BLACKBURNE) affirming the judgment of the Com-

A missioners of Incumbered Estates in an action brought to determine the construction of the will of one John Browne.

By his will, dated Jan. 27, 1825, the testator, John Browne, after giving certain legacies generally to his widow Margaret Browne, and the respondent Anne Browne, gave all the rest and residue of his property, real and personal, to his son Michael. The testator died in 1825, and his son Michael entered into possession of the real estates. In 1846 Michael mortgaged the same for £30,000, and they were afterwards sold by the Commissioners of Incumbered Estates. The question then raised was whether the legacies to Margaret and Anne Browne were charged by the will on the fee-simple and freehold estates of the testator, and whether such charges were entitled to be paid or set apart and secured out of the produce of the sale in priority to the mortgage of 1846. The Commissioners of Incumbered Estates held that the legacies were charges entitled to priority, and the Lord Chancellor of Ireland and the Lord Justice of Appeal affirmed the judgment. The present appeal was then brought.

D Sir Richard Bethell, Q.C., and Moxon for the appellants (mortgagees) contended that the legacies were not charged on the real estates of the testator; but if they were, then Michael Browne must be taken to have mortgaged such real estate to pay the legacies, and the mortgagees ought not to be considered as bound to see to the application of the mortgage money.

E Roundell Palmer, Q.C., and Lawless for the respondent (legatee), contended that the legacies were well charged on the real estates, and no power was given either expressly or by implication to Michael Browne to dispose of the lands discharged of the legacies.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

July 29, 1859. The following opinions were read.

F LORD CAMPBELL, L.C.—In this case I am of opinion that the decision of Mr. Commissioner LONGFIELD and Mr. Commissioner HARGREAVE, confirmed by the Lord Chancellor of Ireland and the Lord Justice of Appeal in Ireland, is right; and I think that if your Lordships were to come to a contrary conclusion, you would disturb the well settled and useful rules of property which have prevailed for a century and a half.

G The first question is whether these legacies are a charge upon the real estate. If it were res integra, and we had to construe this will by the language employed, without any reference to the construction which has been put upon similar language in other wills, I should allow that there is great force in the very able and ingenious argument we have had from the Bar. It might well be supposed that the testator had no notion whatsoever of charging the land with these legacies; but we find that from the time of LORD MACCLESFIELD and LORD COWPER down to the time of LORD COTTENHAM and PAGE-WOOD, V.-C., a rule has prevailed upon this subject which has been acted upon uniformly by all judges, except one, LORD ALVANLEY—a very eminent authority (I do not mean in the slightest degree to disparage him), but with that exception, by all the judges that have determined such cases for nearly a century and a half this rule has been laid down and acted upon, that if there be a general gift of legacies, and then the testator gives the rest and residue of his property, real and personal, the legacies are to come out of the realty. It is considered that the whole is one mass—that part of that mass is represented by legacies, and that what is afterwards given is given minus what has been before given, and, therefore, given subject to the prior gift. That seems to me to be the view which was taken in Awbrey v. Middleton (1) before LORD COWPER, and in Davis v. Gardiner (2) before LORD MACCLESFIELD. The language in which it is expressed varies from time to time, but still that rule seems to have been uniformly acted upon, and I would say, in the language of PAGE-WOOD, V.-C., in the last case upon the subject, Wheeler v. Howell (3), that in the present case

if we held the legacy not to be a charge, the principle of the decision being, in truth, the same in the case of legacies as in that of debt." A

I, therefore, my Lords, conceive it to be unnecessary to travel over and criticise that long series of cases which seems to establish that rule as a general rule that must be acted upon, that the testator, in using this language in his will, must be supposed to use it according to the sense in which the words have uniformly been construed, and to mean that the legacies should be a charge upon the real estate. B

Here the testator gives the legacies generally, and then he says :

"As to all the rest, residue and remainder of any property I may die possessed of or entitled to, of what nature soever, whether estates, freehold leases, leases for years, stocks of every kind, also bills, bonds, notes, annuities, or otherwise, I hereby bequeath, devise, give and grant the same to my first object on earth, my son Michael Joseph Browne, in the fullest manner I can." C

It is quite clear that here there is first a general gift of legacies, and then there is a disposition of the rest, residue and remainder of the property real and personal, of what nature soever, to his son. Therefore, following the rule which has been so long acted upon, these legacies are clearly charged upon the real estate.

Then, my Lords, as to the second point, the discharge: twenty-one years after the death of the testator, his son mortgaged the land for £50,000, and it is allowed that upon the face of the deed there is no reference whatsoever to those legacies. No part of the legacies was paid; and I presume that after he had thus charged the land with the legacies, unless there was some special power in the will, enabling the son to sell the land discharged from the legacies, it can hardly be supposed that what has taken place can amount to a discharge of the burden that was placed upon the land in respect of the legacies. No authority has been quoted to show that this power exists. Is there, then, here any such special power? I am of opinion that the words that follow what I have read are mere surplusage. They merely express what would otherwise be implied. This testator is fond of a florid style; he deals in superlatives; he is very rhetorical, and he makes use of a great many more words than would be sufficient to accomplish his purpose. He says: "I hereby devise, bequeath, give and grant the same to my first object on earth, my son Michael Joseph Browne, in the fullest manner I can or shall have it in my power, with liberty to him to dispose of the same in any way he may think proper." We are now considering whether the lands have been discharged of the legacies. We must consider that they are charged with them. Then he having thus charged the land, did he mean by these words to give his eldest son the power of disposing of the land at any time, so that the younger children would be deprived of the security which he had before provided for them? I think that no such meaning can be educed from the language he employs; and that therefore this mortgage has not the effect of discharging the land of these legacies. My opinion is, that this appeal should be dismissed and the decree affirmed. D E F G H

LORD BROUGHAM.—I entirely concur with my noble and learned friend that these legacies are a charge upon the land. The only difference of opinion that I have with him is, that whereas my noble and learned friend said, that if it were res integra, not ruled by a long current of decisions, there might be a doubt about it. I really have no doubt at all about it. In the first place I have no doubt that the decisions which have been given upon this subject are strictly and logically correct; and then I have no doubt also upon the construction of the words themselves that the legacies are a charge upon the land. I

LORD CRANWORTH.—I concur in the opinion which has been expressed by my noble and learned friend, and I also concur with my noble and learned friend LORD BROUGHAM, that if there had not been a single decision upon this subject, if I were only called upon to say what is the meaning of such a devise, according to the natural meaning of the words, and knowing by what class of persons they are writ-

A ten, I should not have the least doubt in the world that nine persons out of ten would mean exactly what the cases have interpreted the words to mean. The distinction that is suggested between real and personal property is an artificial part of the case. It is perfectly true that we know how differently real property and personal property are dealt with by our law. In reading a devise of real estate to one person, and of personal legacies to another, and of the rest and residue of the real and personal property to a third, we may see that there might be a mode of interpreting it reddendo singula singulis—meaning to give the rest of the personal property to one person, and the rest of the realty to another. But that is not the natural meaning of the words. I feel the force of what was said by SIR JOHN LEACH in Cole v. Turner (4), where, with reference to the words “the rest and residue of my real and personal estate,” he says that the rest and residue mean something after something has been deducted. After what has been deducted? Why, that which has been given before; and that appears to me to solve the whole difficulty.

Counsel for the appellants, in his very able argument, tried to point out a distinction which exists in some of the earlier cases, for the purpose of showing that the generality of the rule as laid down in the more modern cases was not warranted by those earlier decisions; and he refers particularly to Awbrey v. Middleton (1) as being the earliest—which, as far as I know, is the earliest case upon the subject—and he endeavoured to distinguish that case by the circumstance that the legacies there were directed to be paid by the executor, and the gift of the general residue of the realty and personalty was to the executor. He is perfectly correct in that; but it is a singular thing that not only does LORD COWPER not put his decision upon that, but the argument of the counsel at the Bar, adverting to that circumstance of the direction of the legacies to be paid by the executor, actually puts it as an argument for the contrary result, and says that, inasmuch as the legacies were to be paid by the executor, that shows that they were to be paid only out of the personal estate. In truth, in Awbrey v. Middleton (1), the real question as I understood it was, whether, under the gift of “all the rest and residue of his goods and chattels and estate,” real estate was meant to be included. There had been a previous gift in the will of a particular real estate, and the question seemed to turn upon this, whether the word “estate” there was to be held to include real estate; and LORD COWPER said that inasmuch as he begins by saying, “As to all my worldly estate I give in manner following,” the word “estate” was to be taken to include real estate. But he does not put it at all upon the fact of the direction to the executor who was his nephew and sole residuary legatee. What he says is this

G (2 Eq. Cas. Abr. at p. 498):

“Now the words (rest and residue) in this place may have some stress laid upon them, and seem to refer to the introductive clause in the will (as to all his worldly estate, etc.), which certainly extend to lands in a will, and will bear a larger construction by reference to the first clause, by which he intimates that he intended to dispose of all his estate, both real and personal, by his will; and, therefore, he was of opinion that, by the devise of all the rest and residue of his goods, chattels and estate, all his lands do pass to his executor, and that he takes by the will, and not by the descent as heir-at-law.”

Then, with regard to the decision of Bench v. Biles (5), before SIR JOHN LEACH, the Attorney-General endeavoured, very ably, to distinguish it from the present case.

I It appears to me to be utterly indistinguishable. It is true that, in that case, the blending of the real estate with the personal took place during the life of the widow, who took the whole during her life. What difference does that make? The testator gives all his real and personal estate to his wife for life, he gives pecuniary legacies, and all the rest, residue and remainder of his real and personal estate he gave, devised and bequeathed to his two nephews. How is the effect of that altered by the fact that there had been a previous life-estate before the pecuniary legacies took effect? That authority was followed by the same learned judge in Cole v. Turner (4), when he was at the Rolls, and which has been evidently followed by LORD COTTENHAM in Mirehouse v. Scaife (6), and it has been since followed by PAGE-WOOD, V.-C., in Francis v. Clemow (7) and Wheeler v. Howell (8). I feel perfectly confident that if we could know the quantities of property that have been distributed, of which there is no report, in reliance upon the rule of construction laid down by these decisions, we should feel that we were doing the great possible injustice if we were to swerve in the slightest degree from what I consider to be the settled canon of construction. I, therefore, concur with my noble and learned friends that the judgment below ought to be affirmed.

LORD WENSLEYDALE.—The question in this case is as to the construction of the will of Mr. Browne—what is the true meaning of that will? I take it to be a long and well-established rule that we must read the words of a will in their ordinary grammatical sense, and give them no other construction than that, unless so reading them leads to some absurdity, or some contradiction to another part of the instrument which is to be construed. There is no occasion to apply the latter part of the rule in this case. The question upon the construction of this will depends entirely upon the grammatical meaning of the words in it. I confess myself that, without reference to former decisions that have been given upon the subject, if I had read this will for the first time, and had not known that there was any decision upon it, I should not have entertained the least doubt as to the meaning of this will. The testator first begins by a charge upon the estate of £100 a year, with power to distrain. That is clearly a charge upon the real estate. He then gives other legacies of £1,000 and £5,000, and other small legacies, which are clearly prima facie a charge upon the personal estate, and then he gives the residue in these terms already quoted. I certainly should not feel the least doubt myself that the meaning of that was simply to leave the rest of the personal estate minus the charge upon the personal estate, and the rest of the real estate minus the charge upon the real estate. That would give effect to every word in the will. That is, "I leave the remainder of my real estate, charged as aforesaid, and I leave the rest of my personal estate, which has several charges upon it before." I should not have had the slightest doubt that that was the true construction of it, and I should never have dreamt that the testator meant to say that the charge upon the personal estate was to be transferred to the real estate. There is no doubt it is frequently done, and I have heard complaints at the Bar myself, and I have strongly shared in those complaints, that in all questions of this kind relating to wills, innumerable cases are cited which are of very little authority; because the words of one will differ so much from those of another, that there is seldom any light derived from decisions upon other wills. If, indeed, a long course of decisions has established a particular meaning as belonging to particular words, the testator must be supposed to have used those words in that sense, and they must be so construed. But, short of that, I think very little effect is to be attributed to former decided cases. My doubt is, certainly, after hearing the very able argument of counsel for the appellants at the Bar, whether you can predicate from this long bead-roll of cases, that any such principle has been established that, because a testator happens to mention real and personal property in one category, therefore, the property is liable for the legacies. But, as my noble and learned friends take a different view, and considering that it has been established as a proposition that wherever realty and personalty are united together in one fund, they are both made subject to the legacies given by the will; if that be so, of course that rule of construction must be applied to this particular will. But I own for myself that it would require a much more careful consideration of the authorities than I have now given to lead me to come to that conclusion. The impression upon my own mind is that there has been no such positive rule established.

It is, no doubt, of great importance that the House should adhere to the established rules of construction. But the citation of cases frequently misleads. I will refer as an illustration of this to a particular instance which occurred in the earlier part of my own professional career, or rather before it. There was an Act of Parlia-

A ment upon the subject of annuities, the statute 17 Geo. 3, c. 26 [repealed by S.L.R., 1861], upon which there has been a series of decisions, and the courts were in the habit of looking at the decisions instead of looking at the statute, and they gradually got extremely wrong, and at last it occurred to them that it would be proper to consider the statute itself, and the result was that almost all those decisions were done away. I think it is of the utmost importance in all those cases that we should

B see what the object of the testator is. On looking at this will, I do not feel any doubt about its true meaning.

With respect to the other part of the case, I concur entirely with my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack—I think these words at the conclusion of the will really give no power at all; they are only an amplification of his gift of the entire estate. “I give and grant the same to my son Michael Joseph Browne in the C fullest manner I can.” That means merely, I give it to him in fee-simple, “with liberty to him to dispose of the same.” That is merely a consequence of his having the fee-simple. Therefore, I think in this case there is no power given to mortgage the estate free from the legacies.

LORD KINGSDOWN.—I confess that when I read this will at first, it appeared

D to me to be so clear upon the authorities, as I had understood them to be when I was more familiar with them than I am afraid I can boast of being now, that I thought that some subsequent decision must have altered or diminished the authority of those cases. But from the argument that has been addressed at the Bar, it appears that, instead of the rule being limited, it has, I think, been extended, I do not say at all too far, but certainly something beyond the exact principle to

E which those former authorities went, because it has been applied, I think, in the late cases (I do not mean to cast any doubt upon them) not merely to property given under the words “rest and residue,” but to property given previously to the gift either of the residue or the legacies. I confess it seems to me that the rule is one of extremely good sense. If any person unfamiliar with the technicalities of the law were to read a will to this effect—the testator gives a certain portion of his property

F to one person, and devises all the rest of his property to another—I cannot doubt that his opinion would be that “the rest” must be construed to mean that which remains after what was previously given has been withdrawn. The distinction which is relied upon by the counsel for the appellants is, I think, a distinction which is founded not upon general principles or upon the ordinary sense of mankind, but entirely upon the technical rules of the English law. If a testator having an

G estate for 999 years, or leaseholds for years, made a devise of this kind, nobody could imagine but that he intended his personal estate to be subjected to the payment of his legacies. If part of that estate, instead of being leasehold for 999 years, was in fee, or if, instead of being leaseholds for years, renewable according to custom, it was leases for lives renewable for ever, no one could suppose that he meant to distinguish between the two, and that the one should be subject to legacies

H and the other not. I believe, therefore, myself that the rule is founded in perfectly good sense and justice, and I must honestly confess that I think nothing but the great authority, and still greater ability with which the point has been argued at the Bar, would have made it a subject of reasonable doubt.

As to the other point which was hardly argued at the Bar, I think, when it comes to be considered, the point does not really arise. There is no doubt, I apprehend,

I that you may infer a power to give receipts and discharges, where you have a power of sale for the purpose of making certain payments; but where there is an absolute gift of the real and personal estate to the ultimate devisee for his own use and benefit to dispose of it as he thinks fit, in what character is he trustee? If he had accepted the executorship, possibly some argument might have been raised. I do not say that even then that would have made a difference, but in that case possibly some argument might have been raised. But he is not executor; he is in no degree liable for the payment of the legacies; he is in no degree liable for the administration of the assets; he is simply owner of the estate, subject to the charge. Even if he had been trustee, I should have doubted very much whether there was any power. If there had been such a power, as the counsel for the appellants suggests, of disposing of the estate as he thinks fit, that would have made it a different question; but these legacies being charged upon the estate at a period which has not yet arrived, and which may never arrive, in what possible right can the owner of this estate say: "I will raise this money?" What can he do with it, except keep it in his own hands till the period arrives, if it ever should arrive, at which the legacies would become payable out of the fund? Therefore, I have not the smallest doubt in this case that your Lordships ought to affirm the decree of the court below.

Orders affirmed.

WOOD AND ANOTHER v. WAUD AND OTHERS

[COURT OF EXCHEQUER (Pollock, C.B., Parke, Alderson and Rolfe, BB.), November 22, December 1, 1848, April 27, 1849]

[Reported 3 Exch. 748; 18 L.J.Ex. 305; 13 L.T.O.S. 212;
13 Jur. 472; 154 E.R. 1047]

Water—Pollution—Defence to action—Pollution by persons other than defendant—Pollution by defendant immaterial.

A riparian owner has a right to the water of the stream flowing through his land in the state of its natural purity, and he can maintain an action against any person polluting the water. In such an action it is no defence to show that owing to the pollution of the water by other riparian owners the wrongful act of the defendant has made no practical difference as it rendered the water no less suitable for use by the plaintiff than it had been before any pollution by the defendant had occurred.

Water—Diversion—Pollution—Artificial watercourse—Temporary enjoyment.

No action lies for damage by the diversion or pollution of an artificial watercourse where from the nature of the case it is obvious that the enjoyment of it depended on temporary circumstances and was not of a permanent character and the interruption of the user of the watercourse was by a party who stood in the situation of the grantor. A watercourse, of whatever antiquity or in whatever degree enjoyed by numerous persons, cannot be enjoyed so as to confer a right to the use of the water if the watercourse is proved to have been originally artificial.

Action on the case for damages for fouling and diverting water away from a watercourse.

The plaintiffs were possessed of mills and premises adjacent to a stream, of which they said, they, of right ought to enjoy the advantage of the water in a state of purity, but the defendants had wrongfully discharged into the water above the plaintiffs' mills, quantities of foul and offensive materials. The defendants' works, which had been erected within twenty years previously, had, by pouring in soap-suds, woolcombers' suds, and other matter, fouled the water of the stream, but the defendants pleaded that the stream was already so polluted by similar acts of mill-owners above the defendants' mills, by dyers still further up the stream, and also by sewers in a neighbouring town that the pollution of the water by them (the defendants) did not make it less applicable to useful purposes than the water was before.

At the trial before ROLFE, B., and a special jury at the York Summer Assizes, 1845, a verdict was found for the plaintiffs on each count of the declaration subject to the opinion of the Court of Exchequer on a Case, the facts of which appear sufficiently from the judgment of the court.

Cowling for the plaintiffs.

H. Hill for the defendants.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 27, 1849. POLLOCK, C.B., delivered the following judgment of the court.
I —This was an action on the case. The declaration contained four counts. [His LORDSHIP said that the first count stated that the plaintiffs were lawfully possessed of certain mills, lands, and premises, and by reason thereof of right were entitled to enjoy the advantage of the water of a watercourse called the Bowling Beck which ought to have run and flowed in great abundance and purity without the disturbance, pollution, and heating hereafter mentioned, to the said mills of the plaintiffs, to supply the same with water for working them, and enjoying the land and premises, and other necessary purposes, yet the defendants wrongfully discharged into the water of the watercourse above the mills quantities of foul, noxious, impure, and offensive materials, to wit, lees of soap, and the washings, filth, and refuse of wool which the defendants washed near to and above the mills, and of other dirt, filth, and impurity, and also discharged and poured into and mixed with the water of the watercourse quantities of noxious water, by means whereof the water of the watercourse was rendered foul, dirty, heated, spoiled, and unfit to be used for working the plaintiffs' mills, or for the enjoyment of their lands and premises. The second count referred to other mills of the plaintiffs and alleged that the plaintiffs had suffered damage through the defendants pressing and laying on the bed of the watercourse quantities of earth, clay, stone, and other materials, and so diverting water away from these mills. The third count stated that the plaintiffs were lawfully possessed of other mills, from which the water of another watercourse, called the Bowling Sough, had been wrongfully diverted by the defendants, and the fourth count alleged that the plaintiffs had suffered damage from the diversion by the defendants into a reservoir of a watercourse called the Low Moor Sough, which flowed into the Bowling Beck. The defendants pleaded "Not Guilty" and denied that the plaintiffs were entitled to the flow of water which they claimed.]

The first question to be disposed of is in what way the issue on Not Guilty is to be found, so far as that applies to the first and second counts, which are framed to recover damages for obstructions and injuries to the natural watercourse, the Bowling Beck. It is conceded by the plaintiffs' counsel that the verdict must be found for the defendants on the plea of Not Guilty on the second count; it is conceded by the defendants' counsel, that it must be found for the plaintiff on so much of the general issue as relates to the heating of the water. The only question, therefore, on this issue is whether the remainder, which relates to the fouling the water, is to be entered for the plaintiffs or the defendants. The fact, as found by the jury, is that the defendants, whose works have been erected within twenty years (and who have no right by long enjoyment or grant so to do), have fouled the water of the natural stream, by pouring in soapsuds, woolcomber's suds, etc., but that pollution of the natural stream has done no damage to the plaintiffs because it was already so polluted by similar acts of millowners above the defendants' mills, by dyers still further up the stream, and some sewers in the town of Bradford, that the wrongful act of the defendants made no practical difference, that is, that the pollution by the defendants did not make the water less applicable to useful purposes than such water was before. We think, notwithstanding, that the plaintiffs have received damage in point of law. They had a right to the natural stream flowing through the lands in its natural state as an incident to the right to the land on which the watercourse flowed, and that right continues, except so far as it may have been derogated from by user or by grant to the neighbouring landowners. This is the case, therefore, of an injury to a right. The defendants, by continuing the practice for twenty years, might establish a right to the easement of discharging into the stream the foul water from the works. If the dye-works and other manufactories, and other sources of pollution above the plaintiffs, should be afterwards discontinued, the plaintiffs, who would otherwise have had, in that case, pure water, would be compellable to submit to this nuisance, which then would do serious damage to them. We think, therefore, that the verdict must be entered for the plaintiffs on every part of the plea of Not Guilty to the first count.

The next question is in what way the verdict is to be entered on the third and fifth issues to the first and second counts. These issues arise on the traverse of the plaintiffs' right to the watercourse, by reason of the possession of the mills. On the part of the defendants it was contended that, although the plaintiffs might have had a right to the stream of water running along the watercourse in its natural state as incident to the right to the land, they had no right by reason of the possession of the mills, because they had not enjoyed those mills in their present condition for twenty years, and, therefore, had acquired no right in respect of them. For the plaintiffs, it was insisted that, if this argument were well founded, the plaintiffs would still be entitled to have so much of the issues as relates to the right in respect

A of the land found for them. To that we assent, not thinking that there is any distinction between this and Ricketts v. Salway (1). That, however, would, if the defendants should insist upon it, require a special entry, finding a part only for the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs, therefore, contend that the whole ought to be found for them, because if they had a right to the watercourse before the mill was constructed, without the abstraction by the defendants, and just before the commencement of the suit had appropriated the water to the use of the mill, they might have recovered for the injury to the mill, and might have stated that they were entitled to the use of the water for the mill by reason of the possession of the mill. The former proposition the defendants do not deny; the latter they dispute, and principally rely on Frankum v. Earl of Falmouth (2). We think that the plaintiffs are right on this point, and that Frankum v. Earl of Falmouth (2) is distinguishable.

C There the claim seems not to the flow of the water in its natural course for the supply of the mill, but to an easement to dam the water back in alieno solo, and, as the mill was not twenty years old, that claim could not be established.

The remaining questions relate to the two soughs, called Bowling Sough and Low Moor Sough, and are very important, and also novel. Both of these differ from the Bowling Beck in this respect—that was an immemorial stream, a natural stream, and flowing above ground, whereas the Bowling Sough and Low Moor Sough are not immemorial, and they are artificial and underground. They differ also between themselves in one respect, that one, the Bowling Sough, was constructed on the land now belonging to the plaintiffs, and part of the water thereof was used by them by a direct communication between the sough and the plaintiffs' reservoir for the purposes of the mill, before the alleged diversion by the defendants. The other, the Low Moor Sough, only communicated with the Bowling Beck, and not in the plaintiffs' land. Both agreed in one respect—that they were diverted before the water flowing along became part of the Bowling Beck stream. Under these circumstances, questions of considerable nicety arise. We agree with the learned counsel for the plaintiffs in his exposition of the principles which regulate the law as to natural streams, which are discussed and placed on their right footing in Mason v. Hill (3), and the authorities there cited. Flowing water, like light and air, is, in one sense, publici juris; a boon from Providence to all, and differs only in the mode of enjoyment—light and air are diffused in all directions, flowing water in some. When property was established, each one had a right to enjoy the light and air diffused over, and the water flowing through, the portion of the soil belonging to him. The property in the water itself was not in the proprietor of the land through which it passes, but only the use of it as it passes along for the enjoyment of his property, and as incidental to it. The law is laid down in KENT'S COMMENTARIES, vol. 3, pp. 439, 440, thus:

“The proprietor of a bank has naturally an equal right to the use of the water; he has no property in the water itself, but a simple usufruct as it passes along: aqua currit et debet currere is the language of the law.”

H STORY, J., in Tyler v. Wilkinson (4) cited in GALE AND WHATELY ON EASEMENTS, p. 131, lays down the same law. In the judgment of TINDAL, C.J., in Acton v. Blundell (5), he treats the right to the water flowing on the surface as arising from the acquiescence of neighbouring owners, though he also quotes the judgment of STORY, J., above referred to, which treats the right as an incident to the property;

I for STORY, J., says:

“The natural stream existing by the bounty of Providence for the benefit of land through which it flows, is an incident annexed by the operation of the law to the land itself.”

See also WHITELOCK, J., in Sury v. Pigot (6) (Poph. at p. 169), and CREW, C.J. (ibid. at p. 172). LEE, C.J., in Brown v. Best (7), treats the right as arising ex jure naturæ, and, consequently, it is now extinguished, and an easement in alieno solo would be by unity. This seems to us the correct opinion, though it is unnecessary to decide that point on the present occasion, for whether the right to the natural streams be ex jure naturæ or by acquiescence and the presumed grant of the neighbours, the result in this case will be the same. A

But, the Bowling Sough and the Low Moor Sough being neither of them natural watercourses (being underground and not immemorial), a question of some nicety and difficulty arises as to the rights of the riparian proprietors upon these streams or below their junction with the beck. This question is not with respect to their rights as against the owners of these collieries which those soughs relieved from water, but as to the rights of those proprietors inter se; and it will be better to consider, in the first place, how they would stand if the stream were not underground. With respect to a claim of right as against the colliery owners, if it be true that a right was gained to these streams by the riparian proprietors, or against them, in consequence of their acquiescence for twenty years, by virtue of the presumption of a grant, or of Lord Tenterden's Act (Prescription Act, 1832), there would be no difficulty about the right of the riparian proprietors as against other persons. But counsel for the plaintiffs admitted that a grant could not be presumed, and that he should have great difficulty in establishing the right under Lord Tenterden's Act. B C

This court much considered that subject in Arkwright v. Gell (8). We have again considered it, and are satisfied that the principles laid down as governing that case are correct, and were properly acted upon in it by deciding that no action lay for an injury by the diversion of an artificial watercourse, where from the nature of the case it was obvious that the enjoyment of it depended upon temporary circumstances and was not of a permanent character, and where the interruption was by a party who stood in the situation of the grantor. The Court of Queen's Bench, in a subsequent case of Magor v. Chadwick (9), supported a verdict for the plaintiff for the disturbance of a right to the enjoyment of a stream under circumstances somewhat similar, but in that case the action was not brought against the party in whose land the artificial watercourse commenced, nor any one claiming under him, and he had not put an end to it by altering the mode of working his mines; and the action was not brought for abstracting, but for fouling the water, a species of injury which does not stand on the same footing, for though the possessor of the mine might stop the stream, it does not follow that he or any others could pollute it while it continued to run. The two cases are, therefore, distinguishable, and the expressions used by the learned judges in that case as to the similarity of natural and artificial streams are to be understood as applicable to the particular case. D E

We entirely concur with LORD DENMAN, C.J., in Magor v. Chadwick (9), that a watercourse, of whatever antiquity or in whatever degree enjoyed by numerous persons, cannot be enjoyed so as to confer a right to the use of the water, if proved to have been originally artificial. The general proposition that under all circumstances, the enjoyment of watercourses is the same, whether they be natural or artificial, certainly cannot be sustained. The right to artificial watercourses, as against the party creating them, surely must depend upon the character of the watercourse, whether it be of a permanent or a temporary nature, and upon the circumstances under which it is created. The enjoyment for twenty years of a stream diverted or penned up by permanent embankment, evidently stands upon a different footing from the enjoyment of a flow of water originating in the mode of occupation or cultivation of a person's property, and probably of an inferior character and liable to variation. The flow for twenty years of water from the eaves of a house could not give a right to the neighbours to insist that the house should not be pulled down or altered, so as to diminish the quantity of water flowing from the roof. The flow of water from a drain for the purposes of agricultural improvement for twenty years could not give a right to the neighbours, so as to preclude the proprietor from altering the bevel of his drains for the greater improvement of the land. The state of circumstances in such cases shows that one party never intended to give, nor the other to enjoy, the use of the stream as a matter of right. F

If, then, this had been a question between the plaintiffs and the colliery owners, I

A it seems to us that the plaintiffs could not have maintained an action for omitting to pump water by machinery (and in this case the Queen's Bench and Exchequer entirely agree in the cases above cited), nor if the colliery proprietors had chosen to pump out the water from the pit from whence the stream flowed continuously, and caused what is termed the natural flow to cease, could the plaintiffs, in our opinion, have sued them for so doing. But this case is different. The water has
B been permitted to flow in an artificial channel by the colliery owners for sixty years. The question is whether the plaintiffs can sue another person, a proprietor and occupier of land above, through which the sough passes, not claiming under or authorised by them for diverting the water? The case of the Bowling Sough differs from the Low Moor Sough in this, that the plaintiffs, in 1838, used the water of the Bowling Sough where it passes through their land by making a communication
C to their reservoir for working their mill. Had the plaintiffs a right to the water of this sough as mentioned in the third count of the declaration? It appears to us to be clear that, as they had a right to the use of the Bowling Sough as incident to their property on the banks, they would have a right to all the water which actually formed part of the stream as soon as it had become part, whether such water came
D by natural means, as from springs or from the surface of the hills above, or from rains or melted snow, or was added by artificial means, as from the drainage of lands on the colliery works; and if the proprietors of the drained land or the colliery augmented the stream by pouring water into it, it would become part of the current, it being impossible then to make any distinction between the original natural stream and such accession to it.

But the question arises with respect to an artificial stream not yet united to the natural one. The proprietor of the land through which the Bowling Sough flows
E has no right to insist on the colliery owners causing all the water from their works to flow through their land. These owners merely get rid of a nuisance to their works by discharging the water into the sough; they cannot be considered as giving it to one more than others of the proprietors of the land through which the sough is constructed. Each may take and use what passes through his land, and the proprietor of the land below has no right to any part of that water until it has reached
F his own land, and he has no right to compel the owners above to permit the water to flow through their land for his benefit. Consequently, he has no right of action if they refuse to do so. If they polluted the water so as to be injurious to the tenants below, the case would be different. We think, therefore, that the plaintiffs have no right of action for the diversion of the water. The question as to the Low
G Moor Sough is less favourable to the plaintiffs, for this sough does not pass through their land at all. We are of opinion that the plaintiffs would not be entitled to the water of these soughs if above ground; their being below ground in this case would probably make no difference. It does not certainly make a difference in favour of the plaintiffs: these issues ought, therefore, to be found for the defendants.

The next question is one also of considerable nicety. It is whether the verdict
H should be entered for the plaintiffs on the plea of Not Guilty, as to the third count complaining of the abstraction of the water from the Bowling Sough; and the fourth, complaining of the abstraction and detention of the water from the Low Moor Sough. The defendants contend that the diminution of the water, by 5 per cent. and the altering the flow of the water, are too small injuries to be the subject of an action. In considering this question, it is to be assumed that the plaintiffs'
I right is established to the use of the water. It is said that the true rule on this subject is laid down in KENT'S COMMENTARIES, vol. 3, pp. 439 and 440, that streams are meant for the use of man; that it would be unreasonable and contrary to the universal consent of mankind to debar each proprietor from the application of the water to domestic, agricultural, or manufacturing purposes, provided the use of it be made so as to work no material injury or annoyance to his neighbours; and though there would no doubt be, in the exercise of a proper use of water, some evaporation and decrease of it, some variation in the weight and rapidity of the current, the maxim de minimis non curat lex applies, and a right of action by the proprietors would not necessarily follow from such use: it would depend on the nature and extent of the injury, and the manner of using the water, so as to create an apparent claim to a right of action. In America a very liberal use of water for the purposes of irrigation and for carrying on manufactures has been allowed. No doubt if the stream were only used by the riparian proprietor and his family by drinking it, or for the supply for domestic purposes, no action would lie for this ordinary use of it, and it may be conceived that if a field be covered with houses, the ordinary uses by the inhabitants might sensibly diminish the stream. Yet no action would, we conceive, lie, any more than if the air be rendered less pure and healthy by the increase of inhabitants in the neighbourhood, and by the smoke issuing from the chimneys of houses. But, on the other hand, the establishment of a manufactory, rendering the air sensibly impure by emitting noxious gases, would be actionable; so would it be if it rendered the water less pure by the admixture of noxious substances. If a mode of enjoyment quite different from the ordinary one was adopted, by which the water was diverted into a reservoir, and there delayed for the purpose of a manufactory, an action seems to us to be maintainable, and so if by that mode of dealing with the water it is sensibly diminished in quantity. We think, therefore, that the issue on Not Guilty, so far as it relates to both the Bowling Sough and the Low Moor Sough, ought to be found for the plaintiffs.

Judgment accordingly.

CALEDONIAN RAIL. CO. v. LOCKHART

Compulsory Purchase—Compensation—Injurious affection—Right depending on cause and effect, not on distance or proximity—Damage entirely prospective and contingent—Compensation once and for all—Relief to undertakers against possible claims by tenants—Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845.

When an arbitrator has to determine the amount of compensation payable to a landowner part of whose land has been compulsorily acquired (i) the right to compensation extends to any land of the claimant injured by the severance of that which is purchased or by the works which the undertakers are authorised to construct: the right to compensation depends on cause and effect, not on distance or proximity: the test is whether the land which the claimant retains is proved to be injuriously affected by the severance or the works; (ii) the arbitrator must award compensation not only for the immediate value of the land taken, but also for damage which is entirely prospective and contingent. The compensation must be full compensation, once and for all, for the injury to the landowner's rights. An award of compensation for possible future damage may contain a provision that the landowner shall relieve the undertakers against certain possible claims by tenants of his to the extent of the interest accruing on the sum awarded.

Arbitration—Arbitrator—Powers—Consultation with expert—Expert required to survey and report.

An arbitrator has power in the course of an arbitration to consult an expert or to require him to survey and report. He may consult men of science in every department where it becomes necessary.

Appeal from a decision of the Court of Session.

G The Caledonian Railway passed through the lands and estate of Carnworth, of which Sir Norman Macdonald Lockhart was at the material time proprietor. He claimed a certain sum as compensation, which was refused, and the dispute between the parties was submitted to Professor Low, who was asked to determine

H "all claims for the value of the said lands, and others to be taken, used and occupied by the Caledonian Rail. Co., and in general all claims or demands whatever competent to the said Norman Macdonald Lockhart against the said Caledonian Rail. Co., by or in consequence of the Caledonian Rail. Co. taking, using, or injuring any part of the said lands for the said railway, or the works or operations of the said railway company, in any manner or way whatever, . . . including accesses and every other claim competent to him against the said company; declaring hereby that the said arbiter shall conduct the proceedings to follow hereon, and determine the matters hereby submitted to him in strict conformity with the rules and regulations under the provisions and conditions specified in the Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act and the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act."

I The arbitrator acted from time to time, enlarging the time for making his award. On Nov. 6, 1846, the parties by consent agreed to have the time enlarged, with power to make interim or final awards. An interim award was made on Jan. 22, 1848, by which the arbitrator awarded to Sir Norman Lockhart an interim payment of £6,000 on account of the value of the land and intersectional and other damage, with certain deductions and abatements in favour of tenants. On May 9, 1849, Sir Norman Lockhart died. The railway company thereupon applied for an injunction to restrain the arbitrator from proceeding further on the ground that the submission, if under the Lands Clauses Act, was invalid inasmuch as the award was not made within the statutory period of three months, and, on the other hand, if the submission was not under that statute, it expired by the death of one of the parties. The court refused the injunction. Thereafter the arbitrator made his final award, by which he awarded to Sir Norman Lockhart an additional sum of £3,761 for the value of the land and intersectional and other damage. He also awarded £4,000 to Sir Norman, but found that he should relieve the railway company of any claims which his tenants, whose farms were not intersected by the railway, might be entitled to establish against the company in consequence of their operations, to the extent of the interest accruing on this sum of £4,000 from and after the date of the award. The railway company then applied to have the award set aside on the grounds that the award had not been made within the three months specified by the Lands Clauses Act; that the submission had expired at the death of Sir Norman Lockhart; and that the arbitrator had exceeded his powers in so far as he had awarded a sum for prospective and contingent damages, and a sum for damage likely to be incurred by tenants of Sir Norman, and in so far as he had ordered the execution of certain works and enforced their execution by pecuniary penalties. The Court of Session held the award to be good, and the objections untenable, and the railway company appealed to the House of Lords.

Rolt, Q.C., and Roundell Palmer, Q.C., for the appellants, contended that the award was bad, and referred to Pigott v. Eastern Counties Rail. Co. (7); Lawrence v. Great Northern Rail. Co. (1); Vaughan v. Taff Vale Rail. Co. (3); Eads v. Williams (8).

Sir Richard Bethell, Q.C., Anderson, Q.C., and Sir Hugh Cairns, Q.C., for the respondents.

Cur. adv. vult.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

May 23, 1860. Opinions were delivered in which it was stated :

LORD CAMPBELL, L.C. (after dealing with points which subsequent legislation has made obsolete): What is now chiefly relied upon is the remit to Mr. Newland as an expert, which is said to be contrary to the maxim, delegatus non potest delegare. In answer, it has been shown to us that this proceeding was according to the established practice of courts of justice in Scotland and of judicial arbitrators. Indeed, the remit never was complained of by the company, nor by the counsel in the Court of Session. An opportunity was afterwards given of examining Mr. Newland as a witness, when a great number of witnesses were examined on both sides.

On the part of the appellants, the chief stress was laid upon the arbitrator having exceeded his authority, and the awards would be void if he had therein awarded beyond his authority anything to the prejudice of the appellants which could not be severed from what he has lawfully awarded within the scope of his authority. . . . The chief objection was made to the award of compensation for damage likely to be sustained in future from the water of the Clyde being penned back by the works of the company, and thereby damaging the land of the claimant. It was contended that such prospective damage could not properly be included in the award, and that, if any such damage should arise, the proper remedy would be an action against the company. But I am of opinion that the arbitrator was bound to take into his consideration the damage to the land of the claimant likely to be produced by the works which the company were authorised to construct, and were constructing by virtue of an Act of Parliament, and that no future action could be brought against the company except for negligence in the original construction of these works, or in the manner in which these were kept in repair. To support this objection the judgment of the court in Lawrence v. Great Northern Rail. Co. (1), was cited. But when the judgment of the court, delivered by PATESON, J.,

A is examined, it will be found that the action there rested on negligence, for he draws the distinction between that case and R. v. Pease (2), where the defendant had done nothing but in strict accordance with the Act of Parliament. He concludes thus (16 Q.B. at p. 654):

B “Here the company might, by executing their works with proper caution, have avoided the injury which the plaintiff has sustained. We think the want of such caution is sufficient to sustain the action.”

C In Vaughan v. Taff Vale Rail. Co. (3), in which an action was held maintainable against a railway company for damage done to a wood adjoining the railway from the sparks flying from the engine, negligence was alleged by the declaration and found by the jury. It would, indeed, have been strange if, although the mound which the appellants were constructing across the valley of the Clyde under the powers of the Act of Parliament would certainly force back the water to the injury of the claimant's land every time the Clyde was in flood, and there was a moral certainty that the Clyde would periodically be in flood, the damage likely to be done could not be calculated and included in the compensation once for all to be awarded, and if the remedy intended for him was a fresh arbitration toties quoties when the flood came down.

D Objection was then made to compensation being given for prospective damage to land of the claimant's injuriously affected, not confining the claim to the land which the company were entitled to purchase. But I think that the right to compensation extends to any land of the claimant injured by the severance of that which is purchased, or by the works which the company are authorised to construct. The test is whether the land which the claimant retains can be proved to be injuriously affected by this severance or by these works. The right to the compensation depends on “cause and effect,” not on “distance or proximity.”

E The only plausible argument, as it seems to me, for setting aside the award was founded on the second article in the final award:

F “In respect that the sums found due by this and my interim award aforesaid, include, inter alia, the sum of £4,000 awarded to the said deceased Sir Norman Lockhart as compensation for the damage occasioned to his property by the operations of the said company in carrying their line of railway across the valley of the Clyde, I find that the said Sir Norman Lockhart and the succeeding heirs of entail shall relieve the said railway company of any claims which his present tenants, whose farms are not intersected by the said railway, may be enabled to establish against the said company in consequence of their operations, to the extent of the interest accruing on the said sum of £4,000 from and after the date hereof, calculated at the rate of $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. per annum, but under deduction of the sum of £16 4s. per annum included in the abatement of £49 15s. to be allowed by Sir Norman Lockhart to the tenant of Wester Lampits, in terms of my said interim award; and I order accordingly.”

H This objection is distinctly made, and at first it seemed fatal upon the suggestion that the arbitrator had included in the compensation to Sir Norman Lockhart what was due to a class of his tenants, who themselves had claims for compensation which they might bring forward against the company. But upon a proper examination of the awards, it was made out to my satisfaction that no sum was awarded under this head to which Sir Norman Lockhart was not himself entitled, and that

I the company cannot be in the slightest degree prejudiced by the conditional indemnity which is provided. Indeed, there is reason to believe that this clause was introduced for the security of the company at their own request. It was suggested at the Bar, on the part of the appellants, that if the House should not give judgment for entire by setting aside the awards, we should make a declaration as to the nullity of any part of them which may be considered ultra vires and not binding. But there being nothing in the awards by which they are nullified, I am of opinion that we are not bound to follow the course proposed, and I must advise your Lordships simply to adjudge that the appeal be dismissed with costs.

LORD CRANWORTH.—The appellants contend that, supposing the arbitrator had jurisdiction to make his awards, they are void, as being in two respects ultra vires: first, because the arbitrator gave decree for damage entirely prospective and contingent, and, secondly, because he gave decree in favour of Sir Norman for damages assumed to be likely to be incurred by tenants whose lands are not traversed by the railway, and who were not parties to the submission. A

On the first point, the argument of the appellants rests on no foundation whatever. When the legislature authorises the working of the railway, and enables the company, for the purpose of its construction, to take the lands over which it passes, it expressly binds the company to compensate those whose lands it takes, not only for the value of the land taken, but for all incidental damage which the making of the railway may occasion. When the amount to be paid to a landowner is left to be settled by an arbitrator, it is for him to say whether the probability of this incidental damage is so great as to enable him to treat it as a matter practically lessening the value of the property of the landowner not taken for the railway. If he is satisfied that it is so, he is not only authorised but bound to award compensation. This is what has been done in the present case. B C

With respect to the second ground, the facts are as follows. The arbitrator awarded compensation to Sir Norman for contingent damage occasioned to his property by the carrying of the railway across the valley of the Clyde. The lands thus damaged were not traversed by the railway, and were, as to part at all events, in the occupation, not of Sir Norman himself, but of his tenants. Of the right of the arbitrator to award compensation to the landowner in such a case, there cannot be any doubt; and the only question is whether the decree is vitiated and made liable to be set aside, because the arbitrator has added that, in respect of the sum awarded for damage to these lands, the landowner shall, to the extent of the interest of the sum awarded, indemnify the company against any claim on them by the tenants. For that is the true effect of the award. I can discover nothing in this direction which can invalidate the award. The sum awarded on this head was £4,000, and we must assume that to have been the fair compensation for the damage occasioned to the lands, that is, to the inheritance. No claim had been made by the tenants of the lands in question, but the arbitrator thought they might set up a claim at some future time. If the arbitrator was mistaken in thinking that such a claim could be set up by the tenants of farms not intersected, then the direction in question is one which must be inoperative, and, therefore, harmless. But suppose that any such claim could be asserted, I can see nothing unjust or ultra vires in the direction that, to the extent of the interest of the capital sum awarded, which, in effect, becomes part of the inheritance, the company should be protected against the future claims of the existing tenants. In dealing with such a subject as that of future probable damage, and giving an immediate sum certain as the fair compensation to the landowner in consideration of his becoming exposed to evils which may be greater, or may be less, or even may never arise at all, it is impossible to do more than approximate to strict justice, and the course taken here by the arbitrator seems to me to be one which might not be unreasonable. He, in substance, increases the value of the inheritance by a sum of £4,000. If the contemplated probable evils should turn out to be less than the arbiter contemplated, he will have given too much; if greater, he will have given too little. No one can contend that on such a ground the award is bad. How is the case varied by the circumstance that the sum awarded is not an absolute sum of £4,000, but a sum of £4,000 liable to the extent of the interest thereon to indemnify the company against certain possible claims of the then existing tenants of the lands in respect of the probable damage for which the £4,000 was awarded? I see no reason for thinking that this was not within the competency of the arbitrator. The £4,000 can only be withdrawn from the bank in which it is deposited by an order of the Court of Session; and due care will, of course, be taken that it is not withdrawn till the time is past within which any claim can be made upon it. Therefore I concur in the conclusion that the decree below ought to be affirmed. D E F G H I

A LORD WENSLEYDALE.—The appellants objected that the arbitrator acted ultra vires in employing an expert to survey and report. That objection is not maintainable. An arbitrator is not bound to examine witnesses, and cannot by the law of England insist upon their being examined on oath, unless the submission provides for it. By s. 32 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, he may, but is not bound to examine the parties and their witnesses on oath. [But see now B Arbitration Act, 1950, s. 12.] Nor is he prevented from consulting men of science in every department, where it becomes necessary. So he has a power to call in a valuer to assist him, unless restricted by the terms of the submission. This was decided in Anderson v. Wallace (4).

As little weight is due to the third objection that the arbitrator awarded prospective and contingent damages which he ought not to do. The answer is that he C really has not done so. The compensation given is for the necessary damage by the construction of the railway, and for the highly probable damage which would be occasioned in the ordinary course of events by the vicinity of the River Clyde. It becomes, therefore, unnecessary to consider what would be the effect of awarding a sum for purely speculative damage not reasonably foreseen. Generally speaking, railway and other similar companies acquire Parliamentary powers to construct D their works on condition of their paying the price of the land, and the compensation to the parties who may sustain damage by the exercise of the acquired power to do acts for which, if the authority of the legislature had not been given, the landowners might have maintained an action. That price should be a full compensation, once for all, for the injury to those rights. When paid, the company have obtained a lawful right to construct their works, and if they happen to injure one in the reasonable exercise of these rights so purchased, they are irresponsible for such injury. E Those rights are given for the public good, and if an extraordinary unforeseen damage occur, the suffering party must bear it, and is without remedy. But if those acquired rights are exercised unreasonably and without due care, those who have acquired them are responsible, as they are for their exercise of common-law rights: sic utere tuo ut alienum non lædas. Lawrence v. Great Northern Rail. Co. F (1), may have been well decided as belonging to that class of cases in which the acquired right has been negligently executed, for which, therefore, an action would lie. I much doubt whether the company would have been responsible for damage occasioned by the due exercise of their powers, though that damage was unforeseen at the time the compensation was settled and paid. In Vaughan v. Taff Vale Rail. Co. (3), the damage done to a distant piece of land was clearly not within the terms G of the arbitration, the award on which was sought to be impeached, and the dictum of the Lord Chief Baron, that the claimant might proceed for further damages under s. 68 of the Act of 1845 was clearly extra-judicial, and was founded upon the authority of Lawrence's case (1). These observations, of course, do not apply to cases, of which there are some (R. v. Leeds and Selby Rail. Co. (5), Lee v. Milner (6)), where, by the express terms of the special Acts compensation for damage from H time to time sustained is payable.

The last objection is, in my view of the case, the most serious. It is that the final award is void in consequence of the direction contained in it that the sum of £4,000 and interest is awarded to Sir Norman as compensation for the damage occasioned to his property by the operations of the company in carrying the line of the railway across the valley of the Clyde, and it proceeds to find that Sir Norman I and his heirs of entail shall relieve the company of any claims which his present tenants whose farms are not intersected by the railway may be enabled to establish against the company in consequence of their operations, to the extent of the interest accruing on the sum of £4,000 from the date thereof, at the rate of 3½ per cent. per annum, subject to a deduction. It is said for the appellants that it is immaterial whether those tenants had really any claim against the company or not, for it must be inferred that they were to pay more than for the actual damage done to Sir Norman as the price of his indemnity against those claims, and it was impossible to say how much more, and, therefore, the award in this respect was uncertain and void. It is, however, in my mind, very questionable whether those supposed claims of tenants are more than imaginary, and whether this clause has not been introduced into the decree, not because there was any real danger of valid complaints by such tenants, but to satisfy the importunity of the appellants' solicitors, made before the arbitration was concluded, that the appellants should know in what way the arbitrator proposed to secure the company against the tenants' claims, if the money was paid to Sir Norman. At all events, however, it is to be observed that this provision does not affect the principal sum of £4,000. That is certainly due. It is the interest only which is affected in case any of the tenants' claims should be made good. Having heard the opinions already given by my noble and learned friends, I agree with them in thinking that a sufficient case is not made out to reverse the judgment of the Court of Session, either in the whole or in part.

LORD KINGSDOWN concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Bankruptcy—Fraud—Fraudulent conveyance—Voluntary settlement—Purchase of stock for benefit of infant children—Statute 13 Eliz., c. 5, s. 2—Judgments Act, 1838 (1 and 2 Vict., c. 110), s. 12.

Since the passing of the Judgments Act, 1838, an investment of money in the purchase of stock in the names of trustees on trust for the children of the investor at a time when he had not, apart from the money so invested, sufficient assets out of which to pay his debts, is void under the statute 13 Eliz., c. 5 [relating to fraudulent conveyances], because by s. 12 of the Act of 1838 money or stock may be taken in execution, and, therefore, the effect of such a settlement would be to delay, hinder, or defraud the creditors of the investor within s. 2 of the statute of Elizabeth.

Grogan v. Cooke (1812), 2 Ball. & B. 230.

Action by creditors for the administration of the estate of William Mariner who died insolvent.

C James Barrack and his wife knew William Mariner who was confidential clerk to a Mr. Heseltine, a stockbroker. In 1852 Mrs. Barrack, as her husband's agent, instructed Mariner to sell for her husband some shares and stock; Mariner did so and received the proceeds of the sale of the shares, and the dividends of the stock. James Barrack, through his wife, paid to Mariner several sums, other than the aforesaid, which sums, together with the aforesaid, were retained by Mariner for the purpose of investment by him, at his discretion, for James Barrack.

D Mariner furnished to James Barrack an account of investments alleged to have been made by Mariner for him, and such account showed a balance in favour of James Barrack. In July, 1852, Mariner purchased three sums of stock of £300 each; he was then in embarrassed circumstances; and intending to hinder, delay and defraud James Barrack and his other creditors, settled those three sums of stock on his three daughters. Mariner died insolvent in October, 1853, leaving his widow his executrix; and it was then, for the first time, discovered that Mariner had never made the investments of which he had given James Barrack an account, and that he had purchased the three sums of £300 stock and settled them as aforesaid. The debt then due from Mariner to the Barracks on the aforesaid account, and for dividends, proceeds and moneys received by him for investment, amounted to £1,091 16s. 6d.

E The bill charged that the said three sums of £300 stock had been purchased by Mariner with money belonging to the Barracks, and that the settlement thereof ought to be set aside as voluntary and fraudulent. The bill then prayed an account of what was due from Mariner's estate to the Barracks, the plaintiffs, and a declaration that the settlement of the stock might be set aside, for the above-stated reasons, as against the plaintiffs and the other creditors of Mariner. It was proved that Mariner at his death owed Heseltine £1,500, and that all Mariner's property was then worth only £300.

F The bill charged that the said three sums of £300 stock had been purchased by Mariner with money belonging to the Barracks, and that the settlement thereof ought to be set aside as voluntary and fraudulent. The bill then prayed an account of what was due from Mariner's estate to the Barracks, the plaintiffs, and a declaration that the settlement of the stock might be set aside, for the above-stated reasons, as against the plaintiffs and the other creditors of Mariner. It was proved that Mariner at his death owed Heseltine £1,500, and that all Mariner's property was then worth only £300.

G It appeared by the answer of Mrs. Mariner that there was some question whether the three sums of stock were purchased with the money of the Barracks or with that of Mariner himself or of his wife. Mrs. Mariner alleged that the purchase-money of the stock was derived from the rents of certain houses at Gravesend settled to her separate use. But the present decision of the case depended on the considerations whether (assuming Mariner to have purchased the stock with his own money) stock was a species of property liable to be seized and taken in execution within the terms of the statute 13 Eliz. c. 5, s. 2, and the Judgments Act, 1838, s. 12; and then, if it was so liable to be seized and taken, whether the settlement of the stock, in this case, could be set aside as fraudulent within the statute of Elizabeth?

I By the statute 13 Eliz. c. 5, s. 2, it was enacted:

“That all and every feoffment, gift, grant, alienation, bargain and conveyance of lands, tenements, hereditaments, goods and chattels, or of any of them, or of any lease, rent, common or other profit or charge out of the same lands, tenements, hereditaments, goods and chattels, or any of them, by writing or otherwise, and all and every bond, suit, judgment and execution, at any time had or made sithence the beginning of the Queen's Majesty's reign, that then was, or at any time thereafter to be had or made to or for any intent or purpose before declared and expressed, should be from thenceforth deemed and taken (only as against that person or persons, his or their heirs, successors, executors, administrators and assigns, and every of them, whose actions, suits, debts, accounts, damages, penalties, forfeitures, heriots, mortuaries, and reliefs by such guileful, covinous, or fraudulent devices and practices as was aforesaid, were, should or might be in any ways disturbed, hindered, delayed or defrauded), to be clearly and utterly void, frustrated and of none effect; any pretence, colour, feigned consideration, expressing of use, or any other matter or thing, to the contrary notwithstanding."

By the Judgments Act, 1838, s. 12, it is, among other things, enacted :

"By virtue of any writ of fieri facias, to be sued out of any superior or inferior court . . . or any precept in pursuance thereof, the sheriff or other officers having the execution thereof, may and shall seize and take any money or banknotes (whether of . . . the Bank of England, or of any other bank or bankers), and any cheques, bills of exchange, promissory notes, bonds, specialties, or other securities for money, belonging to the person against whose effects such writ of fieri facias shall be sued out. . . ."

Rolt, Q.C. (Speed with him), for the plaintiffs.

W. M. James, Q.C. (Fooks with him), for the defendants.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 17, 1856. PAGE-WOOD, V.-C.—It is impossible to hold that Mariner was not so indebted at the time of purchasing the stock, that any voluntary settlement made by him at that time would be void as against creditors. The argument for the defendants was that inasmuch as the settlement was of property which could not be taken in execution, the case was within the principle of Rider v. Kidder (1), and that class of cases; and that I ought to hold that a settlement of stock was not within the statute against fraudulent conveyances.

The words of that statute are :

"all and every feoffment, gift, grant, alienation, bargain and conveyance of lands, tenements, hereditaments, goods and chattels, or any of them, by writing or otherwise, and all and every bond . . ."

and on those words it was held repeatedly that an assignment of property which could not be taken in execution was not such an assignment as was within the statute. The old authorities proceeded on the notion that it would be useless to avoid a gift of anything which, but for that gift, would not have been available for creditors. It has also been held in Fletcher v. Lady Sedley (2), that a purchase was not, from the mere fact of its being made with the money of the debtor, within the statute, and where a party gave money to a child who made the purchase, it was held that that did not bring it within the statute. It is now, however, no longer true that cash or notes can be given to a child by a person who is insolvent. According to Sims v. Thomas (3), a bond for securing an annuity is not goods and chattels within the statute, but such a bond being now liable to be taken in execution, a voluntary assignment of it would be void. By s. 12 of the Judgments Act, 1838, bank-notes and cash may be taken in execution; if, therefore, you could follow them into the hands of a volunteer, the gift would be void as against creditors. The recent case of French v. French (4) shows that a settlement of an annuity purchased with the proceeds of the sale of stock-in-trade when the settlor was insolvent is within the statute. On the whole, therefore, supposing this money to have belonged to Mariner, I think the settlement was void as against creditors. On that question, however, I am not satisfied with the evidence, and the case must stand over for the examination of Mrs. Mariner and her three daughters and the trustees.

[NOTE: On Nov. 20, 1856, oral evidence was taken on the question as to the ownership of the money settled, and HIS LORDSHIP held that it belonged to Mrs. Mariner. The bill was accordingly dismissed.]

Company—Shares—Transfer—Registration—Refusal to register—Right of purchaser to recover purchase money—Practice of Stock Exchange.

The plaintiff authorised brokers on the Stock Exchange to purchase for him, to be paid for on the account day, twenty shares in the Royal British Bank. The brokers bought the shares of the defendant. Before the account day arrived the Royal British Bank stopped payment, whereupon the plaintiff gave notice to his brokers that he would not take the shares. The defendant had contracted with other stockbrokers for the purchase of twenty shares, and these brokers procured transfers of the shares and the certificates, which on the account day the defendant tendered to the plaintiff's brokers. The plaintiff's brokers paid for them and received them, and then tendered them to the plaintiff, who, under pressure of an action, received and paid for them. By the rules of the Royal British Bank, proprietors of shares might, with the consent of the directors, transfer their shares, and the broker of one of the sellers of the shares requested such consent, which the directors refused to give. It was established that the practice of the Stock Exchange was that the price was payable on the handing over by one broker to the other of the transfers and the certificates. The plaintiff did not execute the transfers nor apply for registration of them, and he claimed repayment by the defendant of the purchase price.

Held: the plaintiff was not entitled to recover the purchase price because (i) having regard to the practice of the Stock Exchange he had obtained what he had bargained for, and, therefore, the consideration had not failed; (ii) he could not rely on a breach by the defendant to perform his part of a contract to sell and cause to be delivered the shares, since the evidence disclosed that the plaintiff was not ready and willing to perform his part of the contract.

Appeal from a decision of the Court of Queen's Bench in an action brought by the plaintiff to recover the purchase price of shares, tried by LORD CAMPBELL, C.J., and a jury, when a verdict was returned for the plaintiff subject to the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench on a Special Case. The Court of Queen's Bench gave judgment for the defendant and the plaintiff appealed. B

Montague Smith, Q.C., and J. Brown for the plaintiff.
Atherton, Q.C., and Aston for the defendant.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 14, 1859. The following judgments were delivered.

LORD CAMPBELL, C.J.—This case was argued last term before my brothers ERLE, CROMPTON, HILL and myself. We will now give judgment. We are all of opinion that the judgment ought to be for the defendant; but there is a slight difference between us as to the reasons, and the case being one of considerable importance, we have thought it better to give our opinions seriatim. C

The plaintiff first contends that he is entitled to recover, under the common counts for money had and received, on the ground of the failure of consideration; he will succeed if he can show that the defendant was bound to see that the transfer of the shares should be registered and completed so as to give the plaintiff a perfect title to the shares; and, further, that he himself has been ready and willing to accept them. If this transaction is to be governed by the same rules as the sale and purchase of an interest in real property, the plaintiff's view of the contract would be correct. To prove that it is, Wilkinson v. Lloyd (1) is relied on as an authority; but although the transaction there was a sale of shares, the shares were of a different nature from those which we have to consider, and the manner in which the business was to be conducted between the vendor and purchaser was entirely different. In Wilkinson v. Lloyd (1) the reasoning was adopted by the court that the contract amounted to a sale by a partner of his share in the partnership, and that the partnership-deed with regard to which the contract between the parties was entered into, clearly showed that the vendor must effect all that was essential to the transaction. On this ground the court there held, that the cases applied which have been decided with respect to the obligation of the vendor of a lease to obtain the landlord's consent to an assignment when the lease requires it. Here the purchase of shares in a joint-stock banking company was made at the request of the plaintiff by a broker on the Stock Exchange in London, and the contract must be considered as made with reference to all the established usages of the Stock Exchange. D E F G

After the repeated decisions on this subject, counsel for the plaintiff very properly waived the objection made at the trial to the admissibility of the evidence respecting these usages. According to these usages the price of the shares is payable on the one broker handing over to the other the transfers and certificates. What does the vendor contract to sell and deliver? Genuine transfers and certificates, with the interests and rights which they convey. There might be a condition subsequent, imposing on the vendor the onus of procuring the consent of the directors to the transfer; but that would be no evidence of such a condition. In Taylor v. Stray (2) (which was an action brought against the present plaintiff by the broker) it was admitted on all sides that Russell, the present defendant, had done everything which entitled him to be paid the price of the shares. WILLES, J., there intimates an opinion that it was not the duty of the broker of the vendor to get the transfer registered; and I apprehend that this duty devolved on the purchaser, though he might have a right to call on the vendor afterwards to concur in the transfer. But the vendor's subsequent defeasance, if there were any, would not amount to a total failure of consideration, for the purchaser would still have the transfers and certificates, with the means of completing the title, and of obtaining damages commensurate to his loss. From the report of the decision of the Court of H I

A Exchequer Chamber in Taylor v. Stray (2), it would appear that the two judges who express an opinion both consider that the purchaser had something valuable in the transfers and certificates, even after the refusal to register them; and POLLOCK, C.B., said that what the purchaser was to get was not the shares transferred into his own name, but the jus disponendi.

B For these reasons, although there had been an absolute refusal on the part of the directors to consent to the transfer, I should still have been of opinion that it was not a total failure of consideration, entitling the plaintiff to recover back the purchase-money; but drawing an inference from the evidence, I am inclined to think that if the plaintiff had been sincerely desirous of having the transfer completed, and of incurring a responsibility equal to the whole of his fortune, he might have gratified his wish; for the reluctance of the directors to consent to transfers
C in the insolvent state of the bank probably arose from a desire to prevent substantial shareholders from escaping by transferring their shares to men of straw; and if the plaintiff had shown that he was as good a man as Mr. William Rowe and Col. Aitcheson, in whose name the shares stood, I can hardly doubt his request would have been complied with. But he never executed the transfer deed, without which the registration could not take place; and as he might then have insisted on a
D repudiation, even after his liability to the broker was established, and although he should have to pay the price of the shares without receiving anything for their value, he had escaped the peril of being made a contributory. The bankruptcy of the company, after the transfers and certificates had been handed over to the plaintiff's broker and the defendant had received the purchase-money, I clearly think could not work a failure of consideration entitling the plaintiff to recover back
E the purchase-money; he might still have been entitled to some benefit under the bankruptcy, and at any rate the shares before Sept. 15 were at the risk of the purchaser.

There is another ground on which I think the plaintiff is not entitled to recover. From the evidence it seems quite clear to me that he was not ready and willing to accept the shares. The letters of Sept. 11 and 12 prove that subsequently to Aug. 28
F he had become fully aware of the insolvent condition of the bank, and that, discovering how unlucky and perilous was the bargain he had made, he was determined by all means, fair or foul, to get rid of it. We are told that these were merely letters to his own broker; and I believe that if he had merely expressed such sentiments in secrecy, or in conversation with a stranger, it would not be sufficient evidence to support the plea that he was not ready and willing. But these letters were written
G to Taylor and Aston, his brokers, and were acted on and communicated by them to Russell and the parties from whom Russell and his jobber had purchased the shares. Taylor and Aston thus addressed him:

H "Mr. Stray will not take any shares in the Royal British Bank; do not pay any money on his account for or in respect of any alleged purchase by him of any such shares. Mr. Stray is advised he has a good defence to any proceedings that may be instituted against him in reference to the Royal British Bank shares."

I Accordingly, Mr. Stray disavowed the payment made by his brokers to Russell, and only paid them the amount under a judgment which they obtained against him after strenuously resisting the liability in the Common Pleas and in the Exchequer Chamber. A further objection to this action for money had and received may be, that if the plaintiff is now permitted to adopt the payment made, according to his orders by Taylor and Aston, so that the money paid by him may be considered money paid by him notwithstanding his disavowal of the payment, and notwithstanding the difficulty of fixing the point of time when the promise to repay the money is first to be implied, at all events Taylor and Aston must be his agents to make the payment, and then it may be considered a payment by him with knowledge of all the facts of the case. At the time when the payment was made he had determined that he would not accept the shares, and he well knew that they never would be transferred to him. A

Having thus disposed of the general count for money had and received, which is chiefly relied on, I have only to point out two fatal objections to the plaintiff's right to recover on the Special Case: first, that the defendant never entered into the contract he alleged; and secondly, that one of the pleas in bar on that count is fully proved. The special count alleges that the defendant undertook that the twenty shares in the Royal British Bank should be transferred to the plaintiff, the breach being that he had not caused them to be transferred to the plaintiff; whereas it has been already shown that the defendant did not enter into any such undertaking, and that he performed the promise which he actually did make when the transfers and certificates were handed over to the plaintiff's agents, on their paying the purchase-money. Again, in answer to the other allegation of this special count of the performance by the plaintiff of all the conditions precedent, the defendant pleads in bar a want of readiness and willingness to accept the shares, and this plea, I think, is fully proved by the letter to Taylor and Aston before referred to, and by the whole scope of the plaintiff's conduct in the transaction, from the time when those letters were written. The present case resembles very closely Remfry v. Butler (3), which was decided by this court on Jan. 26, 1858, on the same principles, and in which on an appeal to the Exchequer Chamber our decision was affirmed, this court being of opinion that, on the facts of the case, according to the rules of the Stock Exchange, the defendant had not failed on his part in completing the contract. B C D

In the present case the conduct of the plaintiff has, I think, been very discreditable, in trying to get rid of a fair bargain when he found it would turn out disadvantageous to him, and in trying to throw the loss of the £140 on his own brokers, without imputing to them the slightest misconduct or failure of duty, and in trying to recover the amount from the defendant, who he knew had acted with perfect propriety in the transaction, and who he knew was liable to the parties from whom the shares were actually purchased. Still, the plaintiff must have obtained our judgment if according to the rules of law he be entitled to it; but I think, according to the rules of law as well as of the principles of justice, we are bound to give judgment for the defendant. E F

ERLE, J.—It appears to me that the plaintiff has had no value for his money. He contracted for shares in a bank, to be delivered at a future day; before that day the bank was known to be insolvent, and very soon after that day it stopped payment, so that the shares on that day were worse than useless. It also appears that no shares could be transferred without the consent of the directors; that consent they were inclined to withhold because the bank was insolvent, and in the honest discharge of their duty as trustees for the shareholders and creditors they decided that no change of liability should be made while they were on the brink of declaring insolvency. Then, if the contract be construed only by its terms, without importing the usage of the Stock Exchange and the course of business for the vendee to execute transfers before applying to the directors for their consent thereto, I am of opinion the vendor was bound to obtain that consent, according to Wilkinson v. Lloyd (1), and that he had failed to do so, and so could not restore the money paid for a purchase which went off by the default of the vendor. But, according to the course of the Stock Exchange, the contract of the vendor was in fact performed by the delivery of transfers executed by the vendor with certificates to the brokers of the vendee. Thus the defendant can maintain that the consideration has not entirely failed; and, therefore, the count for money had and received cannot be supported. G H I

Then, with respect to the evidence that the plaintiff was not ready and willing to perform his part of the contract set out in the Special Case, I think the plaintiff's desire to annul the contract declared on by his own act, and the direction to the agent not to pay the purchase-money, which was obeyed by him, is no evidence to prove this issue for the defendant. But on the letters there is evidence that he

A would not have executed the transfers as vendee, and as such execution was a condition for obtaining the consent of the directors, on this ground the defendant can defeat the special count also, and so obtain judgment in the action.

HILL, J. (read by CROMPTON, J.).—In this case the declaration contained two counts—first, money had and received; secondly, on a special contract, alleging that it was agreed that the plaintiff should buy, and the defendant should sell and cause to be delivered, twenty shares in the Royal British Bank, and that the defendant had not sold, or caused to be transferred, the said shares. The defendant pleaded, denying the debt in the first count, and the agreement in the second; and also, as to the second count, denying that the plaintiff was ready and willing to perform the contract on his part; and, lastly, averring that the defendant had sold and caused to be transferred the said shares.

It appears from the Case that, on Aug. 20, 1856, the plaintiff, through his brokers Messrs. Taylor and Aston, bought in the Stock Exchange in London, of the defendant, who was also a broker there, twenty shares in the Royal British Bank, a joint-stock bank then carrying on business in London. According to the deed of settlement of that bank, shares therein were transferable with the consent of the directors, and also the terms of the deed required seven days' notice before any transfer. Such notice was not usually required by the bank in cases of transfer. The contract made by the plaintiff was for Sept. 15, and according to the practice of the Stock Exchange it was the duty of the plaintiff on that day, by his brokers, to give to the selling broker, the defendant, the names of the parties to whom the transfer was to be made, and afterwards to pay the price of the shares in exchange for transfers executed by the party holding the shares and certificates. The Case expressly states that all such transfers required execution by the purchaser before registration of the company, and by the practice of the Stock Exchange the purchaser requiring registration and new certificates ought to execute the transfer and leave it, with the then existing certificates, at the office of the company for registration, and then new certificates are granted to him in his own name. Until this is done, the purchaser's title to shares is not completed. It further appears from the Case, that on Sept. 3 the British Bank was in such a condition that to have become a member after that day would have been to incur responsibility. On Sept. 11 the plaintiff, through his attorney, informed his brokers that he would not accept any of the shares, and instructed them not to pay for the same. They, however, in accordance with the rules and practice of the Stock Exchange (having previously informed the plaintiff to that effect) on Sept. 15 gave the plaintiff's name as the purchaser of twenty shares to the defendant, and afterwards, on Sept. 18 paid the price of the shares to the defendant in exchange for stamped certificates duly executed by the parties transferring, and also certificates for twenty shares.

It does not appear that any consent to the fact of transfer to the defendant was ever applied for to the bank or refused by them. A written application to the directors to prepare a transfer of sixteen shares to the defendant was sent to him on Sept. 15, which application was refused by them on Sept. 17; and between Sept. 15 and 17 a personal application was made to the bank for the bank to prepare a transfer, which was answered by one of the officers desiring the applicant to prepare it himself, and the officer handed to the applicant blank forms for the purpose. This occurrence took place in the presence of one of the plaintiff's brokers, but there is no statement whether the plaintiff's brokers knew of the written application and refusal. It further appears that the plaintiff had first refused to recognise the payment made by his brokers, and they proceeded by action against him to recover the amount, and after they obtained judgment, and the judgment was affirmed in error, the plaintiff paid to them the amount; and on Dec. 28, 1857, the brokers delivered up the transfers, shares and certificates to the plaintiff, who has ever since kept the same, and has now brought this action without having offered to return the certificates and shares, and without having demanded back the money which he seeks to recover under the count for money had and received. On the argument of the case before us, the special count was not much insisted on, but on that count I am of opinion that the plaintiff is not entitled to recover. I am not satisfied that the contract set out in that count was entered into. Looking at the subject of the sale—shares in a bank—and the place in which the sale took place—the Stock Exchange—and having regard to the rules and practice of the Stock Exchange, I do not think that the vendor in such a case contracts that the directors shall accept the vendee as a proper person to be admitted a shareholder in the bank.

The case differs materially from Wilkinson v. Lloyd (1), which was relied on in the argument. The contract in that case was not made on the Stock Exchange, so that there was no usage binding the bank to procure the transfers to be registered for the perfecting of the transfer to him, and in that case the deed of the company, which was in the knowledge of both parties, cast the duty of obtaining the consent of the directors on the vendor, by whose default alone it was that the consent of the directors was not obtained. It may be also not undeserving of consideration whether a different rule may not well prevail in the sale of shares in a commercial company on the Stock Exchange from that which should be applied to the sale of mining shares, which confer an interest in real estate, made between two private individuals, which rather would appear to fall within the analogy adopted in Wilkinson v. Lloyd (1), of a sale by a termor of his lease when there is a covenant in the lease against assignment without the consent of the lessor.

Further, on the special count, I am of opinion that the plaintiff has failed to prove that he was ready and willing. It is manifest that he was desirous to avoid a responsibility; that he never did nor was he willing to do any of the acts necessary to complete the transfer, and which, according to the practice of the Stock Exchange and the contract which he made, it was his duty to do.

The plaintiff's counsel in the argument, however, mainly relied on the count for money had and received, and contended that the plaintiff had a right to recover the money as on a total failure of consideration. I am of opinion that the facts do not support such a case. As the money was paid according to the terms of the contract, in order to recover it the burden was on the plaintiff to show such circumstances as would entitle him to say that the consideration for which he paid his money had wholly failed without any default on his part. This, however, the plaintiff has not done. The only application to the bank was prior both to the payment of the purchase-money and to the handing over the transfers duly executed, and the certificates of the shares. If the plaintiff was desirous that the transfers should be completed and his title perfected, it was his duty to execute the transfers, and leave them, with the then existing certificates, with the bank for registration. If he had done so, and the bank had unqualifiedly refused to permit the transfer, the plaintiff might be in a position to raise the question which he has submitted to the court. As the facts, however, stand, he himself is in default in obtaining the completion of the transfers; and he cannot be permitted to say that the consideration has wholly failed, when the failure, if such there be, rests on the default of himself, and not on any omission or default of the defendant. It is not shown that the defendant was guilty of any neglect or omission of any act required to be done by him to complete the contract on his part.

There is another ground which, in my opinion, is conclusive against the claim to recover the money, viz., that at the time the money was paid in exchange for the transfers and certificates, the plaintiff's broker, who paid the money, had full knowledge of all the circumstances. Certainly the brokers had full opportunity of knowing all the facts, and the plaintiff has not made out that the money was paid by the brokers either in ignorance or forgetfulness of any material fact. On this point the case appears to fall within, and be governed by, Remfry v. Butler (3), relied on by the defendant's counsel in the argument. If it were necessary to express any opinion whether the plaintiff could maintain an action for money had and received, without demanding the money or tendering back the transfers and certificates, I should hesitate before affirming that proposition. However, I express

A no opinion thereon, but merely mention it, that it may not be thought that I acquiesce in the view that such demand or tender was necessary.

On the whole, therefore, I am of opinion that the judgment must be for the defendant.

CROMPTON, J.—I am of opinion that the plaintiff is not entitled to recover in this action. It appears to me that he fails as to the special count, as he most clearly was not ready and willing to accept the transfer of the shares and do his part towards completing the transfer; and probably also on the ground that the contract set out in the declaration was not the one entered into by the defendant, and that the defendant performed his part of the contract really entered into by him. The plaintiff, however, in the argument before us, mainly relied on the count for money had and received, in which he sought to recover the price which he had paid for the shares, as on a total failure of consideration.

The money appears to have been paid by agents of the plaintiff, according to the terms of the contract, on the name being given, and the certificate and the transfer being handed over; and it lies on the plaintiff to show such circumstances as would make out a case of total failure of consideration. I am not satisfied that the contract was such as the plaintiff must make it out to be in order to treat the supposed breach of it by the defendant as amounting to a case of total failure of consideration, or that the plaintiff lost the whole of the consideration and got nothing for his money, by reason of the defendant's breach of the contract, or that the money was paid in ignorance of the facts. In the first place, I am not satisfied that, according to the contract, the defendant engaged that the banking company should accept the plaintiff as a member of the co-partnership. By the contract, as explained by the usage of the Stock Exchange, the name was to be given on a certain day, so that the vendor might get the transfer made out to the vendee or to his nominee, and he was then to hand over the transfer and certificate of the shares and to receive the money, and there is nothing that satisfies me that anything more was to be done by the vendee. It seems from the statement as to the usage that the vendee was then to bind himself to hold the shares according to the terms of the contract by executing the transfer. It is sufficient for the decision of this case to say that it is not made out by the plaintiff that it was incumbent on the vendor to do more. The fact of the payment being to be made on the handing over the certificates and transfers, and the practice stated of a prior consent being never asked for, and as to no assent being ever refused, make it very probable that the vendee in such case bargains only for delivering the shares and transfers, and takes the chance of getting himself or his nominee or sub-vendee accepted and registered. The plaintiff must be taken to have known of the course in the bank as to the consent, and he may well have bought, taking the chance of procuring such acceptance or registration for himself. He seems to have bought the shares, certificates and transfers, on an agreement to pay for them on the delivery of the documents.

H In Wilkinson v. Lloyd (1) the court assumed that the consent to the assignment was a fact of the vendor's title, as in the case of the sale of a lease; but whatever may have been the case of a purchase of partnership shares in mines—real property to some extent—that is a sale between the parties not according to any course of business on the Stock Exchange. I can make no such assumption in the present case, where the sale was according to the regulations of the Stock Exchange, which I made the price payable on handing over the shares and transfers, according to which it is at least probable that the vendee was to take on himself the duty of getting the transfers completed, and the shares registered, and where from the nature of the transaction it seems to me it is unlikely that the vendor should undertake for the acceptance of any particular name or person when he may have been entirely ignorant at the time of the contract of the name and the responsibility of the intended transferee. But further, it is left uncertain on the evidence whether the plaintiff might not have got his name accepted if he had chosen. The evidence of the refusal on one occasion by the bank is very unsatisfactory for the purpose of making out that they would not have ever allowed the plaintiff or some one on his behalf to have the shares; and it is quite clear to my mind that the plaintiff was not ready and willing, and never would have accepted the transfer of the shares. How can he then say that he has made out that he did not get the transfers owing to the default and breach of contract of the defendant.

Again, it is not made out to my satisfaction that the payment by the plaintiff's agent was made in ignorance of the fact. It is stated that it did not appear whether the refusal by the bank was known to the brokers or not, and it is quite consistent with the special case that it may have been made with full knowledge of the facts. Again, it does not seem to me to be made out that the plaintiff did not get all he bargained for, or that he was entitled to say that he got nothing, or that he lost the whole of the consideration. According to the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice and the Lord Chief Baron in the Exchequer Chamber, and the reasons of CRESSWELL, J., in the Common Pleas in Taylor v. Stray (2), he seems to have got what he bargained for; and at all events he had, and kept, the certificates and transfers. If the shares had risen, he would have disposed of them, and he would probably have been entitled to the equitable rights, and to have used the vendor's name in the assertion of such rights, and he would have been entitled to participate in the distribution of any surplus which might have arisen if the affairs of the bank had turned out well. It seems impossible to suppose that it was part of such a bargain that he should have any guarantee of the soundness or solvency of such a company.

I, therefore, think the plaintiff has failed in making out that the bargain was such as entitled him to say that there was a breach of contract by reason of which the total failure of consideration arose, or that he was prevented by such bargain from getting the shares transferred, or that there was a total failure of consideration by his not getting anything he bargained for, or that the money was paid in ignorance of the circumstances. And I therefore think that the defendant is entitled to our judgment on the count for money had and received, as well as on the special count. Judgment, therefore, must be entered for the defendant.

After what has fallen from the other members of the court, I think it right to add—though it is and ought to be no part of my judicial determination—I am by no means surprised at the plaintiff endeavouring to recover back his money. The case is not without difficulty, either in respect of principle or of apparent authority, and I do not attribute to the plaintiff any motive of impropriety, either in resisting the payment made by the brokers after his direction not to pay, or instituting these proceedings.

The plaintiff appealed to the Court of Exchequer Chamber.

Montague Smith for the plaintiff.

Atherton, Q.C., for the defendant, was not called on to argue.

WILLIAMS, J.—We are all of opinion that the judgment must be affirmed. We all think that, construing the contract in this case by the usage of the Stock Exchange, subject to which it was made, there was no undertaking by the vendor of the shares to obtain, absolutely, the consent of the directors to the transfer. At the most, his contract was to obtain it only after the vendee had done what was reasonable towards obtaining it in the usual course. The special count of the declaration fails in two respects. It does not correctly state the contract; and the denial, in the third plea, of the plaintiff's readiness and willingness to accept the shares is proved. Nor can the common count be supported; for the transaction did not fail, and the transfer did not fail, by any failure on the part of the vendor without the default of the vendee. The vendee himself was in fault for not taking the proper steps to obtain the transfer.

MARTIN, BRAMWELL and CHANNELL, BB., BYLES and KEATING, JJ., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

EADS v. WILLIAMS

[COURT OF APPEAL IN CHANCERY (Lord Cranworth, L.C.), November 11, 13, 14, 15, December 2, 1854]

[Reported 4 De G.M. & G. 674; 3 Eq. Rep. 244; 24 L.J.Ch. 531; 24 L.T.O.S. 162; 1 Jur.N.S. 193; 3 W.R. 98; 43 E.R. 671]

Arbitration—Arbitrator—Duty—Inspection of site—Examination of witnesses—Independence of view—Signature of award by two arbitrators at same time. Specific Performance—Refusal of decree—Lapse of time—Delay in bringing action.

By an agreement dated Feb. 11, 1848, E. agreed to lease a coalmine to W. for such term and at such rent as two named referees, or, in case they should be unable to agree, an umpire appointed by them, should within three weeks determine. The time for the making of the award by the referees was extended to April 14, 1848. The referees' award was made on April 13, 1848, and it was signed, not only by the referees, but also by an umpire appointed by them. In August, 1848, W. rejected the award on the grounds that (a) one of the referees had not inspected the mine himself, but had relied on the report of another; (b) the referees examined none of the witnesses who were available; (c) they did not form their own judgment, but relied on the opinion of the umpire; and (d) they did not both sign the award at the same time. W. (who had been let into possession before the signing of the agreement) ceased to work the mine in December, 1848, because it was unprofitable. Three and a half years later, E. brought this action against him claiming specific performance of the agreement of 1848.

Held: notwithstanding the signature of the award by the umpire, the award should be treated as that of the referees alone, and it was not incumbent on them either to inspect the mine themselves or to examine witnesses; it was, however, a valid objection that (as the evidence disclosed) one of the referees accepted the view of the umpire without forming an opinion of his own, and it was necessary for both referees to sign the award at the same time; but a decree of specific performance would not be granted owing to the delay in bringing the action.

Appeal by the defendant from a decree of STUART, V.-C., declaring specific performance of an agreement alleged to have been entered into by the defendant to take a lease of a coalmine in Worcestershire upon terms which were settled by an award. The award was made but its validity was objected to by the defendant on the ground of misrepresentation, and that the terms awarded by the arbitrators in consequence of the rejection of certain evidence were not fair and such as had been contemplated by the plaintiff and defendant when they entered into the agreement. C

LORD CRANWORTH, L.C.—This was a bill filed for the specific performance of an agreement dated Feb. 11, 1848, made between Williams, the defendant, and Parker (who was then his partner, but who, soon after the agreement, died) of the one part; and several persons who claim under the will of a Mr. Holmes, of the other part. The agreement is this: D

“Whereas the said John Williams and George Parker are working a mine of coal and ironstone called the Broadwell Colliery, situate in the county of Worcester, in copartnership together; and whereas the representatives of Holmes and the parties claiming under them, possess lands and mines adjacent to the said colliery, and the said Williams and Parker have driven gate roads into the vein of coal in such mines called the thick coal, and have proved the quality thereof—Now these presents witness that each of the said parties of the second part agree that Williams and Parker shall have liberty and licence to dig, win, and get the several beds, veins, and seams of thick and ten-yards coal, heathen coal, ironstone, and white ironstone lying in and under the several pieces or parcels of land and hereditaments delineated on the plan indorsed hereon and coloured blue, and formerly the property of Holmes, deceased, at such price or prices, and for such number of years not exceeding twenty-one, and upon such terms, but subject nevertheless to the several terms and stipulations of this agreement, as shall be determined upon by Richard Haines and John Southern, persons indifferently chosen for the purpose by the parties to this agreement, and who, it is agreed, shall have full liberty to decide the value of such mines and minerals as between the several parties hereto, and to direct the payment of the same to be made at such times and by such instalments as they deem right; and also the number of years for which such mines and minerals should be held by the said Williams and Parker, but subject nevertheless to the terms and stipulations of this agreement; and in case of the said Haines and Southern not agreeing upon the price or terms for the working of the said mines and minerals, and declaring the same in writing under their hands within three weeks of the day of the date of this agreement, then that the said Williams and Parker shall have liberty and licence to dig, win, and get the aforesaid several beds, veins, and seams of thick or ten-yards coal, &c., at such price or prices, and for such number of years not exceeding twenty-one years, and upon such terms, but subject nevertheless to the terms and stipulations of this agreement, as shall be determined upon by a person to be nominated and chosen by the said Haines and Southern, before they enter upon the aforesaid reference.” E F G H I

Then, in consideration of the agreement, Williams and Parker undertake to work the coal and make the payments, etc.

The time for making the award was afterwards enlarged by an instrument under the hands of the solicitors of each of the parties. It is thus—after reciting that the

A time limited by the agreement for making the award had expired, and that they were desirous of extending it, Wainwright as agent of the parties of the one part, and Robinson as agent of the parties of the other part, agreed to extend the time to April 14 for making the award by the arbitrators; and, if they did not, then the umpire was to make it within a certain other time therein mentioned.

B From the date of that agreement, and, indeed, previously to it, the mine was worked by Williams and Parker to some extent. After the execution of this agreement, the right of the defendant Williams, and Parker, was to have a lease on the terms which were to be fixed by those referees. The extended time for making the award was up to April 14; in point of fact, the award was made on April 13. It purports to be made by Haines and Southern, the two referees, and not by the umpire; though, before they proceeded to make this inquiry, they did appoint an umpire, a Mr. Peacock. The award is thus:

C "By virtue of the powers given to us by an agreement of Feb. 11, 1848, made between [&c.] and by virtue of the extended time, by a memorandum [&c.] whereby the time was extended, having, previously to entering on the consideration of the matters to us by such agreement, appointed Mr. Peacock to be umpire, finally to decide the matters in the event of our disagreement; and having examined witnesses, and duly investigated the matters referred to us by the before-mentioned agreement, do, by this writing under our respective hands, declare and award that the price to be paid by Williams and Parker for the mines [&c.] in the before-mentioned agreement, on a lease thereof for a term of fourteen years, from April 11 last, shall be £400 per acre, according to the surface measure, and without deduction for faults or otherwise, payable as follows: £400 to be paid down at the time of signing the lease, and £400 per year afterwards, payable quarterly on the usual quarter-days of payment."

D The mines were to be worked in the usual way, under and subject to certain formal directions. That award was made within the time, and therefore purports to be a proper award by the referees. On May 10, 1848, Messrs. Bourne and Wainwright, who were the solicitors for the lessors, sent a draft of the proposed lease to Messrs. Robinson and Fletcher, who were the solicitors of the proposed lessees. It was returned on May 30 to Messrs. Bourne and Wainwright, without any written approval thereof, but with a verbal statement to the effect that they had not then seen their client, meaning Mr. Williams, who had survived Mr. Parker, but that, provided the terms were correctly stated, they had no objection to the draft lease.

E There could be no objection to it, because it was merely a lease on the terms which had been approved of and settled; therefore the lease was returned with a sort of conditional approval. Messrs. Bourne and Wainwright then caused the lease to be engrossed, and sent it so engrossed to Messrs. Robinson and Fletcher; and, on May 31, Mr. Robinson, on the behalf of Williams, wrote to Messrs. Bourne and Wainwright a letter of that date, in which he says:

F "Mr. John Williams has been here to-day; he says he has never seen any copy of the award made by Mr. Haines and Mr. Southern, and is perfectly unacquainted with the periods within which the money is payable; that he has no wish to create delay, or throw any obstacle in the completion of your present arrangements; but he cannot consent to execute the lease until he is better acquainted with the facts."

I No doubt that was a very reasonable objection. He says that he agreed to take a lease on certain terms, which were to be settled by two referees. He never heard what were the terms the referees had settled, therefore, until he knows that, he can say nothing. In consequence of that, a copy of the award was procured and sent to Messrs. Robinson and Fletcher on June 10, when it must be taken that notice was given to Williams of the terms of that arbitration. Nothing, however, seems to have been done on that for some weeks afterwards; but on July 27 Messrs. Bourne and Wainwright again wrote to Messrs. Robinson and Fletcher to ask whether he meant to abide by the award. No answer was sent to that until Aug. 8, when A Messrs. Robinson and Fletcher wrote :

"Mr. Williams is advised that the award is invalid on several grounds, and he, therefore, declines acceding to the terms of it. We are requested, however, to state that he is willing to enter into an equitable arrangement with the parties, notwithstanding his surveyor has ordered the mines to be abandoned, as the produce will not pay the wages." B

There is no doubt that Williams was entitled, under the terms of his agreement of Feb. 11 to have a valid award; and if, therefore, the award was invalid, and objected to in due time, then there was nothing to bind the defendant. These are propositions which are not controverted.

The objections to the award which were made are, first of all, that Haines, being C one of the arbitrators in estimating the amount, relied exclusively on his grandson's report as to the state of the mine, and did not examine it himself; secondly, that the arbitrators examined no witnesses; thirdly, that they left it to Mr. Peacock to say what it should be, and did not form their own judgment, but adopted his;
fourthly, that the parties did not sign the award both together and at the same time.

The award has evidently something strange connected with it, which is this—it is D signed not only by the referees but by the umpire. I, however, treat it merely as the award of the referees, and take the signature of the umpire for nothing, except perhaps as indicating his concurrence; but it was not the award of the umpire, it was the award of the referees. I do not agree that it was incumbent on the referees to examine witnesses; I do not think that is required when a matter is referred to a surveyor and people of skill to settle what the value of property to be bought or let E is. They are entrusted, from their experience and from their observation, to form a judgment which the parties referring to them agree shall be satisfactory; therefore, I do not think that there was anything of importance in their not examining witnesses, provided bona fide they meant to say, "We know sufficient of the subject to decide properly without examining witnesses." That, I think, is not a valid objection. F

I am not prepared to say whether it would be a valid objection merely that Mr.
Haines did not go down the mine himself, but left it to his grandson; because, when you are forming a judgment as to the value of anything, you necessarily proceed in a great measure on the report of others. If a person is to value an estate, nobody intends that he shall examine every rood of land. He takes a cur- G sory view, examines it here and there, he knowing the land and the neighbourhood, he asks some questions, and is in some respects guided by them. Therefore I do not think that it was incumbent on Mr. Haines to go down himself; and I do not think that it is fatal that he relied on the report of his grandson.

Neither should I have brought it an objection that they consulted Mr. Peacock as to his opinion. One must trust to the reports of others as to different matters connected with the property. If, therefore, the result of this had been, that they, H having a doubt as to what they ought to say was the value, among other means of enabling them to form a correct judgment, took the opinion of Mr. Peacock, evidently a person of skill and competent experience in these matters, I should not have thought that any objection. But the evidence as to the mode in which these persons arrived at a conclusion as to the value is to be found in the depositions.
Mr. Haines says that he inspected the mines, and found Williams and Parker I working them. In March, 1848, he inspected the mine in company with Mr.
Southern and Mr. Peacock, and found the workings going on. He examined it, and thought £400 an acre was a proper price. The result of the evidence is that Mr.
Haines, the referee, was guided either entirely or mainly by the report of his grandson, coupled with his own fifty years' knowledge of the neighbourhood, which of itself, I think, was quite a legitimate ground to entitle him to sign an award. But what the other referee says is not that he consulted Mr. Peacock but was satisfied with his decision on it as being worth £400 an acre. Mr. Peacock had valued it at

A £400 and though Mr. Haines did not think it worth £200, he concurred with the other because he thought it no use differing.

That is not an award to which the persons who had agreed to make the reference were bound. They were entitled to have the unbiased judgment of the two; or, if the two could not concur, then the unbiased judgment of the third, acting, not in a loose way, but giving an opinion deciding judiciously on that which it had become
B his duty to decide; I think that was an objection to the award. I am inclined to think contrary to my first impression when the matter was stated, that it was also an objection that they did not sign together. On that I give no opinion, for reasons which will appear, inasmuch as it is not necessary to decide it. One objection to the validity of an award, if taken in a proper way, and the parties are not now precluded, is as good as a hundred. I think that there is a great deal of good sense in
C saying, when a matter is referred to two persons to decide a thing by a statement in writing, that that writing must be made by the two together a contemporaneous act; because if one person signs at York on one day, and another signs at Exeter another day, how are we to know that something may not have occurred in the meantime to induce one party to change his mind if he could. It is the duty of two persons to keep the matter open to the last moment, and it is not competent for D the one to sign at one time and the other to sign at another. That is not a question necessary to decide here, but I wish to guard myself against the notion that I do not accede to that as being a correct statement of the law. On Aug. 8 Mr. Williams objected to this award. Take it on the objection, which I consider a valid one, that it was not the genuine opinion of the two, is that objection taken in due time? He had a knowledge of the award on June 10, it was sent to his solicitor, on that day, or at least a day or two afterwards, it must be taken he knew of it. I think that
E there was considerable, though not quite warrantable, delay; it was no doubt a matter which he ought to have had some little time to inquire into, as to whether this award had been duly made; he said he did not think it was worth half the money, he does inquire, and he does not make an objection until August. Mr. Williams coupled the objection with saying that, though he objected to the award
F himself, he was willing still to negotiate on equitable terms, by which he meant terms other than those which had been stated in this reference. The suggestion on the part of the plaintiff is this, that, supposing the award to be bad, the objection was not made in good time.

I feel myself released from deciding the very difficult question how much delay will be conclusive to shut a person out from making a complaint because I come to
G the conclusion, irresistible to my mind, whether it was made in proper time or not, that the plaintiff concurred in treating it as being open to a new negotiation; that is the important question. Going on, therefore, by steps, there was an award, which, in my view of the law was erroneously made, it was objected to as doubtful, and it is irrelevant whether it was objected to in good time or not, because the parties interested in objecting to it concurred in treating it as having been objected
H to in good time, for they opened fresh negotiations. I have arrived at this conclusion mainly from the evidence of the plaintiff. [His LORDSHIP considered the evidence, and continued:] It appears to me to establish conclusively that, the objection being made to the award on Aug. 8, the plaintiff, by his solicitor and by his agent, assented to that objection so far as to agree that the mine should be examined again with the view of fixing a value; the persons who went down on the
I part of the plaintiff adhered to the opinion which Mr. Thomas Haines had originally formed, that it was worth £400 an acre. Mr. Bettle, on the part of the defendant, comes to a totally opposite conclusion. This carried the matter on into November. The statement of the plaintiff is that the defendant continued working the mine until the following month of December; the defendant says that that is true, but not the whole truth. He says he continued it, in truth, in the hopes that he might find that it could be worked profitably: he continued working until February, and then he abandoned it; the plaintiff supposed that it had been abandoned in December. The defendant alleged that he was not bound by the award, and that he would not take it up, not being worth anything or worth little or nothing. That establishes conclusively that the defendant had given up the working of this mine, either in December, 1848, or in February, 1849. Three years and a half elapsed and nothing was done. Counsel for the plaintiff says that this case is to be distinguished from other cases because, in truth, possession here had been taken, and to a certain extent the mine had been actually worked and coal gotten; therefore, he says, it is more like an action for goods sold and delivered, for the defendant had actually had the goods. I think that there is a fallacy in that. It is true that the defendant had some goods; but what this court is asked to do is to make itself instrumental in compelling him to take other goods. The fact that he has taken some goods may be most important in showing whether or not he is bound to take the remainder. That may be very important in other points of view, but the fact that he had taken some, under some circumstances (for example, under protest) may, as to the others, prove nothing—he may be liable to account for what he has taken; but that does not give the other party a right to compel him to take that which he has not.

It appears to me, on all principles and all the authorities, that lapse of time is conclusive if there had not been anything like an abandonment of possession. It may be that one is not too late to have brought an action; but specific performance is relief which this court will not give, unless the parties seeking it come promptly and as soon as the nature of the case will permit.

In Watson v. Reid (1), SIR JOHN LEACH refused specific performance after the party had been waiting for twelve months, and no sufficient reason given. Southcomb v. Bishop of Exeter (2) was a case of the same description, but the delay there was much less than the delay in this case.

It appears to me that the case may be shortly stated thus: The award was made on April 13, invalid if properly objected to. It was objected to on Aug. 8. It may be doubtful whether it was objected to soon enough, having regard to the nature of the objection; but the conduct of the parties shows that the lessors, or intended lessors, did not mean to avail themselves of any objection for delay up to that time, and that they acquiesced by again sending down their agent to meet the agent of the other parties, in order to fix the value—that no agreement ever was come to, and that, either in December, 1848, or February, 1849, the mine was abandoned. Having been so abandoned, if the plaintiff's view of this case is correct, he might, if he had come forward in good time, have insisted on specific performance, because he might have said there was no objection to the award; but he did not agree to waive the fact that the award had been adopted. He might have put forward either of those grounds. I am of opinion, if it were necessary to decide it, that he was wrong on both those points. I think that there was a valid objection to the award; and I am inclined to think that that objection was made in due time. Even if there was no valid objection to the award, there was a contest on the part of the intended lessees, who say that there is a valid objection to the award; and repudiate the contract in consequence. They quit in December or February, and three years and a half elapse. It appears to me, with all deference to the vice-chancellor, that this is not a case in which the court can give a decree for specific performance.

Bill dismissed so far as it sought specific performance.

Husband and Wife—"Necessaries"—Right of wife to pledge husband's credit—Spouses living apart—Adultery by wife—Casual visits by husband to wife.

Where a wife who is living apart from her husband commits adultery, her authority to pledge his credit for necessities is gone. If the jury find that there has been no condonation, it is not the duty of the judge to leave it to the jury to say whether any authority is to be inferred from some casual visits by the husband to the wife.

Application for leave to move for a rule to set aside an order of WILLIAMS, J., on the verdict of a jury in an action brought by the plaintiff against the defendant for the price of certain necessities supplied to the defendant's wife.

G

The learned judge left two questions to the jury: (i) Whether there had been adultery? and (ii) Whether that had been condoned, and whether, if there had been a condonation, there had been subsequent adultery?

Patchett for the plaintiff.

H

WILLES, J.—As to the misdirection, that is said to have been in this way. The wife was living apart from her husband, and the judge appears to have told the jury that if the wife, while living apart from her husband, committed adultery which was not condoned, he was not liable for necessities supplied to her. The substance of his direction was what I have stated, and I think that was good law. Counsel for the wife says that was not sufficient. He contends there was evidence of authority which ought to have been left to the jury. He points to visits by the husband to the wife at other places than that at which the goods were supplied. But the jury have found that there was no condonation. They must, therefore, have found that these were casual visits, not showing condonation; and it would be an abuse, when the law lays it down broadly that adultery relieves the husband from liability, if the court left it open to the jury on small matters to infer authority: Govier v. Hancock (1); Atkins v. Pearce (2).

I

Then it is said there was no evidence of the adultery, which ought to have been left to the jury. In many cases it may be true that the evidence of the wife might be collusive. But although the objection might prevail in the ecclesiastical courts.

such an exception has never been introduced into these courts. The objection would go rather to the weight of the evidence than its admissibility. But at any rate the privilege, if any, is the privilege of the witness, and not of the counsel, and as he could not object at the trial, he cannot do so now.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. I am of opinion that the authority of the wife living apart from her husband ceases upon adultery.

As to the remaining question, i.e., whether the verdict was against the evidence, their Lordships said they would consult WILLIAMS, J.

Rule refused.

Landlord and Tenant—Lease—Illegality—Lease obtained by fraud—Term vested in tenant and tenant let into possession—Estate not to be divested by collateral fraud.

By fraudulently misrepresenting that he was a perfumer the plaintiff induced the defendant to let him certain premises and he went into possession under the terms of an agreement. At the time the plaintiff went into possession he intended to use the premises for immoral purposes. A few days after he went into possession the defendant forcibly ejected him because of his use of the premises for immoral purposes, and he brought an action for ejectment to recover possession.

Held: the agreement having been made, the term vested in the plaintiff, and the plaintiff having been let into possession the estate had so passed as to prevent it being divested by the collateral fraud of the plaintiff.

Per MAULE, J.: It would be extremely inconvenient if a title could be impeached in a court of law by showing that a conveying party had been induced to execute it by misrepresentation.

D Rule Nisi obtained by the plaintiff to enter a verdict or for the new trial of an action of ejectment tried by CROWDER, J., and a jury, and brought by the plaintiff against the defendant to recover possession of premises in Jermyn Street, London.

The plaintiff, on applying for a lease of the premises, said that he wanted them as a perfumer, and, on being asked if he could give a respectable reference, wrote down the name of a Mr. Pilon, a perfumer in Golden Square. Pilon, on being applied to, said that he had dealt with the plaintiff for four years, that he was a perfumer, and a highly respectable man. The defendant, being satisfied, signed an agreement, and the plaintiff was let into possession, but, after a few days, was forcibly expelled by the defendant. For the defendant evidence was offered to show that the plaintiff was a very disreputable person, and that he did not intend to carry on the trade of a perfumer, but that he had occupied the premises with two women, with one of whom he lived, and who was a common prostitute; and that the defendant had expelled the plaintiff in consequence of the complaints of the neighbours.

E The learned judge thought that this was no defence, but allowed it to go to the jury in order that the point might be raised, and, at the request of the defendant's counsel, put the two following questions to the jury: (i) Whether the plaintiff, at the time that he took the premises, intended to use them for an immoral and illegal purpose; (ii) whether he obtained possession of the premises by fraud and misrepresentation.

G The jury found in the defendant's favour on both points and also that the fraud was that he represented that he wanted the premises for the purposes of a perfumer. The learned judge entered judgment for the defendant with leave to the plaintiff to move to enter the judgment for him. Subsequently the plaintiff obtained a rule to show cause why the verdict should not be entered for the plaintiff.

H M. Chambers, Q.C., and Raymond, for the defendant, showed cause against the rule.

Massey Dawson and Giffard, for the plaintiff, supported the rule.

I JERVIS, C.J.—I must confess I have entertained considerable doubt during the course of the discussion, but the argument of counsel for the plaintiff has satisfied me that this rule ought to be made absolute.

It is unnecessary to pronounce any opinion upon some of the points which have been suggested. In the first place, it was urged that certain evidence as to a criminal charge made against the plaintiff before a magistrate and as to his having been fined for being found in a common gaming house, which was offered for the purpose of depreciating the plaintiff's character, was improperly admitted. Further, it was said that there was no evidence of fraud. I incline to think the evidence alluded to was inadmissible, and I think there was abundant evidence of fraud. But it is unnecessary to give any distinct decision upon either of those points, because I am of opinion that, assuming the evidence in question to have been properly received and assuming that the plaintiff was guilty of a fraudulent misrepresentation when he said that his object in taking the premises was that he might carry on therein the perfumery business, when he really intended to devote them to the infamous purpose to which the jury found he intended to devote them and did devote them, the plaintiff still is entitled to recover in this action.

Counsel for the defendant contended that an agreement to let apartments to be used by the tenant for immoral purposes is an illegal and void agreement; that the defendant was justified in forcibly evicting the plaintiff the moment he discovered the improper use he was making of the apartments; and that, if we hold the plaintiff entitled to recover, and so reinstate him in the possession, we shall be lending our aid to the enforcing an agreement which is tainted with fraud and illegality. I thought at first that that argument presented the true view of the case, but the argument of counsel for the plaintiff has convinced me that the real question is whether, the agreement having been made, the term vested in the plaintiff, and the plaintiff having been let into possession, the estate has not so passed as to prevent its being divested by a collateral fraud. There can be no doubt whatever that the defendant intended to do, and in fact did do, everything that was requisite to constitute a valid lease. He executed the instrument—an instrument sufficient for the purpose of conveying the term—well knowing its effect—and he delivered possession of the premises to the plaintiff, with the intention of passing the term to him, if any were created by the instrument. What is there to avoid that, or to divest the plaintiff of the interest which has passed to him? The defendant seeks to dispossess the plaintiff, not by reason of any misrepresentation as to the legal effect of the contract he was entering into, but because the plaintiff, at the time of the negotiation for the lease, represented (falsely, it may be) that he was about to use the premises for a particular purpose. That was, as counsel for the plaintiff justly observes, a representation as to something altogether collateral to the contract. I do not think that the immoral intention in the mind of the plaintiff at the time, or the immoral use made by him of the premises after he got possession, can have any affect at all upon the validity of the contract.

In the cases relied on for the defendant, the aid of the court was invoked to enforce a contract which was either contrary to public policy or contrary to some statute. Thus, in Ritchie v. Smith (1), the plaintiff was seeking to enforce the payment of rent under an agreement which was an express violation of a positive law. So, in Gas Light and Coke Co. v. Turner (2), there was not, as here, a mere intention on one side to do an illegal act, but the lease which the plaintiffs were seeking to enforce was executed by both parties for the express purpose of carrying into effect something which was prohibited by law. Here the lease upon the face of it is a perfectly valid one. A bare intention such as is shown here is not enough to avoid it. The defendant intended to demise the premises to the plaintiff, and he did all he could to carry that intention into effect. The plaintiff entered under that demise, and became possessed of the term. I, therefore, think his title to maintain this ejectment cannot be impeached in a court of law.

MAULE, J.—I am of the same opinion. The plaintiff is not calling upon the court to enforce any agreement at all. The agreement was an agreement on the part of the defendant to demise certain premises to the plaintiff for a given term. When the instrument was executed, and possession was given under it, it received its full effect: no aid of a court of justice was required to enforce it. This action of ejectment is brought, not for the purpose of enforcing the agreement, but the plaintiff asks the court to afford him a remedy against one who has extruded him from a lawful possession. There is, therefore, a manifest distinction between this case and those where the court was called upon to assist the plaintiff in enforcing

A an agreement the object of which was to do an illegal act, as in Ritchie v. Smith (1). In that case both plaintiff and defendant were parties to an agreement, the very object and intention of which was, to enable one of them to commit an infraction of the law. If the court there had refused to listen to the defence, they would have been helping the plaintiff to enforce something which lay in contract, viz., the payment of rent, when both parties to the agreement were intending to apply the premises to an illegal purpose: the plaintiff was seeking to enforce the performance of an illegal agreement. Such also was Gas Light and Coke Co. v. Turner (2).

B Here, it is said, not that the defendant did not intend to create the term and to vest the interest therein in the plaintiff, but that the execution of the instrument by which that interest in the premises was conveyed to the plaintiff, was procured by means of a fraudulent representation as to the plaintiff's intention. But, however fraudulent and immoral the plaintiff's conduct may have been, I am aware of no authority which supports the position that the plaintiff's title can be impeached in a court of law by showing that the deed under which he claims has been obtained by such fraud. I think it would lead to most inconvenient and mischievous consequences, if we were to hold that a title once vested might afterwards be impeached, on the ground that one of the contracting parties had been induced by a fraudulent representation of the other as to the uses to which he meant to apply the premises, to execute the conveyance. The defendant's proper remedy, if any, is in a court of equity. With respect, therefore, to the misrepresentation, I conceive that the defendant, if he has been imposed upon, might have a remedy against the plaintiff: but I think it cannot be said that the term did not pass. As to the plaintiff's intention at the time of the contract—I think neither that nor the use he made of the premises subsequently will avoid the lease. The plaintiff was to have some locus penitentiæ; it is not to be presumed that he will continue to do that which is unlawful.

CRESSWELL, J.—I concur with my Lord and MAULE, J., in thinking that this rule ought to be made absolute. The subsequent user of the premises for the illegal and immoral purpose suggested, will not avoid the lease: still less will the intention so to use them. The only question is whether the fraudulent representation made for the purpose of inducing the defendant to grant the lease, will prevent its having effect. I think the argument of counsel for the plaintiff, and the cases he has cited, clearly show that the plaintiff's misrepresentation of the purpose for which he wanted the premises, has not the effect of preventing the term from vesting in him.

C H CROWDER, J.—I am of the same opinion. At the trial, it appeared to me that the cause was absolutely undefended. The lease was executed by the defendant with full knowledge of what he was about. The only ground upon which it was sought to be impeached, was, that the plaintiff had misrepresented the purpose for which he wanted the premises, and his intention to put them to an immoral use. I was pressed by counsel for the defendant to leave to the jury the two questions I did leave, viz., whether the defendant was induced by the plaintiff's false representations to grant him the lease, and whether at the time he hired the premises he intended to use them for immoral purposes. I thought at the time, and I still think, that there was no defence. It seems to me to be perfectly clear, that, notwithstanding the falsehood of the plaintiff's representations and the iniquity of his intentions, the term passed by the lease, an interest was created in the plaintiff, from which he was illegally expelled. The plaintiff's fraudulent representations and intentions led to an inquiry that was wholly collateral. The case is in no degree varied by the fact that the plaintiff is seeking by this action to regain the possession of which he has been deprived. He is not calling upon the court to aid him in enforcing or carrying into effect an illegal agreement: all he seeks, is, to recover the possession of premises to which he is lawfully entitled. His misrepresentation will not prevent the demise from taking effect. Suppose the defendant had, instead of turning the plaintiff out, brought an ejectment, would not the agreement have afforded a good answer? No case has been cited to show that it would be any answer, that the lease was obtained by a false representation. All those referred to were very different from this case: they were all cases where the aid of the court was invoked for the purpose of carrying into effect an illegal agreement into which the parties had entered. No intention existing in the plaintiff's mind could make the contract void. He might have repented. For these reasons, I am of opinion that the rule to enter a verdict for the plaintiff should be made absolute.

Rule absolute.

Criminal Law—Larceny—Larceny by finding—Appropriation of goods to finder's own use—Reasonable belief that owner cannot be found—Subsequent disposal of goods after awareness of existence of owner.

Where a man finds goods which have in fact been lost or which he reasonably believes to have been lost and he appropriates them to his own use, in the absence of anything to rebut the presumption that he believed the owner could not be found he is not guilty of larceny, even though he disposes of the goods after he is aware of the existence of the true owner, for the original taking is lawful and the subsequent conversion is not a trespass. But where the evidence shows that at the time of appropriating the goods he believed that the true owner could be found, the original taking was felonious.

A Case Stated for the opinion of the Court of Crown Cases Reserved by PARKE, B. The prisoner was indicted at the Summer Assizes for the County of Huntingdon, 1848, for stealing a bank-note which he found and intended to appropriate. The jury found that the prisoner did not know who the owner was when he picked up the note, but that he did know who the owner was when he changed it. PARKE, B., directed a verdict of Guilty to be entered, but discharged the prisoner on his own recognisance, in order that the opinion of the court might be taken on the case.

No counsel appeared.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 30, 1849. PARKE, B., read the following judgment of the court.—The prisoner was tried before me at the last Summer Assizes for the county of Huntingdon for stealing a bank-note. It appeared that he found the note, which had been accidentally dropped on the high-road. There was no name on it indicating who was the owner, nor were there any circumstances attending the finding which would enable him to discover to whom the note belonged when he picked it up, nor had he any reason to believe that the owner knew where to find it again. The prisoner meant to appropriate it to his own use when he picked it up. The day after, and before he had disposed of it, he was informed that the prosecutor was the owner, and had dropped it accidentally. He then changed it, and appropriated the money to his own use. The jury found that he had reason to believe it to be the prosecutor's property before he thus changed the note. I directed a verdict of Guilty, intimating that I should reserve the Case for further consideration. Upon conferring with MAULE, J., it seemed to us that the original taking was not felonious, and that in the subsequent disposal of it there was no taking; and, therefore, I declined to pass sentence, and ordered the prisoner to be discharged, on entering into his own recognisance to appear when called upon. I requested the opinion of the judges, and the Case has now undergone much consideration. It was not argued by counsel, but the judges who attended the sitting of this court after the last term—namely, POLLOCK, C.B., PATTESON, J., ROLFE, B., CRESSWELL, COLTMAN and WILLIAMS, JJ., and myself, have given it much consideration on account of its importance and the frequency of the occurrence of cases, in some degree similar, in the administration of the criminal law, and the somewhat obscure state of the authorities upon it.

In order to constitute the crime of larceny, there must be a taking of the chattels of another animo furandi, and against the will of the owner. This is not the full definition of larceny, but so much only of it as is necessary to be referred to for the present purpose. By the term animo furandi is to be understood the intention to take, not a partial or temporary, but the entire dominion over the chattels, without colour of right. As the rule of law, founded on justice, is, that actus non facit reum nisi mens sit rea, the guilt of the accused must depend upon the circumstances as they appear to him, and the crime of larceny cannot be committed unless the goods taken appear to have an owner, and the party taking must know or believe that the taking is against the will of the owner. In the earliest times it was held that chattels which were apparently without an owner, "nullius in bonis," could not be the subject of larceny. STAUNFORD, one of the oldest authorities on criminal law, who was a judge in the reign of Philip and Mary, says (PLEAS OF THE CROWN, bk. 1, c. 16):

"Treasure trove, wreck of the sea, waife, or stray, taken and carried away, is not felony; 'Quia dominus rerum non apparet, ideo cujus sunt incertum est.'"

For this he quotes FITZHERBERT'S ABRIDGMENT, Coron. at pp. 187, 265. These passages are taken from 22 Ass. 99; 22 Edw. 3; 23 Edw. 3; and mention only "treasure trove," "wreck," and "waife"; and FITZHERBERT says the punishment for taking such is not the loss of life or limb. The passage in 3 Co. INST. 108, goes beyond this. LORD COKE mentions three circumstances as material in larceny: First, the taking must be felonious, which he explains; secondly, it must be an actual taking, which he also explains; and, thirdly, it must not be by trover. He then proceeds as follows:

"If one lose his goods and another find them, though he convert them 'animo furandi' to his own use, yet it is no larceny, for the first taking is lawful. So, if one find treasure trove, or waife, or stray [here 'wreck' is omitted and 'stray' introduced], and convert them, ut supra, it is no larceny, both in respect of the finding, and also for that 'dominus rerum non apparet.'"

The only authority given is that before mentioned (22 Ass. 99: FITZHERBERT'S ABRIDGMENT, Coron. 265; 22 Edw. 3).

Treasure trove and waife seem to be subject to a different consideration from goods lost. Treasure trove is properly money supposed to have been hid by some owner since deceased, the secret of the deposit having perished, and therefore belongs to the Crown. As to a waife, the original owner loses his right to the property by neglecting to pursue the thief. The very circumstances under which these are assumed to have been taken and converted show that they could not be taken from any one, there being no owner. Wreck and stray are not exactly on the same footing as treasure trove and waife. Wreck is not properly so called if the real owner is known, and it is not forfeited until a year and a day. The word "estrays" is used in the books in different senses, as may be seen in COMYNS' DIGEST. "WAIFE," F., where it is used in the sense of cattle forfeited after being in a manor one year and one day without challenge, after being proclaimed, when the property vests in the Crown, or its grantee of estrays; and also of cattle straying in the manor before they are forfeited. 2 BLACKSTONE'S COMMENTARIES, p. 561 (Stephen's edition), defines estrays to be "such valuable animals as are found wandering in any manor or lordship, and no man knoweth the owner of them, in which case the law gives them to the sovereign."

In the passage in STAUNFORD, no doubt the word is used not exclusively in the former sense, but generally as to stray cattle not seized by the lord. Treasure trove and waife, properly so called, are clearly "bona vacantia, nullius in bonis," and but for the prerogative would belong to the first finder absolutely.

"Hæc quæ nullius in bonis sunt et olim fuerunt inventoris de jure naturali, jam efficiuntur principis de jure gentium": BRACTON.

Wreck and stray, in the sense we ascribe to those words, are not in the same situation, for the right of the owner is not forfeited until the end of a year and a day; but LORD COKE, in Constable's Case (1) (5 Co. Rep. at p. 108a), treats wreck also as nullius in bonis, and estrays "animalia vagantia," he terms "vacantia," "because none claims the property." Wreck and stray, however, before seizure, closely resemble goods lost, of which the owner has not actual possession, and afford an analogy to which LORD COKE refers in the passage above cited. Whether LORD COKE means, what the language at first sight imports, that under no circumstances would the taker of goods, really lost and found, be guilty of larceny, is not clear, but the passage is a complete and satisfactory authority that a person who finds goods which are lost may convert them animo furandi, under some circumstances, so as not to be guilty of larceny. The two reasons assigned by him are, that the person taking has a right in respect of the finding; and also that they are apparently without an owner. Dominus rerum non apparet—an owner or the owner does not appear. The first of these reasons has led to the opinion that the real meaning of LORD COKE was, not that every finder of lost goods, who takes animo furandi, is not guilty of felony, but that if one finds and innocently takes possession, meaning to keep for the real owner, and afterwards changes his mind and converts to his own use, he is not a felon, on the principle that LORD COKE had previously laid down, that

- A "the intent to steal must be when the thing stolen cometh to his possession, for if he hath the possession of it once lawfully, though he hath animus furandi afterwards, and carrieth it away, it is no larceny";
- and LORD COKE also cites GLANVILLE (bk. 10, c. 13): "Furtum non est ubi initium habet detentionis per dominum rei."
- B It is said, therefore, that the case of finding is an instance of this beginning with lawful title, which, consequently, cannot become a felony by subsequent conversion; but that if it be originally taken not from the true owner, but with intent to appropriate it to his own use, it is a felony, and of this opinion the Commissioners for the Amendment of the Criminal Law appear to have been, as stated in their first report. This opinion appears not to be well founded,
- C for LORD COKE puts the case of lost goods on the same footing as waife and treasure trove, which are really bona vacantia, goods without an owner, and with respect to which we apprehend that a person would not be guilty of larceny, though he took originally animus furandi—that is, with the intent not to take a partial or temporary possession, but to usurp the entire dominion over them; and the previous observations have reference to cases in which the original possession of the chattel stolen is with the consent of, or by contract with, the owner. But any doubt on this question is removed by what is said by LORD
- D HALE (1 HALE, PLEAS OF THE CROWN, at p. 506):
- "If A. finds the purse of B. in the highway, and take and carry it away, and hath all the circumstances that may prove it to be done animus furandi, as denying or secreting it, yet it is not felony. The like in case of taking a
- E wreck or treasure trove [citing 22 Ass. 99], or a waife or stray."
- LORD HALE clearly considers, that if lost goods are taken originally animus furandi in the sense above mentioned, the taker is not a felon; and, when it is considered that by the common law larceny to the value of above 12d. was punishable by death; and that the quality of the act in taking animus furandi goods from the possession of the owner differs greatly from that of taking them
- F when no longer in his possession, and quasi derelict, as respects its injurious effects on the interests of society—the true ground for the punishment of crime—it is not surprising that such a rule should be established, and it is founded on strict justice, for the cases of abstraction of lost property are of rare occurrence when compared with the frequent violation of property in the possession of an owner; there was no need of so severe a sanative, and the civil remedy
- G might be deemed amply sufficient. HAWKINS (PLEAS OF THE CROWN, bk. 1, c. 33, s. 3) says:
- "Our law, which punishes all theft with death, if the thing stolen be above the value of 12d. and with corporal punishment if under, rather chooses to deal with such cases as civil than criminal offences, perhaps for this reason,
- H in the case of goods lost, because the party is not so much aggrieved where nothing is taken but what he had lost before."
- It cannot, indeed, be doubted, that if at this day the punishment of death was assigned to larceny, and usually carried into effect, the appropriating of lost goods would never have been held to constitute that offence, and it is certain that the alteration of punishment cannot alter the definition of the offence.
- I To prevent, however, the taking of goods from being larceny, it is essential that they should be presumably lost—that is, that they should be taken in such a place, and under such circumstances, as that the owner would be reasonably presumed by the taker to have abandoned them, or, at least, not to know where to find them. Therefore, if a horse is found feeding upon an open common, or on the side of a public road, or a watch found apparently hidden in a haystack, the taking of these would be larceny, because the taker had no right to presume that the owner did not know where to find them, and consequently had no right to treat them as lost goods. In the present case there is no doubt that the bank-note was lost; the owner did not know where to find it; the prisoner reasonably believed it to be lost; he had no reason to know to whom it belonged, and therefore though he took it with the intent, not of taking a partial or temporary, but the entire dominion over it, the act of taking did not in our opinion constitute the crime of larceny. Whether the subsequent appropriation to his own use, by changing it with the knowledge at that time that it belonged to the prosecutor, does amount to that crime will be afterwards considered. It appears, however, that goods which do fall within the category of lost goods, and which the taker justly believes to be lost, may be taken and converted so as to constitute the crime of larceny, when the party finding may be presumed to know the owner of them, as if there is any mark upon them presumably known by him, by which the owner can be ascertained. Whether this is a qualification introduced in modern times, or which always existed, we need not determine. It may have proceeded on this rule: "Quia dominus rerum non apparet ideo cuius sunt incertum est," and the rule is held not to apply when it is certain who is the owner; but the authorities are many, and we believe this qualification has been so generally adopted in practice, that we must, therefore, consider it to be the established law.

There are many reported cases on this subject. Some, where the owner of the goods may be presumed to be known from the circumstances under which they are found; among these are mentioned the cases of articles left in hackney-coaches by passengers, which the coachman appropriates to his own use, or a pocket-book found in a coat sent to a tailor to be repaired, and abstracted and opened by him. In these cases the appropriation has been held to be larceny. Perhaps these cases might be classed among those in which the taker is not justified in concluding that the goods were lost, because there is little doubt he must have believed that the owner would know where to find them again, and he had no pretence to consider them abandoned or derelict: Lamb's Case (2); R. v. Wynne (3); R. v. Sears (4). Some appear to have been decided on the ground of bailment determined by breaking bulk, which would constitute a trespass, as R. v. Wynne (3): but it seems difficult to apply that doctrine which belongs to bailment, where a special property is acquired by contract, to any case of goods merely lost and found, where a special property is acquired by finding. The appropriation of goods by the finder has also been held to be larceny where the owner could be found out by some mark on them, as in the case of lost notes, cheques, or bills with the owner's name upon them. This subject was considered in Merry v. Green (5), in which the Court of Exchequer acted upon the authority of these decisions; and in the argument in that case difficulties were suggested, whether the crime of larceny could be committed in the case of a marked article, a cheque, for instance, with the name of the owner on it, where a person originally took it up, intending to look at it and see who was the owner, and then, as soon as he knew whose it was, took it animo furandi, as, in order to constitute a larceny, the taking must be a trespass; and it was asked, when in such a case the trespass was committed? In answer to that inquiry the dictum attributed to me in the report was used, that in such a case the trespass must be taken to have been committed, not when he took it up to look at it, and see whose it was, but afterwards, when he appropriated it to his own use animo furandi. It is quite a mistake to suppose, as Mr. Greaves has done (1 RUSSELL ON CRIMES, c. 14), that I meant to lay down the proposition in the general terms contained in the extract from the report of Merry v. Green (5) (7 M. & W. at p. 629), which, taken alone, seems to be applicable to every case of finding unmarked as well as marked property; it was meant to apply to the latter only.

The result of these authorities is, that the rule of law on this subject seems to be, that if a man find goods that have been actually lost, or are reasonably supposed by him to have been lost, and appropriate them with intent to take the entire dominion over them, really believing when he takes them that the

A owner cannot be found, it is not larceny. But if he takes them with the like intent, though lost, or reasonably supposed to be lost, but reasonably believing that the owner can be found, it is larceny. In applying this rule, as indeed, in the application of all fixed rules, questions of some nicety may arise, but it will generally be ascertained whether the person accused had reasonable belief that the owner could be found, by evidence of his previous acquaintance

B with the ownership of the particular chattel, the place where it is found, or the nature of the marks upon it. In some cases it would be apparent, in others appear only after examination. It would probably be presumed that the taker would examine the chattel, as an honest man ought to do, at the time of taking it, and if he did not restore it to the owner, the jury might conclude that he took it when he took complete possession of it animo furandi. The mere taking

C of it up to look at it would not be a taking possession of the chattel.

To apply these rules to the present case. The first taking did not amount to larceny, because the note was really lost, and there was no mark on it nor other circumstance to indicate then who was the owner, or that he might be found, nor any evidence to rebut the presumption that would arise from the finding of the note as proved, that he believed the owner would not be found,

D and, therefore, the original taking was not felonious. And if the prisoner had changed the note, or otherwise disposed of it, before notice of the title of the real owner, he clearly would not have been punishable; but after the prisoner was in possession of the note the owner became known to him, and he then appropriated it animo furandi; and the point to be decided is whether that was a felony. Upon this question we have felt considerable doubt. If he had taken

E the chattel innocently, and afterwards appropriated it without knowledge of the ownership, it would not have been larceny, nor would it, we think, if he had done so knowing who was the owner, for he had the lawful possession in both cases, and the conversion would not have been a trespass in either. But here the original taking was not innocent in one sense, and the question is, Does that make a difference? We think not, it was punishable, as we have already

F decided, and though the possession was accompanied by a dishonest intent, it was still a lawful possession, and good against all but the real owner, and the subsequent conversion was not therefore a trespass in this case more than the others, and consequently no larceny. We, therefore, think the conviction was wrong.

Conviction quashed

Criminal Law—Assault—Assault on police officer in execution of duty—Arrest without warrant—Arrest soon after assault on third party and before danger of further violence has ceased.

If a constable sees an assault committed and, having no warrant, arrests the offender shortly after that assault and before all danger of further violence has ceased, the offender, if he assaults the constable during the arrest, may be convicted of assaulting a constable in the execution of his duty.

Case Stated for the opinion of the Court of Crown Cases Reserved.

On July 1, 1857, at the Sussex Quarter Sessions held at Horsham, the prisoner, George Light, was convicted of an assault on George Cross, a constable of the West Sussex Police, the constable then being in the due execution of his duty.

The prisoner was a married man and lived with his wife and three children in a cottage at Patfield, adjoining the city of Chichester. On the night of May 11, 1857, a few minutes before 11 p.m., the constable was informed of a disturbance in Patfield, and shortly after 11 p.m. he went with the wife into the cottage. The wife stated to the constable, in the prisoner's presence, that the prisoner had knocked her down and beaten her, and Henry Cook, a near neighbour, who was present, confirmed this. The constable left the cottage leaving the prisoner and his wife and children inside. The constable remained outside. Hearing the prisoner using violent language, he opened the outside shutters and he and Henry Cook looked in. Both saw the prisoner take up a shovel and hold it in a threatening attitude over his wife's head, and heard him say at the same time: "If it was not for the bloody policeman outside, I would split your head open, for 'tis you that sent for the policeman." The prisoner was near enough to his wife to have struck her with the shovel at the time he raised it, and spoke those words. About twenty minutes later the prisoner went down the highway towards his father's house, which was about 200 yards from his own cottage. The constable followed him, and when the prisoner had walked about seventy yards from his own cottage the constable took him into custody. The constable had no warrant. The prisoner, on being taken into custody, put his hands into the constable's neckcloth and struggled with him, the constable became exhausted and fell, and the prisoner got away from him. He was afterwards taken on a warrant, tried, and convicted.

A It was objected on behalf of the prisoner that the constable was not in the "due execution of his duty" when he arrested the defendant, inasmuch as he had no warrant; that the words spoken at the time when prisoner lifted up the shovel disproved the intention to commit an assault; and further, that the constable suffered considerable time to elapse before he took the prisoner into custody, and that when he did so, prisoner was peaceably walking away in a direction from his cottage. The court overruled the objection, and the jury found the prisoner guilty. He was sentenced to imprisonment, but with a view to the propriety of the conviction being submitted to the Court of Crown Cases Reserved, he was discharged on bail in order that the judgment of that court should be taken.

Hurst for the prisoner.

C No counsel appeared for the Crown.

SIR ALEXANDER COCKBURN, C.J.—I am of opinion that the conviction is right, the policeman had witnessed an assault by the prisoner on his wife in the house, and when the prisoner came out, he was in such a frame of mind, that the policeman, not unreasonably, considered that he still entertained the intention of returning and using violence. The language used by POLLOCK, C.B., in R. v. Walker (1) applies in this case, because there was a continued pursuit and recent ground for apprehending danger.

ERLE, J.—I am of the same opinion. In this case the offence had been recently committed, and I apprehend that a constable is not obliged to arrest upon the instant. Here he had seen an assault committed, with a threat of murder. Was it to be taken, then, that because the prisoner had come a few yards from the house, the constable was bound to conclude that the wife was safe from further violence? I think he arrested him recently after the offence which he had seen committed, and that he was doing his duty in making that arrest.

WILLIAMS, J., MARTIN and CHANNELL, BB., concurred.

Conviction affirmed.

[VICE-CHANCELLOR'S COURT (Kindersley, V.-C.), February 11, 1859]

[Reported 4 Drew. 427; 28 L.J.Ch. 561; 32 L.T.O.S. 368;
7 W.R. 270; 62 E.R. 164]Solicitor—Lien—Extent of lien—Fund in court—Money recovered for client in course of suit—Money received by client personally in suit to exclusion of solicitor.

A solicitor has no lien for his costs on a fund in court, but only on what he may recover for his client in the course of the suit, and he has a right to have that lien protected if his client should himself receive any money in the suit so as to exclude his solicitor.

Notes. Referred to: Re Wright's Trust, Wright v. Sanderson, Re Sanderson's Trust, Wright v. Sanderson, [1901] 1 Ch. 317.

As to solicitor's lien on funds recovered, see 36 HALSBURY'S LAWS (3rd Edn.) 180 et seq.; and for cases see 43 DIGEST (Repl.) 306 et seq.

Petition presented by Mr. Downes, who had been the former solicitor of Mr. Verity, the plaintiff in this suit, praying for an order that no decree or order for disposing of a sum of £600, ordered to be brought into court in the suit, might be made, without providing for the costs which should be found due to the petitioner; or, in the alternative, that no such order might be made without notice to the petitioner.

On May 23, 1858, the plaintiff filed his bill to enforce the execution of the trusts of a creditor's deed, by which he had assigned his property to the defendant Wild and another, upon trust for the plaintiff's creditors, with a resulting trust in favour of himself. Among the provisions of the deed there was a clause by which it was expressly provided that any sum above £50 received by the trustees should be paid into a particular bank to their joint account. The bill alleged various breaches of trust, and in particular that the trustees had permitted a sum of between £500 and £600, part of the assets, to remain for a long time to the private account of one of the trustees at his own banker's. On the motion for an injunction and receiver, made in June, 1858, the above allegation having been proved, the court ordered a receiver. The petitioner was the plaintiff's solicitor from the filing of the bill till June 15, 1858, when the plaintiff changed him as his solicitor, but leaving a balance due to him for costs. On the motion for a receiver, the money in the hands of the trustees had been ordered to be brought into court and certain costs, amounting to £35 ordered to be paid by the trustees to the plaintiff, were paid by them to the plaintiff, and not to the petitioner, whose costs were still due. In support of the petition it was alleged that the plaintiff and defendant had agreed not to bring the money into court, and were arranging the terms of the compromise, under which the costs of the trustees were to be paid, and the creditors were to receive a compensation, but that no provision was intended to be made for the costs due to the petitioner.

Drewry for the petitioner.

H. C. Ward for the plaintiff.

J. H. Palmer and Langworthy for the creditors.

Sheffield for the trustees.

KINDERSLEY, V.-C.—This is a petition praying that no order for the disposition among the parties to the suit, or any of them, of a sum of money ordered to be brought into court may be made until after provision for certain costs due to the petitioner, or that no order may be made with respect to the fund without notice to the petitioner. It appears that the parties to the suit are now proposing to come to an arrangement under which the fund is to be appropriated in payment of the

A costs of the trustees, and, as far as it goes, in satisfying the creditors. I see no doubt in this case as to how the law stands. The solicitor for the plaintiff has no lien on the fund, the subject of the suit, as against the other parties, but a right that whatever he can recover for his client shall not be paid to him until his solicitor's costs are paid. That is not a lien against the particular fund in court. Here the petitioner prays that the right of all persons on the particular fund shall not be dealt with without notice to him. The right, as I have said before, is, that if anything in the suit should be payable to the plaintiff, or payable as the plaintiff's costs, that then the plaintiff's solicitor has a right to say: "Do not let it go until my costs are provided for, as I have been the person who has obtained that benefit for him." It is not consistent with any principle that the right of the solicitor should preclude any compromise between the parties. If it had that effect, the sooner such a right is abolished the better. I recognise no such right as that asked by the petition. I recognise the right of the plaintiff's solicitor to be protected, if the plaintiff shall receive any of the money in question in the suit so as to exclude him. Here I find that £35 of costs due to the petitioner have actually been paid to the plaintiff. I think, therefore, that the petitioner's application is justified to that extent; and so far he may have an order on that petition.

D I think, however, that no order should be made in this suit by way of compromise or otherwise for the payment of any sum of money to the plaintiff without notice being given to the petitioner. The trustee of the creditors deed and the two creditors who appear as respondents, must be paid their costs by the petitioner, and the plaintiff must pay his own costs.

Order accordingly.

Executor—Powers—Power to carry on business of testator—Liability for debts contracted after trader's death—Indemnity by testator's personal estate—Continuance of business with surviving partner.

H

The executor of a trader carrying on the trade after his death, though doing so avowedly in the character of executor, is nevertheless personally liable for all the debts contracted in the trade after the trader's death, whether he is entitled or not entitled to be wholly or to any extent indemnified by the testator's personal estate, and whether it is sufficient or insufficient for the purpose. The propriety of his conduct as between himself and those beneficially interested in the testator's personal estate does not give creditors of the trade becoming so after the trader's death the rights of creditors of the trader, and, so far as they are concerned, it is immaterial whether the trader, if he had a partner, was bound by a covenant with him that the trader's executor should continue to trade in partnership with the surviving partner.

Appeal from two decrees of the Court of Chancery in the Isle of Man, in an original suit and a cross-suit. The original suit was commenced by a bill filed by Emily Tupper and others against Williams, Deacon & Co., bankers in London, the appellants, and the cross-suit was filed by the respondents against the appellants. The suits related to a debt due from the Isle of Man Joint-Stock Banking Co. to the appellants. The principal questions raised and at issue by the pleadings, and in the present appeal, were (i) whether the real and personal estate of John Colton Tupper, deceased, who was at the time of his decease a shareholder in respect of 300 shares in the Isle of Man Joint-Stock Bank, was liable to the appellants for the debt due to the appellants from the bank when the bank stopped payment on Aug. 14, 1843; and, (ii) whether, if the said real and personal estates were not so liable, such estates were liable to the appellants for the debt owing to the appellants from the bank at the decease of the said J. C. Tupper.

In July, 1836, a partnership was formed in the Isle of Man, for the purpose of carrying on the business of a bank at Douglas, in the Isle of Man, under the name of "The Isle of Man Joint-Stock Banking Co." This partnership was constituted

A by a deed dated July 2, 1836. By the deed it was provided (cl. 8), that the name and place of abode of each proprietor for the time being, together with the number of shares, shall be entered in a book called "the Shareholders' Register"; and every proprietor, etc., and the personal representatives of any proprietor who shall die shall, immediately upon and after any of the said events, leave a notice at the banking-house or office of the company, stating his name, or new name and place of abode. Clause 59 provided that in case any person, to whom any shares in the capital of the company shall, by purchase, etc., representation or other mode of acquisition, become vested, and who shall not have executed or acceded to these presents, shall, after notice in writing, neglect or refuse to execute these presents, etc., the directors might declare the shares so vested in such person neglecting, and all benefit and advantage whatsoever to be incident thereto should be forfeited to the company. Clause 60 provided that whenever the shares should be forfeited or effectually transferred, the responsibility of the previous owner should cease, and he should be released from all subsequent claims. By cl. 61 it was provided that before any executor, administrator or legatee of a deceased proprietor should sell, transfer or assign any shares vested in him in such capacity, or should become a proprietor in respect of such share or shares, or receive dividends in respect of the same, he should produce to the directors satisfactory evidence of his title.

John Colton Tupper died in January, 1840. In the two following years an entry, "the representatives of J. C. Tupper," was inserted among the proprietors' names. Carre Cook Tupper received the dividends on the 300 shares as executor. In August, 1843, the company stopped payment, and a bill and action were commenced by the appellants against all the shareholders claiming a sum of £60,000 as due to the appellants' firm upon the promissory note of the manager, and by a supplemental bill they claimed a sum of £99,943 18s. 1d. Carre Cook Tupper was included among the defendants, both in his own right and as executor. A decree was pronounced in the suit in 1849 by the Court of Chancery in the Isle of Man, to the effect that Carre Cook Tupper, executor of J. C. Tupper, and the various persons therein named as shareholders, ought to pay to the appellants the sum of £96,793 4s. 6d. with interest and costs, and in this suit part of the estate of John C. Tupper was arrested. The plaintiffs in the first suit were the widow and children of J. C. Tupper, who claimed to be interested under his will in his residuary real and personal estate, and his eldest son and heir-at-law, since deceased; and the defendants were the appellants and Carre Cook Tupper, the executor of J. C. Tupper. In 1851 the appellants filed a cross-bill against the widow and children of J. C. Tupper and Carre Cook Tupper. Answers having been put in, and both suits having come on for hearing, the court decreed in the first cause that Carre Cook Tupper, executor of J. C. Tupper, had made himself personally liable as partner in the said Isle of Man Joint-Stock Banking Company in respect of the shares previously held by J. C. Tupper in the said company, and that he had no power to pledge the estate of the said J. C. Tupper beyond the amount invested in the said shares, and the court was of opinion that the debt owing by the said banking company to the appellants at the time of the death of the said J. C. Tupper was discharged, and, therefore, the arrests laid on his property and effects ought to be rescinded and laid aside. The court dismissed the cross-bill filed by the appellants and the cross-bill filed by Carre Cook Tupper. The present appeal was brought from these decrees.

Roundell Palmer, Q.C., and Cotton for the respondents.

KNIGHT-BRUCE, L.J.—This appeal has been argued on each side upon the supposition that there is no difference between the law of England and that of the Isle of Man as to the principles and rules applicable to the particular questions between the parties; and it seems to their Lordships reasonable and right to believe that no such difference exists. The first point in dispute is whether the debt which at the time of the death of John Colton Tupper in January, 1840, was due to the appellants' house of business from the joint-stock banking company called "The Isle of Man Joint-Stock Banking Co.," the company instituted and intended to be regulated by the deed of July 2, 1836, and the memorandum of Aug. 22, 1837, and the liabilities under which that joint-stock company was to the appellants' house at John Colton Tupper's death, were paid and discharged before the stoppage and failure of the joint-stock company in August, 1843; and their Lordships think it plain that this point must be decided against the appellants, namely, that the payment and discharge just mentioned must, upon the materials before the committee, be deemed to have taken place (as to principal and interest) before August, 1843. The appellants' answer seems to us decisive on the matter.

There is not any reason or ground on which, as it appears to their Lordships, it can be reasonably suggested that a sufficient amount of the receipts of the appellants' house on account of the joint-stock company between the death of J. C. Tupper and the stoppage, ought not, according to the regular and ordinary course, to be ascribed to the debt and liabilities existing at the former period. Then comes the question, whether the appellants, in respect of the debt which became newly due to their firm from the joint-stock company after the death of John Colton Tupper (I mean, of course, debt not connected with any liability in his lifetime) have a right of recourse against the assets of John Colton Tupper, the same right in effect as they would have had for the debt due at his death had it not been discharged. The appellants assert the affirmative of this proposition upon the ground that Carre Cook Tupper, the only acting executor of John Colton Tupper, did, in that character, upon and from his death, claim the shares in the company which he held; that this claim, this title of Carre Cook Tupper was recognised by the directors of the company, and that accordingly in that character he received the dividends which between the death and the stoppage were declared on the shares under cl. 46 of the deed, there having been no transfer of any of the shares after the death, but the shares having been uniformly from the death treated by the executor and the directors as belonging to the executor in that character. It is certainly, we apprehend, true, nor denied on either side, that Carre Cook Tupper became personally liable as a partner in the company to the appellants' house in respect of the dealings subsequent to John Colton Tupper's death, and that Carre Cook Tupper would, by the course of conduct that has been mentioned, have made himself so, even if he had not been, as he was, a shareholder in his own right independently of John Colton Tupper's shares. It may possibly likewise be, though we do not assert, that the assets of John Colton Tupper are liable to the company or to Carre Cook Tupper, or to both, in respect of John Colton Tupper's shares by reason of the partnership deed and the transactions and course of dealing subsequent to his death. But any such consideration seems to their Lordships not for any present purpose material. The question is whether the debt and liabilities to the appellants' house, existing at John Colton Tupper's death, having been satisfied, the appellants can come upon his assets as creditors by reason of the shares held by him, and of what took place after his death, and their Lordships' opinion is that, whatever the construction of the partnership deed, and whatever the true interpretation of his will, they cannot.

If it was competent to Carre Cook Tupper to charge the assets in their favour, no such thing was done. The fact that he traded or dealt with the appellants' house as executor, and in his own right also, had not the effect of creating such a charge, nor is it material that all John Colton Tupper's property, actually placed or invested in the joint-stock banking business, must probably be treated as lost, and that the separate estate of John Colton Tupper has not claimed, nor does, nor probably can, claim anything from the joint estate.

The executor of a trader carrying on the trade after his death, though doing so avowedly in the character of executor, is nevertheless personally liable for all the debts contracted in the trade after the trader's death, whether he is entitled or not entitled to be wholly or to any extent indemnified by the testator's personal estate, and whether it is sufficient or insufficient for the purpose; nor does the propriety of

A his conduct as between himself and those beneficially interested in the testator's personal estate, give the creditors of the trade becoming so after the trader's death the rights of creditors of the testator, it being immaterial, also, so far as they are concerned, whether the testator, if he had a partner, was bound by a covenant with him that the testator's executors should continue the trade in partnership with the surviving partner. The latest authorities on the point are, we conceive, thus, and appear to their Lordships preponderant and correct. A sufficient number of these authorities, including Ex parte Garland (1) and Ex parte Richardson (2), were cited at the Bar during the argument.

The terms of the decree in the principal suit—that in which the appellants are defendants—might perhaps, without impropriety, receive some alteration; but substantially that decree seems to us to be as well as the dismissal of their dismissed bill right.

C It was argued that the decree of January or February, 1849, of which execution was awarded on Mar. 10, 1849, entitled the appellants to success in the present appeal. That however is not our opinion. The state of the parties to the suit in which that decree was made, and the nature of the cause, rendered the decree in our judgment of no avail against the suit of Emily Tupper and others, in which the principal decree now under appeal was pronounced. It has been contended also that whatever the merits, there was not a right according to the proper course of judicial proceedings in the Isle of Man to institute such a suit against the appellants. We think, however, that the appellants had taken such proceedings and so acted as to expose themselves to the suit, and that it was regularly and properly instituted against them. The arrests of 1843 were of themselves enough for the purpose. As there must, we think, substantially at least, if not formally, also be a dismissal of the appeal, the appellants, in their Lordships' opinion, ought to pay the costs of it.

Appeal dismissed.

harbour, and a piece of frontage land called Penrhos, within the harbour, and the mines under them, alleged by the Crown to belong to it in right of its prerogative as part of the seashore in the parish of Llanelly in the lordship of Kidwelly, Carmarthenshire. Cur. adv. vult.

July 1, 1854. The opinion of the judges was delivered by

ALDERSON, B.—In this case, on which your Lordship has requested the assistance of my brother MAULE and myself, I am now to deliver our joint opinion, on H the only question argued before us. That question, as I understand it, is this: What, in the absence of all evidence of particular usage, is the limit of the title of the Crown to the seashore? The Crown is clearly in such a case, according to all the authorities, entitled to the litus maris as well as to the soil of the sea itself adjoining the coasts of England. What then, according to the authorities in our law, is the extent of this litus maris? This, in the absence of any grant or usage I from which a grant may be presumed, is, according to the civil law, defined as the part of the shore bounded by the extreme limit to which the highest natural tides extend—quatenus hybernus fluctus maximus excurrit—that is, the highest natural tide; for, according to LORD STAIR's exposition [INSTITUTIONS OF THE LAW OF SCOTLAND, vol. 2, p. 190], the definition does not include the highest actual tides, for these may be produced by peculiarities of wind, or other temporary or accidental circumstances, concurring with the flow produced by the action of the sun and

A moon upon the ocean. But this definition, even thus expounded by the authorities of the civil law, is clearly not the rule of the common law of England. HOLROYD, J., no mean authority, in his very elaborate judgment in Blundell v. Catterall (1) mentions this as one of the instances in which the common law differs from the civil law, and says that it is clear that, according to our law, it is not the limit of the highest tides of the year, but the limit reduced by the highest ordinary tides of the sea, which is the limit of the shore belonging, prima facie, to the Crown. What then are these "highest ordinary tides?"

We know that in fact the tides of each day, nay, even each of the tides of each day, differ in some degree as to the limit which they reach. There are the spring-tides at the equinox, the highest tides of all. These clearly are excluded in terms by LORD HALE, both in p. 12 and in p. 26 of his treatise DE JURE MARIS, for although in one sense these are ordinary, that is, according to the usual order of nature, and not caused by accidents of the winds and the like, yet they do not ordinarily happen, but only at two periods of the year. These then are not the tides contemplated by the common law, for they are not "ordinary tides," not being of common occurrence. This may, perhaps, apply to the spring tides of each month, exclusive of the equinoctial tides; and, indeed, if the case were without distinct authority on this point, that is the conclusion at which we might have arrived. But then we have LORD HALE's authority, p. 26 of DE JURE MARIS, who says:

"Ordinary tides, or neap tides, which happen between the full and change of the moon, are the limit of that which is properly called littus maris;"

and he excludes the spring tides of the month, assigning as the reason that the lands beyond them are for the most part of the year dry and maniorable, that is to say, not reached by the tides. To the same effect is Lowe v. Govett (2), which excludes these monthly spring tides also. But we think that LORD HALE's reason may guide us to the proper limit.

What then are the lands which for the most part of the year are reached and covered by the tides? The same reason that excludes the highest tides of the month, which happen at the springs, excludes the lowest high tides, which happen at the neaps; for the highest or spring tides, and the lowest high tides (those at the neaps), happen as often as each other. The medium tides, therefore, of each quarter of the tidal period afford a criterion which we think may be best adopted. It is true of the limit of the shore reached by these tides, that it is more frequently reached and covered by the tide than left uncovered by it; for about three days it is exceeded, and for about three days it is left short, in each week, and on one day it is reached. This point of the shore, therefore, is about four days in every week—that is, for the most part of the year—reached and covered by the tides; and as some, not indeed perfectly accurate construction, but approximate, must be given to the words "highest ordinary tides," used by HOLROYD, J., we think, after fully considering it, that this best fulfils the rules and the reasons for them given in our books. We, therefore, beg to advise your Lordship that, in our opinion, the average of these medium tides, in each quarter of a lunar revolution during the whole year, gives the limit, in the absence of all usage, to the rights of the Crown on the seashore.

Cur. adv. vult.

I July 15, 1854. LORD CRANWORTH, L.C.—The question for decision in this case is, What is the extent of the right of the Crown to the seashore. The right of the Crown to the littus maris (whatever that means) is not disputed. The question is, What is the littus maris? Is it so much as is covered by ordinary spring tides, or is it something else? The rule of the civil law was est autem litus maris quatenus hybernus fluctus maximus excurrit. This is certainly not the doctrine of our law. All the authorities concur in the conclusion that the right is confined to what is covered by "ordinary" tides, whatever be the right interpretation of that word "ordinary." By "hybernus fluctus maximus" is clearly meant extraordinary high tides, though, speaking with physical accuracy, the winter tide is not generally the highest. Land covered only by these extraordinary tides is not what is meant by the seashore. Such tides may be the result of wind or other causes independent of what ordinarily regulates the flux and reflux. Setting aside these accidental tides, the question is, what is the meaning of "ordinary"? It is evidently a word of doubtful import. In one sense the highest equinoctial spring tides are "ordinary," that is, they occur in the natural order of things. But this is evidently not the sense in which the word "ordinary" is used, when designating the extent of the Crown's right to the shore. A

This is apparent from LORD HALE's treatise DE JURE MARIS, pp. 12 and 25, which is, in truth, nearly all the authority we have to guide us. LORD HALE says in his treatise (p. 12): B

"The next evidence of the King's right and property in the sea and arms thereof, is his right of property to the shore and the maritima incrementa. The shore is that ground that is between the ordinary high-water and low-water mark. This doth prima facie and of common right belong to the King, both in the shore of the sea and in the shore of the arms of the sea; and herein there will be these things examinable: First, what shall be said the shore or litus maris? Secondly, what shall be said an arm or creek of the sea? Thirdly, what evidence there is of the King's property thereof? For the first of these it is certain, that that which the sea overflows, either at high spring tides or at ordinary tides, comes not as to this purpose under the denomination of litus maris; and consequently the King's title is not of that large extent, but only to land that is usually overflowed at ordinary tides; and so I have know it ruled in certain cases." C

Those cases I have not been able to discover—indeed, I do not know whether they are reported—I have looked at all the indices and references in which I thought it was likely I might find them, but I have been unable to do so. Then, D

"for the third, it is admitted de jure communi that that between the high-water and low-water mark doth, prima facie, belong to the King." E

Then in a subsequent passage, to which reference has been made, pp. 25 and 26, concerning the right the subject may have in the seashore, he says: F

"As to the shore of the sea: There seems to be three sorts of shores, or litora marinà, according to the various tides, viz.: the high spring tides, which are the fluxes of the sea at those tides that happen at the two equinoctials; and certainly this doth not de jure communi belong to the Crown. For such spring tides many times overflow ancient meadows and salt marshes, which yet unquestionably belong to the subject; and this is admitted of all lands. The spring tides, which happen twice every month at full and change of the moon; and the shore in question is by some opinion not denominated by these tides neither; but the lands overflowed by these fluxes ordinarily belong to the subject, prima facie, unless the King hath a prescription to the contrary. And the reason seems to be, because for the most part the lands covered with these fluxes are dry and maniorable; for at other tides the sea doth not cover them, and therefore touching these shores some hold, that common right speaks for the subject, unless there be an usage to enable the Crown; for this is not properly litus maris, and therefore it hath been held, that where the King makes his title to land as litus maris, or parcella litoris marini, it is not sufficient for him to make it appear to be overflowed at spring tides of this kind." G

Then he refers to those two old cases to which he referred before. Then he says, H

"ordinary tides or neap tides" [using those two words as synonymous] "which happen between the full and change of the moon, and this is that which is properly litus maris, sometimes called marettum, sometimes warettum—and touching this kind of shore, viz., that which is covered by the ordinary flux of the sea, is the business of our present inquiry." I

- A Disregarding, then, these extreme high tides, we next come to the ordinary spring tides, that is, the spring tides of each lunar month. No doubt, speaking scientifically, they probably may differ; but practically these may be disregarded. LORD HALE gives no absolutely decided opinion; but he evidently leans very strongly against the right to the lands covered only by spring tides, and refers to decisions which support his views. Then he describes ordinary tides as if synonymous with
- B neap tides. This leaves the question very much at large, and there is very little of modern authority. In Blundell v. Catterall (1), HOLROYD, J., says, by the common law it, that is, the seashore, is confined to the flux and reflux of the sea at ordinary tides—meaning the land covered by such flux and reflux; still the question remains, what are ordinary tides? The nearest approach to direct authority is Lowe v. Govett (2). There certain recesses on the coast, covered by the high water
- C of ordinary spring tides, but not by the medium tides between spring and neap tides, were held not to pass under an Act of Parliament which vested in a company an arm of the sea daily overflowed by it. LORD TENTERDEN held that these recesses were not ordinarily overflowed by the sea, which shows clearly that he did not consider the overflowing by ordinary spring tides to be what is meant by ordinarily overflowing; and both LITLEDALE, J., and PARKE, J. (now PARKE, B.), concur in
- D saying that the recesses in question were above ordinary high-water mark, clearly showing their opinion to be, that what is meant by ordinary high-water mark is not so high as the limit of high water at ordinary spring tides. There is, in truth, no further authority to guide us; for the question did not arise in either of the cases of A.-G. v. Burridge (3) and A.-G. v. Parmeter (4), as to the buildings at Portsmouth.
- E In this state of things, we can only look to the principle of the rule which gives the shore to the Crown. The principle I take to be, that it is land not capable of ordinary cultivation or occupation, which was described by LORD HALE as generally dry and maniorable, and so it is in the nature of unappropriated soil. LORD HALE gives as his reason for thinking that lands only covered by the high spring tides do not belong to the Crown, that such lands are for the most part dry and maniorable;
- F and, taking this passage as the only authority at all capable of guiding us, the reasonable conclusion is, that the Crown's right is limited to land which is, for the most part, not dry or maniorable. The learned judges whose assistance I had on this very obscure question, point out that the limit indicating such land is the line of the medium high tide between the springs and the neaps; all land below that line is more often than not covered at high water, and so may justly be said, in the
- G language of LORD HALE, to be covered by the ordinary flux of the sea. This cannot be said of any land above that line; and, I therefore concur with the able opinion of the judges, whose valuable assistance I had, in thinking that that medium line must be taken as the boundary of the right of the Crown.

Order accordingly.

Undue Influence—Parent and child—Gift by son to father without consideration—Need for son to have independent advice—Proof of absence of inducement.

Where a son, after recently attaining his majority, makes over property to his father without consideration or for an inadequate consideration, the court expects that the father will be able to justify what has been done, and to show that the son was really a free agent, that he had adequate independent advice, that he was not taking an imprudent step under parental influence, and that he perfectly understood the nature and extent of the sacrifice he was making, and that he was desirous of making it. Although where, when an eldest son comes of age, an arrangement is made of the family property for the personal benefit of its members, a court of equity does not nicely scan its terms, or inquire whether each party has had a due share of benefit, yet such a doctrine does not apply where the whole arrangement consists in a transaction by which a son, without consideration, gives up valuable rights to his father. Undoubtedly a son may give up all or any portion of his property to his father without consideration, but it is then incumbent on the father accepting such a benefit to satisfy the court before which the transaction is impeached that the son fully understood what he was doing, that no artifice or contrivance was made use of to induce him to do the act complained of, and that the son had competent means of forming an independent judgment.

Solicitor—Duty to client—Sale of property by client to solicitor—Duty of solicitor to disclose all material facts—No advantage to be taken of solicitor's position—Utmost value to be given for property—Action by client independent of solicitor's influence—Duty more onerous where client young person.

Where a solicitor purchases or obtains a benefit from a client, the court expects him to be able to show that he has taken no advantage of his professional position—that the client was so dealing with him as to be free from the influence which a solicitor must necessarily possess, and that the solicitor has done as much to protect his client's interest as he would have done for a stranger. This duty exists on the part of the solicitor in all cases where he is dealing with any client, but when the client is a very young man, who has just obtained his majority and is so far unemancipated as to be still living under his father's roof as part of his family, the duty is, if not stronger, at all events more obvious. In the case of the sale of property to a solicitor the solicitor who purchases is bound to show that he has put his client in a situation to act independently of his influence. He must, to use the words of LORD ELDON in Gibson v. Jeyes (1) (1801), 6 Ves. at p. 271, be able "to prove that his diligence to do the best for the vendor has been as great as if he was only an attorney dealing for that vendor with a stranger." To sustain his purchase he must show, not only that he gave the utmost value for the property, but further that none of the circumstances likely to influence the vendor or other interested party in his determination to concur or not to concur in the sale was kept from him.

Appeal by the defendant in the action from a decree of STUART, V.-C., made on a bill filed by one of the respondents by which he sought to have set aside a mortgage of a certain estate and also its subsequent sale.

Sir Richard Bethell, Q.C., and Willcock, Q.C., for the appellant.

C Bacon, Q.C., Follett, Q.C., Malins, Q.C., and Nicholls for the respondents.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

May 9, 1856. LORD CRANWORTH, L.C., delivered an opinion in which he said: This was an appeal against a decree of STUART, V.-C., by which he set aside a mortgage created by the respondent Richard King, and a subsequent sale of the property included in the mortgage. Savery, the defendant in the action, appealed.

D The respondent Richard King is the elder son of the other respondent John King. Under the will of Richard King, who died in 1811, the respondent John became tenant for life of an estate in Devonshire called Fowelscombe, with remainder to his first and other sons in tail male, with remainder to Richard King, a brother of the respondent John, for his life, with remainder to his issue male, with remainder

E over. The respondent John had issue, two sons and a daughter, the respondent Richard being the elder son. He attained the age of twenty-one on Mar. 7, 1835. Mr. Savery, the appellant, at the time when Richard attained his majority, was and had for many years been the friend and confidential family solicitor of the respondent John, who was then largely indebted to him for money lent to and business done for him. In order to secure the money so due to him, Mr. Savery had a

F mortgage of the life interest of John in the Fowelscombe estate, and also a number of policies of insurance, eleven in all, effected on the life of John at various dates, beginning in April, 1829, and ending in September, 1834. The sum due, or alleged to be due, from John King to Savery in March, 1835, was £9,667. The principal sums secured by the policies amounted to £8,700 only, and so did not cover the whole demand. The premiums payable on the policies amounted to an annual

G sum of £312 4s. 9d., which premiums, as well as the principal money due to Savery and the interest, were charged by the mortgage on the life-estate of John. Previously to April 9, 1835, it was agreed between the respondents John and Richard and the appellant that the respondent Richard should charge the inheritance of the Fowelscombe estate with a sum of £10,000, in consideration of the £9,667 then due from the respondent John, and a further sum of £333 to be then advanced by the

H appellant to the respondents. It was stipulated that the rate of interest on the debt, which had up to that time been payable at 5 per cent., should be reduced to 4 per cent., and that the policies should be assigned by the appellant to the respondent Richard for his own use. This arrangement was carried into effect, first by a disentailing deed executed by John and Richard, dated April 7, 1835, whereby Richard's remainder in tail was converted into a remainder in fee; secondly, by

I indentures of lease and release, dated April 6 and 7, 1835, whereby John and Richard, in consideration of the sum of £9,667 16s. 8d. so due from John, and of a further sum of £332 3s. 4d. then alleged to be advanced by Savery to John and Richard, conveyed the Fowelscombe estate to Savery and his heirs by way of mortgage, to secure £10,000 and interest at 4 per cent. with a power of sale; and, thirdly, by an indenture dated April 8, 1835, whereby Savery assigned the policies to Richard, and John covenanted with him to pay the premiums, but that covenant was not secured by any charge on the real estate. After this mortgage had been completed, the two respondents raised from time to time various sums on mortgage or charge of their equity of redemption, amounting in the whole to £6,855; and the money so raised, or a considerable part of it, was employed in the purchase of some property in Hampshire, which was conveyed to the respondent Richard with the concurrence of his father. A

In the latter part of 1838 the respondents agreed with Savery to sell to him the Fowlescombe estate for a sum of £23,700, out of which all the mortgages and charges were to be satisfied, and this agreement was carried into effect by deeds of lease and release, dated Mar. 21 and 22, 1839, whereby the respondents joined in conveying the property to the appellant in fee, in consideration of the above-mentioned sum of £23,700. On Mar. 1, 1847, the respondent Richard filed his bill against Savery and his father for the purpose of setting aside, so far as relates to his interest, as well the original mortgage of April, 1835, for £10,000 as also the subsequent sale in 1839 on the ground that his concurrence had been obtained by the undue influence of the respondent John his father, and of the appellant Savery the family solicitor. The vice-chancellor, by whom the case was heard, made a decree in favour of the plaintiff, Richard King, setting aside both the mortgage and the subsequent sale. The appellant Savery, being dissatisfied with that decree has brought it by way of appeal before your Lordships' House. B C

It is hardly necessary to say that where any person seeks the aid of a court of equity to enable him to get rid of the effect of deeds which he has executed, the burden of proof is on him to make out a case for such intervention. The question here is, whether the respondent, Richard King, has made out such a case—that is, whether the circumstances, first in the mortgage and afterwards in the sale, were such as entitle him to treat what was done as a fraud or imposition, and so not binding on him. The doctrine of equity on this head is well established. The legal right of a person, who has attained the age of twenty-one, to execute deeds and deal with his property is indisputable. But where a son, recently after attaining his majority, makes over property to his father without consideration, or for an inadequate consideration, a court of equity expects that the father will be able to justify what has been done, and to show that the son was really a free agent, that he had adequate independent advice, that he was not taking an imprudent step under parental influence, and that he perfectly understood the nature and extent of the sacrifice he was making and was desirous of making it. So again, where a solicitor purchases or obtains a benefit from a client, a court of equity expects him to be able to show that he has taken no advantage of his professional position—that the client was so dealing with him as to be free from the influence which a solicitor must necessarily possess—and that the solicitor has done as much to protect his client's interest as he would have done for a stranger. This duty exists on the part of the solicitor in all cases where he is dealing with any client, but, of course, when the client is a very young man who has only just attained his majority and is so far unemancipated as to be still living under his father's roof as part of his family, the duty is, if not stronger, at all events more obvious. D E F G

What is here contended for is (applying ourselves first to the mortgage), that it was obtained from the respondent Richard, the plaintiff below, by the two defendants below, in violation of both these principles—that, in order to suit the purposes of the father and of the solicitor, the son was induced by them within a month after he came of age to burden his inheritance with a mortgage to the amount of nearly half the value of the estate, for which he received no consideration whatever, and that he did this without having the benefit of any adequate independent advice to explain to him the consequences of what he was doing, and fairly to put him on his guard. That he received no consideration for his concurrence in the mortgage is clear, for it was made to secure a debt contracted by his father for his own purposes, before the son attained his majority. It is true indeed that this debt amounted to only £9,667 16s. 8d., whereas the mortgage was for £10,000, and the difference £332 3s. 4d. is stated on the face of the deed to have been paid to the father and the son. But no evidence was given tending to show that any part of this sum actually came to the hands of the son. The reasonable inference is, that H I

A it did not—more especially as in the deed of April 8, whereby the policies were assigned, the whole £10,000 is stated to be the proper debt of the father. Then it was contended that part of the arrangement was, that the interest on the father's debt, which had theretofore been paid at the rate of 5 per cent., should be reduced to 4 per cent. This would be a saving of £100 per annum to the father, and, as the son made part of his father's family, it was argued that this was a substantial benefit to him as well as to his father. This, however, cannot be treated as a valuable consideration for the son, for the father was under no obligation to continue him as part of his family, and though, where, when an eldest son comes of age, an arrangement is made of the family property for the personal benefit of its members, a court of equity does not nicely scan its terms, or inquire whether each party has had a due share of benefit, yet such a doctrine does not apply where the whole arrangement consists in a transaction by which the son, without consideration, gives up valuable rights to his father. I must not be understood as questioning the position that a son may give up all or any portion of his property to his father without consideration. Undoubtedly he may do so. But then it is incumbent on the father accepting such a benefit to satisfy the court before which the transaction is impeached that the son fully understood what he was doing, that no artifice or contrivance was made use of to induce him to do the act complained of, and that the son had competent means of forming an independent judgment. The father is bound to make this out.

This brings us to the second point—has the appellant made out that in this case the respondent Richard had the means of thus forming an independent judgment? In order to come to a just conclusion on this point, we must look to the facts as disclosed by the pleadings and evidence in the cause. Richard attained his majority on Mar. 7, 1835. At that time Mr. Savery was on a visit at the house of John King, the father, in Hampshire. His visit commenced on or about Feb. 21, and he returned home to Modbury, in Devonshire, two days after Richard had come of age, namely, Mar. 9. On the Saturday following his return, namely, on Mar. 14, Mr. Savery wrote a letter to Mr. Shortland, a gentleman at the Bar in London, whom it appears Mr. Savery was in the habit of consulting and employing as his conveyancing counsel, and in that letter occur these words :

“I will send you instructions for King's recovery deeds early in next week, and must claim your early attention to them.”

G On the same day he wrote to Mr. King, the father, the following letter on which much reliance has been placed :

“My dear Sir, I have this day looked into your uncle's will, and I find the Fowelscombe property is settled to you for life, and to your sons in tail male, and in case of your having no male heir, or such dying under age, or in your lifetime without a recovery being suffered, the property goes off to Richard King's family. I should, therefore, advise that you and Richard should without loss of time (if he be of age) join in suffering a recovery, which would enable him at once (subject to your life interest) to give the property by will to his brother or sister, or to do in fact what he pleased with it. This, you understand, will effectually prevent the property going away from his sister, in case his brother John and himself should die unmarried and without issue. In case of Richard's death in your lifetime without a recovery, and John's dying under age, the sister could not possess the property, and I think it, therefore, most desirable the recovery should be suffered immediately. The uses of this recovery may be as you and Richard think proper, that is to say, either settle to you for your life (as is now the case), with remainder in fee simple to Richard after your death, thereby barring all risk of the property going away from the family to Richard King's family, and in this case the insurance on your life must be kept up by you as now done to secure the sum due from you at your death, or the uses may be declared to secure the sum on the property, and subject thereto in fee to Richard, and in this way you may keep up the insurance, so as to secure the whole sum again at your death to Richard, and thereby save in interest about £100 per annum. This will be the least expensive mode of proceeding, and be more desirable to all parties. As to the sale of the estate, you are quite aware that it is a most desirable property; and although the money would give a large income, I confess, were I you and Richard, I should be more inclined to keep it, and if you come to the above arrangement I see no reason why you should not do so. However, the recovery being suffered, you and Richard can then do as you both think best; but, as this is of consequence to your family, I do advise most strenuously that no time be lost to secure the property. Life is very uncertain, and the death of the two boys in your lifetime without a recovery, would leave Mrs. and Miss King deprived of that estate which is now in your and his power to avert. I write this with a view only to the benefit of your family, and I hope you will both give it your best consideration."

There is some difficulty in reconciling those two letters. That to Mr. King would lead to the inference that neither the recovery, nor, of course, the mortgage, had then been agreed on. Yet Savery's letter to Mr. Shortland refers to the recovery as something already agreed on, as to which, apparently, there had been previous correspondence between them. I find it impossible not to come to the conclusion that the recovery had been agreed on between Mr. Savery and Mr. John King, the father, during the visit of the former in Hampshire, and that the letter of Mar. 14 was written to the father in order that it might be shown by him to his son with the view of obtaining his concurrence to a course thus recommended by Savery.

The question, however, so far as it relates to the recovery, is not important, except as it may throw light on the mortgage, which accompanied or followed it. What we have to decide is whether, in concurring in the mortgage, Richard had all the protection which, as against his father and his legal adviser, he was entitled to—whether, before Richard had so bound his inheritance, he had been duly and properly put on his guard as to the nature and consequences of what he was doing, so as to enable him to act independently and free from the influence of his father and the family solicitor. That he had no such independent advice previously to the preparation of the deeds is plain. What is the evidence as to the intermediate period, that is, the time which elapsed after Mr. Savery had left Hampshire on Mar. 9, and given instructions to Mr. Shortland, and April 9, when the deeds were executed? It appears that when Mr. Shortland sent the drafts of the deeds to Mr. Savery, they were accompanied by a letter dated Mar. 28, in which occurs the following passage:

"As the son gives up so much without any apparent consideration, it will be necessary for you to have evidence within your power to show that no undue influence was exercised by his father, but that he (the son) fully understands what he is about, more particularly as the money is due to you, and you are, I presume, the family solicitor."

At, or very soon after this time, Richard King and his father were on a visit to Thomas King, the uncle of Richard. He resided at Huish, which is four or five miles distant from Modbury, where Mr. Savery resided and carried on his business. Mr. Savery tells us in his answer, that on April 3, while Richard and his father were visiting Thomas, he communicated to Richard the advice which he had received from Mr. Shortland, and that Richard thereupon desired him to send the drafts of the proposed deeds to Mr. Kelly, a solicitor residing at Modbury, which direction was accordingly complied with. Mr. Savery says that he at the same time explained to Richard the nature of the transaction, and that on or about that same day it was arranged that on April 7 the deeds should be executed.

The draft of the mortgage deed, having been in conformity with the directions of Richard submitted to Mr. Kelly, was returned by him to Mr. Savery, approved, on behalf of Richard, and all the deeds were then engrossed, in order that they might be executed on April 7, at the office of Mr. Savery, at Modbury. On that day, John and Richard King came to Mr. Savery's office, where Mr. Kelly also

A attended. Mr. Kelly was at that time an entire stranger to Richard King, and the account he gives of what then took place is as follows. He says :

B "What took place, as near as I can recollect, is as follows : The draft of the mortgage deed had been previously submitted to me for approval on behalf of Mr. Richard King, and, as far as the contents of the deed went, I saw nothing objectionable, and I had returned the same to Mr. Savery approved ; but at my introduction to the plaintiff at Mr. Savery's office, never having seen him before, I thought it but fair, as he was a very young man, only having attained majority a few weeks previously, to inquire of him if he was aware that the effect of the business then in progress would deprive him of his reversionary estate in the Fowelscombe property, which, but for this, he would become entitled to at the death of his father. To this he replied that he was not aware that such would be the effect."

C It was said in the argument that that was a misrepresentation of Mr. Kelly's, and so, no doubt, to a certain extent it was. It did not deprive him of the estate, but it would deprive him of the estate to the extent of £10,000. Mr. Kelly goes on to say :

D "I then told him, as I was a total stranger to him, I declined to take upon myself the responsibility of advising him to execute the deeds, and advised him to consult his uncle, Mr. Thomas King, of North Huish, or Mr. Baron, a solicitor at Plymouth, who I knew had been solicitor for some years to parts of his family. Previously to the above conversation, I and the plaintiff had retired into another room alone. None of the deeds were executed on that day. I considered my office as solicitor to Mr. Richard King ceased from that time, and with it my responsibility as to the whole of the transaction both as to the mortgage and disentailing deeds ; and if they were afterwards attested by me, they were so merely as a witness, and not as a responsible adviser of any of the parties. . . . I understood the reason for calling on the plaintiff to execute the disentailing deed was for the purpose of giving the defendant Servington Savery a mortgage in fee of the Fowelscombe estate, instead of the subsisting mortgage of the defendant, John King's life-interest for, I believe, £10,000, in order to save the expense of keeping up life insurances for the security of the mortgagee. Some allusion was made to policies of insurance effected on the life of John King, but I never saw any deed or deeds in relation thereto, nor had I any draft of assignment sent to me to peruse on behalf of Richard King."

G Mr. Savery stated that, according to the suggestion of Mr. Kelly, he gave the deeds to Richard, that is, the mortgage-deed and the disentailing deed, in order that he might show them to his uncle Thomas King. Two days later, namely, on April 9, John and Richard went to stay with Mr. Savery on a visit, Richard bringing with him the deeds, which were then executed.

H On these facts can your Lordships say that due protection was thrown around Richard King ; that the various suggestions which would occur to the minds of men of mature age and businesslike habits as to the prudence of the course which he was about to take had been fairly presented to his mind, and that, nevertheless, he chose, for the purpose of relieving or assisting his father, to burden his inheritance in favour of Mr. Savery with the £10,000 due to him from the father ? It is impossible to answer this question in the affirmative. The burden of proof is on the father and Mr. Savery. What passed between Thomas King, the uncle, who is now dead, and his nephew, cannot be ascertained. Mr. Savery says that Richard told him his uncle saw no objection to the disentailing deed or to the mortgage, and he adds his belief that the uncle advised him to consult Mr. Andrews, a solicitor of eminence, on the subject. This advice was not followed, for though Mr. Andrews was consulted, nothing was laid before him for his opinion except the disentailing deeds, and even they were not submitted to him till on the evening of the 13th, which was after they had been executed. The only independent advice, therefore, which Richard had was that of Mr. Kelly, who declined all responsibility, and referred him to his uncle, and of the uncle, whose advice as to consulting Mr. Andrews was not followed. I think it clear, therefore, that this transaction of the mortgage is one which, according to the principles guiding courts of equity on such subjects, could not be sustained. A

The next question is whether, though not originally binding, it was afterwards made valid and obligatory by the conduct of Richard, who alone could impeach it? B It was argued that he, by his subsequent dealing with the property, had cured any defects existing in the original mortgage. As to his dealings with the property after the mortgage, his acts consisted in having concurred with his father in raising several sums of money, amounting to between £6,000 and £7,000 by way of charge on the equity of redemption, and, secondly, in selling the whole to Mr. Savery. C With respect to the sums so raised by way of charge, the decree does not impeach them, and the question, so far as relates to them, is not whether they are valid, but assuming them, as the decree assumes them to be, good and effectual charges, whether the concurrence of Richard in them prevents him from disputing the original mortgage for £10,000? I am of opinion that they had no such operation, for at the time of their creation Richard evidently laboured under the same ignorance with respect to his rights in relation to the first mortgage as he was under in April, 1835. D Even if he had, at the several times when these subsequent charges were created, in express terms ratified the original mortgage, such ratification would have been of no avail unless it could be shown that he had on those occasions the means of forming an independent judgment which he had not at the time of the original transaction. In fact, however, he had no other advice or assistance than that of his father and Mr. Savery. These additional charges were all made two or three E years after the time when he attained his majority, and while he continued to live under his father's roof as part of his family. The same principles which impeach the mortgage itself must destroy also the effect of any subsequent confirmations made in the same absence of independent advice and assistance. Just so as to the sale. Supposing for the present that the sale itself, like the charges subsequent to April, 1835, is to be deemed valid, yet it cannot, for the reasons I have indicated, F have any effect in setting up the original mortgage. Richard had no intention, when he concurred in the sale, to cure any defect in the mortgage. He was not aware that any such defect existed, and he had no more professional or independent advice than that which he had on the former occasions. I see, therefore, no reason to think that the invalidity of the original mortgage was cured by any of Richard's subsequent dealings with the property. G

This, therefore, brings me to the next question, which relates, not to the mortgage, but to the sale made in the autumn of 1838, and carried into effect by the deeds of Mar. 21 and 22, 1839. This, it will be observed, was a sale by the father and son, who together were owners of the fee (subject, of course, to the charges), to Mr. Savery their common solicitor. In such a transaction the solicitor who purchases is bound to show that he has put his clients in a situation to act independently of his influence. He must, to use the words of LORD ELDON, in Gibson v. Jeyes (1) (6 Ves. at p. 271), be able H

"to prove that his diligence to do the best for the vendor has been as great as if he was only an attorney dealing for that vendor with a stranger."

Here several attempts had been made to sell the estate by auction and by private contract. The sum given by Mr. Savery was £23,700, which was more than had been offered by any other person. If the question had turned on the point whether he had done the best for his client, whether, in short, he had complied with the rule as laid down by LORD ELDON, I am much disposed to think that he had. But, in truth, the question here does not depend on any such doctrine. This sale cannot stand against Richard, because it was made by him without his having been made aware that the original mortgage was invalid. He concurred in the sale of what, from the conduct of Mr. Savery, he had been led to suppose was a reversionary I

A interest in an estate worth only £23,700, and burdened to the extent of £20,000 or thereabouts. He was under a pressing necessity of obtaining an immediate sum of £30,000 to enable him to marry, and with that object in view, he might well consent to a sale to which, if he had known that as against him the charges were only £6,000 or £7,000, he never would have acceded. Mr. Savery, in order to sustain his purchase, must show, not only that he gave the utmost value for the estate, but further that none of the circumstances likely to influence Richard in his determination to concur or not to concur in the sale were kept from him—that he was aware of the invalidity of the mortgage so far as he was concerned, and so knew the real nature and extent of his interest. It is obvious that this was not the case. Mr. Savery had by his conduct led Richard to believe that his interest was much less than it really was. He cannot, therefore, set up against him a sale which but for the erroneous impression thus created never might have been made. I am, therefore, of opinion that neither the sale nor the mortgage can stand so far as Richard is concerned.

The only remaining question is as to the terms on which relief ought to be given. With respect to the mortgage, it is plain that Richard must, as far as possible, put Mr. Savery in the condition in which he would have been if no such mortgage had been made and if his security had rested solely on the life-estate of the father, and the several policies of insurance. [To effect this His LORDSHIP said that the vice-chancellor's decree would be varied with regard to certain matters.]

LORD BROUGHAM concurred.

Decree varied.

FOLEY v. FLETCHER AND ANOTHER

[COURT OF EXCHEQUER (Pollock, C.B., Bramwell, Watson and Channell, BB.), November 17, 1858]

[Reported 3 H. & N. 769; 28 L.J.Ex. 100; 33 L.T.O.S. 11; 22 J.P. 819; 5 Jur.N.S. 342; 7 W.R. 141; 157 E.R. 678]

Income Tax—Annual payment—Liability to tax—Sale of asset—Purchase money payable by instalments.

Contract—Time of performance—Payment of money—Payment to be made on appointed day—Interest computed from such day to be paid if principal not paid within one month of appointed day.

The plaintiff sold her interest in certain lands to the defendants. Part of the purchase money was paid on completion, and the defendants covenanted to pay the balance by equal half-yearly payments over thirty years on the days appointed in the conveyance, and, in case of non-payment of an instalment upon the appointed day or within one month thereafter, to pay interest on the instalment computed from the day appointed for payment. The defendants having fallen into arrear, the plaintiff instituted this suit claiming payment of several instalments. As regards one such instalment less than a month had elapsed after the day appointed for payment thereof and before the commencement of the suit.

Held: (i) the instalments were not liable to income tax, not being "annuities, yearly interest of money or other annual payments" within s. 102 of the Income Tax Act, 1842, and the defendants were not entitled to make any deduction in respect of tax; and (ii) the covenant for payment had to be construed together with the proviso relating to non-payment, with the result that no suit ought to be commenced for the payment of an instalment until one month had elapsed from the day appointed for payment thereof.

Notes. The Income Tax Act, 1842, and the Income Tax Act, 1853, have been repealed. See now the Income Tax Act, 1952, ss. 122, 123, as amended. This case establishes that income tax is only to be charged on payments that are properly income, and not on capital payments that happen to be made annually; this distinction between income and capital payments is fundamental to the law of income tax.

Demurrers in an action upon a covenant in a deed, dated Aug. 26, 1854, by which the plaintiff and Sir F. E. Scott assigned to the defendants certain build-

A ings, lands, mines and hereditaments, to undivided moieties in which they were respectively entitled.

The declaration, after alleging that the plaintiff and Sir F. E. Scott had agreed with the defendants for the sale to them of the buildings, lands, mines and hereditaments, with the colliery, engines and plant thereon, free from encumbrances, at the sum of £99,000, and should be conveyed to William Hatton and William B Matthews, upon and for the trusts, intents and purposes, and subject to the powers, provisos, agreements and declarations therein contained, stated that it was by the indenture witnessed that in pursuance of and part performance of the recited agreement, and in consideration of the sum of £6,770 upon the execution of the indenture paid to the plaintiff and the said Sir F. E. Scott, in moieties, in part of the said purchase sum, and of the further sum of £92,230, the residue of the purchase sum to be paid to the plaintiff and the said Sir F. E. Scott, their respective C executors, etc., in moieties by the several instalments and at the several times thereafter expressed, the said Sir F. E. Scott and the plaintiff did grant, etc., the said buildings, etc., to the defendants William Hatton and William Matthews, their heirs and assigns for ever, upon and for certain trusts, intents and purposes in the indenture declared concerning the same.

D The declaration then stated that the defendants did by the same indenture covenant with the plaintiff in the following manner: that they or one of them, or one of their heirs, etc., should pay to the plaintiff, her executors, etc., the sum of £46,115, being the equal half part of the said sum of £92,230, the unpaid residue of the said purchase sum of £99,000, in and by the several instalments and proportions at the several times, and subject to the provisos and agreements and otherwise in the manner thereafter expressed (the declaration stated that there was a like covenant for payment of Sir E. Fletcher's moiety), that is to say, the sum of £768 11s. 8d. on every June 24 and Dec. 24 in every year after 1854, until and inclusive of Dec. 24, 1884, the first half-yearly instalment to commence and to be paid on June 24, 1855, and subject nevertheless to such eventual acceleration or variation of the time or respective times of payment as was thereafter

F mentioned and thereafter described. Further, that in case either of the last-mentioned instalments or sums of £768 11s. 8d. lastly thereinbefore covenanted to be paid should not be accordingly and fully paid by the defendants, one of them, or their or one of their heirs, etc., to the plaintiff and her heirs, etc., upon the day or time thereinbefore appointed for the payment thereof, or within one calendar month next after the same day, and should not have been previously

G satisfied pursuant to any of the provisos in the said indenture contained, then they the said defendants, or one of them, or their or one of their heirs, executors, or administrators, should and would upon demand, or in default of such demand, then by equal half-yearly payments in each year, well and truly pay unto the plaintiff, her executors, administrators or assigns, interest at the rate of £4 for every £100 by the year upon the instalment or upon each instalment which for

H the time being should be in arrear and unpaid, or upon such part thereof respectively as should be so in arrear; and such interest should be computed from June 24 or Dec. 24 as the case might be, upon which the instalment should have become payable, or (as the case might require) should be computed from the then last preceding day for payment of interest upon the instalment so in arrear; and that every payment thereinbefore covenanted to be made should be so made without

I any deduction or abatement, except in respect of any property or income tax, which ought by law to be deducted from such interest. The declaration then averred that the times of payment had not been accelerated or varied, and alleged that six instalments of £768 were in arrears and unpaid to the plaintiff, and that divers half-yearly days of payment, according to the indenture, of interest on the said instalments, except the last, elapsed before the suit, yet the defendants had not paid, etc.

The defendants, by their second plea, pleaded, as to so much of the declaration as related to the instalment which became due on Dec. 24, 1857, that by the said indenture it was provided and agreed that no instalment or other principal sum for the time being payable under or pursuant to the covenant or provisions therein contained, should be recoverable or capable of being enforced, nor should any proceedings for that purpose be commenced until after the expiration of one calendar month from the day upon which the same instalment or sum should have become payable under or pursuant to the covenants and provisions therein contained, nor should any interest accrue or become payable in respect thereof until the expiration of such calendar month. The defendants further said that one calendar month from the day upon which the said last-mentioned instalment or sum became payable under or pursuant to the covenants and provisions contained in the said indenture had not expired before the commencement of this suit. The defendants also pleaded, by their fourth plea, as to the sum of £236 7s. 8d., parcel of the instalments claimed, that in making payment of the said instalments respectively, the defendants deducted and retained out of the said instalments respectively divers sums of money, amounting in the whole to the said sum of £236 7s. 8d., being the amount of the rate of duty which at the times when the said instalments respectively became due, was payable under the Income Tax Act, 1853, and that by such deduction they were acquitted and discharged of the said sum of £236 7s. 8d., under and by virtue of such statute.

The plaintiff demurred to both pleas, and the defendants joined in demurrer.

By the Income Tax Act, 1842 :

"Section 1. There shall be charged, raised, levied, collected, and paid, unto and for the use of Her Majesty, Her Heirs and Successors, during the term hereinafter limited, the several rates and duties mentioned in the several Schedules contained in this Act, and marked respectively A, B, C, D, and E; (that is to say) . . .

SCHEDULE D

Upon the annual profits or gains arising or accruing to any person residing in Great Britain from any kind of property whatever, whether situate in Great Britain or elsewhere, there shall be charged yearly, for every twenty shillings of the amount of such profits or gains, the sum of seven-pence; and upon the annual profits or gains arising or accruing to any person residing in Great Britain, from any profession, trade, employment, or vocation, whether the same shall be respectively carried on in Great Britain or elsewhere, there shall be charged yearly, for every twenty shillings of the amount of such profits or gains, the sum of seven-pence :

And upon the annual profits or gains arising or accruing to any person whatever, whether a subject of Her Majesty or not, although not resident within Great Britain, from any property whatever in Great Britain, or any profession, trade, employment, or vocation exercised within Great Britain, there shall be charged yearly, for every twenty shillings of the amount of such profits or gains, the sum of seven-pence."

"Section 102. Upon all annuities, yearly interest of money, or other annual payments, whether such payments shall be payable within or out of Great Britain, either as a charge on any property of the person paying the same by virtue of any deed or will or otherwise, or as a reservation thereout, or as a personal debt or obligation by virtue of any contract, or whether the same shall be received and payable half-yearly or at any shorter or more distant periods, there shall be charged for every twenty shillings of the annual amount thereof the sum of seven-pence, without deduction, according to and under and subject to the provisions by which the duty in the Third Case of Schedule D may be charged; provided that in every case where the same shall be payable out of profits or gains brought into charge by virtue of this Act no assessment shall be made upon the person entitled to such annuity, interest, or other annual payment, but the whole of such profits or gains shall be charged with duty on the person liable to such annual payment, without distinguishing

A such annual payment, and the person so liable to make such annual payment, whether out of the profits or gains charged with duty, or out of any annual payment liable to deduction, or from which a deduction hath been made, shall be authorised to deduct out of such annual payment at the rate of sevenpence for every twenty shillings of the amount thereof, and the person to whom such payment liable to deduction is to be made shall allow such deduction,

B tion, at the full rate of duty hereby directed to be charged, upon the receipt of the residue of such money, and under the penalty hereinafter contained, and the person charged to the said duties having made such deduction shall be acquitted and discharged of so much money as such deduction shall amount unto, as if the amount thereof had actually been paid unto the person to whom such payment shall have been due and payable; but in every case where any

C annual payment as aforesaid shall, by reason of the same being charged on any property or security in Ireland, or in the British plantations, or in any other of Her Majesty's Dominions, or on any foreign property or foreign security, or otherwise, be received or receivable without any such deduction as aforesaid, and in every case where any such payment shall be made from profits or gains not charged by this Act, or where any interest of money shall not be reserved or charged or payable for the period of one year, then and in every

D such case there shall be charged upon such interest, annuity, or other annual payment as aforesaid the duty before mentioned, according to and under and subject to the several and respective provisions by which the duty in the Third Case of Schedule D may be charged: Provided always, that where any creditor on any rates or assessments not chargeable by this Act as profits shall be entitled to such interest, it shall be lawful to charge the proper officer having

E the management of the accounts with the duty payable on such interest, and every such officer shall be answerable for doing all acts, matters, and things necessary to a due assessment of the said duties, and payment thereof, as if such rates or assessments were profits chargeable under this Act, and such officer shall be in like manner indemnified for all such acts, as if the said rates and assessments were chargeable."

By s. 40 of the Income Tax Act, 1853:

"Every person who shall be liable to the payment of any rent, or any yearly interest of money, or any annuity or other annual payment, either as a charge on any property or as a personal debt or obligation by virtue of any

G contract, whether the same shall be received or payable half-yearly or at any shorter or more distant periods, shall be entitled and is hereby authorised, on making such payment, to deduct and retain thereout the amount of the rate of duty which at the time when such payment becomes due shall be payable under this Act, that is to say, sevenpence, sixpence, or fivepence, as the case may be, for every twenty shillings of such payment; and the person

H liable to such payment shall be acquitted and discharged of so much money as such deduction shall amount unto, as if the amount thereof had actually been paid unto the person to whom such payment shall have been due and payable; and the person to whom such payment as aforesaid is to be made shall allow such deduction, upon the receipt of the residue of such money, under pain of forfeiting the sum of fifty pounds for any refusal so to do: Provided always, that no tenant or occupier of any property chargeable under

I Schedule A of this Act shall be entitled to deduct or retain out of the rent thereof any greater sum than the amount of the duty which shall have been assessed and charged upon or in respect of such property, and actually paid by such tenant or occupier."

Atherton, Q.C., and Gray for the plaintiff.

Phipson for the defendants.

POLLOCK, C.B.—I am of opinion that on the demurrer to the second plea, the judgment of the court ought to be for the defendants; but for the plaintiff on the fourth plea. A

The demurrer to the second plea raises a question as to what is the effect of a covenant for payment of a sum of money on a day certain, with a proviso that no action shall be brought for its recovery until the expiration of a month from the day of payment; whether the proviso ought to be read with the covenant, so as to make an action premature which is brought after the day of payment but before the expiration of the month. The covenant is mixed up with the proviso in the deed itself. The defendants covenant that they will pay, or cause to be paid, to the plaintiff £46,115, being a moiety of the purchase-money "in and by the several instalments and proportions, at the several times and subject to the provisos and agreements and otherwise in the manner hereinafter expressed." The covenant, therefore, by the express words of the deed, must be taken with the proviso, construed with, and qualified by, the proviso. The result of so reading the whole together is, that there is an extension of the time for one month beyond the nominated day of payment. The provision for interest, making the payment free of interest when made within the month, renders this more clear, because by its effect interest is to become due only after default has been made in paying within the month after the days named; and the stipulation that where interest has become due it shall be calculated from the original day on which the money was payable was probably resorted to with a view to establish a species of penalty; and it furnishes a very good reason for the making of a separate covenant and proviso, as a means of accomplishing that purpose. The result is, that the payment is sufficient, provided it be made within the month, and no action can be brought until the expiration of that month. Therefore, our judgment on that plea must be for the defendants. B C D E

But our judgment on the fourth plea ought to be for the plaintiff. That question is whether the periodical payment of instalments, provided for by the deed mentioned in the declaration, constituted an annuity or annual payment liable to assessment to the income tax by virtue of any of the Acts imposing that duty. I am of opinion that it is not. The statutes referred to in the argument have both of them substantially the same title, namely, "An Act for granting to Her Majesty duties on profits arising from property, professions, trades and offices." The first Act, the Income Tax Act, 1842, has five schedules, in which are specified the income which shall be liable to the duty. Schedules A and B provide for the annual value of lands, tenements, hereditaments or heritages; C for profits arising from annuities, dividends and shares of annuities, payable out of any public revenue; D for annual profits or gains arising or accruing to any person residing in Great Britain from any kind of property whatever, and annual profits or gains accruing to any person, although not resident within Great Britain, from any property whatever in Great Britain; E for every office or employment of profit, and every annuity, pension or stipend, payable by Her Majesty or out of the public revenue of the United Kingdom, except annuities before charged to the duty under Sched. C. These are all matters liable to the tax. F G H

The question now is whether, when upon the sale of an estate for £99,000, it is stipulated that the purchase-money shall be paid £6,000 or £7,000 of it down, and the rest by annual payments extending over a considerable number of years, such payments are annual profits, and therefore liable to the duty? It has been contended that it is an annual profit because the effect of the protracted period of payment, when taken in connection with the value of money, shows that the real value of the estate was some £23,000 or £30,000, and that the difference between that amount and the £99,000 is the profit which that real value, if paid over to the seller, would have produced during the period over which the payments have extended; and, therefore, to that extent, the payments are profit, and are payments of an annuity; and inasmuch as it is the fault of the plaintiff that she has so mixed up profit with capital that the one cannot be distinguished from the other, the consequence must fall upon herself; like the case of a person who has mixed I

A his corn with the corn of another. Therefore, as the plaintiff claims part as profit, the court must say all is assessable as profit, because we cannot distinguish how much of it is capital.

B There are several answers to this. First, there is nothing on the record to justify the assertion that the property was not worth a great deal more than £99,000. There is nothing to show that protracting the time for payment was not a matter of mere indulgence to the purchaser. Then, even if we could speculate and should come to the conclusion that a great part of the annual payment was in respect of the time of payment of all being postponed, still we should have no authority to say that they were payments substantially within the Act, merely because some profit may be mixed up with it. No doubt the annual payment is to the amount of one-half a payment of money properly due as capital, and not profit or interest.

C Then it was said, admitting that, still so much of the annual payment as is interest—that is, the surplus beyond what is strictly purchase-money—is assessable. But there is no provision in the statute to that effect. I cannot say that capital is liable to the duty, because it is in the company of profit. The section principally relied on is 102 of the Income Tax Act, 1842. That section imposes the duty upon all

E “annuities, yearly interest of money, or other annual payments, whether such payments shall be payable within or out of Great Britain, either as a charge on any property of the person paying the same by virtue of any deed or will, or otherwise, or as a reservation thereout, or as a personal debt or obligation by virtue of any contract, and whether the same shall be received half-yearly, or at any shorter or more distant period.”

F If these terms are to be applied to this case merely because we find the words “annual payments,” payable “as a personal debt or obligation by virtue of any contract,” they would apply to every case where a sum of money was payable for two or more years under a contract of what kind or nature soever the obligation might be, such as an ordinary debt payable by instalments; and now by virtue of s. 40 of the Income Tax Act, 1853, they would apply not only to annual, but to any periodical payments. I think that these words, “or other annual payments, whether such payments shall be payable within or out of Great Britain, either as a charge on any property, etc.,” must be read as applicable only to annual payments ejusdem generis with those specified, namely, annuities and yearly interests of money. It is not an annual payment, although payable by virtue of a contract within the meaning of the section, if it is made in payment of a debt; and, although it may be mixed up with some profit, that does not make the debt subject to duty.

G Section 40 of the 1853 Act provides that

H “every person who shall be liable to the payment of any rent or any yearly interest of money, or any annuity, or other annual payment, either as a charge on any property, or as a personal debt or obligation, by virtue of any contract, whether the same shall be received or payable half-yearly, or at any shorter or more distant periods, shall be entitled, and is hereby authorised on making such payments, to deduct and retain thereout the amount of the rate of duty which at the time when such payment becomes due shall be payable under this Act.”

I The same observation applies to this section as to that cited from the earlier Act. The words “other annual payment” must be read as applicable to annual payments ejusdem generis with those specifically mentioned, i.e., rent, interest and annuities. If it turns out that an annual payment is the payment of a debt by instalments, it is not profit, or within the Act. The title of the Act and all the provisions declare the imposition of a tax on profits, not on the return of capital. If the payment is of an annuity, then it is chargeable because it is an annuity, and is expressly made subject to the duty. It was said that the provision that the annual payments shall be chargeable, "whether the same shall be received or paid half-yearly, or at any shorter or more distant period," carries the matter further than the earlier statute, but, if the argument founded on this were valid, then these words would include every promissory note, and, in fact, every payment. If s. 40 stood alone, there might be some colour for the argument; but, looking at the schedule to see what is charged, we find Sched. D says:

"for and in respect of all interest of money, annuities, and other annual profits and gains not charged by virtue of any of the other schedules contained in this Act"

—that is, every person who shall be liable to an annual payment which is itself subject to the duty, shall be entitled to deduct, but not otherwise. Here the parties have stipulated for the payment of a sum of money by instalments; and we have no power, where they have contracted for one thing, to make them liable for another.

BRAMWELL, B.—I am also of opinion that the defendants are entitled to judgment on the second plea.

On the other question I think that our judgment must be for the plaintiff. In Re Micklethwait (1), PARKE, B., says (11 Exch. at p. 456):

"It is a well-established rule that the subject is not to be taxed without clear words for that purpose; and also that every Act of Parliament is to be read according to the natural construction of its words."

The latter is the main rule, the other subordinate. The natural course of things is, that the heir takes on the death of the person last seised; whoever seeks to disturb that rule must make out his right to do so. So, whoever seeks to impose a tax or penalty must establish the right; whoever seeks to punish must establish the guilt. The rule, properly understood, is, that the burden of proof is on the assertor. I cannot help referring to Mr. SEDGWICK'S books on STATUTORY AND CONSTITUTIONAL LAW, p. 334, where it is said:

"These decisions, as I have said, naturally modify the old rule that penal statutes are to be construed strictly. The more correct version of the doctrine appears to be that the statutes of this class are to be fairly construed and faithfully applied, according to the intent of the legislature, without unwarrantable severity on the one hand, or equally unjustifiable lenity on the other, in cases of the court's inclining to mercy."

And afterwards, at p. 336, he says:

"These decisions show the gradual tendency of the judicial mind to disavow and renounce any right to construe statutes according to considerations of policy or hardship, and to recognise the duty of conforming on all occasions to the will of the law-making body."

And in a note at p. 335, he asks:

"Whether all laws must not be supposed intended to effect a public good, and whether the effort to accomplish the intention of the legislature should be more earnest in this case than in all others?"

These are the principles and considerations which I think ought to prevail in considering this case.

I think, consistently with these, the plaintiff is entitled to judgment on the fourth plea. But I have had considerable doubt upon the matter. The instalments are the payments for an estate deferred for thirty years, the total amount of which is, probably, about double the sum which would have been paid if paid down at once. It may be that the sellers have been content to forgo interest; but the presumption is that the amount consists partly of principal and partly of interest. If we were at liberty to consider the case independently of express enactment,

- A I should say that it would be reasonable to ascertain how much is the payment of principal and how much interest. But all speculation is at an end if the words and the meaning of the statute are plain. Inasmuch as the statute imposes a duty on the whole of an annuity, without discriminating between that part of it which is repayment of principal and that which is interest, I should say that, if there was no injustice in that, there could be no injustice in imposing the duty on a sum
- B analogous to an annuity; if these payments were called an annuity, income-tax would doubtless be payable upon them. It was said that persons will now mix up interest and principal to escape the payment of duty. But by "An Act for granting to Her Majesty duties on profits arising from property, professions, trade and offices," it cannot be taken that the legislature meant to impose a duty on that which is not profit derived from property, but the price of it. On looking at
- C Sched. D. of the Income Tax Act, 1842, it seems to be susceptible of this interpretation, that everything is to be referred to the title and prior part of the Act; and then this expression "the last-mentioned duties extend to every description of property or profit not in the Schedules A., B. and C." will refer to property or profits of the same description as in those schedules; and then when we find in s. 102, "all annuities, yearly interest of money, or other annual payments," it seems
- D not an unreasonable construction to say (leaving out the word annuities), that the intention is to charge yearly interest of money and other annual payments ejusdem generis, that is within the description of profits; and then substantially all annuities. Acting on the principle that the affirmation of the proposition must be made out by those who seek to impose the tax, I cannot say in this case that has been established. But, assuming it has been, and that duty is payable on the instalments, it is
- E admitted the plaintiff herself might have been assessed. If the plaintiff may be compelled to make a return and herself pay in respect of the instalments, it cannot be that the defendants can deduct the income tax before making the payments.

Reading the words of s. 40 alone, nothing seems plainer, and as this is an annual payment, why does it not apply? The expression "liable to payment" is peculiar.

- F Though feeling the greatest doubt on the subject, I think the plaintiff is entitled to judgment, as this is not an annual payment liable to income tax; and even if it is, the defendants can have no right to deduct income tax in respect of the whole of each payment. I own I feel the greatest doubt, because my decision is founded on a construction of the Act which does violence to the words of it.

- G WATSON, B.—I think the defendants are entitled to judgment upon the second plea, for the reasons given by the Lord Chief Baron, and that the plaintiff is entitled to judgment on the fourth plea. It is a startling proposition that income tax attaches upon debts payable by instalments. It is a tax upon income, the title of the Act shows it; and reading Schedules A., B., C., D. and E. of the Income Tax Act, 1842, it is obviously a yearly tax on what is called throughout income, and
- H profits and gains. The Income Tax Act, 1853, contains similar heads of taxable matters, all of them treating that on which the tax is to attach as profit or income. Section 102 of the Act of 1842 is relied on by the defendants, and this payment is said to fall within the description of an annuity. But an annuity means an income purchased with money, the capital ceasing to exist, having been converted into an annuity. Annuities are made chargeable by express words. The words "other
- I annual payments" in the section mean payments ejusdem generis, viz., as profits. Suppose the case of a will giving to a legatee money payable by instalments, as for instance £10,000, £5,000 payable at the end of the first, £5,000 at the end of the second year after the testator's death; the sums so bequeathed would not be an annuity, and would be chargeable, not as income, but under the Legacy or Succession Duty Acts. If a person covenanted to pay an annual sum, not being the payment of a debt, by instalments, as to pay £10 a year to a particular person, such payment would be chargeable with income tax. But there is not a word in the Act that leads to the inference that a debt payable by instalments is chargeable with income tax; and a tax cannot be imposed by implication. Or suppose this payment to the plaintiff made by two instalments, would income tax attach in such a case? It has been said that these payments are compounded of principal and interest. Profit may be obtained by the postponement of the payment, but how can we say that any part of this was interest? As to the other point: by the Act of 1853, the several sections of the first Act are re-enacted, and s. 40 of that Act provides, that a person liable to the payment of "any annuity or other annual payment, either as a charge on any property or as a personal debt by virtue of any contract," shall be entitled "on making such payment to deduct and retain thereout the amount of the rate of duty which at the time when such payment becomes due shall be payable under the Act." The true meaning of that is, that where the party has been assessed to the income tax he may deduct it, though he has not actually paid the money. I do not see how a person covenanting to pay the purchase-money of an estate by instalments can be charged with income tax in respect of such payment. It does not appear as a fact that the defendants are in possession of the land, and there are no provisions for assessing the duty on them. The Crown would, therefore, have no remedy, and the defendants would get money which they might keep if we held that they were at liberty to make a deduction on account of income tax.

CHANNELL, B.—I also think our judgment should be for the defendant on the demurrer to the second plea, and for the plaintiff on the demurrer to the fourth plea. The first question is whether the plaintiff commenced this action before she had a right to do so. The defendants rely upon a proviso that no action shall be brought till the expiration of one calendar month from the time when the instalment sued for was made payable; that the proviso amounts to a covenant not to sue, and does not qualify the covenant for payment of the instalments. A covenant not to sue for a definite time, generally speaking, cannot be pleaded as an answer to an action; but here the qualification is contained in the same deed, and to put a proper construction upon that deed, the whole of it must be taken together in order rightly to construe the intention of the parties to it. It is not an absolute covenant to pay, but is subject to a proviso, which makes the proviso part of the covenant itself.

As to the fourth plea, the stipulation is to pay part of the agreed purchase-money at once for the estate, and the remainder by instalments. Are these instalments liable to income tax as "an annuity or yearly interest of money or other annual payment" within the Income Tax Act, 1842, s. 102? I think they are not; as that would be to tax capital, not income; for the purchase-money of this estate, although part of it is payable by instalments, is nevertheless capital, and not income within the meaning of the Act of Parliament. I am, therefore, of opinion, for the reasons which have already been given, that these payments are not liable to be assessed as income.

Judgment for plaintiff on the fourth plea; for defendants on the second plea.

ORR & BARBER AND OTHERS v. UNION BANK OF SCOTLAND

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Cranworth, L.C., and Lord Brougham), May 12, 15, 16, August 7, 1854]

Bank—Letter of credit—Grant to debtor requesting second bank to honour drafts of creditor—Forgery of draft by servant of creditor—Refusal by bank to honour creditor's draft—Right of debtor and creditor to recover from bank granting letter.

If the grantee of a letter of credit has paid or deposited money in respect thereof, and, the letter having fallen into the wrong hands, money is obtained in fraud of the grantee by means of a forged cheque, the grantee will be entitled to recover the amount against the bank granting the letter of credit.

A debtor, who owed the first appellant £460, paid that sum into the respondent bank and received from the respondent bank a letter of credit addressed to the L. bank requesting that bank to honour the drafts of the first appellant to the extent of £460 and to charge the respondent bank with that sum. The debtor enclosed this letter of credit in a letter to the first appellant, which arrived at the latter's office in his absence. The only clerk in the office, who had no authority to manage money transactions, took the letter of credit to the L. bank, forged a cheque in the first appellant's name for the amount, received payment, and absconded. On the first appellant's return he drew on the L. bank for the £460, but the bank refused payment. In an action by the first appellant and the debtor against the respondent bank,

Held: when the respondent bank received the money from the debtor they impliedly undertook that the L. bank would honour the drafts of the first appellant for £460; payment on a forged draft was no payment as between the payer and the person whose name was forged; and, therefore, the respondents could not set up against the claims made in the action the payment made by the L. bank on the forged draft, and the action succeeded.

John Gordon Campbell, merchant, in Glasgow was in the habit of dealing with Orr & Barber, commission agents in Liverpool, and in 1844 was indebted to them in the sum of £460 9s. With a view to paying this debt, Campbell deposited that amount in the Union Bank of Scotland at Glasgow, filling up the following slip of paper, according to the usual practice:

“Union Bank of Scotland, Oct. 22, 1844.

“Wanted credit on Liverpool for £460 9s., payable to Messrs. Orr & Barber.”

In return for his money Campbell received from the bank the following letter of credit:

“Union Bank of Scotland, Glasgow,
 “No. 15,583 A.A. “Oct. 22, 1844.
 “Please to honour the drafts of Messrs. Orr & Barber to the extent of £460 9s., which charge to the bank. “I am your obedient servant,
 “£460 9s. (Signed) JAMES WATSON, “Entd. M.G.H. Cashier.

“To the Manchester and Liverpool District Bank, Liverpool.

“Not transferable.

On the same day Campbell put the letter of credit into the Post Office at Glasgow, under cover, addressed to Orr & Barber at Liverpool; but they never received or saw it. At the time it should have arrived both partners were absent; Orr, who conducted the business of the firm at Liverpool, being then in Ireland, where he remained for a fortnight, from Oct. 18 to 31, 1844; Barber, who conducted the business at Buenos Ayres, being long resident abroad. On Orr's return to Liverpool on Oct. 3 he found in his counting-house the letter from Campbell advising the remittance but the letter of credit referred to was gone. He went to the Liverpool and Manchester District Bank to make inquiries and to get payment. He was there informed that the money had been paid on a draft or order previously presented.

A He, Orr, had given no authority to any one to draw on the bank in his name. The fact, however, was that at the time the letter reached Liverpool, the only clerk in Orr & Barber's counting-house was one Smith who was merely a messenger or office-keeper, and had no authority to manage their business or money transactions. He, however, opened the letter, wrote to Campbell acknowledging the receipt of the same, then forged the name of Orr & Barber to a draft, received payment, and absconded before Orr's return. The Manchester and Liverpool Bank refused to give Orr any information, and declined to honour his draft for the money. Having consulted counsel as to his remedy, Orr was advised that, as there was no evidence of the Liverpool bank having ever consented to hold any money for Orr & Barber, and as there was no privity of contract between them and Orr & Barber, no action could be brought by them against that bank.

C In these circumstances Orr & Barber applied to the Union Bank at Glasgow for payment; but they also declined to pay. Orr & Barber then, along with Campbell, the grantee of the letter of credit, as co-plaintiff, brought an action against the Union Bank. After setting out the above facts, their declaration concluded as follows :

D "The defendants (the Union Bank) have failed to perform what they undertook to do in consideration of the said sum of £460 9s.; they did not effectually establish a credit with the Manchester and Liverpool District Bank in favour of Orr & Barber; they did not take the requisite steps for establishing such a credit in terms of their undertaking; and their mandatories, the Manchester and Liverpool District Bank, did not accept or fulfil the mandate contained in the letter of credit, and did not honour the drafts of Orr & Barber to the extent therein mentioned, or to any extent. Further, the defendants themselves refused to give credit to the Manchester & Liverpool District Bank for the sum of £460 9s. as being paid on their account; and they have still in their hands unaccounted for, the sum paid to them by John Gordon Campbell. In these circumstances the plaintiff Campbell requires the defendants either to pay back the said sum to him, or otherwise to implement their undertaking by yet honouring the drafts of Orr & Barber, or making payment to them of the said sum of £460 9s."

G The defendants relied on the following grounds : that, the letter of credit having been transmitted by Campbell in the regular course of post and having been duly delivered at the counting-house or place of business of Orr & Barber and taken and accepted by them as equivalent to a payment of the sum therein mentioned they had no further claim against Campbell or the defendants for payment of the sum, unless they could show that the letter of credit was not an available order or obligation for the said sum. That, the letter of credit granted by the defendants in favour of the plaintiffs Orr & Barber on the Manchester and Liverpool district bank having been honoured when presented for payment, the defendants were not responsible for the loss alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiffs or either of them. That the obligation undertaken by the defendants was only to give Campbell a good and available letter of credit on the Manchester and Liverpool Bank; and, that bank being solvent, no recourse could be against the defendants, unless the plaintiffs produced the letter of credit dishonoured or unpaid, especially as it was not alleged that the Manchester and Liverpool District Bank ever refused to pay the contents of the said letter of credit to any one presenting the same.

I The full court, by a majority of twelve to one, the minority being SIR ALEXANDER COCKBURN, decided that the declaration disclosed no cause of action against the defendant bank. The plaintiffs appealed.

Hugh Hill, Q.C., for the appellants.

Bliss, Q.C., and Forsyth for the respondents.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

Aug. 7, 1854. The following opinions were delivered.

LORD CRANWORTH, L.C.—The question here is whether, in these circumstances, the Union Bank of Scotland, the respondents, are responsible for the money either to Orr & Barber, or to Campbell, from whom they received it. The Lord Ordinary considered the claim of the appellants to be relevant, and admitted it to proof. But a great majority of the judges of the Court of Session held that they were not so responsible. A

With all deference to that high authority, I confess I have arrived at the conclusion that the Lord Ordinary was right. What the respondents undertook when they received the money from Campbell was that the Liverpool bank would honour the draft of Orr & Barber for £460 9s. Campbell complains that this engagement of the respondents has never been performed, so that he has never received any benefit from the payment which he made to the respondents. That the Liverpool bank has refused to honour the draft of Orr & Barber is not disputed, and most unquestionably prima facie this gives to Campbell a right of action against the respondents, for he paid his money to them upon their undertaking that the Liverpool bank should do what in fact they have never done, and on the contrary refuse to do, namely, honour the draft of Orr & Barber for £460 9s. B C

The question is whether this prima facie case against the respondents is effectually displaced by the defence set up by them. The substance of that defence is that they, the respondents, put the Liverpool bank in funds so as to enable them to meet the draft of Orr & Barber, and that the Liverpool bank was imposed upon by a forged cheque, which they paid supposing it to be genuine, and now decline to make any further payment upon the letter of credit. But this, without more, clearly affords no valid defence. The respondents must show either that the Liverpool bank actually paid the draft of Orr & Barber when called on to do so, pursuant to the letter of credit, or else that they did something which as between them and Orr & Barber they are entitled to treat as equivalent to payment. It is certain that they did not pay the draft of Orr & Barber, and the only question, therefore, is, on the other alternative, whether the payment which they made on the forged cheque is a payment which they are entitled to consider as valid between themselves and Orr & Barber. If it is, then Campbell would be entitled to treat Orr & Barber as having received the £460 9s., and so would be entitled in account with them to have credit for that amount. The Liverpool bank would rightfully debit the respondents for that sum as paid on their account, and neither Campbell nor Orr & Barber could have any claim on the respondents. If, however, the payment on the forged cheque was not a valid payment as between the Liverpool bank and Orr & Barber, then Orr & Barber have not received anything from Campbell. He is still liable to them. The Liverpool bank has no right to debit the respondents for money paid on their account, no such payment having been made, and the money paid by Campbell into the respondent bank still remains in their hands. It is plain from this short statement that the respondents are answerable to Campbell unless they can make out that the payment on the forged cheque was a valid discharge to the Liverpool bank as between themselves and Orr & Barber. D E F G H

The learned judges of the Court of Session seem to have supposed that on this subject there is some peculiarity in the law of England—some difference at all events between the law of England and that of Scotland. But I do not think that any such difference exists. Payment on a forged cheque or order is not of itself any payment at all as between the party paying and the person whose name is forged. This is, I apprehend, the law both of England and Scotland. Cases may perhaps exist in which such a payment may be made valid by reason of collateral matters. Where, for instance, a forgery has been successfully accomplished by reason of the want of due caution on the part of the person whose name is forged. It was on this ground that the Court of Common Pleas decided Young v. Grote (1). There the customer of a bank signed a cheque in blank, to be filled up by his wife with whom he left it, and she filled it up with a sum of fifty pounds written so inartificially that a servant was able to insert the words “three hundred and” before the word “fifty,” so as to deceive the bankers without blame on their part. The court held I

A that the bankers, having paid £350 on this cheque, were entitled to credit with their customer for that amount. The decision went on the ground that it was by the fault of the customer the bank had been deceived. Whether the conclusion in point of fact was in that case well warranted, is not important to consider. The principle is a sound one, that where the customer's neglect of due caution has caused his bankers to make a payment on a forged order, he shall not set up against B them the invalidity of a document which he has induced them to act on as genuine.

How does this doctrine apply to the present case? How can it be said that the Liverpool bank was induced to pay the forged cheque in consequence of any negligence or misconduct of Orr & Barber? It can hardly be attributed as blame to them that their clerk purloined the letter of credit. Besides, a letter of credit is not a negotiable instrument. The letter of credit merely gave authority to the bank C to honour the cheque of Orr & Barber. The circumstance that the letter of credit was in the hands of the clerk did not necessarily or naturally import that he was the person entitled to draw for the amount mentioned in it. The bank ought to have made inquiry as to who were the drawers of the cheque, and they ought to have satisfied themselves as to the genuineness of the signature. The fact that it was presented by a person who held and gave up the letter of credit raised a presumption D that it had been drawn by the proper party. But it was only a presumption; and if the bank chose to act on such a presumption without further inquiry, they must abide the consequence. If, then, the Liverpool bank cannot set up the payment which they made on the forged cheque, it follows of necessity that the present claim of the appellants is well founded; for they can have no possible remedy against the Liverpool bank, between whom and them there is no privity whatever. E The respondents have given to Orr & Barber a credit on the Liverpool bank, but that bank will not honour their draft, so that the parties are necessarily thrown back on those with whom the money was originally lodged, and whose contract has not been performed. The respondents will have their remedy against the Liverpool bank by disallowing in account any sum alleged to have been paid on the letter of credit; but with that the appellants have no concern.

F It remains only to notice a point raised in argument, but not much insisted on: I allude to the joinder of Orr & Barber with Campbell as co-pursuers. This was, however, as I conceive, quite right. We are not dealing with an English action at law where such a union would have been bad. But when Campbell paid the money to the respondents, both he and Orr & Barber became interested in the due fulfilment of the obligation into which the respondents had entered, and both, G therefore, properly joined in the action. The course which I now advise your Lordships to take is to reverse the decision, and to remit the case back to the Court of Session, in order that the parties may go to proof, unless the respondents should consider that it would be useless to them to go into such proof.

LORD BROUGHAM.—I entirely agree with the Lord Chancellor; and I am H sorry to be under the necessity, in agreeing with him, of disagreeing with the great majority of the learned judges in the court below. I hope and trust that the suggestion made by the Lord Chancellor at the close of his statement will not be thrown away on the parties, but that, however they should be advised, they will not proceed further; for I should consider that this litigation, in consequence of what has passed here, may be said to have reached its natural conclusion. I apprehend I that the facts of the case are really not in dispute. The facts, from the nature of the case, which depends almost entirely upon documentary evidence, have been before us, and I confidently hope that the parties below will rest satisfied with what has been done here, and that they will not pursue further the litigation.

Appeal allowed.

WILKINSON v. HAYGARTH

[COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH (Lord Denman, C.J., Coleridge and Wightman, JJ.), November 30, January 14, 1847]

[Reported 12 Q.B. 887; 16 L.J.Q.B. 103; 8 L.T.O.S. 465;
11 Jur. 104; 116 E.R. 1085]

Tenancy in Common—Trespass by one tenant—Damage to subject-matter of tenancy—Action in trespass by other tenant in common—Competency.

One of several tenants in common is not entitled to damage or destroy the land the subject of the tenancy, e.g., by cutting and carrying away turves, and he cannot lawfully license another person to do that which he cannot himself do. If he does damage or destroy the land he will be liable in trespass at the suit of one of his co-tenants.

Notes. There were further proceedings in this case reported only in 12 Q.B. 851, but do not affect the point decided here.

A Rules Nisi, one obtained by the plaintiff, the other by the defendant, in an action in trespass for entering the plaintiff's close and digging and carrying away peat, soil and turves therefrom.

The defendant pleaded inter alia.

B The plaintiff was one of several tenants in common of the close in question, and the defendant pleaded that the peat, soil, and turves were not so his property as to enable him to maintain the action. The defendant also said that he acted as he did under a licence granted him by one Wearing, another of the tenants in common. At the trial, before CRESSWELL, J., the jury gave a verdict for the defendant on some issues in the case and for the plaintiff on the other issues. A rule nisi was obtained for entering judgment for the plaintiff, with damages 1s. non obstante veredicto, for a new trial, and a cross-rule was obtained by the defendant.

C Pashley for the defendant, showed cause against the rule for entering judgment for the plaintiff.

Martin, Q.C., and Manisty, for the plaintiff, supported the rule.

D LORD DENMAN, C.J.—In my opinion, the fourth plea to the original declaration and the second plea to the new assignments are bad. The turf is composed of the grass and soil on which it grows, as peat is the vegetable and the soil of which it has become a part. The turf does not grow as to become part of the accruing profits which are the subject of enjoyment by the tenants in common. It is admitted that, if there has been an ouster, the present action will lie; that taking a chattel away constitutes an ouster; and that in all cases the destruction of the property is also an ouster. In Clayton v. Corby (1) a prescription in a plea to take in alieno solo as much clay for making bricks at the defendant's brick-kiln as he required was held bad. The principle of that case was that such a taking destroyed the subject-matter. I consider this, therefore, an ouster effected by means of the destruction of the property. No authority contradicts this view. We cannot act upon what LORD THURLOW said in Goodwyn v. Spray (2) without knowing the circumstances of that case more fully.

F COLERIDGE, J.—The plaintiff now confines his claim to the new assignment. We must, therefore, see what the facts pleaded amount to. It must be admitted on the part of the plaintiff that the tenant might license the doing of whatever he might do himself, and, on the other hand, the defendant must admit that this does not include acts of destruction. Taking turf is not like taking the vestura terræ or other growing profits. Were we to hold that a tenant in common could take away the turf, we must say also that one tenant in common could carry all the brick earth from the surface, and it is impossible to say where we could stop.

G WIGHTMAN, J.—The plaintiff complains that the defendant has made holes in his close, and has dug up, carried away and converted turf. The defendant says he did this in exercise of a right of common of turbary. The plaintiff, as to that, new assigns, stating that he brought his action for trespasses committed for other purposes than the exercise of the right of common. To this the only justification pleaded and affirmed by the verdict is leave and licence by a tenant in common. The case, therefore, is as if the only plea to the declaration had been leave and licence by the tenant in common. Can, then, one tenant in common license the taking away the soil? It is as if the action had been brought against the tenant in common himself, for he could not authorise another to do that which he himself could not do. That, if the action had been against the tenant in common, the plaintiff must have succeeded, appears sufficiently from Co. Litt. 200, a.

Rule absolute for judgment on the new assignments.

Martin, Q.C., and Manisty then showed cause against the rule for entering a verdict for the defendant on one of the issues.

Pashley supported the rule.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 14, 1847. LORD DENMAN, C.J., delivered the following judgment of the court. —In this action of trespass for cutting turf, all the points were disposed of on the argument, except the question on the plea of not possessed. The evidence showed the plaintiff to be but a tenant in common of the locus in quo, and indeed, further, that the defendant had been authorised to commit the trespass by another of the tenants in common. This latter fact is immaterial for the purpose of the present question, except that it furnishes an example of the necessity for holding here that the plaintiff was possessed for the purpose of bringing trespass. For, if possession in such case imported exclusive possession, one tenant in common might destroy the subject-matter for his own benefit, and his co-tenant be without this remedy. If the plaintiff had joined the co-tenant in bringing the action, that co-tenant would, of course, have released the defendant whose act of trespass was committed under his orders. The plaintiff can recover such damages only as are proportionate to his interest in the property, but the wrongdoer has no right to put him to the proof of more than is necessary to show him injured by the wrong done. If the defendant thinks he can have any advantage from the joint interest of another, he must plead it in abatement.

Rule discharged.

EGERTON v. EARL BROWNLOW AND OTHERS

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Cranworth, L.C., Lord Lyndhurst, Lord Brougham and Lord St. Leonards), June 23, 24, 27, 28, 30, August 1, 12, 19, 1853]

[Reported 4 H.L.Cas. 1; 8 State Tr.N.S. 193; 23 L.J.Ch. 348;
21 L.T.O.S. 306; 18 Jur. 71; 10 E.R. 359]

Will—Condition or limitation—Operation of condition eo instante when interest would otherwise fall into possession—Whether condition subsequent or precedent.

Will—Condition—Legality—Public policy—Interest to depend on obtaining title of duke or marquis.

A. by will devised his freehold estates to trustees in trust to convey them to the use of C., his great-nephew and heir-apparent to the earldom of D., for ninety-nine years, if he should so long live, remainder to trustees and their heirs during the life of C., in trust to preserve contingent remainders, remainder to the use of the heirs male of the body of C., with divers remainders over, "subject nevertheless, as to the uses and estates so to be limited to C., &c., to the several provisos for the determination thereof hereinafter contained." In a subsequent part of the will was this proviso: "Provided always, if C. shall die without having acquired the title and dignity of Duke of B. to him and the heirs male of his body then and in such case the use and estate hereinbefore directed to be limited to the heirs male of his body shall cease and be absolutely void, and my said real estates shall thereupon go over and be enjoyed according to the subsequent uses and limitations declared by my will, as if the said C. were actually dead without issue male." There were similar provisos directed to other events. C. died leaving a son, but without having acquired the title of Duke of B.

Held (disregarding the opinions of the majority of the judges, and reversing the decree of the Court of Chancery, LORD CRANWORTH, L.C., dissentiente) (i) the proviso operated as a condition subsequent (although, per LORD ST.

A LEONARDS, it was in fact a contingent limitation) and was not a condition precedent; (ii) as such conditions tended to fetter the free agency of the party in the performance of his duty as a peer, to embarrass the responsible advisers of the Crown in the distribution of titles, and were an insult to the Crown itself, they were at variance with the public good and general welfare, and, therefore, illegal and void.

B Per LORD TRURO and LORD ST. LEONARDS: A contingent gift or interest has an existence capable, as well as a vested interest or estate, of being made to cease; a chance may exist, and a chance may be made to cease; and there is no authority for saying that a condition subsequent cannot operate to defeat a use or estate before it can vest as well as an estate subsequently to its vesting.

Appeal from a decree of LORD CRANWORTH, V.-C., acting for KINDERSLEY, V.-C., dated Feb. 26, 1852.

John William, seventh Earl of Bridgewater, by his will dated Mar. 31, 1823, after charging his estates in Shropshire and Cheshire with an annuity of £12,000 to his wife, Charlotte Catherine Anne Countess of Bridgewater, and with annuities of £4,000 to Sir Charles and Lady Long his niece, gave all his real estates, except his copyhold and leasehold estates thereafter devised, and the estates of which he was either a trustee or a mortgagee, and subject, as to his estates in the counties of Salop and Chester, to the before-mentioned annuities, and to the powers for the recovery thereof,

“unto and to the use of John Earl Brownlow, Edward Herbert Lord Viscount

A Clive, and the said Sir Charles Long, their heirs and assigns for ever, upon trust, by such conveyances or assurances as shall be deemed expedient, or counsel shall advise, to convey and assure, settle and limit, all my said hereditaments and real estates hereinbefore devised, with their appurtenances, to the several uses, upon the trusts, and for the intents and purposes, and with, under, and subject to the powers, provisoes, limitations, and declarations, hereinafter by this my will declared and directed concerning the same: And in the meantime to permit and suffer my said hereditaments and real estates to be held and enjoyed by, or to pay, apply, and dispose of the rents, issues, and profits thereof unto and for the benefit of, such person or persons, or for such intents and purposes as the same would go, or belong to, or be applicable, if such settlement had been actually made pursuant to this my will: And I will and direct, that such conveyance and settlement shall be to the use of the heirs of my body: remainder to the use of the said John Earl Brownlow, Edward Herbert Lord Viscount Clive, and Sir Charles Long, their executors, administrators, and assigns, for and during the term of ninety years, computed from the day next before the day of my death, without impeachment of waste, upon the trusts and for the intents and purposes, and subject to the provisoes and declarations, hereinafter declared and directed concerning the said term, and from and after the expiration or sooner determination of the said term and in the meantime, subject thereto and to the trusts thereof, to the use of James Walter Earl of Verulam, and John Thomas Viscount Sidney, and their heirs, during the natural life of my brother the Hon. and Rev. Francis Henry Egerton, in trust to preserve contingent remainders [with divers remainders over] with remainder to the use of the said Charlotte Catherine Anne Countess of Bridgewater, my wife, and her assigns, for and during the term of her natural life, without impeachment of waste: and from and after her decease, to the use of the said Dame Amelia Long for the term of ninety-nine years, if she shall so long live: remainder to the said John Earl Brownlow and Edward Herbert Lord Viscount Clive and their heirs during her life, in trust to preserve contingent remainders: remainder to the use of the heirs male of the body of the said Dame Amelia Long: remainder to the use of John Hume Cust, commonly called Lord Viscount Alford, the eldest son of the said John Earl Brownlow by my niece Sophia Lady Brownlow, his late wife, deceased, for and during the term of ninety-nine years, computed as aforesaid, if the said John Hume Lord Viscount Alford shall so long live: remainder to the use of the said Edward Herbert Lord Viscount Clive and Sir Charles Long and their heirs, during the life of the said John Hume Lord Viscount Alford, in trust to preserve contingent remainders: remainder to the use of the heirs male of his body; with remainder in default of such issue to the use of the Hon. Charles Henry Cust, second and only younger son of the said John Earl Brownlow by the said Sophia Lady Brownlow his late wife, for the term of ninety-nine years computed as aforesaid, if he the said Charles Henry Cust shall so long live: remainder to the use of the said Edward Herbert Lord Viscount Clive and Sir Charles Long and their heirs, during the life of the said Charles Henry Cust, upon trust to preserve contingent remainders: remainder to the use of the heirs male of the body of the said Charles Henry Cust; subject nevertheless as to the several uses and estates so to be limited to the said John Hume Lord Viscount Alford and Charles Henry Cust, and to the trustees during their respective lives and to the heirs male of their respective bodies, to the several provisoes for the determination thereof hereinafter contained: with remainder to the use of Wilbraham Egerton, of Tatton, in the county of Chester, Esq., and his assigns, for and during the term of his natural life, without impeachment of waste: and from and after the determination of that estate by any means in his lifetime, to the use of the said Edward Herbert Lord Viscount Clive and Sir Charles Long and their heirs, during the life of the said Wilbraham Egerton, in trust to support and preserve the contingent uses and estates hereinafter declared and directed.

nevertheless to permit and suffer the said Wilbraham Egerton or his assigns, during his life, to receive and take the rents and profits of the premises for his or their own use: with remainder, from and after the decease of the said Wilbraham Egerton, to the use of William Tatton Egerton, eldest son of the said Wilbraham Egerton, during his life, without impeachment of waste: remainder to the said Edward Herbert Lord Viscount Clive and Sir Charles Long and their heirs, during his life, in trust to preserve contingent remainders, and to permit him to take the rents and profits as aforesaid: remainder to the first and other sons of the said William Tatton Egerton severally and successively according to seniority, and the heirs male of their respective bodies, every elder son and his issue male to be preferred to the younger and his issue male."

with divers remainders over: and with the ultimate remainder to the testator's own right heirs. The testator further declared that

"in the settlement to be made pursuant to this my will, my said estates are not to be limited successively to the use of the first and other sons of my said brother, or of the said Dame Amelia Long, or of the said Lord Viscount Alford, or of the said Charles Henry Cust, in tail male, but to the heirs male of their respective bodies in the words of this my will; it being my intention, that the vesting of my estates in the heirs male of their respective bodies shall be suspended during the lives of my said brother, the said Dame Amelia Long, the said Lord Viscount Alford, and the said Charles Henry Cust respectively."

After a name and arms clause and a proviso relating to the term limited to Dame Amelia Long, the will continued:

"Provided always, and I declare my will to be (1) that if the said John Hume Lord Viscount Alford shall die without having acquired the title and dignity of Duke or Marquis of Bridgewater, to him and the heirs male of his body, then and in such case the use and estate hereinbefore directed to be limited to the heirs male of his body shall cease and be absolutely void; and (2) that if the earldom of Brownlow shall descend and come to him, and he shall not have acquired, or shall not acquire, the title and dignity of Duke or Marquis of Bridgewater, to him and the heirs male of his body, before the end of five years next after he shall become Earl Brownlow, then and in such case the several uses and estates hereinbefore directed to be limited to the said John Hume Lord Viscount Alford, and to trustees during his life for preserving contingent remainders, and to the heirs male of his body, shall thenceforth cease and be absolutely void, and that my said hereditaments and real estates hereinbefore devised shall, in either of the said cases, thereupon go over and be enjoyed according to the subsequent uses and limitations declared and directed by this my will, as if the said John Hume Lord Viscount Alford were actually dead without issue male:

Provided also, and I declare my will to be, (3) that if it shall happen that the said John Hume Lord Viscount Alford shall not acquire the title and dignity of Duke or Marquis of Bridgewater, to him and the heirs male of his body, with the immediate limitation over of such title and dignity to the said Charles Henry Cust and the heirs male of his body, or to the heirs male of his body if he shall be dead leaving issue male, and also that the said Charles Henry Cust shall not acquire the title and dignity of Duke or Marquis of Bridgewater to him and the heirs male of his body, then and in such case the use and estate hereinbefore directed to be limited to the heirs male of the body of the said Charles Henry Cust shall cease and be absolutely void; and (4) that if the earldom of Brownlow shall descend and come to him the said Charles Henry Cust, and he shall not have acquired or shall not acquire the title and dignity of Duke or Marquis of Bridgewater, to him and the heirs male of his body, before the end of five years next after he shall become Earl Brownlow, then and in such case the several uses and estates hereinbefore directed to be limited to the said Charles Henry Cust, and to trustees during his life for preserving

A contingent remainders, and to the heirs male of his body, shall thenceforth cease and be void, and that in either of such cases my said hereditaments and real estates hereinbefore devised shall thereupon go over and be enjoyed according to the subsequent uses and limitations of this my will, as if the said Charles Henry Cust were actually dead without issue male :

B Provided also, and I declare my will to be, (5) that if my brother, the said Francis Henry Egerton, shall be created Duke or Marquis of Bridgewater, with such limitations over of the said title and dignity as that the same may, immediately after the failure of issue male of my said brother, come to the said John Hume Lord Viscount Alford and the heirs male of his body, and after them to the said Charles Henry Cust and the heirs male of his body; then and in such case my said hereditaments and real estates hereinbefore devised shall be settled, limited, and enjoyed in such manner, as if the several provisos hereinbefore expressed for the determination of the uses or estates directed to be limited to the said John Hume Lord Viscount Alford and Charles Henry Cust, and to trustees during their lives for preserving contingent remainders, and to the heirs male of their bodies respectively, subsequent to the proviso for taking and using the name and arms of Egerton only, had not been contained in this my will : Provided also, and I declare my will to be, (6) that if the said John Earl Brownlow shall, in case of the death and failure of issue male of my said brother, in his lifetime be created Duke or Marquis of Bridgewater, the said title and dignity being limited to him and the heirs male of his body by the said Sophia Lady Brownlow his late wife only, and not being inheritable by or limited to any other issue male of the said John Earl Brownlow, the same shall be thenceforth equivalent to the acquisition of such title and dignity by the said John Hume Lord Viscount Alford to him and the heirs male of his body, with limitation over to the said Charles Henry Cust and the heirs male of his body; and my said hereditaments and real estates shall be settled and limited, so as to go and be enjoyed, thenceforth and for the future, as if the several provisos hereinbefore expressed for the determination of the several uses or estates directed to be limited to the said John Hume Lord Viscount Alford and to the said Charles Henry Cust, and to trustees during their lives for preserving contingent remainders, and to the heirs male of their bodies respectively, subsequent to the proviso for taking and using the name and arms of Egerton only, had not been contained in this my will, notwithstanding the previous determination, if it shall happen, of the uses or estates directed to be limited to the heirs male of the bodies of the said John Hume Lord Viscount Alford and Charles Henry Cust, under any of such several provisos :

G Provided always, and I declare my will to be (7) that, if the said John Earl Brownlow shall hereafter take any other title than Duke or Marquis of Bridgewater so as to be inheritable by, or limited to, the issue male of his body by the said Sophia Lady Brownlow his late wife, or any of them, then and in such case the uses and estates hereinbefore declared and directed to be limited to the said John Hume Lord Viscount Alford and Charles Henry Cust, and to trustees during their lives for preserving contingent remainders, and to the heirs male of their bodies respectively, shall thenceforth cease and be void; and that thereupon my said hereditaments and real estate shall go over, and be limited and enjoyed, according to this my will, as if the said John Hume Lord Viscount Alford and Charles Henry Cust were actually dead without issue male : Provided also, and I declare my will and intention to be (8), that my said hereditaments and real estates shall not be enjoyed by the said John Hume Lord Viscount Alford, or the heirs male of his body, if he shall by any means whatsoever succeed to or take any title other than Duke of Bridgewater, to which the Marquis of Bridgewater (sic) shall not, if then, or would not, if thereafter to be created, be superior in rank, or have precedence being of the same rank, nor by the said Charles Henry Cust, or the heirs male of his body, if he shall take any title, either by immediate creation, limitation over, or otherwise, other than Duke of Bridgewater, to which the Marquis of Bridgewater (sic) shall not, if then, or would not, if thereafter to be created, be superior in rank, or take precedence if of the same rank; and that the uses and estates hereinbefore directed to be limited to such of them the said John Hume Lord Viscount Alford and Charles Henry Cust, as shall take any such title contrary to this my will, and to trustees for his life to preserve contingent remainders, and to the heirs male of his body, shall thenceforth cease and be void; and thereupon my said hereditaments and real estates shall go over and be enjoyed, according to the subsequent uses or limitations of this my will, as if he or they taking such other title contrary to this my will were actually dead without issue male."

The testator died without issue on Oct. 21, 1823, and thereupon his brother, Francis Henry Egerton, became Earl of Bridgewater. He died a bachelor on Feb. 11, 1829, without having been created either Duke or Marquis of Bridgewater, and on his death the earldom became extinct. Lady Long, who became Lady Farnborough in consequence of her husband having been created Lord Farnborough, died without having issue on June 16, 1837. She, and Sophia Lady Brownlow, deceased, the mother of Lord Alford and Charles Henry Cust, were the only children of Lady Amelia Hume, the testator's only sister; and, on Lady Farnborough's death, Lord Alford became the testator's heir-at-law. Lord Farnborough died on Jan. 18, 1838, and in June, 1840, Wilbraham Egerton, the elder, was appointed a trustee of the will in his place. The testator's widow died on Feb. 11, 1849. Lord Alford complied with the direction in the will as to taking the name and arms of Egerton, and exercised the power of jointuring contained in the will, by an indenture of April 5, 1849, charging certain hereditaments with £5,000 a year to his wife, Lady Marianne Margaret Egerton. He died on Jan. 3, 1851, leaving the plaintiff, who was an infant, his eldest son, and the heir male of his body. The plaintiff and Charles Henry Cust also complied with the direction as to taking the name and arms of Egerton.

The bill, which was filed in February, 1854, against the trustees, Lord Alford's widow (in whose favour his Lordship had exercised the power of jointuring contained in the will), Charles Henry Egerton, and his son William Tatton Egerton, and his son, after stating the will and codicils, and the facts above detailed, alleged that there was not at the time of the date of the will, or of the testator's death, a dukedom or marquise of Bridgewater either in existence or abeyance; and that it had not, since the decease of the testator, been the pleasure of the Crown to create any such dukedom or marquise, or any such title as Duke or Marquis of Bridgewater; that the plaintiff's father did not, after the date of the will, succeed to, acquire, or take any title whatever; and that John Earl Brownlow had not, since the date of the will, taken any title whatever; that the plaintiff was advised that, notwithstanding the provisoes and declarations in the will having reference to the title and dignity of Duke or Marquis of Bridgewater, he was equitable tenant in tail in possession under or by virtue of the will of the estates, subject to the trusts thereof: that Charles Henry Egerton, Wilbraham Egerton the elder, William Tatton Egerton, and Wilbraham Egerton, the son of William Tatton Egerton, contended, that by reason of the plaintiff's father having died without acquiring the title and dignity of Duke or Marquis of Bridgewater, to him and the heirs male of his body, the use and estate by the will directed to be limited to the heirs male of the plaintiff's father had ceased and become absolutely void, and that the testator's estates had gone over to Charles Henry Egerton, and that Charles Henry Egerton was then entitled to the receipt of the rents and profits of all the estates; and that his son also claimed an interest in the matters in question in the suit: that the plaintiff's title being disputed as aforesaid, the trustees of the will were unable to act without the direction of the court. The bill prayed that it might be declared by the court that the plaintiff was, under and by virtue of the will, equitable tenant

A in tail male in possession of the estates, subject to the trusts of the will; and that the trustees might be decreed to account with him for such, if any, of the rents and profits of the estates from the death of his father as might have been received by them: and that some person might be appointed to manage the estates, and receive the rents and profits thereof in the meantime, and until it should have been ascertained whether the plaintiff or Charles Henry Egerton was the party entitled to the possession and receipt of the rents and profits of the estates. All the defendants, except Lady Alford, demurred to the bill for want of equity.

The demurrers were argued before LORD CRANWORTH, V.-C., and overruled by him on Aug. 20, 1851. All the defendants thereafter put in answers to the bill; and after replication and evidence gone into, the cause came on to be heard on Feb. 26, 1852, before LORD CRANWORTH, V.-C., acting for KINDERSLEY, V.-C. In his

C decree of that date, LORD CRANWORTH decreed that the bill so far as it prayed that it might be declared that the appellant was equitable tenant in tail male in possession of the estates, other than leaseholds for years, subject to the trusts of the will, and absolutely entitled to the estate held on leases for years and the personal chattels respectively, subject to the trusts of such will, but, as to such leaseholds for years and personal chattels, subject to the gift over in such will contained in

D the event of a tenant in tail male by purchase dying under twenty-one years without leaving issue male of his body then living, and that the trustees might be decreed to account with the appellant for the rents from the death of his father, should stand dismissed. In the event which had happened, his Lordship declared, that in the settlement directed in the decree to be made, no present use or estate in possession ought to be limited to the heirs male of Lord Alford in the freehold

E hereditaments; and that on the decease of Lord Alford, the respondent, C. H. Egerton, became entitled to the said hereditaments, and also to the leasehold hereditaments and personal chattels for the term of ninety-nine years, computed from the day next before testator's death, if C. H. Egerton should so long live, discharged from the jointure and term of years for securing the same respectively, expressed to be limited by the indenture of April 5, 1849, but subject to the proviso in the will

F for the determination of the estates of C. H. Egerton; and that the said C. H. Egerton was then entitled to the receipt of the rents of the freehold, copyhold, and leasehold hereditaments, and real estate, and to the possession and enjoyment of the personal chattels; and with the above declaration his Lordship ordered that it be referred to the Master to approve of a settlement accordingly. The decree then provided for the costs. Against that decree, except so far as it provided for pay-

G ment of the costs, the plaintiff now appealed. The case was argued in June, 1853, before LORD CRANWORTH, L.C., assisted by the common law judges, who had been summoned to attend.

A. Hobhouse for the trustees of the will.

I At the conclusion of the arguments the following questions were submitted by the House to the judges:

Taking the facts from the printed cases, but reading the will as if it were a devise to the uses therein mentioned, and not a devise to trustees to convey to those uses. 1. On decease of Lord Alford, did his eldest son, the appellant, become entitled to any and what estate in the lands devised in remainder immediately expectant on the ninety-nine years' term? 2. If he did, is such estate liable to be defeated on any and what event or events, and may it or not come in esse, or revive again on any and what event or events? 3. On decease of Lord Alford, did his brother Charles Henry Egerton, the respondent, become entitled to any and what estate in remainder immediately expectant on the said term? 4. If he did, then is such estate liable to be defeated on the happening of any and what event or events? 5. Are all, or any, and which, of the several provisoes void? 6. Are the provisoes, or any, and which of them, to be treated as being conditions precedent? 7. In the events which have happened, has the jointure appointed in favour of Lady Marianne Alford ceased? A

On Aug. 12, 1853, the judges delivered their opinions, the majority taking the view that the condition on which the estate of Lord Alford depended was a condition precedent, and since that condition had never been satisfied, no estate arose in Lord Alford; the condition was not void. The seven questions were answered in accordance with this view. B

The House took time for consideration. The following opinions were delivered. Aug. 19, 1853. C

LORD LYNTHURST.—I have read and considered with attention the opinions of the learned judges in this case; and, after weighing the reasons on which they are founded, I am constrained to say, though with deference, that I differ from the conclusions of the majority of those learned persons. It is to be regretted that several of the opinions, as stated on a former day, were prepared during the pressure of the circuit, and without sufficient opportunity of consulting the authorities bearing on the different, and, in some respects, intricate points which the subject involves. But though I regret this circumstance, it was, I have reason to believe, unavoidable. D

Two questions have been raised. First, whether the proviso respecting the title of Marquis or Duke of Bridgewater is a condition precedent or subsequent; and secondly, whether the proviso is valid, or is to be regarded as against public policy, and, therefore, void. As to the first and more technical question, it is, I think, admitted, and cannot indeed be disputed, that the will has been drawn with much care and attention, by a person obviously well acquainted with the force and effect of the terms he employed, and not likely, therefore, to have misapplied them. The testator declares his will to be, that, if Lord Alford shall die without having acquired the title of Duke or Marquis of Bridgewater, to him and the heirs male of his body, then and in such case the use and estate thereinbefore directed to be limited to the heirs male of his body shall cease and be absolutely void. These are admitted to be, in point of construction, and according to the constant usage of conveyancers, words importing a condition subsequent. The same words are uniformly used in different parts of the will, as denoting conditions subsequent, and in cases where no other interpretation can be put on them. In no instance are they used to express a condition precedent. In the previous passage of the will, the limitation of the uses and estates to Lord Alford and Henry Cust, and to the trustees during their respective lives, and to the heirs male of their respective bodies is declared to be "subject to the provisoes for the determination thereof hereinafter contained"; and the use of the distinct word "determination," as to all these uses and estates indiscriminately, manifestly shows that the testator intended the conditions contained in those provisoes to be, as to all of them, conditions subsequent. In like manner, in the proviso respecting the testator's brother being created Duke or Marquis of Bridgewater, the testator speaks of the proviso for the determination of the use or estate directed to be limited to the heirs male of the body of Lord Alford, and so also in the proviso immediately following relative to Earl Brownlow. E

It is further to be observed, that in the very clause in question the condition is admitted to be a condition subsequent as to one part of it, although it is contended to be a condition precedent as to the other part. In a case of necessity, indeed, such a difference of interpretation in the same clause might be adopted; but a very strong case must be made out to justify such a departure from the ordinary rules of construction. The testator declares that the use or estate limited to the heirs male of the body of Lord Alford shall in a certain event cease and be absolutely

A void—words which, even in their ordinary acceptation, and without reference to any technical rule, denote exclusively a condition subsequent. The proviso has nothing of the character of a condition precedent. It is not said that on the occurrence of such an event a use or estate shall arise, but that, if such an event shall not have occurred, a use or estate previously limited shall be defeated. It does not create—it determines and destroys. The will, in fact, consists of a series of limitations in favour of different persons and sets of persons; and the obvious meaning as to the point in question is, that if Lord Alford shall die without having acquired either of the suggested titles, the particular limitation in the series created in favour of the heirs male of his body shall cease and be void—the limitation is in effect to be struck out of the series, and the next limitation, in favour of Henry Cust, is to be advanced—but then on a condition which, if invalid, can have no operation.

C But, my Lords, it is said, and not improperly said, that whether a condition is to be construed as precedent or subsequent must depend on the intention of the testator, to be collected from the whole instrument; that no particular form of words is absolutely necessary to express the one condition or the other; and that the most strict technical words or form may bend to the clear and manifest intention of the testator. But, far from the intention of the testator, to which I shall presently advert, being at variance with the terms used according to their natural and legal construction, it appears to me that the case is just the reverse. The fallacy, if I may so speak, which has led to the forcible conversion of the words importing a condition subsequent in this case into a condition precedent, seems to be this—namely, that a condition subsequent is not properly applicable to the limitation of a contingent use or estate. But such use or estate is an interest recognised by the law, and not unfrequently of great value; and there is no more inconsistency in making it subject to a condition subsequent, by declaring that, if a certain event shall not have occurred, the limitation shall determine or cease and be void, than if it were an interest vested or in possession. If the law allows such a limitation to be made, such an interest to be created, it follows, as of course, that it may be vacated or determined. It is clear that the framer of the will considered it as no objection to the effect of a condition subsequent, that the use or estate limited was contingent, since he expressly provided that the use or estate in this instance, which he must have known to be contingent, should on the failure of a certain event cease and determine. It is also to be observed that in the clause respecting the name and arms the testator declares that if the person entitled, etc., shall refuse to take, or shall discontinue to use, the name and arms of Egerton, etc., all such estates directed to be limited to the sons of such person in tail male, as for the time being shall be in contingency or suspense, as the case may happen, shall cease, determine, and be void—thereby expressly stating that a use or estate which is described in terms as being in contingency shall cease and be void. Here I may remind your Lordships that one of the learned judges (ALDERSON, B.) though his opinion in the result is unfavourable to the appellant, after adverting to the words “shall cease and be absolutely void,” observes

H “that they must be allowed to be very strong words, indicative of an intention on the part of the testator that the heirs male of the body of Lord Alford should in some way or other first take the estate, and, on the contingency occurring, lose that which they had before taken. And in such a case the words would be to be treated as a condition subsequent.”

I Then with respect to the intention of the testator, as it is to be collected from the whole of the will, did he intend that the condition should not operate as a condition subsequent according to the plain and obvious meaning of the words (for this is what is contended), but on the contrary, as a condition precedent? He was not inops consilii, and we cannot assume that he did not know the effect of the terms that he used. Then how would they operate? If the testator considered, as I think it reasonable to conclude he did, that the proviso was legal and binding, his intention would be equally effectual whether the condition were precedent or subsequent; and it would, therefore, not be necessary, on this supposition, and in order to effect that intention, to do the violence which is attempted to the language and form of the condition. If he were mistaken in this respect, that is no reason for altering the plain words which he has used, and to introduce other terms, in order to give effect to what may be conjectured as to the disposition he might have made of his property had he been aware of the legal obstruction to the execution of his wishes. If we are to indulge in what I must consider as misplaced conjecture, I should think it not reasonable to suppose that he would, if the object he had in view could not be legally accomplished, and by no failure or default of those whom he intended to benefit in the first instance, desire that the estate should go over and be enjoyed by those who were the most remote objects of his bounty. For the same reason, if the testator entertained a doubt as to the legality of the proviso, it is not unreasonable to suppose that he would, as the safer course, have made the condition a condition subsequent rather than a condition precedent. There appears to me then to be no sufficient reason, founded on any supposed intention of the testator, to do violence to the words that have been used—and that they should, therefore, be interpreted according to their plain technical as well as ordinary sense; that is, denoting a condition subsequent.

The second point to be considered is whether the proviso is at variance with public policy; for if so, and the condition be a condition subsequent, then the result will be the same as if no such proviso had been contained in the will; but otherwise, if the condition be a condition precedent. This is not a technical question, but must be considered on general principles, with reference to the practical effect of the condition; and we must bring our observation and experience to bear in determining it.

It is a well established rule of law, that a condition against the public good or public policy, as it is usually called, is illegal and void. SHEPPARD'S TOUCHSTONE and LORD COKE are direct authorities on this point. In more modern times, we find LORD HARDWICKE, in Earl of Chesterfield v. Janssen (1) already cited by POLLOCK, C.B., stating (1 Atk. at p. 352):

"Political arguments in the fullest sense of the word, as they concern the government of a nation, must be, and always have been, of great weight in the consideration of the court; and though there may be no dolus malus in contracts as to other persons, yet if the rest of mankind are concerned as well as the parties, it may properly be said that it regards the public utility."

In Lawton v. Lawton (2) the same eminent judge says (3 Atk. at p. 16):

"These reasons of public benefit and utility weigh greatly with me, and are a principal ingredient in my present opinion."

It is unnecessary to cite other authorities in support of this well-established rule of law. What cases come within the rule must be decided as they successively occur. Each case must be determined according to its own circumstances. When the case of a trustee dealing with his cestui que trust was first considered, it must, in the absence of precedent, have been determined on weighing the public mischief that would arise from giving a sanction to such dealing. So as to transactions between attorneys and their clients; also as to seamen insuring their wages, and other similar cases referred to in the course of the argument. The inquiry must, in each instance where no former precedent occurred, have been into the tendency of the act to interfere with the general interest. The rule then is clear. Whether the particular case comes within the rule is the province of the court in each instance, acting with due caution, to determine.

My Lords, the duties incident to the peerage (and Lord Alford might at any moment, by the death of Lord Brownlow, have become a peer) are of the gravest and highest character, and in the proper discharge of which the interests of the Crown and the public are deeply concerned. These duties are both legislative and judicial; in addition to which, a peer of the realm has a right, when he deems it

A necessary, to demand an audience of the Sovereign, and to tender his advice respecting public affairs. In the framing of laws, it is his duty to act according to the deliberate result of his judgment and conscience, uninfluenced, as far as possible, by other considerations, and least of all by those of a pecuniary nature. He acts judicially, not merely in the appellate jurisdiction of the House, but also in the various matters usually referred to committees, in which the strictest independence

B is to be observed, and all foreign influence of every description to be carefully avoided. Such is the position, and such the duties, of a peer of the realm; and it follows that any application or disposition of property, that has a tendency to interfere with the proper and faithful discharge of these duties, must be at variance with the public good, and consequently illegal and void. It is true that creations of peers and promotions in the peerage emanate from the Crown; and the respect we

C entertain for the Sovereign will not allow us to suppose that, in the exercise of this or any other prerogative, he can act otherwise than according to the best and purest motives. But we all know that, practically, this power is exercised according to the advice of the minister—that the Crown rarely exercises it except at his suggestion, and on his recommendation; and, further, that these honours are usually granted, except in cases of extraordinary merit or distinguished public services, to the partisans and supporters of the administration for the time being, and seldom to its opponents. This is obvious to all, and confirmed by everyday experience. What, then, would be the practical result of this state of things with reference to the proviso now under consideration? If an estate, in this case of great extent and value, is made to depend on a creation or promotion in the peerage, is it reasonable to suppose—speaking generally (for we must so consider the subject), and without

E reference to particular individuals—that such a state of things would not have at least a tendency to lead the party thus interested to act, and without much inquiry, in accordance with those who could insure the permanence of the estate to his descendants, to induce him to support their views and measures, without any very scrutinising regard as to their effect or propriety, and thus to affect that free agency which it is a duty, as far as possible, to keep unimpaired? That there may be

F exceptions—honourable exceptions—to such an influence I do not mean to doubt. There may also be individuals who, from the dread of being supposed to be swayed by such motives, might adopt the opposite course, which would also be liable to objection. But, taking mankind as we find them, we could not, without wilfully closing our eyes and discarding all the results of our observation and experience, come to the conclusion that such a position would not have a tendency, and, in

G some cases at least, a strong tendency, to produce the result which I have stated, viz.: to fetter the free agency of the party in the performance of the important duties incident to his position as a member of the peerage; and it follows, I think, that a proviso or condition which has a tendency to produce such results must be at variance with the public good and general welfare.

H It is admitted that any contract or engagement having a tendency, however slight, to affect the administration of justice, is illegal and void. The character of the judge, however upright and pure, does not vary the case. No less strong must be the principle where applied to the important duties of legislation and to those judicial duties of the peerage, on which so many and vast interests depend. In the decision already adverted to, as to the insurance of the wages of a seaman, the only principle on which it proceeded was that such a practice, if permitted, would tend

I to relax his exertions for the safety of the ship, and thus affect the proper performance of his duty, in the faithful and active discharge of which the public interest is concerned; and so in other instances which have been mentioned, and to which it is not necessary more particularly to refer. Each case must, as I have already mentioned, be decided on its own circumstances, as applied to the established rule of law regarding the public interest and welfare; or, to use the words already quoted of LORD HARDWICKE, “upon political arguments in the fullest sense of the word, as they concern the government of a nation.” It is true, and cannot be disguised, that other motives, such as love of power, eagerness for office, etc., may, and undoubtedly do, more or less influence the conduct of men in the performance of these various and important duties. But if cases exist which are beyond the reach of the law, they afford no reason why, when a further influence is attempted to be created by an unusual disposition of property, and courts of justice are called on to give effect to such disposition, they should not refuse to give it their sanction. The question then is, whether a proviso, such as we are considering, would have, if acted on, a tendency to influence improperly the performance of those duties to which I have referred. I think it would have such an influence, and I consider it, therefore, to be against the public good, and consequently illegal and void.

Other objections, some of them of a more refined nature, may be urged against this proviso; but I am not disposed to enter into further detail, as there are several noble Lords present, of great learning and experience, who have given much of their attention to this case, and are prepared to state their opinions upon it.

For the reasons then which I have thus given, I think, but not without some hesitation, considering the respect due to those learned persons from whom I have the misfortune to differ, that the judgment in this case cannot be sustained.

LORD BROUGHAM.—The conclusion at which I have arrived, but not without some hesitation, considering the respect which I entertain for the opinions of the learned judges from whom I have the misfortune to differ, is that the judgment in this case cannot be sustained.

The decision of this case must depend upon two points—the effect of the proviso respecting the dignity, and the legality of that proviso. If the proviso makes the acquiring of the dignity a condition precedent to the estate tail in remainder, that remainder never existed, and the legality of the proviso is immaterial. If the proviso only avoids or makes to cease the estate tail in any way created, then this estate is only destroyed if the proviso is legal. It appears quite impossible to doubt what the frame of this proviso is, what were the intentions of the testator, and what were the pains taken by the well-skilled conveyancer who drew the will to give those intentions expression and effect. The remainder is to the use of the heirs male of Lord Alford's body—not if he shall, or provided that he shall, acquire the dignity, but without any such condition or contingency. Then follows a general declaration or provision, subjecting the uses and estates so limited to Lord Alford and the heirs male of his body to “the several provisoes for the determination thereof hereinafter contained.” So that the remainder, having first been given without any conditions, is subjected to a proviso for its determination, that proviso being afterwards inserted. I observe some unwillingness to regard this proviso as properly a condition, whether precedent or subsequent: and it is said to be only in popular language a condition. It appears, however, to come distinctly within the description of a condition. It is a condition imposed on Lord Alford—he is to acquire the dignity; and the impossibility of his doing so, were it admitted to the fullest extent, would not make it the less a condition. A gift to A. for life, remainder to B., if A. shall go to Rome in three hours, would prevent the remainder from ever vesting or even existing, and would so operate as a condition precedent. This is of no consequence to the present argument, the point I am now dealing with, whether we take it as a condition, or as a circumstance or event, or generally as a contingency. It may be of more importance as to the other question, that of legality.

The use or estate then, which had been limited without any words of condition or any words importing contingency at all, is declared to be subject to the proviso, not for annexing a condition or contingency to the use or estate coming into existence, but for working “a determination” of that use or estate; and then we have the proviso thus referred to, on the decease of Lord Alford without having acquired the dignity:

“the use and estate hereinbefore directed to be limited to the heirs male of his body” (and, as I am now dealing with it not as executory, but as at common

A law, I will leave out the executory words), "the use and estate hereinbefore limited shall cease and be absolutely void."

The proviso thus answers, and most exactly answers, the description given of it in the preceding clause, in which it is referred to the clause which subjects the uses and estates before limited to the after-mentioned proviso. It is most truly a "proviso for the determination thereof." So when, in the jointuring clause, the proviso is respectively referred to, the same expression is used—the uses are said to have been "determined and made void by virtue or according to the provisos."

B If it be contended that the words, although denoting cesser, avoidance, destruction, may possibly mean also prevention, preclusion, causing non-existence as well as destroying existence, we may then look to the other provisos, if any can be found in which the same expressions are used, where there is only one possible sense imputable to them; and accordingly we find this occurs twice over—if Lord Alford shall become Earl Brownlow, and shall not within five years acquire the dukedom or marquissate, all uses limited to him, to trustees to preserve contingent remainders, and to the heirs male of his body, "shall thereafter" (that is, at the end of five years) cease and be absolutely void, and the real estates go over as if he were actually dead without issue male." This is clearly, and without any possibility of question, a cesser, a defeasance of a particular estate vested in possession, and of a remainder expectant on its determination; and no doubt whatever can arise that here the words import a condition subsequent. So the power of jointuring is given; and if Lord Alford at any time during his life shall execute it, the jointure so made and covenanted to be made by him shall cease and "be void," "if the uses and estates shall be determined and made void by the aforesaid proviso"; and the jointure is "thenceforth to cease and be void"—that is, from and after the determination and avoidance of the uses and estates limited to Lord Alford, and of the estate tail to his issue. It is quite undeniable, therefore, that in these two provisos condition precedent is out of the question; there is a condition subsequent only. The estate to Lord Alford and the remainder to the heirs male of his body in the one, the jointure given to his widow in the other, are to cease by his not having acquired the dignity—to cease after his own estate had become vested in possession, and after he had executed the jointuring power.

E It is said, indeed, that the condition may be subsequent as regards the one limitation, and precedent as regards the other; and for this somewhat violent construction the reason is alleged that the proviso was so framed as to meet either of two contingencies—the death of Lord Alford without acquiring the title, and his becoming Lord Bridgewater and not obtaining it in five years; and this, it is said, explains and justifies the use of the words—that is, their use in both cases. But really this is not so; for the part of the proviso which relates to Lord Alford's decease might have been framed in words importing a condition precedent—as that no such uses or estate should be limited to heirs male of his body, instead of a direction that it should cease and be absolutely void; and then the use and estate, both to himself and his issue male, would have been directed to cease and be void from and after the five years. Indeed, it is quite plain that the two provisos are separate and independent: they refer to different estates; the one to the estate tail; the other, both to the estate of Lord Alford and the estate tail. They relate to different periods: the one to the death of Lord Alford; the other, to the expiration of five years from his succeeding his father; and the word "thenceforth," which only refers to the last antecedent, "end of five years," has no application to the former part of the proviso, which is complete in itself. The concluding part, as to the estates going over, applies to both; and, accordingly, it says, "in either of the said cases," so as to leave no doubt of the deliberate intention.

I Then must it be said, that there is no estate existing to which the words of cesser can apply? The limitation to Lord Alford, with remainder to his issue male as purchasers, may possibly be regarded as an entire limitation and taking effect in Lord Alford's life, so that the conditions subsequent could operate on it. Without denying that this is a possible view of the matter, it may be said that we are not driven to it in order to give the proviso the effect which it plainly was framed to have, as contemplating a contingency determining an existing estate. For there would, independent of Lord Alford's estate, be an existing remainder, contingent indeed—and in two ways contingent—both contingent during the particular estate, and subject to the further contingency of the dignity not being acquired: a contingency which, if operating by way of condition precedent, prevents the remainder from arising; if operating by way of condition subsequent, destroys that remainder or causes it to cease.

The difficulty arises from the negative nature of the condition. If it had been a remainder expectant on the determination of the estate, and to cease and be void if Lord Alford obtained a certain dignity, there could have been no doubt or difficulty. But even the consideration that the estate should cease the instant of its coming into existence does not appear to import anything absurd or self-repugnant. It is not nearly so refined as the possibility of a seisin supposed in the well-known case of Dillon v. Freine (3), in order to serve contingent and non-existing uses, and the supposition made in some other cases in order to avoid greater absurdities or contradictions. The momentary nature or duration of the estate may possibly be the result, the consequence, of regarding the condition as subsequent. On the other hand, it must be admitted that, if we are not to treat this as such a condition, no expression of the testator's intentions could have been sufficient to make it so considered. The same objection might have been urged, even if he had said in terms, "I direct this to be taken as a condition subsequent, and not as a condition precedent," in the same manner as he has superfluously intimated his will respecting the suspension of estates in the heirs male during the existence of the life estates.

So we are driven to admit this must be a condition subsequent, unless there is a rule of law to prevent it so being, which will hardly be contended. I have been treating this as a limitation to uses (and not a devise to trustees to convey to such uses), as the learned judges have been directed, of course, to regard it. But, having clearly ascertained the intention, I apprehend we are so to deal with the settlement, so to direct its being made, as will give that ascertained intention effect. This can only be done by giving some estate on which the condition subsequent can operate, as, indeed, certain of the judges appear to have thought—one more doubtfully, another plainly and explicitly. Nor do I find that any of these learned persons has a doubt on the plain import of the words employed by the testator. None of them appears to doubt that he intended a condition subsequent, although most of them consider that, from such estate not existing, his words must be construed differently from his meaning. My Lords, it is quite unnecessary to speculate upon the grounds of the testator's intention. It has been suggested that he may have said: "If I have a right to stimulate Lord Alford, and thereby obtain the junction of dignity with the property, I do so; if I have no such right, then I shall not desire to exclude my nearest relations." But it is not safe to indulge in such suppositions, and it seems by no means called for in this case; and they are open to objections derived from the frame of the will. I also pass over the somewhat extraordinary results which might follow from the proviso in case it were deemed legal and effectual. Thus, the possession of the estate might have been vested in one branch of the family for many years, in case Lord Alford had died leaving a son five or six years after the testator's decease, so that the devises over might have taken effect; but after twenty or thirty years, Lord Brownlow obtaining the dignity, they would have reverted to the issue of Lord Alford. Such consequences might follow whatever view we took of the condition, though more likely to follow from that condition regarded as precedent. No such consequence can follow, if it be considered as both subsequent and illegal.

We are, therefore, brought to consider the second question, which only becomes material on our deciding the first in favour of the condition being subsequent. The proviso is that, if Lord Alford shall not acquire the dignity in his lifetime, the

A estate shall pass from the heirs male of his body immediately on his decease, and that if he, having acceded to the earldom of Brownlow, shall not acquire the dignity within five years, the estates shall pass from himself as well as from his heirs. The creation of Lord Brownlow, the father, a duke or marquis, with limitations to the heirs male of his marriage with the testator's niece, is declared to be equivalent to the acquiring the dignity by Lord Alford. It is very possible that, if the expression had been, not "acquire," but "be created," in the main proviso, the same consideration would have been applicable, knowing as we do the manner in which dignities may be conferred—in which they sometimes have been, and always may be, conferred. But we are to regard the precise expression used, and by it plainly is intended, "Lord Alford's obtaining it by his own exertions." If the testator had been asked, whether he did not contemplate Lord Alford becoming a duke or marquis, either through the public service of his father, thereby exalted, or through his own services in after life, he would in all likelihood have thought the question designed to turn him into ridicule. He would probably have so regarded the suggestion, that, by leading an exemplary life, by strictly performing all the duties of his station, the father or son might find himself raised in the peerage without further or more active efforts to aid his ascent. No one can seriously believe that the testator contemplated such a rise—that he had in his view anything but a strenuous exertion to reach the desired height—that he attached the forfeiture of the estate to anything but the want of exertion or the want of success, and rather to the former than to the latter kind of failure. Here, my Lords, I lay out of view the arguments urged—powerfully and not inappropriately urged—on the tendency of such conditions and family arrangements to interfere with the free exercise of the prerogative. My view is pointed in another direction. I look towards their manifest tendency to cause corrupt proceedings, to encourage attempts on the virtue of one class of public servants, to lay snares for the integrity of another class.

That the Crown is the fountain of honour, and the Sovereign must be presumed incapable of giving a wrong direction to its streams, is an undeniable principle of the constitution—an undoubted position of law. But there is another quite as irrefragable, which supersedes it, and precludes its application to the present question. The Sovereign can only act by advisers, and through the instrumentality of those who are neither infallible nor impeccable—answerable, indeed, for all that the irresponsible Sovereign may do, but liable to err through undue influence, and to be swayed by improper motives. The proviso gives Lord Alford the strongest inducement to use the means of unduly influencing the dispensation of royal favour; and the will places these means at his disposal in an ample measure. A revenue of £50,000 a year and upwards depends on his obtaining the dignity; and that large income may be employed, with the influence of his rank and station to boot, in furthering the attainment of this end. In these times, no one will pretend that the coarse form of naked bribery would probably be resorted to. But suppose the will had borne the date of 1678, instead of 1823, will any one pretend that the same improbability would have existed? Will any one affirm, that the very persons from whom some illustrious members of this house descend would have withheld their influence over, I will not say the Sovereign, but the ministers of the day, towards raising the devisee to the rank which their own progeny had attained; or would have spurned a gift of much less than £50,000 to propitiate that influence? If I go back half a century more than is necessary, it is because of a decided case. I might have stopped at 1723, and suggested that the possibility would even then have been anything rather than remote of a skilful application of great resources obtaining a considerable advancement in the peerage, through certain favourites better known than respected. In those days—possibly of George I, certainly of Charles II. this would have been considered as within the bounds of possibility. But surely it can hardly be maintained that the condition, which would on this ground have been held illegal then, has become lawful now, in consequence of a change in the degree of probability that it might lead to corruption. The tendency is alone to be considered; and unless the possibility is so remote as to justify us in affirming that there is no tendency at all, the point is conceded—gifts, bequests, conditions, contracts, are illegal from their tendency to promote unlawful acts, without regard to the amount of the inducements held out or interest created, the position of the parties, or any other circumstances which go to affect the probability of the unlawful act being done. A

As I cannot regard the argument on improbability in this case, so neither can I the suggestion that such conditions may have respect either to lawful or unlawful proceedings, and that we are to presume that lawful only are intended. Suppose even that it were said, Acquire the dignity by all lawful means, as was Earl of Kingston v. Pierepont (4)—but there are no such words here—still, suppose there had been, this would make no difference so long as unlawful means might be resorted to on lawful means failing; for the encouragement to wrongdoing would still be held out, and it might be effectual notwithstanding the qualification adjoined by way of guard. In that case it was very far from clear, that the dukedom might not have been sought and even obtained without corruption, by “best becoming and lawful means”—the expression used in the will. The sum of £10,000, a sum at that time equal in force and effect to twice as much at the present day, might have been judiciously employed to increase, and (the Statute 49 Geo. 3, c. 118 [repealed], against selling seats, not having passed) by lawful means to increase, the court's minority on the Exclusion Bill; and no service could have been more gratefully acknowledged by the King or the heir-presumptive—none more liberally rewarded. Yet the possibility of another use being made of the money determined that great judge—renowned alike for sagacity and incorruptible integrity in facie populi—to allow the demurrer and dismiss the bill, B C D

“for that it is against the law that such titles and honours, which are properly the rewards of virtue and merit, should be purchased by money.” E

Can we doubt that if he had seen an estate of a hundred times the value made to depend on obtaining a dukedom, he would have rejected the suggestion that this title and honour might have been sought after by “best becoming and lawful means,” and that the use of none other was to be presumed? Enough that other means might have also been employed; and that, even if the terms of the condition did not suggest, nay, though they excluded such a course, it yet easily came within these terms. F

In later times the same disregard of the comparative probability of the two courses being taken has been evinced by the language of the courts, the tendency towards the undue proceeding being held sufficient. In Jones v. Randall (5), which was the case of a wager on the event of an appeal to this House, and held to be merely an innocent wager, LORD MANSFIELD said that had it been with a Lord of Parliament it would have clearly been unlawful and void—and why? “On account of its mischievous tendency,” says LORD ELLENBOROUGH in Gilbert v. Sykes (6) (16 East, at p. 158); and yet, as was stated by his Lordship: G

“The danger of these illustrious persons being influenced was infinitely remote; but that, notwithstanding the improbability of any mischief, in fact it was void, on account of its tendency on general rules of law.” H

His Lordship, in Gilbert v. Sykes (6) and also LE BLANC and BAYLEY, JJ., applied the same general rule on the same grounds, refusing to take into account the remoteness of the risk that assassination would be committed or the policy of the state be interfered with. So in Cole v. Gower (7), when the court was pressed with the argument that the security in question never could have induced the parish officers intentionally to let the pauper child perish, the court said that on principles of public policy it could not allow them to acquire such an interest, whether they were likely to abuse their trust in consequence or not. I

The case has been put of a gift conditioned on the party offering a living; and the possible tendency of this to encourage simoniacal traffic has been supposed no impeachment of the gift. It is easy to put such cases, in which a very trifling variation would entirely make the condition illegal on that very ground, from the some-

A what anomalous state of our law respecting simony. But what shall be said of a bequest to all the adult males of a parish where sectarian feelings ran high combined with political violence, ten per cent. to be paid down, the remainder when A. B., ministering to a small minority of the parish, should cease to be the rector? There are parts of the United Kingdom in which A. B.'s life would not be insurable: though without doubt the parishioners might entitle themselves to the residue of their legacies innocently, by investing the ten per cent. in the purchase of another living, or in obtaining from the incumbent the resignation of his cure. But the possibility of a crime being committed would make the condition at once be deemed illegal which had a tendency in that direction.

Thus far touching the tendency of this condition to produce and facilitate attempts at obtaining the dignity by corrupt means—attempts, it is admitted, unlikely to be made at the present day, and still more unlikely to succeed. But there are other means of a far less guilty cast, and which are not to be rejected from our consideration; for they are neither so unlikely to be employed, nor are they without great injury to the public weal. As the stern voice of prerogative has been said to be replaced by the gentler accents of influence on the part of the Sovereign, so on that of the subject the ruder forms of corruption have assumed the less repulsive features of intrigue. But, as regards the duties and the functions of the legislature, the law and constitution are inflexible—its members, whether by hereditary or elective right, are there only to consult circa ardua regni; and though, in their corporate character, they can, like the Sovereign, do no wrong, individually they may be seduced or deterred from the due discharge of their office. Dignities are, in contemplation of law, to be bestowed for services, or other merits; but they may likewise be sought by submitting to the personal views of a minister, by exerting the influence of property so as to affect elections, and by using that property in a way that the law discountenances; or by guiding the conduct of the persons returned to Parliament, or by directing the course of those filling hereditary seats away from consultation for the interests of the realm, and towards the attainment of the desired advancement. In point of fact, it is as certain as the existence of Parliament that the views of men are occasionally thus pointed, and their conduct guided by these motives. For examples of this we need not go back to the body which existed less than a quarter of a century before the date of this will, sitting in a house which a bystander, a dignitary of the Church, described to be as ‘half a bowshot from the college;’ and where contracts were notwithstanding made for time—that is, political support hired out for a few important months, or even weeks, when some crisis gave every vote a high value, and when it was remarked by the same authority that the attitude of climbing and crawling is the same. In purer times and places the conduct of higher men in both Houses of Parliament has been notwithstanding all but avowedly shaped by the desire of obtaining title, or a step in the peerage. It is, therefore, idle to represent the condition, which makes acquiring a dukedom necessary to preserving a vast estate, as only contemplating a bare possibility—as not addressed to the Parliamentary conduct of the party invested with the precarious possession—as not likely practically and in fact to sway that conduct. But the law reprobates the yielding to such sinister motives; reprobates both the direction of that conduct in order to obtaining the dignity, and the grant of the dignity in consideration of that conduct; and not only reprobates, but discourages, forbidding, not only the wrongful course, but whatever has a tendency towards making it to be pursued. We are not, therefore, allowed to say that the party should not be presumed to seek the honour by undue means, or the dispensers of royal favour to grant it for reasons other than his merits. It is very possible that neither the one nor the other may be incorrect—that neither the individual nor the minister may swerve from the line of their duty; it is even far from probable that either will: but the law regards possible events not more unlikely than these; and, taking security against the infirmity of human nature, regards the tendency as well as the act, and removes the motives to offending, that it may not have to punish the offence. Truly when we find such remote probability of abuse as amounts to a bare possibility made the ground of decision—the bare possibility of a peer being influenced by a £5 wager to decide a cause on which it was next to impossible he should ever sit in judgment—we may well take into our consideration the possibility of his political conduct, his voice on questions of public policy being biased by the desire of obtaining the dignity which should protect himself or his family from ruin. Yet it is undeniable that his yielding to this bias is a plain breach of duty, especially in a peer, inasmuch as it is contrary to the exigency of the writ whereby he is summoned to attend and to deliberate. That the minister who, to reward such an adherent, prostituted the honours of the peerage, would be culpable, is not denied; but it is a guilt very far from unprecedented. In the present case it would be all the more grave, because of the injury that it must work to the devisees over; and, accordingly, titles have been refused, even leave to change a name withheld, in order to avoid all preference of parties minded to act ad captum legati. But all this does not in anywise weaken—it greatly strengthens—the argument; for it illustrates the tendency of such conditions to undermine the virtue of the complying minister, as well as of his unscrupulous partisan.

My Lords, upon these grounds, I entirely agree with the proposition of my learned and noble friend, namely, to reverse the decree now under appeal.

LORD TRURO.—Having arrived at the same conclusion, and for the same reasons mainly as those which have been addressed to your Lordships by my noble and learned friend who first addressed you, I shall have to repeat very much in effect that which he has already uttered. But in so doing I shall only state to your Lordships the course that I have taken, and which has led to the conclusion at which I have arrived; not having been previously aware of the contents of that judgment (beyond its general result) which your Lordships have just heard read.

In this case the will devises the estate to trustees, with a direction that a settlement shall be made embodying the limitations and uses mentioned in the will, but making them subject to the provisos in the will for the determination thereof; and, in a subsequent and distant part of the will, the proviso in question is inserted, being one of those referred to in the limitations. The question which arises on that proviso is whether it should be construed to have the effect of a condition precedent, or the effect of a condition subsequent. The distinction becomes extremely important in the present case, in reference to the second question which your Lordships will have to decide; that is, whether the proviso which for convenience has been called a condition, but which correctly speaking it is not, that the limitations in favour of the Brownlow family should only take effect in the event of the title of Marquis or Duke of Bridgewater being acquired, is a proviso which the law will allow to bind the estate. It is possible that the legality of the proviso may affect its construction; and for the purpose of considering the construction of it, I shall in the outset assume that it is illegal, and shall reserve any observations upon that point until after my remarks upon the construction of the clause upon that footing. The following is the proviso to be construed: [His LORDSHIP here read the proviso.]

It may be convenient to notice that there are certain rules or principles of construction connected with the right decision of this case. Thus, the intention of the testator is the governing principle in the construction of wills; and this intention is to be collected from the whole will, and not from particular expressions or detached passages alone. But, on the other hand, in the case of trusts executed, such intention of the testator must be collected, not conjecturally, but from the language of the will itself; and words and forms of expression having a known legal import must be understood in their technical sense, unless it is to be collected from express words, or by plain implication, that they are to be understood in some other sense. Although in the case of executory trusts the courts have in certain cases properly assumed a greater freedom in effectuating what appears to be the general intention of the author of the trusts, than in the case of trusts executed, yet, even in the case

A of trusts executory, an intention must not be imputed by mere uncertain conjecture in contradiction to the express words; and especially where it is manifest that the will was drawn, not by a person who used technical expressions without knowing the meaning of them, but by a person well skilled in the practice of conveyancing. Again, although the courts will frequently alter the position of words and clauses, and put other meanings on them than those which they prima facie import, yet
B this is never to be done to give effect to an unlawful intent, or in any case where such alteration or interpretation is not really necessary: moreover, where a gift is good in itself, but is followed by an unlawful or repugnant condition or qualification in a distinct clause, the gift is upheld, and the condition or qualification, which alone is obnoxious, is rejected.

The first part of the proviso, which in terms purports to cause the cesser
C of the use and estate directed to be limited to the heirs male of Lord Alford, in case of his dying without having acquired the title of Duke or Marquis of Bridgewater, is in the nature of a condition subsequent, and not of a condition precedent. The proviso, when taken as a whole, is not in the nature of a condition precedent. No estate is to arise on its fulfilment; nor is it a conditional limitation properly so called, because, although it purposes to defeat a use or estate, it does not create D a new estate or interest in the room of the use or estate so defeated. Nor is it simply in the nature of a condition subsequent, because it not only defeats one estate or interest, but it proceeds to provide that the property shall go over to the objects of the ulterior limitations. In truth, as a whole, it is what the testator himself designates it, a proviso for the determination of the use directed to be limited to the heirs male of Lord Alford; and it is also a proviso which thereby,
E and by express provision, accelerates the subsequent estates or interests. It is similar in this respect to the proviso in Earl of Scarborough v. Doe d. Savile (8), except that in that case the cesser was of a vested interest, whereas in the present case it is a cesser of a contingent interest. But the first part of the proviso in question is in the precise form of a condition subsequent, penned in the regular technical way, for it is annexed to an estate or interest created by a previous clause
F or previous part of the instrument, and, in the failure of the condition, the use or estate is "to cease"; whereas, if it had been of the nature of a condition precedent, framed in the ordinary technical way, it would have formed a part, and usually and more properly the introductory part, of the clause whereby the estate to which it is annexed would be created; and, on the fulfilment of it, an estate would arise: see per ROLFE, B., in Cooke v. Turner (9), 14 Sim. at p. 503.

G It is also an important circumstance that this proviso is in the precise form of conditions in the same will, which are beyond all dispute conditions subsequent. It is true that no precise technical form or position is essential to render a condition precedent or subsequent. If it can be collected from the will itself, that the testator's intention was that the condition should be a condition precedent, or that it should be a condition subsequent, it is to be so construed, however expressed.
H I refer to the remarks of ASHURST, J., in Hotham v. East India Co. (10), 1 Term Rep. at p. 645, and of LORD KENYON in Porter v. Shephard (11), 6 Term Rep. at p. 668; and the remarks of LORD TALBOT in Robinson v. Comyns (12), Cas. temp. Talb. at p. 166, properly considered, are not inconsistent with this statement. As the condition in question is in the regular form of a condition subsequent, and as it is in the very same form as the other conditions in the same will, which are unquestionably conditions subsequent, the onus of showing that it was intended to be the very opposite of that which on its face it would appear to be—that is, the onus of showing it to be a condition precedent—lies upon those who would put that construction upon it.

I As the use or estate was only to cease or be void in the given event on the death of Lord Alford, before which time it could not vest—as it was to cease and be void before it had ever vested—it has been contended, and the majority of the learned judges have adopted the position, that, by reason of the contingency, the words "cease and be void" can have no correct and appropriate application to the use and estate referred to. It is said that, the use and estate not being vested, it cannot cease and be void, consequently the proviso cannot operate as a cesser or determination; and that, to have any effect, the proviso must be construed as a declaration that the acquisition of the prescribed dignity should operate as a condition precedent to any use or estate arising or vesting, in which case the legality or illegality of such condition precedent is immaterial. It has been assumed to be so clear that the proviso can have no operation as a cesser or determination of the contingent use or estate, that neither from the Bar nor by the judges has any reason, principle, or authority, been mentioned or adduced in support of the point. It appears to me that the learned judges (owing, perhaps, to the little time and opportunity afforded them for research) have mistaken the common and ordinary examples of a rule for an exact and perfect definition of it. I do not deny that the examples, on which those learned persons would seem to have relied, may be in the nature of conditions precedent or subsequent; but I cannot assent to the assumption that they form the limits of the rules by which provisions of such a nature are to be ascertained.

This will, my Lords, is evidently drawn by a skilful draftsman. Numerous contingencies, which might interfere to thwart or disappoint the testator's intentions or wishes, are anticipated and provided for with a degree of ability and professional skill which, if correctly estimated, must induce great caution and mistrust in entertaining an impression or opinion that the draftsman had adopted words which, although of known established technical meaning, were yet senseless and inappropriate in relation to the use and estate of which he was speaking, and were incompetent to produce the legal effect for which he used them; and, in fact, rendered the proviso, as he framed it, incapable of any sensible or legal construction. It seems to me that the expression here used is perfectly correct as applied to the gift or the interest made or created by the limitation. For a contingent gift or interest has an existence, capable, as well as a vested interest or estate, of being made to cease and become void. The vesting has nothing whatever to do with the question; it is perfectly immaterial. In the one case, a contingent gift or interest exists; in the other case, an actual estate exists. The two things are very different; but each exists, and each may properly be made to cease and become void. Indeed, a use, eo nomine, though it be only inceptive, inchoate, or potential, may be properly said to exist, and to cease and become void, as well as a use clothed with the actual seisin, or in other words an actual estate. Who can deny that even a chance may exist, and a chance may be made to cease?

My Lords, it may be admitted it was the object of the proviso, and the intention of the testator, that the use of the estate to the heirs male of Lord Alford should not vest at his death, otherwise than in the event of his having acquired the title of Duke or Marquis of Bridgewater. But, it should be observed, that that object and intention would be equally accomplished by construing the condition, if valid, a condition subsequent. But it seems to be further contended, not only that such was the intention of the testator, but that the effect of the proviso was that, from the very necessity of the case, the use or estate to the heirs male of Lord Alford could not vest at his death otherwise than in the event of his having acquired the title of Duke or Marquis of Bridgewater; and that, therefore, the proviso, coupled with the limitations to which that proviso relates, virtually amounts to two conditions precedent, such as these: "If Lord Alford should acquire the title of Duke or Marquis of Bridgewater, then to his heirs male; but if he should not have acquired that title, then over," which is what is commonly called a contingency with a double aspect—and that, consequently, the proviso, as regards the use to the heirs male of Lord Alford, is in fact a condition precedent, and attended with the incidents of a condition precedent. This reasoning, however, appears to me to be fallacious, and little short of confounding things which are essentially different. For, as the very learned editor of GILBERT ON USES, p. 177, observes:

"The distinction is very refined; but it is certainly well established, that if an

- A estate be limited to A. until B. return from Rome, and after B.'s return to C., the limitation to C. is a good contingent remainder; whereas if the estate is limited to A. for life, with a proviso that if B. return from Rome the estate shall go to C., in this case the limitation to C., although precisely the same as the former in effect, is not a remainder, but what is generally termed a conditional limitation."
- B The very affirmative words which have been constructively supplied in the present case, viz., "if Lord Alford should acquire," etc., are wanting. We have only the negative words, "if he should die without having acquired," etc., which constitute a condition precedent in regard to the acceleration of the posterior uses, but a condition subsequent as regards the prior use to the heirs male of Lord Alford. Take the words as they stand, and then according to their prima facie and technical
- C import, what the testator says is this—not that an estate to the heirs male is to arise on a given contingency, which would be a condition precedent; but that an estate previously directed to be limited to the heirs male should cease on a given contingency, which is a condition subsequent. As little are we authorised, I conceive, to supply the affirmative words above mentioned, as we should be authorised to supply the collateral limitation "until B. shall return from Rome," in the
- D example just given of a conditional limitation by the learned editor of GILBERT ON USES. To do so would be to translate the testator's language into words of a different legal import, and thereby, as I shall presently endeavour to show, defeat instead of effectuating his intention. The mere fact that, if the condition determines the use at all, it must determine it before ever it could vest even in interest, does not show that it was a condition precedent. It may virtually have the effect
- E of a condition precedent in this respect, without being a condition precedent in its form, or of the nature of a condition precedent, and without being attended with the incidents of a condition precedent.
- My Lords, it appears to have been assumed, that, according to the definition, and indeed according to the import of the very term itself, a condition, to be a condition
- F subsequent, must necessarily be a condition to defeat a use or estate subsequently to its having become actually vested, that is, vested in interest at least. It is true, indeed, that ordinarily the use or estate which is defeated by a condition subsequent has become vested before the time when the condition defeats it; and it may be admitted, at least for the sake of argument, that one reason why a condition subsequent was so called, is, that it is a condition which ordinarily defeats a use or estate subsequently to its vesting. But, although this may be one circumstance
- G from which its name may have been derived, yet its nature is not necessarily restricted to the thing from which its name is derived. Although the condition may have received that name because such an operation is ordinarily incidental to it, yet, even if this were the only reason why the condition was entitled a condition subsequent, that fact would not prove that in all cases the use or estate, to be defeated, must be actually vested before the condition operates. But there is another reason
- H why a condition subsequent may have received that name. A condition may be called precedent, when it precedes, and because it precedes, the words of gift; and a condition may be called subsequent when it follows, and because it follows, the words of gift, whether that gift is vested at the time when the condition (which follows it) is to operate or not. Regularly a condition precedent does in form precede, and a condition subsequent does in form follow, the words of gift, and in all cases a condition precedent does, in substance and by construction at least, precede the gift, and a condition subsequent does, in substance and by construction at least, follow the gift; for if the gift is to arise on a condition, such condition must in substance precede the gift; and if the gift is to be defeated, or the use or estate is to cease or determine by the condition, such condition must in substance follow the gift; the gift in the latter case must have an existence antecedent to the operation of the condition which is to defeat it, or cause it to cease or determine.
- I For these reasons, my Lords, it seems to me that no satisfactory grounds have been shown for the position that a condition subsequent can operate only on a vested estate or interest, or that a condition subsequent cannot operate to defeat a use or estate before it can vest, as well as an estate subsequently to its vesting. To get rid of the argument arising from the frame of the condition, it is urged that this is not a case of a trust executed, but of a trust executory—that is, of a trust raised by a direction in the will to make a settlement to uses, or upon trusts which are indicated in such will, but left to be formally declared by the settlement so directed; and it is beyond dispute that this is a case of a trust executory in that sense of the word, and that in the case of a trust executory a court of equity is in the habit of directing the property to be settled in such a mode as will best carry out the testator's intentions: see Jervoise v. Duke of Northumberland (13); Duke of Newcastle v. Countess of Lincoln (14). But admitting all this, the onus still lies on the party contending that this proviso, framed as a regular condition subsequent, is a condition precedent, to show that in reality it was intended to be a condition precedent.

How then is such an intention manifested, or on what grounds is it clearly presumable? I do not perceive any necessary or plain implication, any vehement or strong presumption, any clear or sufficient indication, of such an intention. But I do see what appear to me to be perfectly conclusive grounds, for holding that an intention existed that this should not be a condition precedent. Not only does the testator, or rather the skilful draftsman for him, adopt the frame of a regular condition subsequent, but he designates the provisos embodying that condition, and the other conditions which are unquestionably conditions subsequent, by one general term of "provisoes for the determination of the uses and estates directed to be limited." The true character of those provisos is therefore described in the will itself. But, independently of this, there are very strong grounds for negating the presumption (if any existed from any other circumstances) that this is of the nature of a condition precedent. I conceive that probability, and reasonable and strong, if not vehement, presumption, is all in favour of the construction that this is of the nature of a condition subsequent. The will of the Earl of Bridgewater, although it may not be faultless, is yet admitted evidently to be the production of a gentleman well skilled in the law of property, and in conveyancing practice—and it may, I think, be fairly considered that he knew that the conditions he was instructed to insert were of questionable validity, and that he, therefore, very prudently and properly adopted a course which he knew to be safe with regard to those conditions, by making them conditions subsequent. But whether he knew this or not, one thing is certain, that the insertion of a condition subsequent was safe, whether valid or not while the insertion of a condition precedent would have been most mischievous, and subversive of what we may fairly presume to have been the most important designs of the testator. For, assuming the condition to be bad, it would do no harm if subsequent; whereas, if bad and precedent, it would accomplish the testator's intent as regards the heirs male of Lord Alford; and while the heir male of Lord Alford, though the prior object of the testator's regard, would lose his estate, it would go to those who were only secondary objects of his regard, and be held by them freed and discharged from the condition which in their case is a condition subsequent, and which, therefore, if bad, would be wholly inoperative.

The grounds on which I say that the condition in their case is a condition subsequent are these. The operation of the first branch of the first proviso is made dependent on a single circumstance, viz., the non-acquisition of the title by Lord Alford, during whose life the limitation to the heirs male of his body was necessarily contingent. But as regards the second proviso, relating to the heirs male of C. H. Cust, the operation of that is made dependent on two circumstances, namely, the non-acquisition of the title by C. H. Cust, during whose life the limitation to the heirs male of his body would also be necessarily contingent, and also the non-acquisition of the title, with certain special limitations, by Lord Alford, and which he might have acquired after the death of C. H. Cust, and consequently long after the limitations to his heirs male had become actually vested. The distinction between the first and second provisos in this respect, or at all events the conse-

- A quences of that distinction, as regards the defeating instead of effectuating the general intention of the testator, would seem to have escaped attention. The limitation to the heirs male of C. H. Cust is only contingent on account of the person. It is not contingent by reason of the second proviso relating to the acquisition of the required title. For it is a rule that an interest shall, if it can consistently with other rules of law, be construed to be vested, either in the first instance or as early as may be, rather than contingent; and the second proviso, relating to the acquisition of the required title by Lord Alford or C. H. Cust, does not prevent the application of this rule—for that proviso (as far as regards the words of the cesser) is not only capable of being deemed to be of the nature of a condition subsequent, so as not to interfere with the vesting of the limitation to the heirs male of C. H. Cust on his death; but, so far as regards the words of cesser, it is in the precise technical form and language of a condition subsequent, insomuch that to hold it to be of the nature of a condition precedent would be a gratuitous infringement of the rules of law, both as to the construction of conditions and as to the construing interests to be vested rather than contingent. Hence, if C. H. Cust had died in the lifetime of Lord Alford, the heir male of C. H. Cust would have taken a vested interest under the limitations of uses, and notwithstanding the second proviso. In that case, if Lord Alford had not subsequently acquired the prescribed title, and C. H. Cust had not acquired it before his death in the lifetime of Lord Alford, the second proviso would, as being in the nature of a condition subsequent, defeat such vested interest in the heir male of C. H. Cust, if such second proviso were legal; but if such second proviso were illegal, the property, on the death of Lord Alford, would, by virtue of the first proviso (supposing it to be of the nature of a condition precedent, whether legal or illegal), go over from the heir male of Lord Alford, the primary object of the testator's bounty, and would vest in possession in the heir male of C. H. Cust, the secondary object of the testator's bounty, unaffected by the second proviso, as being of the nature of a condition subsequent and illegal, or by any condition whatever. Thus, if the condition were bad, the only effect of holding it to be a condition precedent would be this—to cause the prior objects of the testator's bounty to lose the estate under an unlawful condition, because the dukedom or marquissate was not acquired by descent, and to give the estate to the secondary objects of the testator's bounty, though they might not possess the title, which it was equally the desire of the testator that they should possess, if they should become the owners of his property. This would be accomplishing a part only of the testator's intention, in such a way as to be utterly subversive of his real intention as a whole. For it can never be supposed that he could wish to take the estate in effect from the prior objects, and give it to the secondary objects of his regard, when the condition would be as unfulfilled by the secondary as by the prior objects.
- I have considered the case as if it had been a question whether the words constituted a condition precedent or a condition subsequent. But I have already intimated that in reality the proviso containing the contingency is neither a condition precedent nor a condition subsequent, but "a proviso of cesser and acceleration." Whatever might be the true decision if this were strictly a question between a condition precedent and a condition subsequent, the case assumes a very clear form when it is considered, as it is in fact, a case of a distinct proviso of cesser and acceleration, even separated (though I need not lay any stress on that circumstance) by an interval of several pages from the limitations of uses.
- I My Lords, the case, thus considered, resolves itself into this short form. First, there are certain limitations of uses; secondly, there is a proviso of cesser and acceleration of some of those uses. The limitations of uses are free from objection. The proviso of cesser and acceleration is alone the subject of objection. If that objection is well founded, if the proviso is invalid, the limitations of the uses remain unaffected by it. The gift being valid in itself, and the proviso which occurs in a subsequent part being alone obnoxious, such proviso must be regarded as struck out of the will. If it be said that the testator would not have inserted those limitations of uses, or would have varied them, if he had known that the proviso of cesser and acceleration was to have no effect given to it, I answer that is a mere conjecture, on which no judge could act. I may here observe, my Lords, that it appears to have been thought that the inoperativeness of a void condition subsequent, or of a provision of the nature of a condition subsequent, depends on the circumstance of its being annexed to a vested interest. But I apprehend that the reason of that inoperativeness is not the repugnance of the law to defeat vested interests, but the repugnance of the law to illegality, and the rule "that no provision (whatever may be its nature), dependent on an illegal event for its operation, shall have any effect."

In concluding this part of the subject I may here remark that the opinions I have expressed, as to the nature and effect of the first proviso, are the conclusions at which I have arrived, treating, as the learned judges were directed to treat, the dispositions in this will as legal limitations. Considering them, as they in fact are, executory trusts, I think the grounds for those conclusions would be still stronger. If I had not been satisfied that the first proviso, so far as regards the words of cesser, is of the nature of a condition subsequent, and that the words "cease and be void" would be capable of having effect given to them, even if this were a trust executed, I should have taken the course suggested by one of the learned judges, Alderson, B., namely, to have submitted to your Lordships the expediency of considering the question as depending on an executory trust.

My Lords, for the opinions of all the learned judges I entertain a most unfeigned respect, and it is a subject of regret with me that those very learned persons have not had more time and better opportunities to form the opinions for which we have had to thank them. I know from experience too well what the duties of a judge are on circuit, not to feel how fully they are entitled to the indulgence with which several of them have begged your Lordships to receive their opinions. But I cannot forbear adding a hope that this case will not be hereafter cited as a precedent for any judge expressing an opinion, unless he is himself present, when there shall unfortunately be a difference of opinion among those learned judges.

On the grounds I have stated, I have come to the conclusions that the proviso is in the nature of a condition subsequent, and will operate as such if legal; but, if it be illegal, it must be rejected, as if it were not contained in the will, and the gift will remain unaffected by it. I have hitherto assumed that the proviso, by which the limitation to the heirs of the body of Lord Alford is restrained from taking effect otherwise than in the event of Lord Alford, during his life, obtaining the title of Duke or Marquis of Bridgewater, is illegal and void; and I now submit to your Lordships the grounds on which I think the correctness of that assumption is established.

In considering the question of the legality of the proviso, and the inexpediency of unnecessary restrictions on the free disposition of property by will, or by any other means known to the law, it cannot be denied that such dispositions are subject to some limits and restraints, and that the law will not uphold such as have a tendency prejudicial to the public weal. Every man is restricted against using his property to the prejudice of others. The principle embodied in the maxim sic utere tuo ut alienum non laedas, applies to the public in at least as full force as to individuals. There are other mixims equally expressive of the principle, nihil quod est inconveniens est licitum, and salus reipublicæ suprema est lex. The principle I conceive to be universal, as governing as well transfers by deed, as the validity of contracts, and dispositions by will. I know of no textbook or case impugning this principle. Confusion occasionally arises from considering cases as establishing a principle, when they are in truth but instances of its application. It must be superfluous in this House to cite authorities to prove the existence of such a general law. It is to be found enunciated in our law books from the earliest times, and by names of the highest authority in the law—by LORD COKE, 1 INST. 206 b; by BRACTON, bk. iii. fol. 100; and in SHEPPARD'S TOUCHSTONE, chap. 6, 132, which I believe is the work of DODDRIDGE, J.; by LORD HARDWICKE, in Earl of Chesterfield v. Janssen (1), 1 Atk. at p. 352; by LORD KENYON and LAWRENCE, J., in Blachford v. Preston (15); and it has been acted on in a great variety of cases, marriage brokerage bonds, restric-

A tions upon trade, the disability of sailors to insure their wages, sale of offices not within any statute, as in Harrington v. Du-Chatel (16), which was a case of security given as a consideration for having procured an office in the King's household; and LORD THURLOW expressed himself to the effect that it was a matter of public policy, similar to marriage brocade bonds, where, though the parties are private, the practice is publicly detrimental, and in cases of wagers respecting the public revenue and numerous other instances. This law has been expressed in different language, but all to the same import, as applying to matters against the liberty of the law, contrary to law, and against the public good. Some criticism has been wasted in relation to the language in which the principle has been expressed. Exceptions have been made to the expression of "public policy"; and it has been confounded with what may be called "political policy," such as whether it is politically wise to have a sinking fund or a paper circulation, or the degree and nature of interference with foreign states, with all which, as applied to the present subject, it has nothing whatever to do. Public policy, in relation to this question, is that principle of the law which holds that no subject can lawfully do that which has a tendency to be injurious to the public, or against the public good, which may be termed, as it sometimes has been, the policy of the law, or public policy in relation to the administration of the law.

D I shall, therefore, assume that a disposition of property by will, equally with a disposition in any other form, which has a tendency injurious to the public interest or good, the law will not uphold; and the law looks not to the probability of public mischief occurring in the particular instance, but to the general tendency of the disposition; and if the law is to be practically applied, it cannot be administered with reference to the character of the individuals to whom the question may relate. E It has been said that this rule is too uncertain and vague to be capable of practical application by judges, on account of the various opinions which may be entertained on the subject of public policy. But I think the remark has no just foundation. There is no uncertainty in the rule that the law will not uphold dispositions of property and contracts which have a tendency prejudicial to the public good. There will be, no doubt, occasionally a difficulty in deciding whether a particular case is F liable to the application of the principle. But there is the same difficulty in regard to the application of many other rules and principles admitted to be established law. The principle itself seems to me to be necessarily incident to every state governed by law. Judges, who are charged with the duty of seeing that dispositions and transactions are not upheld and enforced which are contrary to the spirit of the law, must be presumed to take care not to apply the law to doubtful cases, and G unnecessarily interfere to affect with the transactions which are the subject of judicial investigation. It is true, as I have before said, that remarks have been made on particular cases as calculated to impugn the principle, when the point of doubt has really been whether the circumstances of the particular case brought it within the principle.

H The facts, of which the tendency to affect the public interest is to be determined in this case, are these. A vast estate is given, and the continuance and permanency of the gift is sought to be made to depend on the event of a certain title of peerage being obtained—the object, as declared, being to annex the estate to the title required; and the question is, has the hope of retaining an estate of £80,000 a year, by the acquisition of the title referred to, any tendency to influence the devisee I to a conduct which may be inconsistent with his public duty as a subject, and prejudicial to the public good? This question relates to the tendency of the hope on practical conduct.

My Lords, the materials for arriving at a sound conclusion, on the question must be gathered from a consideration of the political and social state of the country. It will not be necessary to refer to history to ascertain the particular sources of influence by which the grant of peerages may have been obtained, or what change in those sources may happen at any future period—whether those in the year 1668, when Earl of Kingston v. Pierepont (4) occurred, in which £10,000 was bequeathed, to be employed in "all lawful and becoming manner to obtain a dukedom," and which was held to be void, may be identical with those of after-times—because the principle of the constitution is, that the peerage at all times should be conferred with reference only to the character and circumstances of the individual elevated, and that pecuniary or any other influences, apart from those merits, ought not to be exercised or prevail: but the question should be determined by the tendency generally, of the possession of such vast wealth being made dependent on the acquisition of a peerage or elevation to a higher rank in it, to furnish motives calculated to influence the conduct of the devisee, and independently of a sense of duty. The question is not affected by the character, or supposed character, of the individual who may be placed in such circumstances; the general tendency of being placed in such a situation is the point to be considered.

My Lords, in considering the question proposed, I do not think it proper or necessary to introduce the name of the Crown as the fountain of honour, further than to say that, constitutionally, the Crown is under no legal responsibility in relation to the exercise of its prerogatives, and that the Crown is esteemed never to act on its own motion and impulse, but by the advice of those who are held responsible to the public for their due exercise. If the law is to be administered faithfully, the question must be considered with reference to the fact that it is the minister of the day by whom and through whom, in substance, peerages are acquired. Let any one look through the list of creations since the commencement of the reign of George III, and say, if there are not instances (not to say how many) of elevations to the peerage of individuals whose public merits entirely eluded public attention, and whose elevations, whatever those merits might be, could only be ascribed to Parliamentary or political influence. Probably there are few persons with so little regard to their credit as to controvert the fact. With the exception of persons engaged in the public service, and of a very few other persons, has it not been the course for such patents to be conferred on the adherents of the party in power, or Minister of the day? Or have they not frequently resulted from Parliamentary influence? However fortunate each Minister may have been in his turn in the great merits and virtues possessed by his adherents and his party, many not very auspicious persons yet do not doubt that those merits would have gone unrewarded, unless they had been associated with Parliamentary power and influence. The possession of Parliamentary boroughs, and a large expenditure in aiding the election of party associates, have certainly not been unsuccessful in arresting the attention of the Minister of the day to the merits of those adherents who were owners of the boroughs and expenders in elections. Those who affect to doubt on this subject may arrive at satisfaction by ascertaining what proportion of the peerages, within the period I have mentioned, or of the advancement of the old ones, have fallen on individuals not belonging to the party in power at the time of their elevation. Can it be said that, at the present day, no peerages have been acquired by the influence of party and Parliamentary support? Does experience warrant the conclusion, that the devise in question has no tendency to furnish a motive for public conduct independent of duty? My Lords, in considering the effect of the hope of retaining the estate by procuring a higher title, by an existing peer already charged with high duties of a legislative, political, and judicial character, can it be said that it has no tendency to influence him in his public conduct?—or, in case of a commoner, to induce him to create and exercise a Parliamentary influence, and regulate his conduct with views resulting from other considerations than the good of the state? Will it be asserted that motives much less cogent, though equally connected with personal objects, have influenced political conduct on very important occasions. I repeat that what may occur in the particular instance is not the point. It is the general tendency. It has been said that the extent of the fortune should have no influence on the question; which, properly explained, can only mean that the degree or quantum of power to produce the evil referred to is not an ingredient in determining whether the devise has a tendency adverse to the public good. No advantage can result from putting a number of hypothetical cases, which are supposed to have more or

A less analogy to the present. A difference of opinion may prevail in respect of each or of any of the cases, as to their falling within the principle; and to arrive at a correct decision may require as much examination and deliberation as the case in question, and without any advantage to be derived from the result.

The present case must be decided with reference to a general principle, but the particular circumstances of the case are the only safe materials on which to determine whether the case itself is brought within the general principle. I cannot doubt that the testator was too well acquainted with the state of the society of which he was a member, not to know the ordinary means by which individuals of large fortune have been elevated to the peerage, whose situations were very likely to afford the opportunity of performing great public service; and that he never supposed that Lord Alford was in a station likely to have the opportunity of distinguishing himself by the performance of any such public services as would be calculated to ensure the reward of a marquissate or dukedom, however eminent the personal virtues and merits of that individual might be and no doubt were. The means which the testator put within his power would enable him to display a merit quite as probable to procure the desired distinction as public services—that is, the merit of becoming a powerful and influential political and Parliamentary supporter of the minister of the day. Many individuals would hesitate to express a confidence in their political independence and virtue, if such merits were to be followed by a loss of £80,000 a year. My Lords, I entertain the opinion that individuals ought not to be allowed to dispose of their property in any manner which furnishes a motive to conduct in relation to acts of State, independent of a sense of right and duty. I can conceive no good motive to influence such a gift. It is plain that personal regard for the individual is not the only, or even the principal, motive for the gift. I admit the object sought to be attained is not illegal. I also admit that illegal or improper means need not necessarily be used to attain it. But I do not think that the testator could have contemplated any legitimate means by which it could be acquired, and that he could have anticipated the use of no other means than Parliamentary or private influence, obtained through the medium of the means which he should furnish. The views, intentions, or contemplations of the testator in this respect do not, in my opinion, form material ingredients in the question. Giving credit for the purest intentions on the part of the testator, and the highest honour to Lord Alford and his parent peer, I think the tendency of the devise ought to prevent those considerations from influencing the decision; and that that tendency is to induce the individual to apply his wealth to the furtherance of his great object, in a manner which others had found to facilitate the attainment of similar objects, and to political conduct irrespective of the proper motives.

My Lords, Earl of Kingston v. Pierepont (4), has a strong bearing on the present case. In that case £10,000 was given to the Marquis of Dorchester and William Pierepont, to be applied by them in all becoming and lawful manner to procure a dukedom. On a bill being filed to set apart that sum to be applied according to the will, the bequest was held to be illegal and void. It will be observed that the testator sought to guard his bequest, from objection, by directing the application of the £10,000 to be in all becoming and lawful manner. But the court held that no lawful and becoming manner could be discovered in which the £10,000 could be applied to enable him to procure that title. In that case the money was given to be applied to procure the title. In this case the estate is to be retained, if the title is acquired; and it is distinguishable from the case cited, by the omission of any direction that the income to be derived from the estate should be applied to acquire the title. But I think the circumstance that the estate would be lost, if the title should not be acquired, has such a tendency to induce the appropriation of the funds derived from the estate in endeavours to obtain the acquisition, and to influence Lord Alford's conduct as a subject, as to bring the case within the principle of the decision cited.

My Lords, my opinion has been founded on what I firmly believe is the just result of my experience of the present state of the political community which must be subjected to the operation of the proviso in question; and I cannot, when exercising the solemn duty of a judge, deny or reject that experience, in order to adopt a sentimental theory of purity, which, in truth, is not applicable, and as to which I doubt whether it is applicable to any former, or will be applicable to any future, period of the history of this country. In conclusion I have to repeat that I think the dispositions of property being made dependent on matters of state, which furnish motives that have a tendency to affect the conduct of the objects of such dispositions, as subjects, is not a restriction which can be deemed improperly or unnecessarily to interfere with the disposing power which the law has given. The caprice and fancy which may influence individuals, in regard to the disposal of their property, may have abundant scope for exercise, although not allowed to the extent of interfering with the public good. The power to regulate the disposal of property after death ought not to extend to the doing it in a manner tending to the prejudice of the living; and I think that to do it in a manner which furnishes motives for conduct independent of a sense of duty, is a disposal tending to prejudice the living, and is such as the law will not uphold. And, on this ground, I think the proviso by which the limitation to the heirs of the body of Lord Alford is made to depend on the acquisition of the title of Marquis or Duke of Bridgewater, is illegal, and is in the nature of a condition subsequent, and that no effect can by law be given to it; and that, as the will contains a perfect limitation to the heirs of the body of Lord Alford, which character the appellant fills, full effect must be given to such limitation; and, therefore, that the decree which has been made in the cause must be reversed.

LORD ST. LEONARDS.—As it is my fortune to address your Lordships last on this occasion, I shall take care not to go over the same grounds which have been already laid before your Lordships. I may state that I entirely concur in the grounds as stated by my noble and learned friends.

The questions are of great importance in point of law; their importance in that respect exceeds even that which the case derives from the value of this property. The property, I take it, in round numbers may be considered as exceeding in value two millions of money; but the questions of law are not less important. I am sure, in the estimation of your Lordships: and I must say that I for one shall never accede to any representation under any circumstances to hasten, as we have hastened under the peculiar circumstances the decision of this case; for it has led to considerable inconvenience to the learned judges, and has pressed on them in the manner to which they have adverted in their judgment, and which, no doubt, has a tendency to take from the opinions of those learned persons some of the weight to which those opinions are entitled. If I differ in the result at which I arrive from those learned judges, I must be considered to do so with the greatest possible hesitation, and with the greatest deference to opinions of which I know so well the value.

The questions, as has been already stated, are two: one on the nature of the condition itself, whether it be what is called a condition precedent, or a condition subsequent; and the other as to its legality or illegality. I look on it to be of the highest importance to ascertain exactly what is the nature of those limitations, before we consider what the particular provisions of the will are. It seems rather late in the day to refer to first principles; but they lie in a few words, and they appear to me to be essential to the proper understanding of this case. Under the common law, as your Lordships all know, you could not create such estates as are now made, and you could not raise a fee on a fee—you could not have a possibility on a possibility. You were so crippled and confined, that, even if you could only manage to create a determination of an estate by either a conditional limitation or by a condition, the heir-at-law only could take advantage of it—the consequence of which was that you could have no limitations over to a stranger or to other persons, in the way that you now may. When uses were introduced, the law was entirely changed, and you were enabled by means of uses, which were founded originally on trusts, to introduce all those modifications of property which are now

A so well known in the law of this country. It seems, with regard to the opinions of all the learned judges, to be of importance to ascertain what a contingent use is; because they seem to think that that which does not exist cannot be defeated; and that I understand to be the ground of the opinion which they have delivered on this first point.

B In point of fact, a use is a thing simply of confidence. If one man have a legal interest, which of itself is only a creation of the law, the man who has the legal interest may tread with a landlord's tread on the land; he has it only as by force of law. But when you come to the use of a legal estate, which gives a right, the possession of the estate may be in one person, and the use or confidence in another. When, therefore, a man has the use, it is simply that there is a confidence placed in some person, who has the legal estate, to permit the other person to have a usufructuary interest; that is a thing which is simply a creation of the law—it is a thing C which is not tangible—it is a thing simply of confidence. When the Statute of Uses came in and transferred uses into possession, that is, made uses possessions, and gave to the equitable person, to him who had had the benefit, the legal estate, then it was a simple transfer, by force of the statute, of the legal estate, which we call the seisin, to serve those uses. What did the contingent use then become? It D did not alter its character, except in this respect, that the legal estate was carried to it; and so it was made in that sense a possession. Speaking of a vested estate, for example, it was in possession, when before it was a simple use or confidence. But it arises in the same way; although, being coupled with the legal estate, it does not alter its character and quality. It does not alter its character afterwards, because it becomes a legal estate. Instead of the thing being vested simply in E confidence, the legal estate is in another. If you come to a contingent use, there is no variance; the contingency is a thing resting in confidence; and when the time arrives for that contingency to take effect, the statute executes that use or confidence, and gives the legal estate. Why should it not? Before it vests it is a limitation, and it is a limitation of the use. What distinction can there really be in law, as to the operation of defeating a confidence, whether it be a confidence to F allow a person to enjoy an estate for the next ten years, or whether it be a confidence to allow me, if I go to Rome, for example, or if I have a son born within a certain time, to enjoy the estate from that period? In either case it is a confidence. In the one case it is a confidence to be executed at once, and in the other it is a confidence depending on a future event; but equally to be executed, and equally to be served out of the legal estate of the person in whom that estate has G been vested.

On the mere abstract question, can a contingent use be divested or not, before it actually takes place, I should say, why should it not? What is there to prevent you from saying, if a certain event arises, I direct you to stand possessed of that estate on confidence, for A. B. C., and so on? But if a certain other event happen, I then tell you that that confidence is to cease—the trust is to cease, as we call it— H and the use is to cease—the trust ceases and the use ceases. The statute goes with, and operates to give, the seisin to all these uses, and they may all be determined precisely the same as vested estates. That, therefore, is a mere abstract question. I can have no doubt that a contingent use is a confidence—a trust—and therefore is an estate first in equity, and then at law; but which, before the event arises, is just as capable of being defeated by a matter subsequent I as any vested estate in the possession of any person.

The next point, which it will be necessary to ascertain before we come to the discussion of the very point before your Lordships, is, What is the nature of these provisions? I am sorry to differ from my noble and learned friend who spoke second, on that question, because my impression strongly and clearly is, that it is not a case of condition at all. These provisions may properly be called in law conditions, to enable us to judge of these limitations, because contingent limitations—such limitations the law now allows—have been imported into the law from the law of conditions; and, therefore, it is that what might be illegal as a condition may still be illegal as a secondary or shifting trust; and, therefore, that what might be a precedent condition at law before the operation of the Statute of Uses, may still be a contingent gift since that statute. My Lords, I apprehend that it is perfectly clear, with submission to others, that this is not a case of condition at all; but that it is a case of contingent limitations, with a series of shifting or secondary uses limited on those contingent limitations. That relieves this case very much from all the difficulty that has been imported into it in considering these provisos, as if they were strict conditions at common law; for I am content, and must be content, to take the law of conditions as it stood, as a precedent in this matter. I know, by the authorities which have been referred to, that conditions, which were intended to defeat an estate, have defeated an estate, in contingency just as much as a vested estate—that they are odious in law, as it is said by high authorities. In SHEPPARD'S TOUCHSTONE it is said expressly that they must be submitted to a strict construction; that is, you are not to give any favourable construction to a proviso, the object of which is to defeat an estate already created; but that, if that estate is to be defeated, it must be so by clear and express terms, within the limits of the instrument creating it.

So far then, if this be a mere question of contingent limitations, we have to consider what are the limitations on which this estate is to operate. I think one thing is perfectly clear, that we can only collect the intention of this testator from the words which he has used; and that here, as in all other cases, we are bound, if we can, to give the common meaning to every expression which we find on the face of the will. If you find that the expressions are vague—if you find that they are irrelevant, and that they are, as one of the learned judges said, words, and only words—that will not prevent you from getting the substance; but you must be satisfied, before you discard the ordinary meaning of language,—if you do what the majority of the learned judges propose to do in this case, viz., mould the words of this testator—you must be perfectly satisfied that you are called on to mould those words, by taking them in their common and ordinary import as words of science; and you must be satisfied that they do not convey the meaning which the testator had, and to which you by law may give effect.

My Lords, I would first, before I address myself to that point, call your Lordships' attention to the subject of executory trusts. If this could be deemed as an executory trust, that construction would let in many arguments which would strike fatally at the view taken by the majority of the learned judges. But, as I said on a former occasion, when I stated my opinion to your Lordships, this is not a case of an executory trust—and I took particular care to draw the attention of the learned judges to that question, and to state to them that their opinions were not asked on that question. This House did not require the opinions of the learned judges at common law on what was or was not an executory trust—the House had itself better means of deciding that point than fell within the reach of the learned judges. But one of the learned judges, ALDERSON, B., has, although not asked the question, given his opinion that this is an executory trust. I am sorry to differ from that learned judge; but I am clearly of opinion—and as strongly as a man can be on any point—that this is not an executory trust; and I advise your Lordships not to treat it as an executory trust, but to treat this will in all respects as if it had been a series of limitations of the legal estate.

Now, my Lords, with some knowledge of the framing of these instruments, I will take on myself to state to your Lordships, that no legal instrument ever was prepared with a more perfect knowledge of the subject with which the draftsman was dealing, and of the law bearing on the different points, than this will exhibits in every part and portion of it. If the framer has miscarried with regard to the legality of the subsequent condition, he has miscarried in very great company, and he would have no reason, if he were living, to be ashamed of any failure. He certainly has miscarried with very high authorities, to whom the greatest deference must be given. But there is no colour belonging to it of an executory trust, properly so called; all trusts are in a sense executory, because a trust cannot be

A executed except by conveyance, and, therefore, there is something always to be done. But that is not the sense which a court of equity puts upon the term "executory trust." A court of equity considers an executory trust, as distinguished from a trust executing itself, and distinguishes the two in this manner: Has the testator been what is called, and very properly called, his own conveyancer? Has he left it to the court to make out from general expressions what his intention is, or has he so defined that intention, that you have nothing to do but to take that which he has given to you, and to convert them into legal estates. I defy any real property lawyer living to go through this will, and draw a settlement from it, and to alter a single word. I will say of the whole framing of the limitations, they are right from beginning to end. I do not speak now of the legality of the particular proviso, but I am speaking of the framing of the instrument; and I say that no lawyer sitting down to frame that instrument could do it more legally or more effectually than the framer of this will has. I trace the hand of a master in every part of it. There are provisions with regard to vesting the heirlooms; there are provisions with regard to the vesting of chattels; there is a provision respecting his brother's debts, not giving his creditors a right over the fund. In short, in every page, and every part of this will, I see that the framer knew perfectly well what he was about.

If he did know what he was doing, what has he done? He has introduced one of the most perfect series of limitations that it was possible for the law to enable him to introduce. He has given to the testator's heirs of his body this estate in the first instance. His brother was resident abroad, and there are most elaborate provisions in respect of that residue. He gives him a certain interest, and provides for his heirs male; but how does he provide for his heirs male? In the same way in which he provides for the heirs male of other parties. He then makes a provision for Lady Long, who was afterwards Lady Farnborough; and I beg your Lordships' particular attention to these provisions. The learned judges have begun the will a little later; but I hold the further limitations to be of very great importance, as showing what was the true construction of this will.

F By his will he gives an estate, after his wife, in remainder to Lady Long for ninety-nine years; then to trustees in the usual way, in trust, to preserve contingent remainders; and then to her heirs male. There is a proviso afterwards inserted that, in case she has not issue male living at the time when the estate comes into her possession, then the limitation to her shall cease and be void, and the estate shall go as if she died without issue. At the Bar I remember it was argued as if there was some difference of expression in that proviso, as compared with the other provisos; but that is not so. There may be sometimes "determine" in one proviso; sometimes "cease and be void;" in another—equivalent words; but the expression is always the same, either "determine and be void" or "cease and be void"—there is no variance in the expressions. Now, my Lords, just as we are passing, to try the point on which I am about to enter, namely, what is the true construction of those limitations, and what you are to introduce, take that particular case. The words are: "To Lady Long for ninety-nine years, and her heirs male."

H I may as well try the case on the limitations to her as on those to Lord Alford. A limitation, as we all know, to heirs male, is in its nature and from necessity a contingent limitation, because it only refers to the person who shall be the heir male of that devisee at the death of that devisee; but then it has this singular operation as a limitation, that, although it cannot, in the first instance, operate to the first and other sons, and to them in tail male—but that the first son, the person who is heir male at the death of the devisee, takes it as a purchaser; yet, when he does take it as purchaser, it then has all the qualities of a regular limitation, the ancestor not taking a life estate, and the estate goes from one to another in precisely the same way as it would have done if there had been a regular line of limitation. And, my Lords, the framer of this will was perfectly aware of that; for, in the subsequent clauses, with regard to heirlooms, he speaks of the first and other sons taking. Let us try how we are to remodel it, because what the learned judges propose is this : The limitation is of itself contingent, without introducing any single word; and they propose in the other limitations, on which the question properly arises, to introduce from the will new contingencies. They look to the subsequent provisos, and they take from those provisos a particular contingency, and they add that contingency to the contingency which is necessarily created and embodied in the very limitation itself. A

I do not know whether I quite make myself understood by your Lordships; but take this for example: The limitation to Lady Long's heirs male is in itself contingent, because it really is, in point of law, to the person who shall, at her death, answer the character of heir male of her body. If the learned judges were to do with that limitation what they propose to do with the subsequent one, finding that in case Lady Long, when she comes into possession of her estate, being in remainder, have not issue male then living, the whole is to be defeated—they would introduce another contingency, and they would say, if Lady Long has issue male living at her death, or, if Lady Long has issue living at the time that her estates come into possession—and why would they introduce that? Because they say, that the contingent limitation or use of the estate to her issue was a thing that had not arisen, and, therefore, could not be defeated; and, although the conditional proviso is that it shall cease and be void, and the estate go over, they say that it is not possible to give that effect to it—they are words and only words—because, the estate never having arisen to heirs male, it cannot be defeated; but the will made it a precedent condition, that she should have issue male living at the time she came into possession. B C D

Your Lordships will be aware that in the way in which the learned judges look at this point, with the opinions which they have expressed on the second point, it is to them wholly immaterial whether this is a condition precedent, as it is called (and which I will call it also, simply for the sake of following the argument, and not because it is correct), or a condition subsequent. What can it signify, whether you shall introduce the contingency before the limitation, which shall prevent the limitation arising, or you let it take place modo et forma in which it is given, with a positive, clear, and distinct declaration, that on a given event it shall not take place? Suppose it to vest, where is the magic—where is the harm of it vesting? Suppose it to vest in the person who is heir male, let it vest in the person who is so for the time, and it is then divested, what is that? It is a momentary operation. But, my Lords, the law is so benignant in this country, that the law sometimes contradicts itself, in order to preserve estates. The very doctrine (and I beg your Lordships' attention to that) of conditions subsequent, was introduced in favour of men's dispositions, and to save estates which might be avoided by legal conditions from the destruction which awaited them, if the condition were held to be precedent. Therefore, in that view it is of the greatest importance to distinguish the real nature of that which we are dealing with. Take Lady Long's case, because it is so very simple, and because it was to cease on an event which might happen in her own lifetime, viz., that she might not have issue living at the time the estate came into possession; and if you look at the words of the proviso, you will see that the words of the proviso, or limitation, are clear—it is a contingent limitation; but with no other contingency attached to it,—and if you give effect to the will, therefore, in that respect, you must give effect to it as a contingent limitation to arise at the time of her death. Then there is a proviso which defeats it. That proviso is strictly proper in all respects—it is a shifting or secondary use, because it defeats the previous limitation, and introduces a new estate in lieu of it. Therefore, it is what, on the face of the proviso, it purports to be—it is strictly a secondary or shifting use. E F G H I

Why should you not give effect to it according to the words? You are in this dilemma, which, as I think, my Lords, the learned judges have in no respect relieved themselves from, that in this very simple proviso to which I have referred in Lady Long's case, you would have to give to these words a double meaning—that is to say, that, as regards Lady Long's whole interest, it was a condition subse-

A quent, as it is termed, and in regard to the issue a condition precedent. Whereas, if you let this will operate as the framer intended it to operate, so as to let the limitations, if they can, take place according to the manner in which they are given, and then let the other provisoes operate in the way in which they by law can operate, and in the manner in which the framer of the will meant they should operate, and as I am bound to suppose the testator himself meant they should operate, they will be defeated if the events arise, and if the events do not arise they will not be defeated. In this case there is this most important consideration. If you will let the limitations take effect in their course, and according to their order, in the way in which they are pointed out, in this will there are events, and very probable events, in which every one of those uses will take effect, exactly as they are given, and no one by any subsequent event can be defeated. Are you to introduce contingencies in order to defeat those estates? I think, with the greatest submission, that the learned judges have not met the difficulty—at least, the learned judges have not at all relieved my mind from the difficulty; and they introduce a particular contingency.

Let us see, for example, when we are trying that, what the provisions are, and then see whether the learned judges have or have not solved the difficulty which they have themselves created. After this proviso as regards Lady Long's estate, you come to the proviso as to the dignities. The first proviso provides for the two events, and it has been treated as two provisoes. It is only one proviso, and the latter part of that proviso overrides the whole of it. If Lord Alford do not in his lifetime, or within a certain time, obtain the dignity to himself and his heirs male, or if the title of Lord Brownlow descend to him in his lifetime, and he do not within five years obtain a proper grant of the dignity, then and in either of those cases, etc.—that is the proviso. The latter part of it governs both the preceding provisions, and hence it is only one proviso—the estate to him, and to his heirs male, and to trustees, and so on, shall cease and determine; and the estate shall go over as if Lord Alford had died without issue. Just let us consider that for a moment while I pass on. Then the same provision is introduced as regards his next brother, Charles Henry Cust, now Egerton, and with this additional proviso, that, if Lord Alford shall have obtained a remainder which would extend to Charles Henry Cust, then that would introduce an additional case; but supposing it did not, then, and in either of these three cases, the estates in like manner are to go over in the clearest possible manner. Then come what have been properly called the equivalent clauses—and I will show your Lordships presently the operation of those clauses—that if the brother of the testator obtains the grant of a dignity, and that should extend to Lord Alford, for example, then the gift to him shall operate; or if Lord Brownlow himself, after the death of his brother, obtains a dignity, that then the estates of Lord Alford shall operate. We will see presently how that will bear.

Then come two extraordinary clauses—one, that if Lord Brownlow obtain an estate which descends, and which would interfere with the dukedom or marquise, then the limitations are to be void; secondly, if Lord Alford acquire by himself or otherwise an estate, the precedence of which shall not be greater than the marquise of Bridgewater would be, that then the estate shall be void. These are two actually distinct clauses, repeating clauses. I will not stop now to inquire whether they be legal or not. But observe what the learned judges have done; they have taken out of this series of complicated provisions a particular case, namely, that of Lord Alford dying without acquiring the title, and then they introduce one contingency on a contingency, which is necessarily included in the devise, and then they make it thus. [LORD LYNTHURST.—That is only half the devise.] That is only half the devise, but I will show your Lordships what besides. They take that particular case out, and introduce it without warrant of law in my opinion, speaking with great deference to them, but certainly against the intention of the testator and contrary to the frame of this will; they take a particular contingency out, and read it thus, that if Lord Alford should obtain the title of Duke or Marquis of Bridgewater in his lifetime, then to his heirs male at his death.

My Lords, I pressed it on the learned counsel at the Bar at the time, that, in order to sustain that view of the case, you must be prepared to do this—to show how every part of these very provisos can be introduced by way of contingent event, or precedent condition, if you like to call it so, by a contingency which shall prevent the use from arising unless it happens. But to take out that particular case, because the event has happened, is against every construction of law which ought to bind a court of justice. You are not to look at the case as it stands at the moment when you are deciding it, and pick out that particular case, and say, Because this event has happened, therefore, there is such a construction to be put on it. But the true mode of construing men's wills is this. Take the whole instrument, and ask, What were the probable cases which might arise at the time that will was made? What were the probable events which were contemplated by the testator, and provided for? If we are to do this, no man can introduce contingent limitations that will satisfy your Lordships in the way in which the learned judges intend to construe it; for, in order to do this, they must go on and provide for all. There is no reason why you are to take one contingency—we are now speaking of a contingent limitation—and leave out all the rest.

Therefore, the first contingency is, if Lord Alford shall not acquire the title; but then the next contingency is not with a qualification or rather with another contingency, "or if he shall"—it must be, if he shall for five years be Earl of Brownlow without acquiring that title, that goes to qualify and defeat the will. Are you to introduce anything except where it is introduced in the will? Then we come to the other cases, still keeping to Lord Alford; if Lord Brownlow acquired the title, that is a satisfaction, and that is the qualification. Therefore, suppose Lord Alford, for example, not to have acquired the dignity, why, we know perfectly that still his issue male might take under the will. Then you must come to the conditions afterwards, in order for them to operate. Why not take them, therefore, in their regular course and order? Supposing the brother himself to have acquired the title, there is satisfaction again; and then the limitation will take place. But the contingency proposed to be introduced by the learned judges, in order to effectuate the intention of the testator, according to that view of the subject, would require to be qualified, moulded, and explained in a way that no man ever did or could create such a contingency. What was the consequence? Why, that the framer of this will, who was master of his business, drew the will in a perfectly legal manner, so as to meet that; and, I will venture to say, in exactly the manner in which every conveyancer, who is really worthy of the name of a conveyancer (a name for which I can assure your Lordships I have a very great respect) would have drawn that will. I have read over and over again every syllable of this will. I have bestowed on it the greatest attention in my power, and have felt exceedingly anxious about the determination of it, differing as I do from my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack. I do so with great reluctance when I consider that his opinion is supported by so very great a majority of the learned judges; and it really does require a very strong conviction to enable me to recommend your Lordships not to follow the opinions of those learned judges. There is not a single proviso throughout this will that it is not consistent with itself and with every other part of the will; and if you attempt to dislocate it, and to introduce contingencies from it, you produce all the mischief which I have pointed out, and it leads to inextricable confusion. You may, no doubt, pick out a particular case which has happened, and say that it is a contingency; but you are not warranted in doing so in point of law. Therefore on that point I have nothing further to say. My Lords, in this case there has been a little misunderstanding. One learned judge refers to Carwardine v. Carwardine (17) as an authority for importing words into a condition. Your Lordships will find it fully explained in the last edition [3rd Edn.] of GILBERT ON USES, 173, n, that that case does not bear at all on this case:

"A settlement was made to the use of the settler for life—remainder to his

A intended wife for life, except in such cases as should be thereafter excepted for her jointure."

B In a subsequent part of that settlement you find that there was a proviso that, if the settler had issue, that issue should have half the estate, during the life of the wife; and what the Lord Keeper did in that case was this. He introduced that proviso properly where the exception was to her for her lifetime, "except in such cases as should be thereafter excepted." He said: "Very well; I must look to see what is excepted,"—and he took the exception that created a conditional limitation. It was no case of contingency, properly speaking. She had the whole of the estate if there was no issue living; and, if there was issue, then the issue took one half, and she took the other half. That was all that was done in that case.

C My Lords, one of the learned barons (ALDERSON, B.) seems to have imagined that this was a case turning on the difference between a contingent remainder, and an executory devise. I think there is some misapprehension about that. This case involves no consideration of that rule. The very limitation itself is a contingent remainder. We are all aware that it is a contingent remainder, and not an executory devise. The rule is (only we do not want the rule) that a thing is not more or less contingent. The event on which the contingency depends may be more or less probable; but you do not make the contingency more or less contingent. It is contingent; and that is the definition of it. But the event may be much more probable in one case than in another. Is it contingent? It is in point of law. This, therefore, is a contingent remainder; and the only question is whether it is to be defeated by subsequent events, by a proviso which would operate to create a shifting or secondary use. The learned judge introduced that which is under the law a shifting or secondary use, as if it applied primarily to the creation of either a contingent remainder or an executory devise, which it clearly does not.

E One thing I think is quite clear. My noble and learned friend who spoke last stated that, in which I quite agree, that a condition precedent or a condition subsequent can never be fairly varied, or be rendered more or less operative, because a limitation is contingent. It matters not whether the limitation is vested, or whether it is contingent; for the question of condition precedent or condition subsequent, depends on intention; whether the one or the other, whether it be a contingent limitation or whether it be vested, it is wholly indifferent to the operation of that rule. The great question on this will be what I have before stated. If you leave these limitations to operate precisely as they are given, and to be defeated precisely as the testator has provided for their being defeated, every intention which the testator ever had will be carried into effect according to the rules of law, without altering a single word in the will. You will give to the language its natural import; and, moreover, you will give to the language its scientific and legal import; and it would be doing violence to the words to construe them in any other way. I have already, I think, mentioned to your Lordships that it must be wholly indifferent, as to the intention of the testator, whether you prevent the use from arising, or whether you will allow it to vest for a moment, and then to be divested. But I will call your Lordships' attention to the care with which the law provides for the vesting of estates to save estates from being destroyed. There is a remarkable instance in the old books—Plunket v. Holmes (18). There there was a devise to the testator's heir-at-law for life, with remainder over in contingency, and the fee simple descended to the heir-at-law, who was then the tenant for life. Your Lordships are aware that the union of a fee simple in reversion with a life estate would exclude and destroy the contingent remainder. What did the court do when that case arose? It decided that, as the descent was immediate to the heir, there should not be that coalition in law between the reversion and the life estate, which would exclude the contingent remainders, although they admitted the law to be, as it still is, that if the descent of that reversion had not been immediate, but it had descended to a third party, and then from him to the tenant for life, the heir-at-law, the contingent remainders would have been excluded. That, therefore, is an instance in which the law actually entrenches on its own settled rule, in order to save estates from being destroyed. A

My Lords, I have reserved, as regards this question, the authorities by which I want to show your Lordships that, as I apprehend, the opinion delivered by the majority of the learned judges ought not to be the rule of your Lordships' decision; and the cases to which I am about shortly to call your Lordships' attention, you will find to be cases which, if the rule now proposed by the learned judges had been adopted, must have been decided directly in an opposite way. Yet, my Lords, there are no cases better established in law than those to which I shall very shortly call your Lordships' attention. B

My Lords, I will first refer to a case in which the question was whether a proviso should operate, by way of condition, to defeat a legal estate, or whether it should operate so as to form a part of the limitation itself, and so save the estate. It is Page v. Hayward (19). C

"Nicholas Searle, by his will, devised to his niece Mary Bryant and the heirs male of her body, upon condition and provided that she intermarry with and have issue male by one surnamed Searle; and, in default of both conditions, he devised to Elizabeth Bryant in the same manner; and, in default thereof, he devised to George Searle for sixty years, if he so long lived; remainder to the heirs male of the body of the said George and their issue male for ever." D

One of the nieces married a person who was not a Searle, and the question was, what the effect of those limitations was.

"And, by HOLT, C.J., and the whole court, it was adjudged, first, that the estate devised to Mary was a good estate tail; and so was the estate to Elizabeth; but it is a special entail; it is an estate to her and the heirs male of her body begotten by a Searle, which is a middle entail, not the highest nor the least; for it might have been to her and the heirs of her body begotten by J. Searle, which had been more particular; yet this is a good estate tail within the statute de donis, for it is within the reason of the statute. Secondly, the words 'upon condition,' etc., though they are express words of condition, shall be taken to be a limitation; so it is held in other cases. And HOLT, C.J., said, he saw no reason why they might not be so construed in a deed, though the law had not been carried so far; and so the sense is, if she has no issue by a Searle upon her death, the estate shall remain over." E F

In that case, therefore, the condition was so moulded as to form part of the limitation, and so to save the estates, which had been intended to be created by the testator; whereas, according to the opinions which have been now given, I should understand that it would be read as an express condition, which would defeat the estate, instead of allowing it to go as a description of part of the limitation of the estate, so as to save, as far as it might be, the limitations provided for. G

My Lords, there are a great number of cases, which have been decided, where, although actual words of contingency are used, and limitations are introduced by actual words of contingency, yet, from the limitations over, you can come to the conclusion that the testator intended that the devisee, before that contingency had arisen, should take the vested estate. Those cases, therefore, go infinitely beyond that now before your Lordships, because you are here asked, from a proviso providing for a subsequent event, to select a contingency, and to insert it where you do not find it. But the cases to which I now call your Lordships' attention are cases in which there was such a contingency expressed in the clearest words, and yet, entirely on the ground of the intention, that contingency was not, as here, interpolated and inserted without warrant, but that contingency was struck out of the will, and it was not considered as a condition precedent, but as a condition subsequent. H I

The first case is the well-known case of Bromfield v. Crowder (20). There the testator devised to A. for life, and, after her death to B. for life, and, at the decease of the two, he gave all his real estate to C. if he should live to attain twenty-one;

A but, in case he should die before attaining twenty-one, then he gave it over. The court there held, that that last taker took the estate at once from the death of the testator; though he was under twenty-one, he took a vested estate at once, and the gift over was only to take effect in case he died under twenty-one. The learned Chief Justice, in stating the opinion of the court, says :

B "There is nothing in the will to prove that the testator meant the plaintiff not to take a vested estate, unless he survived twenty-one. Indeed, the true sense of the thing is, that the deviser meant him to take it as an immediate devise in himself; but that it was to go over in the event of his dying under twenty-one. It must be admitted that, according to repeated decisions, no precise words are necessary to constitute a condition precedent in wills. They must be construed according to the intention of the parties; and it would be absurd, considering the various circumstances under which wills are made, to require particular terms to express particular meanings. The apparent intention, as collected from the whole will, must always control particular expressions. Now the fairest construction that can be put upon this will, independent of authority, is that the plaintiff took an immediate vested estate on the death of the preceding devisees, with a condition subsequent."

D That case came to your Lordships' House, and the judgment was affirmed; so that there the very contingency was struck out of the will, and a vested estate taken directly, contrary to the very words of the will itself. That was followed by a case, which was very much doubted at the time, Doe d. Hunt v. Moore (21). The only difference between those cases is this—that the former was the case of a gift in remainder, and the latter was a devise at once to J. M. when he attained twenty-one; but, in case he died before twenty-one, then over. And it was held, that there was no distinction in law between the two cases, and that, therefore, the devisee took, although he had not attained twenty-one. The words of contingency are again and again struck out, in order to effectuate the intention of the testator; and that is directly, as it appears to me, opposed to the

That case being deemed not quite satisfactory, the point was brought before your Lordships' House in Phipps v. Akers (22). There the case which was stated to the learned judges was this :

G "The testator, being seised in fee of estates situated in the parish of Wheelock, devised those estates in this manner: he gave those estates to George Holland Akers when and as soon as he should attain the age of twenty-one years; but in case he should die under the age of twenty-one years, without leaving issue, in that case the estates should form part of the residuary estate of the testator, which he gave over to another person; and the question put to the judges was this, what estate George Holland took in the Wheelock estates."

H My noble and learned friend who spoke second doubted whether Doe d. Hunt v. Moore (21) had been properly decided, yet he did not oppose the decision of this House, and that decision was in favour of the judgment of the court below, and that really sets this point at rest. [LORD BROUGHAM.—Where did that case come from?] From the King's Bench.

I There was another case, that of Aislabie v. Rice (23). There was a devise in that case to the wife and her assigns for life, in case she continued single and unmarried, and, after her decease, to such persons as she should appoint by deed or will, and, for want of appointment, over. But in case she should marry in the lifetime of other persons, with their consent, then she was to enjoy the estate for the whole of her life. Your Lordships will see, therefore, that the limitation was to her for her life, if she should so long continue single and unmarried, but with a subsequent proviso that if she married in the lifetime of those persons referred to, with their consent, she should have the estate for the whole of her life. Those persons died, and she married without consent, and the question was, what was the nature of the limitation. It was sent to the Court of Common Pleas and the learned judges gave this opinion: A

"We have heard this case argued, and have considered it. We are of opinion that this condition was a condition subsequent, and that, as the compliance with it was by the death of Alice Hatton, and James Fremoy, and Thomas Lilly, become impossible by the act of God, her estate for life is become absolute; and that she may now execute the power of appointment." B

And that was confirmed. If that had been allowed to operate as a part of the limitation, she would of course have lost the estates; but the court held it to be a condition subsequent, and that, that condition having become impossible by the act of God, the estate was not destroyed or affected, but remained; and your Lordships see, therefore, what has been the care of the courts to prevent estates being defeated by those conditions. C

There is one other case, Gulliver d. Corrie v. Ashby (24). There there was a devise of estates to uses, and there was a condition that the party should take the name and arms; but in the devise over there was a condition: it was by way of proviso. There was a condition that they should not commit waste, and the particular spot wasted was actually devised over. There was a little argument, therefore, on that point, still the testator knew how to devise the estate over when he made it; and the question was, what was the nature of this proviso. LORD MANSFIELD said: "I am of opinion that this is not a condition precedent, and it cannot be complied with"; and he gives the reason why he is of that opinion. It was argued very much, that that portion of the proviso was to be taken in and form part of the limitation, just as the learned judges have recommended your Lordships to take the contingent proviso, and to insert it before the limitation. LORD MANSFIELD was clearly of opinion that this was not warranted by law; and he makes this observation as to the question whether the condition was broken or not: "In such a case (of so silly a condition as this is)," showing that the courts do not look with very great favour upon such conditions, "the court, perhaps, would incline against the rigour of the forfeiture," though a forfeiture had been incurred. F

YATES, J., says (4 Burr. at p. 1942):

"This is certainly not a condition precedent. The question then is whether it be a conditional limitation? I am clearly of opinion it is not. Doubtless it is not an expressed limitation; and an implication of one can only be made in order to effectuate the testator's intention, and must necessarily be an implication to that purpose." G

He then says:

"The court will not make an implication to support an idle intention beneficial to nobody, nor can such an implication be made upon a limitation after estates tail. It cannot, therefore, be considered as a conditional limitation, nor is it a condition subsequent; for it would be nugatory, as Ambrose Saunders might immediately suffer a common recovery and bar the estate. It can only operate as a commendation or desire." H

ASTON, J., says:

"Whether this be a condition or a recommendation, yet the rules of making implications do not hold in the case now before us. The cases cited in support of making the implication are founded upon reasons which do not exist in the present state. I take it to be a condition subsequent, and, as such, barred by the common recovery." I

My Lords, see what another of the learned judges, HEWITT, J., says (ibid. at p. 1943):

"He concluded with saying that this condition, or whatever else it may be called, is not such a limitation as will carry the estate over to the next remainderman, upon breach of the condition enjoined."

- A These cases seem to me clearly to prove what I have stated to your Lordships, that not only is the introduction of the contingency, selected and culled out of the provisoes, not warranted by law, but that the law does, in cases of infinitely more difficulty, actually strike out positive contingency, and give vested estates in order to effect an intention. In like manner, it refuses to take a proviso, the object of which was to impose a condition on the parties, out of its proper place, and to insert
- B it as a part of the limitation, and which would go to defeat the estate. As these cases appear to me quite conclusive on the subject, I have, therefore, come to the conclusion to recommend your Lordships, with my noble and learned friends who have already spoken—and I do so with a perfect conviction in my own mind that such is the law—to hold that this is a condition, if it is to be called a condition, subsequent, and not a condition precedent. I call it so, because it is a short way of
- C expressing it, not because I look on it as conditional.

- My Lords, you must in looking at this part of the case bear in mind the different events that might have arisen. If Lord Bridgewater's brother had obtained the dignity, and it had descended to Lord Alford, everything would have taken place regularly in its course; if Lord Brownlow had obtained the dignity, and it had descended, the same operation would have taken place; and, therefore, in that case they would have taken effect in their natural order, without being in any manner disturbed. The different complications which might take place I have already referred your Lordships to, and I will not repeat them; but looking at the whole of these points, I am bound to say, as a mere real-property lawyer, it is not one on which I can entertain any doubt. I speak with great submission and deference to those who are more competent than myself to give an opinion on it; but I am bound
- E to state my clear and firm conviction and opinion, that there is in no respect any principle of law which authorises your Lordships to treat it as what has been termed a condition precedent.

- That introduces the next question, which has been so largely debated, that I shall be as short as I possibly can on that question. I agree with so much that has fallen from my noble and learned friends, that I shall not attempt to repeat what they
- F have already so ably expressed. But there are some few points to which I wish to draw your Lordships' attention.

- If your Lordships take the case of Earl of Kingston v. Pierepont (4) as it is reported, it would seem to be a case in which the testator had intended by lawful means, as he states, to obtain a dignity. I have been furnished with the copy of an extract from the registrar's book of that case, by which it appears that he meant
- G no such thing—he meant any means, however unlawful, as I will show to your Lordships. What does that case prove? Remember that this was a will of an honourable man openly made, a will that must necessarily be brought forward, made by a person of great family, and made with the view of obtaining the highest dignity that could be obtained from the Crown—yet it did unblushingly, as I will show to your Lordships, provide for the purchase by money of the dignity in
- H question. How was that followed up? A bill in equity was filed by the person who would be entitled to have that money laid out in the purchase of the dignity, to have the trust executed, that is, to have the dignity bought. What conclusion do I draw from that? That at that period such was the corruption of the times, that nobody doubted that a peerage might be bought. But observe for 180 years, that attempt being defeated, nobody has ever attempted to raise the question again,
- I till the Earl of Bridgewater raised it in this case. It has often been said by sages of the law, and I think well said, that it is a good rule never to allow that to be done which has never been accomplished. We have had new-fangled schemes quite enough already; and the attempt at this day to introduce some novel limitation would fail, for you may depend on it that it would contain some seeds of vice which would render it illegal. The wit of man has been tried, and the science of lawyers has come to his aid, to endeavour to make limitations of all sorts and kinds to gratify every possible fancy and caprice; but during the whole of that period there are but two instances, one of which I have mentioned to your Lordships, in which the parties thought they could in a court of justice enforce an actual disposition of money to buy a peerage. And the debate was long, as the registrar's book tells you, before that case was decided; and then this case, for the first time, at the end of upwards of a century and a half, comes before your Lordships. What is the distinction between the cases, in the worst and vilest view of the matter, and looking at the infirmities of human nature? That in the one case it was unblushingly and openly asserted, intended, and expressed; and in the other case, supposing there was any such intention, the means are furnished of accomplishing the very same purpose, and the means furnished with such a pressure on the man to whom these means are given, that it is too much, it is too great a trial of human firmness, or rather I should say of a man's weakness, to expose him to such a temptation; and the law ought to step in to save the man from such a temptation. But what was the object of the Earl of Bridgewater? To annex his estates, as he tells you, to the title of Duke or Marquis of Bridgewater. How did he intend to accomplish it? By giving this immediate vested estate, worth upwards of two millions of money, to a family with influence, possessing already a dignity, and which would only make it necessary, therefore, to obtain a step or two steps in the peerage. And, with such a pressure as that would create, he hoped that it would lead to the acquisition of the dignity. My noble and learned friends have told your Lordships what has been done; and I entirely agree that this case ought to be decided precisely as if it had taken place a century and a half ago. The law moulds itself to the wants and wishes and varying exigencies of mankind, and properly so; but the principles of law do not vary, though they may be modified in their application to new cases as they arise—and the principle of law upon which these cases must be decided is precisely that which ought to have governed your Lordships, if the case had come before you at the time when Earl of Kingston v. Pierepont (4) came before the Court of Chancery—that is, that men are not by pecuniary means (for those are illegal means, given to a party, who has himself so deep an interest in obtaining that which it is the wish of the testator shall be obtained, annexed to the enjoyment of the estates, and for which he has provided the illegal means) men are not to be allowed to hold out inducements which may lead to serious and fatal consequences.

My Lords, I think it important, in a few words, to call your Lordships' attention to what was the real nature of Earl of Kingston v. Pierepont (4), because it shows how necessary it is for your Lordships to be very careful, in any rule laid down, not to encourage dispositions of this nature. He says he appoints, and

"he appropriates £10,000 to be employed by his brother, the Marquis of Dorchester, and William Pierepont, both or either of them, or the heirs male of their family at the time of his death, by all best becoming and lawful means to procure the title of Duke to the present head, and successive heirs male of their name and family, provided the same were effected within the term of one year after the day of his decease."

He thought that the dignity of a dukedom was to be had very readily, and he only allowed twelve months to obtain it, and £10,000. I beg your Lordships' attention to this part of the will, in order to see what the intention of the testator was.

"But if the said sum of £10,000, or what they, concerned in the title, might and should add, could not avail to that mentioned and appointed end, the obtaining of the title," then he gives the £10,000 over. So that he says, If you cannot with that £10,000 obtain the title, my object will not be answered, and I give it over. Then comes this important clause:

"Further declaring, that the said £10,000 or any part of it was not to be nor should not be in the hands of the carriers on account of the designed procurement, but granted and secured to be paid when the wished title was really procured, and satisfactory security given to his executor, and that within a short prefix time it certainly should."

A Your Lordships see, therefore, that he says here that the money is not to be given to the carriers, but it is to be secured well, till the title is actually and positively got. The word "carriers" seems rather to have puzzled some persons; but it admits of a very easy interpretation—it there means the persons who undertake to get the title; and they were not to touch the cash till the ducal coronet descended on the brows of the person there named. A more unblushing and audacious disposition
B never was made by man. That the parties entitled under it should dare to go into a court of equity, and ask for the execution of that trust, does show a state of things sufficient to alarm us; and it ought to operate as a warning not to let in, by the decision of your Lordships now, such dispositions in effect as that which was struck at. There the matter remained up till this moment, and I hope that your Lordships will now, by your judgment, give a final and fatal blow to such highly improper
C dispositions.

My Lords, I cannot help thinking that there is a great deal in the argument addressed at the Bar, as to the embarrassment which such a creation and such a proviso as this would create to the Crown. Constitutionally speaking, I will not on this occasion sever the Crown from its Ministers; but I will consider the Crown acting, in the usual way, by responsible Ministers. Then observe what it is that is
D desired—a particular dignity is pointed out, and particular limitations of that dignity are chalked out; and there is this pressure at least put on the Crown, that a case of compassion is raised. Supposing Lord Alford was an infant when the testator made his will, and he provided for his infancy. Supposing, for example, the estate to have come to the infant Lord Alford, and suppose Lord Brownlow to have died, and the Earldom of Brownlow to have descended to Lord Alford while
E he was an infant, then comes the clause, that if within five years he did not obtain the dignity his estate should go to his heirs male—an estate worth two millions of money. Conceive the pressure that is put on the Crown, the case of compassion which is made out. Will the Crown refuse the dignity to this family? Will it refuse one step more in the peerage (knowing that the consequence of its refusal will be that this vast estate will go from the person for whom it was provided in the F first instance, and, therefore, the object of the testator's bounty be frustrated. I say, my Lords, that it is an indignity, an insult offered to the Crown, that a man shall point out the particular title which he will have, and the particular limitations to be attached to that title—that he shall prohibit a party from taking any other title which should interfere with his views—that he shall insist on what the Crown itself cannot accomplish, namely, as in one of the clauses, that the dignity to be
G taken shall have a certain precedence. The Crown of itself has not the power to do that which this ambitious testator desired to be accomplished. Is the Crown to be placed in that difficulty? Suppose that I were to imagine that two Sovereigns had already been compelled, from this provision, to refuse a step in the peerage to give effect to this instrument, it would be no great stretch of imagination. Yet what can be more painful when you look at the great pressure on the party. It is a dangerous power to be placed in the hands of any man, with a temptation to use it;
H such a temptation is almost irresistible. God forbid that I should say there are not men who could resist it; but the temptation is more than you are justified in laying before a man, and more than you are justified in exposing him to. You are not justified in raising so fearful an issue.

Look for a moment at the case of the five years—Lord Alford might have died an
I infant, and the Earldom of Brownlow might have descended with the dignity not acquired during that time. It is said that this honour is to be acquired by merit, and this was what the testator looked at. But look at the probable case, that while Lord Alford was an infant, Lord Brownlow might have died, and the earldom descended to Lord Alford. Then Lord Alford, being an infant, would have been incapable, of course, of doing any act—he would not have acquired that dignity of Duke or Marquis of Bridgewater by merit; it would have been impossible for him to do so. Then what would have been the position of the Crown. Here is a young nobleman, an earl, to whom this money has been left, as a child wholly guiltless of any neglect whatever, belonging to an ancient stock and a noble family; and the Crown has the means, by giving him only one more step in the peerage, to secure to him an estate of £70,000 a year. My Lords, it is a position in which no subject has a right to place the Crown—no subject has a right to play, if I may so say, with the prerogative of the Crown, or to make the prerogative of the Crown the basis of an arrangement as to his own property. No subject has a right to do so. It ought to come from merit, and from merit alone. Look at the case—suppose Lord Brownlow to die, and Lord Alford to be of age, and that just for the time the earldom descends to Lord Alford—Lord Alford in that case, just come of age, for example, or he might be older, would have five years to acquire the title of duke or marquis. How is any man in this country by fair means to acquire the title of marquis or duke, or any particular title which he chooses to chalk out for himself? If the Crown confers the title, the very first act of the Crown is to select the title. The Crown, out of deference and regard to the subject whom it means to ennoble, may desire to be furnished with certain titles; but the Crown selects the title—the subject is never allowed to select it. He may do so by grace and favour, but the Crown selects the title, though it may select that which the man may wish to have conferred upon him. Now, my Lords, observe what Lord Alford would have to do in five years, let his age be what it would, when the earldom came to him. He must procure a dukedom or marquise, and this particular dukedom or marquise with particular limitations, or the estates are to go over. It is said that the testator meant nothing but merit; what merit in five years could enable any man so to ennoble himself? Is it to be the senate—is it to be in diplomacy, in the army, or the navy, or in the law? How is he to determine where his services are to be given, or his talents exercised, in order to entitle him in five years to the most distinguished mark of favour which the Crown has to bestow upon a subject. It appears clearly to me, therefore, that this is not a question turning upon the grace and favour of the Crown; but it is a vast estate given to a person in order to feed the posthumous vanity of the testator, that he might die in the belief that his estates would once more be annexed to a dukedom or marquise of Bridgewater; and he had furnished the means, and given a temptation to exercise those means, in order to obtain that dignity.

My Lords, there are just a few remarks that I wish to make on public policy. I will not add a word to what has been already said by my noble and learned friends; but I will call your Lordships' attention to what fell from one of the learned judges (CRESWELL, J.) as regards the restraint of trade. That learned judge says, that with regard to the restraint of trade, there is a maxim in common law, and he refers to a case in the YEAR BOOK, 2 Hen. 5, pl. 26, to prove it. But the learned judge forgot to tell your Lordships on what that maxim was founded. Nobody supposes that there was any statute in those times—on what was that maxim founded? Why, on public policy for the good of the realm. It was not good for the realm that men should be prevented from exercising their trades. Now let us see what this particular case is—it lies in a few words, and remarkable consequences have resulted from it. It was an obligation with a condition that if a man did not exercise his craft, say, of a dyer, within a certain town, that is, where he carried on his business, in six months, then the obligation was to be void: on which, HULL, J., said, being uncommonly angry at such a violation of all law, according to the book, "Per Dieu, if he were here, to prison he should go—just as if he had committed an offence against the King," because he had dared to restrain the liberty of the subject. STRANGE, J., says, that "if the defendant had carried on his business for a certain time, say seven days within the time limited by the condition, that would have been enough."

I have referred to this case to draw your Lordships' attention to it. Angry as that learned judge was at that infraction of the law, what has been the result of that very rule, without any statute intervening? That common law, as it is called, has adapted itself on grounds of public policy to a totally different and limited rule, that would guide me at this day, and is just as good a condition as any condition that was

A ever inserted in any arrangement, that was ever the subject of any statute, because a partial restraint created in that way with a particular object is now perfectly legal. Without any exclamation of the judge, and without any danger of prison, any subject of this realm may sue on such a condition as HULL, J., was so very indignant at in that particular case. That shows, therefore, that the rule which the learned judge thought depended on some rule of common law, irrespective of policy, B has been founded on public policy and has been restrained, and limited, and qualified, up to this very hour, and beneficially so, by that very policy which has no bearing at all upon the foundation of the rule.

My Lords, there has been great discussion about distinguishing between wagers and conditions. Certain rules have been laid down by some of the learned judges, and dissented from by other learned judges, which I do not mean to follow. I C mean, particularly in the advice I tender to your Lordships, to guard myself against this. I am acting in that advice on what I consider a great principle of law, and I am advising your Lordships to apply that principle to the particular case before you. I strongly advise your Lordships to follow the example of my predecessors, and not to lay down on this occasion any abstract rules. Let each case be decided on principle. Let each case as it arises be subjected to the consideration of the D judges, and you will find in that case, to take the example of perpetuities, a solid matter of reform will be formed. If you had attempted, at starting, to fix a limit, and to lay down a certain rule which was not to be departed from, you would have done great mischief, and you would never have had the rule of property acted upon which you now enjoy.

One of the learned judges (TALFOURD, J.) refers to, and ALDERSON, B., puts a case E about, the danger of wagers. He puts the case of a wager on the Queen's life; alluding to a wager on the duration of that life being void, he asks whether a lease on the Queen's life would not be good. Why of course it would be good—it has no tendency to mischief—it is rather, generally speaking, meant in honour of the parties whose names are taken. It is only done that the persons who grant leases may, from the dignity of the nominee, know when that life drops; but no mischief F has ever occurred from it. If it had occurred, it would at once have been provided against. But suppose this case. Suppose a devise to one for life, with a proviso that if the Queen was not dead that day six months the estate should cease. Would not that be an illegal proviso? Of course it would be; and your Lordships have shown, by your decision in a case that was decided lately by your Lordships (Dimes v. Grand Junction Canal (Proprietors) (25)), that a judge with the smallest interest, G however small it might be, was incapable of trying a cause—not because anybody supposed that he would be influenced (nobody supposed so), but because the principle is, that a man shall not have an interest in a matter which he is to decide. You must take the general principle; but it is said by the learned judges, Yes, that is a principle of law. No doubt it is: but on what was the principle founded? Does any man doubt that it was founded on public policy? That is an expression H which is well understood. Does any man doubt it? One of the learned judges, who denied that there was public policy in the case of the restraint of trade, is contradicted by another learned judge, PARKE, B., who was of opinion that it was founded on public policy. That learned judge's opinion I considered as containing within itself the opinions of the great majority of the judges.

My Lords, a case was put by one of the learned judges of this sort. He could not I distinguish from a case of this sort that a subject went to the Crown and said: "If the Crown will grant a dignity to such and such a member of my family, I will settle a great estate on that person." The learned judge said that was perfectly legal, and he could not see where the distinction was. I see naturally a very broad line to be drawn between that case and this. It may not be a wise thing to do; and clearly it is not legal. Suppose a great family desire, as often has happened, that the second son should be made a peer, in order to found a separate family. Nothing could be more reasonable, in asking on proper grounds for the favour of the Crown, than to tell the Crown that that dignity would be sustained by a sufficiently ample estate—nothing could be more proper; but there the Crown is not fettered at all. The Crown will accept or reject, just as it thinks the party deserving of its favour or not. That is not the case of a man who has left his property in such a manner that he cannot afterwards remedy or alter it, death having intervened. There is no question of that sort in this case—the man is living, and the Crown does not care how that man shall dispose of his property. The Crown would not grant a dignity merely because an estate was to be attached to it. If it did, every wealthy person in the kingdom would have a dignity conferred on him. That is different from a case of this kind. Here we are dealing with the dispositions of a dead man's property; and we are to consider whether we can or not leave it safely under the rule which he has laid down.

My Lords, one of the learned judges (CROMPTON, J.), in giving his opinion to your Lordships, says: "There is no capricious disposition by which, according to the law of England, a man may not leave his property." I believe, my Lords, that is rather too broadly laid down. It has already been shown in the argument otherwise—that no man can attach any condition to his property which is against the public good. For instance, the case given in the old books, of a man making a condition that his devisee shall not cultivate his arable land. That is void, because it is against the prosperity of the country; and for no other reason. But there are many dispositions that a man may not make of his property: and I will give your Lordships a few instances. A man cannot alter the usual line of descent by a creation of his own. A man cannot give an estate in fee simple to another and the heirs of his body. Why? Because the law has already said how a fee simple estate should descend. There is a case in which he cannot alter it. There is a case in which a capricious disposition is not allowed by law. A man cannot, by law, give an estate to private charity—the law would not execute it—it is so vague. In Townley v. Bedwell (26), LORD ELDON decided against the validity of a gift for maintaining a botanical garden, on the ground that it was stated to be intended for the public benefit. He thought that was too large, and not within the Statute of Uses. A man cannot give his property generally to objects of immorality, or to objects of benevolence; and so I might multiply instances. There are many instances in which the rule admits of exception; but a man cannot indulge in any fanciful disposition of his property which he thinks fit. The law of England, however, does this, which no other law in the world accomplishes; and I hope your Lordships will, in another capacity, take care not to break wantonly and without consideration into that law. The law of England enables you at once to put your estate in settlement, for the very purpose that a man desires to provide for those who are to come after him; and, at the same time, it gives all the power in the world, all the rational power of disposition, which any man could wish to have given him, and which, I believe, no other law in the world accomplishes in so perfect a manner, or so well, as the law of England. But, my Lords, the law of England knows where to step in and to stop any improper or any unwise disposition, such as that before your Lordships. This, therefore, is a case in which that power, so large as it is, which is given by the law of England, ought to be properly restrained.

I wish before I sit down only to draw your Lordships' attention to an authority, and an ancient one—one that has had great influence on the law of England—to show that this doctrine of public policy is authorised, by the greatest authority in the law, to be applied to a subject like that before your Lordships—that is, a testamentary disposition of property: putting aside wagers and putting aside contracts, and involving ourselves in nothing which is not germane to the matter; but taking the actual case of a disposition of property, to see whether public policy is in this country not strictly within the rules of the courts, and to continue to be so according to the decided cases. The case to which I invite your attention is the Duke of Norfolk's Case (27); and your Lordships will recollect that that was the first time in which, by way of trust there had been an attempt to carry over an estate on a contingency to happen in the lifetime. We should be astonished now to hear it stated; but then the question was whether you could limit your estate over on a contingency

A to happen in the lifetime. The three Chief Justices (MONTAGU, NORTH and PEMBERTON) were unanimously of opinion that it was against the law; LORD NOTTINGHAM was of opinion that it was in accordance with the law; and one of the Chief Justices, NORTH, C.J., who afterwards became Lord Keeper, at the re-hearing reversed the decree of LORD NOTTINGHAM. The case was then brought to your Lordships' House, which reversed the Lord Keeper's decree, and affirmed LORD NOTTINGHAM's decree; and they wisely did so.

B But I would now call your Lordships' attention to what the grounds were on which LORD NOTTINGHAM had a right to disagree with what was, at that time, such great authority—the united opinions of the heads of every court in Westminster Hall—all of them men entitled to very great attention, from their individual learning. In that case the opinion of NORTH, C.J., was against the validity. He says

C (3 Cas. in Ch. at p. 20):

"I conceive the rules of law to prevent perpetuities are the policy of the kingdom, and ought to take place in this court as well as in any other court."

So that the Lord Chief Justice, therefore, thought that the policy of the kingdom which was observed in every other court ought to be observed in the Court of Chancery. LORD NOTTINGHAM made this observation (ibid. at p. 33):

D "Pray let us so resolve cases here that they may stand with the reason of mankind, when they are debated abroad. Shall that be reason here that is not reason in any part of the world besides? I would fain know the difference why I may not raise a new springing trust upon the same terms, as well as a new springing term upon the same trust; that is such a chicanery of law as will be

E laughed at all over the Christian world."

Upon a subsequent argument he said (ibid. at p. 48):

"If there be a tendency to a perpetuity, or a visible inconvenience, that shall be void for that reason."

He says again (ibid. at p. 49):

F "No man can say that it doth break any rule of law, unless there be a tendency to perpetuity, or a palpable inconvenience."

He then says (ibid. at p. 51):

G "If, then, this be so, that here is a conveyance made which breaks no rules of law, introduceth no visible inconvenience, savours not of perpetuity, tends to no ill example—why this should be void only because it is a lease for years, there is no sense in that."

Then he was asked what bounds he would put. It was thought he was going to a vast extent in allowing a contingency on a life in being—that must take place on a life in being; and he was asked where he would stop—where were the bounds? and he answered (ibid. at p. 49):

H "You may limit, it seems, upon a contingency to happen in a life. What if it be limited if such a one die without issue within twenty-one years or one hundred years, or while Westminster Hall stands? Where will you stop if you do not stop here? I will tell you where I will stop: I will stop wherever any visible inconvenience doth appear; for the just bounds of a fee simple upon a fee simple are not determined; but the first inconvenience that ariseth upon it will regulate that."

I So that your Lordships will see that that question was precisely germane to this. The question was, by law, how far was the limit of the estate? LORD NOTTINGHAM, against the united opinions of the other three judges, went further than ever had been gone before, and he did it on grounds of public policy. He was asked, "Where will you stop?" and he said: "I will stop wherever I find a visible inconvenience." Succeeding judges have gone on; and now the rule is that you may take a life in being, and twenty-one years after that life; and that clearly shows how sound the principle of LORD NOTTINGHAM was, and how wisely it has been extended. But the judges have had no difficulty in stopping; and why did they stop? Because they found inconvenience. The principle of the law did not allow the tendency to perpetuity; and when a limitation had that tendency, they stopped it. So here. These provisos are the subject of limitation, and you are to construe and mould them, if you can, so as to meet that principle in the law. If you find that they are not capable of being so dealt with, you must strike at the root of them—and on what ground? On the ground of public policy. Why should not grounds of public policy be applied to limitations of this nature, as well as to limitations of another, namely, in perpetuity? The law limits it; it being important that you should not allow vague and vain limitations to be inserted in the will of a testator.

I shall conclude with this one observation. I pray your Lordships to bear in mind, if you permit this mischief now to be introduced, what the bearing of it is, and where it will stop. You might not be able to stop it, because a visible inconvenience came; because, if you permit this when the inconvenience is so visible, you could not stop any other disposition. My Lords, men's minds are prone to embrace precedents, and to invent new-fangled schemes, without the aid of the law. If your Lordships decide this case according to the opinion of the majority of the learned judges, no man is wise enough to know or to say where the mischief will stop, or how far it will go. I ask your Lordships to consider if there were a considerable number, as there might be, and probably would be, of landed proprietors, each attempting to raise a dignity on his own private estate, embarrassing and entangling the Crown, and embarrassing and perhaps leading to mischief the Crown's advisers—how the Crown would deal with the circumstances, and how the law would stand with respect to that which would become a public mischief. Your Lordships ought to strike at this, on the ground—and on the ground alone—that it is necessary for public policy. On these grounds, I have only to advise your Lordships that, on the first point, there is no condition precedent, and that no such words can be imported by law as the learned judges have advised your Lordships to import. On the other point, that the condition subsequent, if it be a condition, is illegal, and therefore void; and consequently the decision of the court below must necessarily be reversed.

LORD CRANWORTH, L.C.—Although I have still the misfortune to retain the opinion which I originally entertained, differing from the opinion which has been expressed by the four noble and learned Lords who have addressed your Lordships, yet I do not feel it inconsistent with my duty or with my respect to your Lordships to state that it is my intention in any detail to give the reasons for that difference, and on these grounds. Four of your Lordships have stated, at very great length, your reasons for thinking that the judgment ought to be reversed. My Lords, without making any distinction such as is made in practice, though not in the theory of the constitution, between those noble Lords who are called Law Lords and other noble Lords, and assuming that all noble Lords might equally give their opinion and vote on this question as on every other, yet I may, I think, assume that no peer would think fit on a question of this sort to give his vote, who has not heard the whole of the arguments. There being only four noble Lords besides myself who have heard the argument, I may assume that your Lordships will only have to decide between the views of those four noble Lords and my own; and, in fact, the four noble and learned Lords who have addressed your Lordships will decide the question. If, however, I had been in the position of either of those noble Lords, I should nevertheless, although differing from them, and though my difference was in some sense useless, have felt myself called on to state in detail the grounds of that difference of opinion. But, inasmuch as this is an appeal from a decree made by myself, and inasmuch as the grounds on which I pronounced that decree are before your Lordships, fully stated in print, being printed from my own manuscript, I do not think it is necessary that I should repeat what is already there stated. Whatever may be the demerits or the errors of that judgment, I am perfectly satisfied that I have not to accuse myself of having come to the conclusion at which I

A have arrived hastily and without the fullest deliberation. I did give to the case my fullest attention, and the result of it is before your Lordships.

I think I know myself well enough to be able to say that, if my opinion had been shaken by the arguments which I have heard, I should have had no hesitation in stating at once that I had changed my opinion; and I should have made that admission the more readily, because the circumstance of the great and I might almost say overwhelming majority of the learned judges who heard the case having concurred in the view which I take, would have relieved me from anything like a sense of false shame, if I had been convinced. It may be that it is difficult to change one's opinion, or it may be from other causes—what the causes are I do not inquire—but I still retain the opinion which I formed at the original hearing of this case, and which is expressed in print as shortly and clearly as I was able to express it.

C Therefore, it is that I do not think it will be either necessary, or, I might almost say, respectful to your Lordships, to read over to you again that which you have already read, or to put in different language that which I have already stated in the best language I could command to convey my meaning; and, therefore, I simply say that I adhere to my original opinion. But there are one or two little points which have fallen partly in the course of the arguments, partly from the opinions

D of the learned judges, and partly from your Lordships in the course of what you have stated today, that do induce me to make one or two observations, and they shall be of a very limited character.

In the first place I certainly felt in the course of the argument, that perhaps I had been wrong in the use of the word "condition." I did not mean to use it in the technical sense of a legal condition. When we speak of common law pleadings, all

E conditions precedent must be averred. It is not strictly a condition, but it expressed my meaning, as I thought, with sufficient accuracy; and I shall continue the use of that expression, though entirely deferring to what has been said, that it is not, strictly speaking, a legal condition. But, call it a contingent limitation, or a contingency, or give it what name you please, I think it is to be governed by the same consideration. Certainly, nothing that I have heard, either in the arguments

F at the Bar or from the four noble Lords who have addressed your Lordships, has at all (I speak with submission and diffidence, because I differ from such high authorities) shaken me in the notion that there is in that sense a condition precedent. It is said that that could not have been the intention of the testator. In my opinion it is not a question of intention at all. Whether a certain course of events operate as a condition precedent or as a condition subsequent is something collateral to the intention, and not dependent upon it at all. My opinion would not have been shaken if

G the will had said, "I mean all this to operate as a condition subsequent." Why? I take it, in deciding whether a condition is subsequent or precedent, what we are to look at is, to see the way in which it is to operate; and if it is something which is to happen one way or the other, before that which is contingent upon it can be decided, that is in the nature of things precedent. Can there be the least doubt in

H the world that the testator meant (I recollect his meaning only from the words of his will) that if, at the death of Lord Alford, he dying in the lifetime of his father, Lord Alford had not obtained a dukedom or marquise, then Lord Alford's son, at his death, should not have the estate. It seems to me, after all that has been said, to be a proposition utterly incontrovertible. To say that it shall operate as a condition subsequent, if it is in the nature of things a condition precedent, seems to me

I confounding that which is the object of the intention, with that which is not the object of the intention.

Let me put this case. Suppose Lord Alford had survived his father and had become Lord Brownlow, and the question of the operation of the contingency, or of the proviso had then come into effect; and suppose in this will the testator had said, after the proviso in that case defeating the estate, "I intend that proviso to operate as a condition precedent," I should have laughed at it—I should have said, "What do you mean by its operating as a condition precedent? It is in its nature a condition subsequent, and, therefore, all the rules that attach upon conditions subsequent will be applicable, although the testator has chosen to call it a condition precedent." I think exactly the same principle applies. No doubt very ingenious arguments have been adduced to show, from the terms of the will, that the testator meant this to operate as a condition subsequent. I cannot believe that any such thought ever crossed the mind of any testator. The testator does consider how his property is to go; but whether it is to go by one rule of law, or by a condition of one character or another, never crosses the mind of any testator; it is something beside the intention. A B

My noble and learned friend who last addressed your Lordships adverted to Phipps v. Akers (22), and many similar cases of that sort. The courts have got over contingencies, and have made violent struggles to get rid of them, and have treated the will as if it were differently worded; and so either they see, or think they see, an intention in the testator which would be defeated by the use of those words in the way he has used them, and they have got over the use of those words in order to carry into effect the intention. But in this case nobody surely can doubt what the intention of the testator was; and if it were a lawful intention, it will be defeated by the course which your Lordships are about to take. Let me ask your Lordships to put the question, whether this is a condition precedent or subsequent, to the test. One of the learned judges (PARKE, B.) in his opinion, adverts to this circumstance, and says that you cannot, in trying this condition, by any suggestion bring it to the test of special pleading, because in actions of ejectment there is no special pleading; but it occurred to me to suggest this case to your Lordships. I will suppose an action of covenant. I do not profess to be a very expert special pleader; but I think this is a matter so much in the substance of the case, that I cannot be wrong in what I am about to suggest. It is a well-known rule that all conditions precedent, using the words in rather a loose sense, must be averred by the plaintiff on his declaration; whereas a condition subsequent, which defeats a previously-acquired right, need not be alluded to by the plaintiff—it must be set forth by the defendant. Let me suppose an action of covenant by A. B. against C. D., and the declaration of the plaintiff to state that C. D., by his deed, under his hand and seal, covenanted with plaintiff that he would pay to J. S. during his life an annuity of £100, and would after decease of J. S. pay to such person as should then be heir male of the body of J. S. a like annuity of £100, by half-yearly payments, the first payment to be made at the end of six calendar months next after the decease of J. S.; provided always, that if J. S. should not in his lifetime acquire the title of Duke of Bridgewater, then the said annuity so payable to the heir male of his body should cease and be void, and that in such case it shall be payable to X. Y. for his life, and after his death to such person as shall be heir male of his body, with a like proviso in case X. Y. shall not acquire the title of Duke of Bridgewater. The declaration, I then assume, shall go on to state that the defendant during the life of J. S. paid him the said amount, as it from time to time became due; that J. S. died on the blank day of blank, leaving J. N., his eldest son and heir male of his body, and though more than three years have elapsed since the death of J. S., and though J. N. is still alive, yet defendant has not paid him the said amount or any part thereof, to the damage, etc. Demurrer by defendant for want of averment that J. S. had, in his lifetime, acquired the title of Duke of Bridgewater. I think it would make no difference if the deed expressly stated that the condition, as to the dukedom, should be taken to be a condition subsequent. Are your Lordships prepared to say that that demurrer would have been a bad demurrer? In a matter of this sort it may be a little dangerous to speak off-hand with very great confidence; but I am strongly of opinion that that would have been a good demurrer. I am not at all inclined to think that it would have been rendered a less good demurrer if the deed had stated that it should operate as a condition subsequent. The question would have been no more affected by the declaration of the intention of the parties, than if they had said "It shall operate as a final recovery," or anything else. The question would have been: "Was it intended that J. N. and the heirs male of his body, at the death of J. S., should take any part of that annuity, unless C D E F G H I

- A J. S. had obtained the dukedom in the lifetime?" In my opinion, it was necessary that that should have been averred. Perhaps it may be said that it is only idem per idem. It is exactly this case; and if it does not illustrate my meaning, I must then only fall back on the reasons I have given in the judgment which is now in print, and leave your Lordships to consider this as not adding at all to the weight of the reasons I there gave. If I were right in that—and I fear your Lordships
- B have come to the conclusion that I was wrong in thinking that it was a condition precedent—the other question substantially does not arise. It might arise in certain contingencies; but I do not think it necessary for me to go into that question. I have stated my grounds for thinking that there was nothing in the nature of the proviso which this House or any court of law could deal with as being put upon grounds of public policy. I shall not repeat the reasons which I have stated.
- C As I have said, this subject is always exceedingly difficult to deal with. LORD NOTTINGHAM thought that a life in being and twenty-one years afterwards was good—he thought that a certain limitation was not bad; but it would be a very dangerous thing now to say that we think it contrary to public policy that I should go on as long as it has been heretofore going on. I do not at all rely on that; because those are matters very difficult to be dealt with. I only wish your Lordships had
- D been called in aid to decide the Thellusson will [Thellusson v. Woodford (28)]; for I protest that, to my mind, whatever inconvenience arises from public policy as applicable to the proviso, I think that public policy was thwarted in a tenfold degree by Thellusson's will. The object of that will was to keep mankind out of the enjoyment of an enormous sum of money, which, according to the calculation of actuaries, might have amounted to ten millions or fifteen millions before anybody should
- E enjoy any part of it, or only a small portion of it, and to keep everybody out of the enjoyment of it for a period of some sixty or seventy years. The court said there was nothing in the law to prevent it; but that it was contrary to public policy is proved by the fact that in the very next year the legislature interfered to prevent anything of the sort happening for the future [Accumulations Act, 1800].
- F My argument, my Lords, is but an additional argument to those I have already stated, which are in print, and which I shall not trouble your Lordships by referring to again. I must make one observation, that, if I have come to an erroneous conclusion, it is an error which I think I have less reason to regret than perhaps could ever have fallen to the lot of any judge who has committed an error; because it was stated to me fairly, when the case was under argument by the learned counsel, that they averred the matter in order to get a decision; but I believe neither party cared
- G which way the decision went. If I had wished for an excuse for indolence, it was tendered to me almost as if they had said, "If your Lordship will just state your impression upon the subject, and make a decree, that will satisfy us; for all we want is a locus standi to go to the House of Lords." I mention this for the purpose of saying that I did not think it consistent with my duty to take that course. I did come, as it turns out from the opinion of the noble and learned Lords, to which I
- H most readily bow, to a wrong conclusion; though I am supported in that conclusion by the great majority of the judges, who also differ from their Lordships' opinion. I can only say that I am extremely glad that the real rights of the parties have now been correctly ascertained: and I shall rejoice in one sense, as much as any of your Lordships can do, that any attempts to make these extraordinary wills will be found not very easy to carry into effect. If I could see what the public policy in such a
- I case was, I should feel as much as any of your Lordships that it is exceedingly to be deprecated, that parties should puzzle mankind, and interfere with the ordinary enjoyment of property, by any contrivances or provisions out of the ordinary course of things.

LORD BROUGHAM.—I entirely agree with my noble and learned friend, and I believe we are all of opinion that the attention he gave to this case was most diligent and entire, and he might very easily have spared himself the trouble of giving that judgment. It was undeniable on all hands, that the case was brought into court with the view of its being ultimately brought to your Lordships' House, A whichever way my noble and learned friend decided it.

Decree reversed.

COLYER v. FINCH

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Cranworth, L.C., and other Peers), July 15, 17, 18, 24, 1856]

[Reported 5 H.L.Cas. 905; 26 L.J.Ch. 65; 28 L.T.O.S. 27;
3 Jur.N.S. 25; 10 E.R. 1159]

Mortgage—Priority—Priority of first mortgagee—Postponement—Title deeds left in possession of mortgagor—Fraud or gross negligence by first mortgagee—“Gross negligence”—Prima facie evidence.

A first mortgagee, having the legal title, is not to be postponed to a subsequent purchaser or mortgagee merely because he has not possessed himself of the title deeds of the mortgaged property. To deprive the first mortgagee of his legal priority the person claiming by title subsequent must satisfy the court that the first mortgagee has been guilty of either fraud or gross negligence but for which he would have had the deeds in his possession. What circumstances will amount to, or be evidence of, gross negligence it is difficult to define, but prima facie a mortgagee who, knowing that his mortgagor has title deeds, omits to call for them, or who omits to make any inquiry on the subject, must be considered to be guilty of such negligence as to make him responsible for frauds which he has thus enabled his mortgagor to commit.

Circumstances in which held that there was no evidence of gross negligence.

H Appeal from an order for foreclosure made by SIR JOHN ROMILLY, M.R., in a suit instituted by the respondent, Edward Finch, against the appellant, Thomas Colyer for the foreclosure of a freehold estate, called "Hook's Place" and "Weavers," and situated at Southfleet, in Kent.

On July 7, 1842, Sir John Kenward Shaw, Bart., being absolutely entitled to the estate in question subject to certain legacies amounting to £6,000 and to an annuity of £200 charged thereon and also upon other property of his and to a term of 100 years for securing such annuity, and being also one of the executors of the will under which he became so entitled, executed a mortgage in fee of the estate to the respondent Finch for securing £3,500 and interest. In that transaction Mr. John Hayward, of Dartford, acted as solicitor both for the mortgagor and the mortgagee. At the same time there were handed over to Finch certain documents which he was led to believe gave to him a complete security, but shortly before the present litigation it transpired that some documents of title which ought to have accompanied the mortgage were not given up to him. On Sept. 23, 1843, the property in mortgage to Finch, with other estates, was conveyed by Shaw to John Hayward, in trust for securing to the latter certain moneys and interest therein mentioned, and without any notice having been therein taken of Finch's security. Between November, 1845, and July, 1846, Mr. Colyer advanced, through Mr. John Hayward, to Sir John Kenward Shaw, £11,000 upon a deposit of certain title-deeds relating to the same estates, with an agreement giving Thomas Colyer an equitable mortgage for that sum and interest. In this transaction no other solicitor appeared to have been employed than John Hayward, and in like manner no notice was given to Colyer of Finch's prior mortgage. On Oct. 11, 1847, Sir John Kenward Shaw conveyed the same estates, with other property, to John Hayward, for further securing the moneys secured by the deed of Sept. 23, 1843 (but in which Finch's money was again not noticed), and for raising, among other sums, the £11,000 so advanced by Thomas Colyer. This deed was prepared by John Hayward, and executed by Shaw without the knowledge of Colyer. Ultimately Colyer became dissatisfied with his security, and insisted upon repayment through the medium of Mr. Ellis, a new solicitor, whom he had consulted.

By a mortgage of date May 20, 1848, John Hayward, with the concurrence of Shaw, Colyer and others, conveyed to William Webb Hayward the property in question, with all the other premises previously conveyed to him by Shaw, discharged from the trusts of the deeds of conveyance to John Hayward of Sept. 23, 1843, and Oct. 11, 1847, as a security to re-transfer certain stock loans of £20,000 and £4,750, and to pay £6,000 sterling to Mr. Thomas Colyer, and in such deed was contained a power of sale to William Webb Hayward, for the general purposes of the trusts of such mortgage security, and among others for raising and paying the legacies, amounting to £6,000. This deed was prepared in the office of Messrs. Essell and William Webb Hayward, solicitors of Rochester, but no notice was given to William Webb Hayward, at the time of the execution thereof by Sir John Kenward Shaw or John Hayward of Finch's first mortgage claim, and out of the loans made under the deed Colyer was paid off his equitable mortgage of £11,000, and executed such deed, and thereby released that claim. On Feb. 15, 1849, William Webb Hayward put up the estates comprised in Finch's security for sale by public auction, entirely without the knowledge of Finch, and on July 17, 1849, the portion thereof called Hook's-place and Weaver's was conveyed to Thomas Colyer as the purchaser thereof, and the title-deeds were concurrently handed over to him. Mr. Colyer's solicitor in this case also was Mr. Ellis.

Finch's mortgage interest having ceased to be paid by John Hayward, who had been accustomed to pay it as Sir John Kenward Shaw's solicitor, it became necessary for him to enforce his rights of foreclosure under his first mortgage charge. On June 1, 1852, accordingly, he filed his bill in the Court of Chancery (which was afterwards amended) against Sir John Kenward Shaw and Mr. Colyer, praying by such bill that an account might be taken of what was due to him, the respondent, Finch, for principal, interest and costs on his mortgage security, and that Shaw and the appellant, Colyer, might be ordered to pay to the respondent what should be so found due to the respondent by a day to be appointed by the court for that purpose, and in default thereof that the appellant might be absolutely barred from all equity of redemption of and in the mortgaged premises, and might be directed to deliver up to the respondent all deeds, documents, muniments of title and writings relating to the mortgaged premises; or, if the court should not direct possession to be given up to the respondent, then that the appellant might be restrained by the order and injunction of the court from setting up or pleading or giving in evidence in any proceedings to be taken at law by the respondent for obtaining possession of the mortgaged premises the term of 100 years created by the indentures of April 9 and 10, 1822. The appellant duly appeared and put in answers to the original and amended bills. Shaw was at the time of filing the bill, and continued, out of the jurisdiction of the court.

On Sept. 28, 1852, the appellant filed his bill in the Court of Chancery, which he afterwards amended) against the respondent, praying that it might be declared by

A the court either that the respondent's mortgage was invalid, or, if not declared invalid, that he was not entitled to priority over the appellant's purchase; and also that, whether such mortgage should be declared valid or invalid, the respondent might be directed to convey to the appellant and his heirs, or as he or they should direct, all such estate (if any) in the farms and premises as might then be vested in the respondent under his mortgage deed, and that, if the mortgage deed should be

B declared invalid, the same might be ordered to be delivered up to be cancelled, and that the respondent might be restrained by the order and injunction of the court from taking any proceedings at law to obtain possession of the farms and premises. The respondent duly appeared and put in answers to the original and amended bills. Replication having been filed, and evidence gone into on both sides, the two causes came on to be heard before the Master of the Rolls who, by his decree, dated

C July 18, 1854, decreed that the appellant's bill should stand dismissed with costs, to be taxed, and that the appellant should pay to the respondent his costs when so taxed, and that an account should be taken of what was due to the respondent for principal and interest on his mortgage security, and for his costs of the first-mentioned suit, such costs to be taxed by the taxing master, and that upon the appellant paying the respondent what should be found due to him for such principal,

D interest and costs, within six months after the chief clerk of the judge to whose court the cause was attached should have made his certificate at such time and place as should be thereby appointed, the respondent should re-convey the mortgaged premises free and clear of and from all incumbrances done by him, or any claiming by, from or under him, and deliver up all deeds and writings in his custody or power relating to the mortgaged premises, upon oath, to the appellant, or as he should appoint; and that in default of the appellant paying to the respondent what should be found due to him for such principal, interest and costs within the time aforesaid, the appellant from thenceforth should be absolutely debarred and foreclosed of and from all right, title, interest and equity of redemption of, in and to the mortgaged premises. Against this order the appellant

July 24, 1856. LORD CRANWORTH, L.C., delivered the following opinion.—The remaining question* for our decision is whether or not Mr. Finch, the mortgagee, put himself in such a situation as to disqualify him from setting up a prior legal title by reason of having improperly left the title-deeds in the hands of Sir John Kenward Shaw, the mortgagor from whom he derived his title. The rule upon this subject is now well settled. A first mortgagee, having the legal title, is not to be postponed to a subsequent purchaser or mortgagee merely because he has not possessed himself of the title-deeds. To deprive the first mortgagee of his legal

G priority the party claiming by title subsequent must satisfy the court that the first mortgagee has been guilty of either fraud or gross negligence but for which he would have had the deeds in his possession. What are the circumstances which will amount to, or be evidence of, gross negligence it is difficult to define beforehand. But I think that prima facie a mortgagee who, knowing that his mortgagor has title-deeds, omits to call for them, or who omits to make any inquiry on the

H subject, must be considered to be guilty of such negligence as to make him responsible for frauds which he has thus enabled his mortgagor to commit.

I

Is that the case here? Finch was a retired tradesman, having a sum of between £3,000 and £4,000 which he was desirous to invest on real security. He was a friend of Mr. Hayward, a solicitor of station and respectability, who was with him an executor of his father's will, a circumstance which no doubt made Hayward aware to a certain extent of the nature of Finch's property. Hayward was also the solicitor of Sir John Kenward Shaw, a neighbouring landed proprietor, and in that character he applied to Finch in June, 1842, to know if he would lend his money on a mortgage of Sir John Kenward Shaw's estates, which he represented truly to be of ample value and to be the absolute property of Sir John Kenward Shaw free from all encumbrances. Finch acceded to the application, and directed Hayward to prepare the necessary deed. The progress of the transaction is described in Finch's affidavit thus: He says:

"About the latter end of the month of June or the beginning of July, 1842, the said John Hayward desired me to be ready with the said £3,500 by the then following July 7, and I accordingly applied to Mr. Frederick Charles Chappel, of 15, Angel Court, in the city of London, stockbroker, to sell for me so much of a sum of £4,076 19s. 3d. new three-and-a-quarter per cents. then standing in my name, as would produce the sum of £3,500 clear, but Mr. Chappell informed me that he could not complete such sale until July 8. On July 8 I went, in the first instance, to the Adelaide Hotel, London Bridge, where I was to meet Mr. Hayward by appointment, and I then saw Mr. Hayward and Sir John Kenward Shaw in conference together. Mr. Hayward then informed me that he had arranged everything with Sir John Kenward Shaw and by his (Hayward's) desire. I then went to the office of Mr. Chappell, and sold £3,517 14s. 3d. portion of the sum of £4,076 19s., which produced, after deducting the brokerage, the sum of £3,500 exactly. Mr. Chappell handed me over the proceeds of the sale in notes of the Bank of England. Immediately I received the £3,500 I went from the office of Mr. Chappell to the Adelaide Hotel, London Bridge, where Mr. Hayward had appointed to meet me. I met Mr. Hayward at the hotel, and he then informed me that Sir John Kenward Shaw had just left, but that he, Mr. Hayward, would see him that evening, and I might leave the money with him. I did, accordingly, then pay to Mr. Hayward the £3,500. On July 11 I received from Mr. Hayward a letter, of which the following is a copy: 'Dear Sir, I was too late for Sir John Shaw on Friday, but I remained in London, and concluded the business yesterday afternoon. I have the papers, and will bring them up the first day I am in London. I did not get away yesterday until half-past six, and I could not manage to get to your house.—Yours very truly, JOHN HAYWARD.' A few days afterwards John Hayward called upon me, and delivered to me the indenture marked A [the mortgage-deed from Sir John Kenward Shaw] together with the several documents now produced and shown to me, marked B, C, D, E and F, and the said paper writing marked G, and he also delivered to me at the same time a parchment writing, which for the reasons hereinafter stated I have not now in my possession, and the nature of which I do not accurately know, but I believe that it was dated somewhere about 1678 and that Brasenose College, Oxford, was one of the parties to it. Mr. Hayward then informed me that the document so delivered to me constituted, with the indenture marked A, a perfect security for my advance, and I implicitly believed that statement. I was then, and am now, totally unacquainted with documents of title to landed property and legal forms, and quite incompetent to form an opinion upon the question whether the documents so delivered to me in fact constituted the title-deeds belonging to the mortgaged premises. Under these circumstances, and having no reason whatever to doubt or question the perfect respectability of Mr. John Hayward, I relied upon the representations made to me by him, and entirely believed that the documents delivered to me, were in truth and fact the title-deeds of the said premises. I never knowingly or wilfully left the title-deeds, or any of them, in the hands or custody of the said defendant Sir John Kenward Shaw."

I ought to have stated, that it was an instruction to Mr. Hayward to prepare a proper mortgage, and he did prepare that indenture accordingly.

- A The result of all this is that Finch obtained a valid legal mortgage, together with certain documents which Hayward represented to him as being, and which Finch believed to be, the muniments of title which made him completely secure. I may state that the documents not obtained by Finch were not material. They consisted of a will of the date of 1760, which was merely an indemnity against certain temporary charges which existed, and copies of subsequent wills. But for the circumstance that Finch employed Hayward as his solicitor, there would be no pretence for saying that there was in this transaction anything like culpable negligence on the part of Finch. He did all that a person in his situation could do. He obtained a valid conveyance, together with documents which the solicitor of the mortgagor, a man of credit and respectability, told him made his security perfect. To hold that he was guilty of gross negligence in not making further inquiry and investigation
- C would be to hold that to accept a mortgage security without taking all the precautions which an experienced conveyancer would suggest may subject the person accepting it to the consequences of fraudulent misconduct, or of negligence so gross as to be tantamount to fraud—a conclusion at variance with all the authorities.

- I may refer to a case which was commented on fully, Evans v. Bicknell (1), where the deeds had got into the hands of the mortgagor, not having been improperly lent by the trustees under the marriage-settlement, but lent under circumstances which the court held did not involve fraud, though it might have been an imprudent act. In Barnett v. Weston (2), a case before SIR WILLIAM GRANT, there was a loan of the deeds in the same way. Farrow v. Rees (3), was a case where the deeds related to settlement property, and several other cases were referred to: Worthington v. Morgan (4); Allen v. Knight (5); and Hewitt v. Loosemore (6).
- E If, then, such would have been the result, supposing Finch not to have employed Hayward in the business, does the circumstance of that employment make any difference? I think not. The only employment was an employment to prepare the deed which was a mere ordinary mortgage in fee from Sir John Kenward Shaw, reciting his uncle's will under which he was tenant in fee-simple of the property mortgaged. There was no investigation of title, Finch relying on Hayward's assurance that Sir John Kenward Shaw was, as in fact he was, seised in fee-simple in possession free from incumbrances. If this assurance had been false, if there had existed prior charges on the property, then there would have arisen the question how far Finch, by employing Hayward to prepare his deed, was affected with notice of these charges. But no such question did or could arise, for no prior charges, in fact, existed and in respect of the handing over of the documents, Hayward was in no respect the agent or solicitor of Finch. Finch in that part of the transaction acted for himself. Hayward acted for Sir John Kenward Shaw, and when Finch accepted from Hayward the copies of the will and other documents as being what was necessary to make him secure, the only question is whether he was bound, in order to relieve himself from the imputation of fraud or gross negligence, to inquire further of the mortgagor or of Hayward as his solicitor? I have already said that I think he was not. The consequence is, that the appellant fails in this part of the case as well as in those which were disposed of last week, and I, consequently, move your Lordships to dismiss the appeal with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

FRESHNEY AND OTHERS v. WELLS AND OTHERS

[COURT OF EXCHEQUER (Pollock, C.B., and Martin, B.), January 27, 1857]

[Reported 1 H. & N. 653; 26 L.J.Ex. 129; 156 E.R. 1363]

Bankruptcy—Property available for distribution—Property in reputed ownership of bankrupt—Goods mortgaged to secure debt—Bankrupt left in possession—Subsequent adjudication—“True owners” of goods—Right of assignees in bankruptcy to set up jus tertii.

H., a trader, assigned his goods except fixtures worth £10 to W. Subsequently, in January, 1855, he assigned by way of mortgage all his goods including the fixtures to the plaintiffs subject to a condition for redemption on payment on demand and a stipulation that he should remain in possession of the goods until default in payment. On May 10, 1855, at noon, H. was adjudicated bankrupt. At 3 p.m. on the same day the plaintiffs demanded payment. Shortly afterwards the assignees in bankruptcy took possession of the goods and obtained an order of sale. In an action against the assignees for conversion, Held: (i) under the mortgage of January, 1855, the plaintiffs were the “true owners” within the meaning of s. 125 of the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849 [repealed: see now Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 38 (c) (2) HALSBURY’S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 321]; the goods were in the “order and disposition” of the bankrupt with their consent, and, therefore, the goods passed to the assignees in bankruptcy save for the £10 worth of fixtures; (ii) the assignees in bankruptcy were not precluded from setting up that the goods were in the order and disposition of the bankrupt with the consent of W., because they were, in a sense, claiming through him, but, on the other hand, they were setting up their own title and were not precluded from pleading a jus tertii.

Notes. The Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849, has been repealed. The provisions of s. 125 of that Act are reproduced in the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 38 (c): see 2 HALSBURY’S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 321.

Rule Nisi obtained by the defendants to enter the verdict or reduce the verdict either to £25 or £11, in an action for conversion of goods, chattels and effects, in which the defendants pleaded Not Guilty and not possessed.

At the trial, before WILLES, J., at Durham Assizes, it appeared that the defendants were the assignees of a bankrupt, named Hagestade. [The assignees were the equivalent of trustees in bankruptcy.] In February, 1844, and again in Octo-

A ber, 1852, the bankrupt mortgaged his furniture, etc., to Ward. These mortgages did not include effects to the value of £25, which were subsequently mortgaged to the plaintiffs. In January, 1855, the bankrupt executed a mortgage to the plaintiffs of all his goods, chattels, fixtures and effects mentioned in the former mortgage, comprising the effects to the value of £25 already mentioned as not covered by the former deed, including fixtures to the value of £10. These were articles screwed
B to the walls. The assignment being absolute in terms, was subject to a proviso for defeasance on condition of payment on demand of a certain sum, with a power of seizure and sale in the event of default of payment on demand; there being also a stipulation that the bankrupt should be at liberty to remain in possession until such default.

On May 9, 1855, the sum of £169 was due from the bankrupt to the plaintiffs
C and on that day he, without their knowledge, filed a declaration of insolvency, on which at about noon on May 10, there was an adjudication of bankruptcy. The plaintiffs, before 3 p.m. on that day, served notice of demand of payment on the bankrupt and immediately afterwards took possession of all the goods on his premises, including the fixtures referred to. Shortly afterwards, on the same day, the assignees, the defendants, seized the goods and subsequently obtained from the D Court of Bankruptcy an order for the sale of the goods, as having been in the order and disposition of the bankrupt. The order recited that it had been shown that the bankrupt was, with the consent of the true owner thereof, possessed of certain goods (specifying them), and that an application had been made by the assignees that the said goods should be sold, and then directed that the same should be sold for the benefit of the creditors. The order, however, did not specify the party
E who was the "true owner," and with whose "consent" the goods had been in the bankrupt's order and disposition. Under this order the goods were disposed of, and it was admitted that there had been a conversion in fact.

It was objected that there was no possession sufficient to maintain the action for conversion, and that the plaintiffs, at all events, could not recover, except as to the goods to the value of £25, not included in the first mortgage, or as to the fixtures
F to the value of £10. On the other side, it was contended that the order for sale was not valid, and that the defendants could not set up Ward's title. WILLES, J., ruled that there was a possession of all the goods sufficient to sustain the action but reserved the points. The verdict accordingly was entered for the plaintiffs for £169, and a rule was obtained by counsel for the defendant to reduce the verdict.

Hugh Hill and Unthank for the plaintiffs showed cause against the rule.—The G assignees claim through the bankrupt, under an assignment by operation of law, and cannot take anything to which the bankrupt was not legally entitled: Jeffries v. Great Western Rail. Co. (2). Hence, they cannot set up Ward's title, unless they show that they have it. The plaintiffs were in possession, and they were deprived of possession by the defendants, the assignees in bankruptcy, on the ground that the goods were Ward's. [MARTIN, B.—They claimed the goods as theirs.] But
H because Ward, being the owner, left them in the bankrupt's order and disposition. [MARTIN, B.—That is not setting up jus tertii: they set up their own title; not Ward's.] They claim through Ward's title. [POLLOCK, C.B.—The case cited only establishes the principle that a defendant on the plea of not possessed, in an action for conversion, may set up that he is the owner, but not merely that some one else
I is, from whom he derives no right or title. Here, the defendants claimed the goods as their own.] It is conceived that the case proceeded on the principle that even a stranger in possession can recover against a wrongdoer. [MARTIN, B.—The defendants here were not in the position of mere wrongdoers, if they claimed and seized goods they were entitled to.] The plaintiffs had a prior possession. [MARTIN, B.—Of an hour or so. That cannot affect the question, if the assignees had a title.] Either they were in the position of wrongdoers, or if they had a colour of title it was only acquired by operation of law through the bankrupt, and they cannot set up a title which he could not set up, however inconsistent with his own prior assignment to Ward. The defendants cannot set up the title of a third party, unless they derive title through him; and here they claim against Ward, not through him. Moreover, the case did not come within the principle of the provision in the bankrupt law, as to goods in the order and disposition of the bankrupt with consent of the true owner. For the possession here by the bankrupt was consistent with the terms of the assignment, which in effect amounted to a lease of the goods: Bradley v. Copley (3) and Fenn v. Bittleston (4). Further, the order [of the Bankruptcy Court] was invalid. It should have specified the "true owner," with whose consent the goods were in the order and disposition of the bankrupt, for otherwise it does not appear that there was any adjudication on his claim: Heslop v. Baker (5) and Quartermaine v. Bittleston (1). The plaintiffs here were not owners until after demand of payment and default on such demand. They must clearly recover as to the goods to the value of £25. At all events, the plaintiffs must recover as to the fixtures, which could not be in the order and disposition of the bankrupt.

Manisty for the defendants supported the rule.—The assignees here do not set up jus tertii. They do not set up Ward's title, but their own; and, on the other hand, they do really derive their own title through or under Ward, and their title is founded on his. But, in truth, they do not require his title at all; they can claim under the deed of 1855. [POLLOCK, C.B.—I agree that Ward's title is not necessary for the assignees; but if it were so, it would not help them.] The order for sale was valid, and the assignees can stand on that without reference to Ward's title. It is admitted, however, that they cannot recover as to the fixtures.

POLLOCK, C.B.—As to the fixtures, they clearly could not come within s. 125 of the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849, as to "goods and chattels" in the order and disposition of the bankrupt. As to the rest of the effects, they were within the order and disposition of the bankrupt with the consent of the true owner and, therefore, the assignees were justified in seizing and selling them, having obtained an order for that purpose.

The question whether, as regards Ward, the goods were in the order and disposition of the bankrupt with the consent of the true owner might be one of nicety. I think that if Ward was the true owner, the assignees, although aware of his title, were entitled to treat the goods as in the order and disposition of the bankrupt. The assignees, as regards the true owners, claim adversely, but yet consistently with and in a certain sense through his title, and had a right to set it up in this action. The defendants, therefore (except as already intimated), are entitled to judgment.

MARTIN, B.—I am of the same opinion. The right of the assignee(s) [trustees in bankruptcy] is governed by the state of things on May 10, the day of the adjudication in bankruptcy. At that time, as between the plaintiff and the assignees, the bankrupt was in possession of certain goods by virtue of a provision in the deed of assignment of Jan. 2, 1855, under which the plaintiffs claim. That deed transferred the property absolutely to them (subject only to a proviso for redemption), and they became the "true owner," and were only to cease to be so on the performance by the bankrupt of a condition subsequent. According to all the principles and analogies of law, the effect was to pass to them, the plaintiffs, the absolute property, subject only to a condition subsequent. The deed, however, contained a stipulation enabling the bankrupt to retain possession of the goods until default, which, however, might be on demand by the plaintiffs of payment at any time. The plaintiffs, therefore, by virtue of the deed were the "true owners" of the goods in question.

Then had the bankrupt at the time of his bankruptcy these goods in his possession, order and disposition as reputed owner, with the consent of the true owner? The deed provides for his having such possession of them. It is one of the terms of the very deed under which the plaintiffs claim. Surely that was a case of that very kind of "reputed ownership" which the bankrupt law contemplates. The effect

A of the law is, that if the true owner of goods and chattels permits another person to have them in his possession as reputed owner he must suffer this consequence, that in case of bankruptcy the goods will pass to the assignees in bankruptcy. As to jus tertii, my opinion was always in conformity with that expressed in Quartermaine v. Bittleston (1), that the order for sale vests the property in the assignees. The assignees, however, set up their own title, and not another's. If it is said

B that Ward was the true owner by virtue of the former deed, still, as the rule of law is, with regard to personal chattels, that a party can only, except by sale in market overt, transfer such title as he possesses, if the assignees could make out a case of reputed ownership as against the true owner, they gave themselves a title as against all the world.

C As to the order for sale I think it was sufficient, and vested the goods in the assignees. It is necessary that the attention of the Commissioners should be directed to particular goods; but it is unnecessary that it should be mentioned in the order who was the party claiming as the owner. It seems to me, therefore, that (except as admitted) the verdict must be entered for the defendants.

Rule absolute to reduce the verdict to £10, the value of the fixtures.

G Criminal Law—Jurisdiction—Offence committed on board British ship—Charge against foreigner—Effect of illegal detention in ship—Trial in court within jurisdiction of which prisoner found.

H A foreigner on board a British ship on the high seas owes obedience to the law of England, and if he commits an offence against that law he is triable by any court of justice in Her Majesty's dominions within the jurisdiction of which he is found to be, provided that that court would have had cognizance of the offence if it had been committed within the limits of its ordinary jurisdiction. It makes no difference whether the offender came on board the British ship voluntarily or was brought and detained there against his will.

Cases Stated for the opinion of the court by CROMPTON, J., and MARTIN, B.

R. v. LOPEZ

The prisoner, Benito Lopez, was tried before CROMPTON, J., at the Exeter Assizes, on an indictment charging him with feloniously wounding George Smith with intent to do him grievous bodily harm, and he was found guilty of unlawfully wounding, and sentenced to two years' imprisonment with hard labour. It was proved at the trial that the prisoner, a foreigner, being a sailor and one of the crew of the British ship Ontario, wounded the prosecutor, also a foreigner, a sailor, and one of the crew of the same ship, while in the ship on the high seas on a voyage from London to the coast of Africa. The learned judge reserved for the consideration of the court the question whether the prisoner was properly convicted of the offence committed on the high seas.

Serjeant Ballantine for the prisoner.

Welsby for the Crown.

R. v. SATTLER

The prisoner, Christian Sattler, was a foreigner. On Nov. 2, 1857, he committed a larceny at St. Ives, in Huntingdonshire, and left England with part of the stolen property for Hamburg. The owner of the property gave information to the London police, and the deceased, who was a detective officer of that force, and an English subject, proceeded to Hamburg, and there, with the assistance of the Hamburg police, arrested the prisoner and brought him against his will on board an English steamer trading between Hamburg and London in order that he might be tried for the larceny. Hamburg was on the River Elbe, sixty miles from the sea, but the tide flowed higher up than the place where the steamer was when the prisoner was taken on board. The steamer left Hamburg on the morning of Nov. 21, the prisoner being in irons, and on Nov. 22, while the steamer was on the high seas, he shot the officer who afterwards died of the wound. If the killing had been by an Englishman in an English county it would have been murder. The deceased held no warrant for the arrest. The question submitted to the court was whether there was any jurisdiction to try the prisoner at the Central Criminal Court. The learned judge also asked for the opinion of the court on the following questions:

A First, was the custody of the prisoner on board the steamer lawful? and was there any distinction as to the times while the steamer was on the River Elbe, and while she was upon the high seas? Secondly, supposing the custody not to have been lawful, was the killing only manslaughter?

Serjeant Ballantyne for the prisoner.

The Solicitor-General (Sir H. S. Keating) for the Crown.

B

LORD CAMPBELL, C.J., delivered the following judgment of the court.—We are all of opinion that both these convictions must be sustained. In R. v. Lopez it was proved that the prisoner, being a foreigner and a sailor, one of the crew of a British ship, maliciously wounded the prosecutor, also a foreigner and one of the crew, while on board the ship on the high seas. We have no doubt that an offence was committed by the prisoner under the circumstances against the law of England, for he was in an English ship and under the protection of the English laws and owed obedience to those laws. It is unnecessary to enter into a consideration of the authorities which have been cited to prove that proposition, which I am glad to find is also the law in America and France. The other question is whether it was within the jurisdiction of the court sitting under the commission for the county of Exeter to try the offence. Upon that we entertain as little doubt. Before the passing of the Merchant Shipping Amendment Act, 1855 [repealed by Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, of which now see s. 686], I think there would have been jurisdiction to try the offence. But we are of opinion that that statute is quite conclusive upon the question. It seems to have been enacted for the purpose of removing any doubt which might by possibility be suggested, for the prisoner is clearly found within the jurisdiction of the court where he was tried. If that offence had been committed within the limits of the court where he was tried, he would have been liable to have been indicted. I think there was clear jurisdiction in the court that sat at Exeter to try the prisoner.

D

With regard to R. v. Satler, I think it is equally clear that, although the prisoner was a foreigner he had committed an offence against the law of England. It is found in the Case that, if the killing had been by an Englishman in an English county, the offence would have been murder. I am of opinion that the prisoner, whether his capture at Hamburg was legal or not, whether his custody on board the steamer was lawful or unlawful, was guilty of an offence against the law of England, for he was in an English ship, which is to be considered as part of the territory of England, and subject to the law of England, and he, therefore, owed obedience to the law of England. He was guilty of murder, for he shot the officer, not with the view of obtaining his liberation, but from revenge and malice prepense. The question is whether the Central Criminal Court had jurisdiction to try him. It was contended that as he had been brought within the jurisdiction against his will, he could not be said to be found there within the meaning of s. 21 of the Act of 1855, but as we said in R. v. Lopez, that statute was passed for the purpose of obviating questions of this kind, and it is quite enough that he was found within the jurisdiction of the court. A man is "found" where he is actually present. The prisoner was found, then, within the jurisdiction of the Central Criminal Court, and we think, therefore, that that court had jurisdiction to try him. It is unnecessary for us to answer the second question put, whether the custody of the prisoner on board the steamer was lawful, and whether there is any distinction as to the times while the steamer was on the River Elbe and while she was on the high seas, for the prisoner did not commit the crime with the view of liberating himself, but from malice prepense. Were it needful to decide it, some distinction might possibly be taken between the state of affairs in the River Elbe and on the high seas. Thirdly, it is asked, supposing the custody not to have been lawful, was the killing only manslaughter?—that must mean, was it necessarily only manslaughter? We have no hesitation in saying that, notwithstanding the custody had been illegal, as the act was done of malice prepense, the offence was murder.

G

EARL NELSON v. LORD BRIDPORT AND OTHERS

[ROLLS COURT (Lord Langdale, M.R.), July 4, 5, 7, 9, 10, November 4, 1845]

[Reported 8 Beav. 527; 8 L.T.O.S. 18; 10 Jur. 871; 50 E.R. 207]

Evidence—Foreign law—Proof as matter of fact—Evidence of qualified and experienced witnesses—Testimony as to terms of foreign law and interpretation of those terms—Reference by witnesses to laws and treatises.

No knowledge of foreign law is to be imputed to a judge of English law sitting in a court of English jurisdiction. Foreign law and its application, like other matters of which no knowledge is to be imputed to the judge, must be proved, as facts are proved, by appropriate evidence, i.e., by properly qualified witnesses, or by witnesses who can state from their own knowledge and experience, gained by study and practice, not only what are the words in which the law is expressed, but also what is the proper interpretation of those words and their legal meaning and effect as applied to the case in question. Witnesses, in giving their testimony, may refer to laws or to treatises to aid their memory and assist them in the subject of their examinations, but in general it is the testimony of the witness, and not the authority of the law or the text writer, detached from the testimony of the witness, which is to influence the judge.

Per LORD LANGDALE, M.R.: There may be cases in which the judge may, without impropriety, take on himself, to some extent, to construe the words of a foreign law and determine their application to the case in question, especially if there should be a variance or want of clearness in the testimony of the witnesses.

Action by the plaintiff, grandson of Susanna, the sister of the first Lord Nelson, against Lord and Lady Bridport and others, for the recovery of the estate of Bronte in Sicily, granted to the first Lord Nelson by the sovereign of that country.

Lord Nelson's title was (in the event of his dying without issue), limited to his father and the heirs male of his body, and then to his sister Susanna Bolton, and next to his sister Mrs. Matcham. The estate of Bronte was given him with a power of nominating a successor, and by his will he directed that it should go as far

- A as possible along with the title. After his death without issue his elder and only brother William succeeded to the title and estates and he, the King of Sicily, having in the year 1818 abolished feudal tenures, destroyed the entail and by his will left Bronte to his daughter, Lady Bridport. The title then went to Thomas, the son of Mrs. Bolton, upon whose death the plaintiff, his eldest son, succeeded. The object of the present suit was to ascertain the rights of the plaintiff who claimed
- B adversely to Lady Bridport on the ground that it was not competent to Earl William to bar the entail.

Tinney, Gardner and R. Palmer for the plaintiff.

Lewin for the executors of Earl Thomas.

Turner and Bowyer for Lord and Lady Bridport.

Hodgson for other defendants.

Cur. adv. vult.

- C Nov. 4, 1845. LORD LANGDALE, M.R., read the following judgment.—This case was heard on exceptions to the Master's report under a decree whereby it was referred to him to make various inquiries as to the effect of the law of Sicily on several points which were thought to be important in the consideration of the claims of the several parties to the cause.
- D In the year 1842 the statements of the facts were carried in to the Master's office, and the parties were at liberty to examine their witnesses. The plaintiff having stated his case in a manner of which no substantial complaint has been made, procured the joint opinion of Ruggiero and Cacace, two Sicilian lawyers, on several questions proposed to them. Ruggiero and Cacace were examined in the examiner's office on a Case, their joint opinion was produced to them severally, and each of
- E them stated he had deliberately and with much reflection considered the context and the opinion was the joint opinion of himself and the other witness—it was given bona fide and conscientiously according to the best of his experienced judgment and ability, and was, as far as he knew or believed, in accordance with the law of Sicily. A commission was issued to examine witnesses in Sicily, and under that commission the plaintiff and the defendants, Lord and Lady Bridport, respectively
- F examined several Sicilian lawyers and witnesses; and in 1844, the depositions having been published, the parties carried in their further statements of facts and charges. The plaintiff's further statement and charge were left on Mar. 19, and amended on June 26, 1844.

- In this statement of facts the plaintiff submitted to the consideration of the Master various writings and books, of which he set forth a list intituled "Documentary evidence." That list comprised the Case and joint opinion to which I have referred, and several printed books, which, according to the description of the plaintiff's witness, Viola, consist partly of compilations of the Roman feudal law, the common feudal law of Europe, and the ancient and modern law of Sicily, and partly of treatises on the ancient feudal law, the same witness describing them as being, to the best of his knowledge and belief, all of them genuine publications
- G such as they purported to be, and held in estimation by the judges and other members of the legal profession in Sicily. He says that such of them as contain compilations of laws are commonly received as evidence by the courts of law in Sicily of the text of the law which they respectively purport to set out, and such of them as are treatises are often referred to as useful commentaries on the law, and are considered to contain authoritative explanations of the law. For the
- H laudable purpose, as it would seem, of relieving the subject from the vagueness of this general testimony, and showing what particular parts or passages of those voluminous works were intended to be referred to, an exhibit marked "Z" was produced to the witness. It contains a list of the books which had been referred to by the witness, with references to particular passages specifically marked by pages or other appropriate indications, and the witness stated that the law which he had quoted would be found at the pages specified in the exhibit, and that at each of the places or passages set forth in the exhibit would be found an authority or confirmatory opinion in support of the answer he had given.
- I

The defendants, Lord and Lady Bridport, carried in their further statement of facts and charges on Mar. 27, 1844, and they also submitted to the consideration of the Master the depositions of their witnesses and certain documentary evidence, including certain Sicilian laws and decrees dated in the year 1818, and also the civil code of laws of the Two Sicilies. The witnesses for the defendants, Lord and Lady Bridport, in their depositions referred to several law books which they do not produce or authenticate, but, as it would seem, assuming them to be genuine and authentic books, they refer to them with more or less particularity, sometimes stating the law, and then adding to the statement a mere reference to the books, sometimes stating the law to be as appearing in the books, and sometimes setting forth extracts or passages from the books. Among the books referred to by the witnesses of the defendants, Lord and Lady Bridport, are some which are not mentioned by the plaintiff's witness Viola, or in the exhibit "Z" produced to him, in particular, certain works or publications of ROSENTHAL, CATELLI, MILLANENSIS, and ROCHETTI. A B C

The plaintiff afterwards carried in two further statements. On June 7 he carried in a statement of that which he called his "Documentary evidence," as adduced on his behalf. This further statement contains at length the Case and opinion upon which Ruggiero and Cacace were examined, and several extracts or passages from many of the books specified in the exhibit "Z." I think that the further statement does not contain all the passages, or even mention all the books specified in the exhibit "Z"; but it does contain several passages purporting or alleged to be contained in books which are contained in the exhibit "Z," although such passages are not therein specifically referred to. Thus it contains an annotation of YSCRUIR, upon the CONSTITUTIO DIRAE MEMORIAE, two acts from the books of feuds, and several passages from STRUVIUS, CANNETIUS, INTRIGLIOBUS, GUIRBA, GASTONE, and DE NEAPOLI, which annotations, titles, and passages are some of them specified in the exhibit "Z," although the books from which the same passages purport to be taken are therein specified. On June 10, 1844, he carried in a further statement, as to the feudal common-law text writers, and Sicilian civil law text writers and reporters of Sicilian decisions, stated or referred to in the depositions of the witnesses of Lord and Lady Bridport, as authorities for them. This statement contains extracts from the books of ROSENTHAL, CATELLI, MILLANENSIS, and ROCHETTI; and those extracts were submitted to the consideration of the Master as qualifying, explaining, correcting, or contradicting the effect of the passages from the same books which were referred to or cited by the witnesses of Lord and Lady Bridport. At the close of the statement the plaintiff insists on his right to refer to or make use of all works or authorities, or, as I understand it, any passages from any works or authorities cited for the defendants, Lord and Lady Bridport, which he, the plaintiff, has not used in that statement. D E F G

The question has been raised as to the admissibility of the evidence. It appears that the Master admitted various books, which were produced to him as evidence of the written laws of Sicily, to be read before him as such, and also various extracts or passages from every text writer which was cited by the plaintiff in his statement of facts, and referred to by the exhibit "Z." On these points the defendants, Lord and Lady Bridport, have filed no exceptions, and upon them, therefore, there is no controversy upon this occasion. But the Master refused to admit as evidence the Case or the joint opinion of Ruggiero and Cacace, and so much of the depositions of Ruggiero and Cacace as related thereto. He also refused to admit as evidence any passage from the books exhibited by the plaintiff which were not cited by the witnesses examined by the plaintiff, and especially referred to in the exhibit "Z." He did receive as evidence for the defendants, Lord and Lady Bridport, the depositions of witnesses who referred to certain books which were not then produced and he refused to receive as evidence other extracts from the same books which were tendered on behalf of the plaintiff. On the evidence as it was constituted after such admissions and refusals, the Master made his report, dated Dec. 17, 1844. H I

A To this report the plaintiff and some of the defendants have taken several exceptions. The first seven of the plaintiff's exceptions and the first five of the exceptions of the excepting defendants relate to the reception and rejection of evidence, and are the subject of our present consideration. For some reason not appearing, the subjects of the exceptions are arranged in an order different from that in which the Master's findings are placed in his report; but taking them in the order adopted

B in the exceptions, and avoiding the complication of the exceptions which perhaps could not be avoided in framing them, it is in substance alleged by the plaintiff as follows: (i), that the Master ought not to have received the depositions of the witnesses of the defendants, Lord and Lady Bridport, without the production of the laws and treatises therein referred to; (ii), the Master ought to have permitted the plaintiff to read passages from books cited by the witnesses of the defendants,

C Lord and Lady Bridport, although such passages were not cited by the plaintiff's witness, Viola, or specified in the exhibit "Z."; (iii), the Master ought to have permitted the plaintiff to read from books cited by the witnesses for the defendants, Lord and Lady Bridport, such passages as were specifically distinguished in the affidavit of Mr. Hugh Jackson, containing references to the original text; (iv), the Master ought to have permitted the plaintiff to read from books cited by the

D witnesses of the defendants, Lord and Lady Bridport, such particular passages as were purported to be extracted or set forth in the depositions of the witnesses of the defendants, Lord and Lady Bridport; (v), the plaintiff alleges that the Master ought to have permitted the plaintiff to read from his own exhibits passages which support or authorise the depositions of his own witnesses, though not cited by them or specifically referred to in the exhibit "Z.;" (vi), he alleges that the Master ought

E to have permitted the plaintiff to read such exhibits and the English translations of parts thereof containing references to, and specifically designating parts of, the original text of such laws and treatises; and, (vii), the plaintiff and the excepting defendants allege the Master ought to have received as evidence the joint opinions of Ruggiero and Cacace. The first four exceptions relate to the manner in which the Master has dealt with the evidence of Lord and Lady Bridport, and

F three others the manner in which he has dealt with the evidence of the plaintiff.

The questions which arise are to be considered with reference to the manner in which foreign law ought to be dealt with in an English court of justice. With foreign laws an English judge cannot be familiar; there are many of which he must be totally ignorant. There is in every case of foreign law an absence of all the accumulated knowledge and ready associations which assist him in the consideration of that which is the English law, and the manner in which it ought to be

G applied in a given state of circumstances to which it is applicable. He is not only without the usual assistance afforded by the accumulated knowledge and able suggestions contained in the arguments which are addressed to him, but he is constantly liable to be misled by the erroneous suggestions of analogies which arise in his own mind and are pressed on him on all sides. Those difficulties are

H obvious enough even in cases in which he may have before him the very words of that which is proved to have been the law applicable to the events in question. Even if he suppose it to be proved that the law has not been legislatively repealed or varied and has not fallen into disuse in the country in which it was in force, and that the words have been accurately translated, still the words require a due construction, and the construction depends on the meaning of words to be con-

I sidered with reference to other words not contained in the mere text of the law, and also with reference to the subject-matter, which is not insulated from all others. The construction may have been, and probably has been, the subject of judicial decision; instead of one decision, there may have been a long succession of decisions, varying more or less from each other, and ultimately ending in that which alone ought to be applied to the particular case.

The difficulty which arises under such circumstances is obviously very great, but it is vastly increased when the law itself, or the words in which the law is expressed, has never been authoritatively declared, when that which is alleged to be the law is to be discovered from decisions or usages, or from the opinions of unauthorised writers, who may have written much which is acknowledged to be existing law, and may also, in the very same books, have written much which is contrary to the existing law. The decisions were subjects of appeal and may have been altered by subsequent decisions, and the precise application of them to the case in question may only be ascertainable by means of an accurate historical and legal deduction from all that has passed in the courts on the subject, and a judge who seeks information as to foreign law, has not in himself the means of distinguishing the correct from the incorrect propositions of the text writers. Whoever has considered the nature of the difficulties which frequently arise in our own courts in the investigation of English law applicable to particular cases, and the mode of reasoning and investigation by which it is endeavoured to surmount those difficulties, will easily perceive what presumption it would often, nay, generally, be in an English judge to attempt to apply the same process to the investigation of foreign law and its proper application in particular cases. A B C

The rule of English law, that no knowledge of foreign law is to be imputed to a judge of English law sitting in a court of English jurisdiction is, undoubtedly, well founded, and as cases arise in which the rights of parties litigating in English courts cannot be determined without ascertaining, to some extent, what is the foreign law applicable to such cases, the foreign law and its application, like any other result of knowledge and experience, on matters of which no knowledge is imputed to the judge, must be proved, as facts are proved, by appropriate evidence, i.e., by properly qualified witnesses, or by witnesses who can state from their own knowledge and experience, gained by study and practice, not only what are the words in which the law is expressed, but also what is the proper interpretation of those words and the legal meaning and effect of them as applied to the case in question. Such, I conceive, to be the general rule, but the cases to which it is applicable admit of very great variety. D E

Though a knowledge of foreign law is not to be imputed to the judge, you must impute to him such a knowledge of the general art of reasoning as will enable him, with the assistance of the law, to discover where fallacies are probably concealed, and in what cases he ought to require testimony more or less strict. If the utmost strictness were required in every case, justice must often have to stand still; and I am not disposed to say that there may not be cases in which the judge may, without impropriety, take on himself, to some extent, to construe the words of a foreign law and determine their application to the case in question, especially if there should be a variance or want of clearness in the testimony of the witnesses. In Lindo v. Belisario (1), in which the evidence was not clear and positive, on the interrogatories, LORD STOWELL thought he would not transgress his duty if he looked beyond the evidence, but not further than the evidence fairly led; and in both Lindo v. Belisario (1) and Dalrymple v. Dalrymple (2), I understand him not to have considered any authority, opinion, or any passages from any writer, not distinctly referred to by the witnesses, and in that way he did not look further than he considered the evidence to have fairly led, and yet to have gone beyond the mere evidence in considering for himself the effect of the authorities referred to, with a view of acquiring for himself a notion by which he might be able to decide on the effect of the varying and obscure testimony of the witnesses. There are many cases in which, it appears to me, that this is a mode of proceeding which might not improperly be adopted, but they are cases of a simple nature, and in all cases it would be necessary to use the greatest caution. A judge endowed as LORD STOWELL was, might perhaps safely do some things which other judges might find extremely hazardous. In this, as in many other instances, there is room for the exercise of a sound and cautious discretion, by the employment of which courts are enabled to bring some cases, otherwise interminable, to a good and even satisfactory conclusion. F G H I

The opinion—the considered and carefully formed opinion—which is the result of any man's knowledge and experience, applied to a complicated case, is founded

A upon views of the subject so extensive, upon authorities so far differing in authority, and upon such various degrees of practice, that it would be impossible to trace all the sources whence it is derived, or to examine and determine on the elements of which it is composed; and it is held to be sufficient if a person, proved to be experienced, and to have had the means of acquiring an accurate knowledge, thinks fit to state distinctly, in his opinion, that the law and its application to the case in question are such as he states them to be. An opinion so proved must be received and attended to, subject to the observations which may justly be made upon the witnesses themselves, upon the circumstances under which their testimony is given, and upon attention and consideration, whether contrasted with the opinions of other witnesses or not. Considering the nature of the case, it seems to me that witnesses, in giving their testimony, may, if they think fit, refer to laws or to treatises for the purpose of aiding their memory and assisting them in the subject of their examinations, but in general it is the testimony of the witness, and not the authority of the law or the text writer, detached from the testimony of the witness, which is to influence the judge. The testimony of the witness, or the information which the judge is to obtain from him, ought to be founded on the knowledge which he possesses, and which ought to have been derived, not merely from his own observation as a witness in the course of his own practice and experience, but also from a study of the law itself, and the recognised commentators thereon, in connection with his observations and inferences made in the course of his practice; and when he refers to lawyers and books in connection with the testimony he gives, he must be considered as indicating them only to be among the subjects of his consideration in the formation of his opinion. If he does not distinctly say so, he is not to be understood as saying that the lawyers or commentators to which he refers are the sole foundation of his opinion.

It has been made a question whether a certain law to which a witness refers ought not to be produced and proved, and there are cases in which the party has been entitled to prove the context of the written law by formal evidence. I conceive that it would be an advantage if every law or commentary to which the witness may refer was produced, for, although I think that when it is produced the judge has in general no right to take on himself the business of considering it and determining its application, yet when the passages are produced they may enable the party affected by the testimony not only to cross-examine the witness as to his own interpretation or inferences, and the grounds thereof, but also to call other witnesses to the same point; but in matters of foreign law, particularly when complicated, where every party engaged in the inquiry is a mere disciple, where there is no adept, and where re-investigation and further inquiries must be allowed in every case of surprise, and in which surprise is not in this as in most other cases unlikely to happen, the advantage of immediate cross-examination is perhaps of less importance than might at first be supposed and the difficulty of producing and proving the written law greater than might have been supposed.

H In De Bode's Case (3), it appears to have been determined that the party was not bound to produce a written law or decree which his witness referred to, and the evidence of the witness was received without producing the decree or law. This case appears to me to be stronger than that which was the subject of the first exception to the Master's report; and I think the Master was right in receiving the depositions of the witnesses of the defendants, Lord and Lady Bridport, without the books therein referred to being produced. The same rule applies to other cases, in which the witness professes a scientific knowledge which is not imputed to the judge. Thus in Collier v. Simpson (4), TINDAL, C.J., did not allow medical books to be read, but said he saw no objection to the witness being asked his opinion and the grounds of it, which might in some degree be founded on books as a part of his general knowledge. If the law and passages referred to were authorities understood by the judge—if the interpretation was to be so—if he could, a priori, and until it appeared that there was some sufficient reason for his doing so, look at them unconnected with the testimony, the case would be different; but in the first instance at least he can only regard them as connected with the testimony, and, except with regard to the degree of weight given by the testimony, cannot consider them at all important. If he reads them they may appear to him to accord with the testimony or to differ from it; if in his view, they accord with it, nothing is gained; if, in his view, they differ from it, he, being ignorant of the foreign law, cannot weigh his opinion against the opinion of the witness whose opinion ought to be derived not only from the citations in question, but from all the sources of knowledge of the law which he is proving. The citations, however, appear to me to be material, and to require the most careful attention of the other party who can avail themselves of them for the purpose of correcting any error or supplying any defect in the opinion of the witness already examined, by means of other witnesses to be afterwards examined for the purpose. A

This must, however, be done in a proper manner; and this brings me to the question raised by the exceptions (ii), (iii), and (iv). For the purpose of the argument I may take it to be as the plaintiff alleges, that the passages from the several books to which the defendants have specifically referred, when taken by themselves, bear a sense different from that which would fairly be deduced from them if taken in connection with other passages to be found in the same books, and such other passages are specifically referred to in the affidavit of Mr. Jackson. I say nothing of the translations, because on that subject no complaint has been made, and I presume them to be correct. I have throughout considered the translations and the originals as one. The plaintiff being supposed to have discovered that the opinions of the witnesses, so far as they were derived from the passages referred to, have no solid or sufficient foundation, would have a right to bring that matter under the consideration of the court. To that extent I agree with him, and if he desired to examine witnesses for the purpose of showing the fallacy or correcting the error, I should, in my present view of the case, have been greatly disposed to assist him, if it were necessary; but instead of desiring to examine witnesses on the subject, he seems to have assumed that the new passages he proposed to read were evidence of existing law, or that every party who cited a passage from the work of a text writer was bound to consider every other passage taken from the same work as good law; and he has desired the Master to permit him to select parts, and read such passages as he thought fit, from the books cited by the witnesses for the defendants, Lord and Lady Bridport, in order, I suppose, that the Master might himself, and without the assistance of any witness, consider which passages were good law, and which not, and might, if he considered them good law, interpret them or consider the weight of authority which ought to be attached to them, and after contrasting them with the passages cited by the defendant's witnesses, at last decide by his own judgment on the effect they ought to have on the case. B C D E F G

I am of opinion that the second, third, and fourth exceptions must be overruled. It is alleged that a particular passage is erroneously set out in the depositions of the witness Tedaldi, and certain words are alleged to have been improperly substituted for the word "confirmatum." It may be so, but I cannot consider this case as different from the other. There is so much reason to think that the substituted words are a mere clerical error, capable of being corrected by a very moderate skill in verbal criticism, that I cannot help feeling some regret that any difference should have arisen between the parties on the subject; but if any importance is attached to it—if any verbal or clerical error be detected—then the case is like the rest, a subject of evidence, and the Master was right in rejecting the passage which was tendered to him without any proper evidence to support it. The two next exceptions of the plaintiff, the fifth and sixth, relate to the plaintiff's evidence, and are subject to very similar considerations. All the extracts and passages which are specifically referred to in the exhibit "Z," are connected with the evidence of the witnesses. The closeness of the connection, and the assistance which the passages cited may afford for inquiry into the grounds of the opinion of the witnesses, and affecting their testimony, may have to be hereafter very H I

A carefully considered, but there is a connection between the passages and the testimony, and, perhaps, also a reasonable presumption that, in the opinion of the witness, the passages were at the time in question considered to be legal authorities applicable to the case, and to be interpreted in conformity with the opinion of the witness, but the passages which are not specified in the exhibit "Z," are not connected with the testimony of the witnesses. There is no testimony from which

B it can be inferred or presumed that, in the opinion of any witness, the passages now sought to be introduced were, at the time in question, considered to be legal authorities applicable to the case, or interpretations in conformity with the opinion of any witness. For these reasons I am of opinion that the plaintiff's fifth and sixth exceptions must be overruled.

The seventh exception of the plaintiff, which is the same as the fifth and sixth of Lady Nelson, and those who are joined with her, relate to the Case with the joint opinions of Ruggiero and Cacace. It is fully established that the opinions of properly qualified persons are receivable as evidence of foreign law. No objection is made to the qualifications of the witnesses, and no substantial objection is stated to the mode in which the facts are stated in the Case submitted to them; and each of the witnesses has distinctly sworn that, according to the best of his knowledge

D and belief, the opinion is in accordance with the law of Sicily in the manner therein expressed. It may be noticed that the Case was considered by four lawyers, of whom only two, the witness Ruggiero and the younger Cacace, have been examined. The other two, Gamboa and the elder Cacace, have not been examined, but no objection was taken on that ground. It was stated to me as an objection that the Case was stated by the plaintiff himself, and not by the Master, and that it was

E not communicated to the defendants. By this mode of proceeding the plaintiff appears to me to have exposed himself to considerable hazard—to the hazard of being deprived of the benefit of his testimony in the possible event of its appearing that the Case stated by him is not the very Case between the parties, or that it contained improper suggestions, calculated to mislead the witnesses; but under the circumstances I think that, at the risk to which he inevitably exposed himself,

F the plaintiff had a right to state his case in his own way, and that this objection to the evidence cannot prevail.

The other objection stated is, that the evidence ought to be considered as concerted between the two witnesses, and that the deposition containing the joint opinion ought to be considered as a deposition prepared and concerted before the examination, contrary to the established rule of the court. I am of opinion that

G the objection cannot be sustained. All rules must be considered with reference to the subject to which it is proposed to apply them; and I am very much inclined to think that a conclusive opinion, formed, as this is sworn to have been, on the deliberate and conscientious consultation of two lawyers in consultation with others, is more likely to be correct and satisfactory than the separate opinions of the two would have been. If the witnesses have mutually assisted one another, it may

H perhaps be so much the better. A common result from the separate studies and experience of the two, as stated by them, is perhaps more satisfactory than the result at which an English judge might arrive after a consideration of the two opinions separately. On the whole, after a consideration of the subject with all the attention which is due to the Master and the arguments I have heard, it appears to me that the joint opinion of the two witnesses on the Case submitted

I to them ought to have been received in evidence. It will be received, of course, subject to every proper consideration and objection which may be made to it. On the whole, I overrule the first six of the plaintiff's exceptions, which are the same as the first four of the exceptions filed by the defendant Lady Nelson and the Matchams; and I allow the seventh of the plaintiff's exceptions, and which is the same as the fifth of Lady Nelson and the Matchams.

Order accordingly.

DALBY v. INDIA AND LONDON LIFE ASSURANCE

[COURT OF EXCHEQUER CHAMBER (Parke and Alderson, BB., Wightman and Erle, JJ., Platt, B., and Crompton, J.), November 27, December 2, 1854]

Insurance—Life assurance—Nature of contract—Not contract of indemnity—Contract to pay sum on death in consideration of premium.

The contract commonly called life assurance in no way resembles a contract of indemnity, but is a mere contract to pay a certain sum of money on the death of a person in consideration of the due payment of a certain annuity for his life, the amount of the annuity being calculated in the first instance according to the probable duration of the life.

Insurance—Life assurance—Insurable interest—Material date—Time when policy entered into—Life Assurance Act, 1774 (14 Geo. 3, c. 48), s. 1.

By s. 1 of the Life Assurance Act, 1774: "No insurance shall be made by any person or persons . . . on the life or lives of any person or persons, or on any other event or events whatsoever, wherein the person or persons for whose use, benefit, or on whose account such policy or policies shall be made shall have no interest, or by way of gaming or wagering; and every assurance made contrary to the true interest and meaning hereof shall be null and void . . ." To satisfy the provisions of this section it is sufficient if the assured had an insurable interest in the life assured at the time of entering into the policy. It is not necessary that his interest should continue until the death of the person whose life is assured.

Appeal against a ruling of CRESSWELL, J., in an action brought by the plaintiff

A on a policy of life assurance for £1,000 granted by the defendant company to him on behalf of the Anchor Life Assurance Co.

The declaration set out the policy, which was in the usual form, and then stated that Adolphus Frederick Duke of Cambridge lived beyond the period of twelve calendar months (mentioned in the policy), and until a certain day, to wit, July 8, 1850, when he died, and stated that during the life of the duke, and at the
B expiration of the last-mentioned period, and of each and every subsequent period of twelve calendar months during the life of the duke, he, the plaintiff, for and on behalf of the Anchor Life Assurance Co. did pay to the defendant company the sum or premium of £122 15s. 10d. for and in respect of the then next succeeding period of twelve calendar months, and that the policy remained and was in force from the making thereof until and at the time of the death of the duke. The
C plaintiff further said that after the death of the duke, to wit, on Nov. 28, 1850, his death was notified by the plaintiff to the directors of the defendant company and proof thereof was then made to the satisfaction of the directors of the company. It was further said that at the time of the making of the policy, and thence until the death of the duke, the Anchor Life Assurance Co. was interested in the life of the duke to the amount insured thereon, and that the plaintiff and the Anchor
D Life Assurance Co. had respectively complied with all the conditions contained in the policy, but that the defendant company had failed to pay the plaintiff the sum of £1,000 assured by the policy or any part thereof. The plaintiff claimed £1,200 damages. By their defence the defendant company contended that the Anchor Life Assurance Co. had no insurable interest in the duke's life.

The trial came on at the sittings in Middlesex, on Nov. 29, 1851, before CRESS-
E WELL, J., and thereupon it was, on the part of the plaintiff, given in evidence that before the date of the policy the Anchor Life Assurance Co. had granted to the Rev. John Wright four several policies of insurance on the life of the Duke of Cambridge for four several sums of money, amounting together to the sum of £3,000; that John Wright, at the time of the granting of these policies, was interested in the life of the duke to the amount of £3,000; that the said four several
F sums were by the terms of the policies to be paid by the Anchor Life Assurance Co. to John Wright on the death of the duke; that the Anchor Life Assurance Co., being desirous to secure and indemnify themselves to the extent of £1,000 against their liability for the £3,000 payable according to the policies to John Wright on the death of the duke, the plaintiff, as one of the members and directors of the G company, did, by authority and on behalf of the company, effect the policy in the declaration mentioned with the defendants for the sum of £1,000, by way of a cross or counter assurance to that amount on the life of the duke, against the policies effected by John Wright with the Anchor Life Assurance Co. John Wright surrendered the policies to the Anchor Life Assurance Co., and in consideration of that surrender and the payment of £325 the company granted to him an annuity of £120 sterling during the joint lives of himself and Honoria his wife, and upon the H decease of either of them, then to the survivor of them one annuity or clear yearly sum of £80 sterling during the rest of the life of such survivor.

The grounds of appeal stated were that the Anchor Life Assurance Co., being at the time of the making of the policy in the declaration mentioned liable to pay to John Wright the sum of £3,000 on the death of the Duke of Cambridge, were interested in the life of the duke as in the declaration alleged; that it was necessary that I the interest of the Anchor Life Assurance Co. in the life of the duke should continue until and at the time of his death or of action brought, because, a wager policy being good at common law, the existence of an interest at the time of the making of the policy was sufficient to satisfy the Life Assurance Act, 1774, and because such interest was the only interest to which that statute referred; that the Anchor Life Assurance Co., having purchased from Mr. Wright the policies effected by him with the company on the life of the Duke of Cambridge, were entitled to the benefit of the interest which Mr. Wright had in the life of the duke at the time of his death; that an insurance of a person on his own life, or on the life of another, was not in its nature a contract of indemnity; and that Godsall v. Boldero (1) was wrongly A decided.

Bramwell, Q.C. (with him H. Tindal Atkinson and F. J. Smith), for the plaintiff.
Serjeant Channell (with him Partridge and Coxon) for the defendants.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 2, 1854. PARKE, B., delivered the following judgment of the court.— B
 This case comes before us on a bill of exceptions to the ruling of my brother CRESSWELL, J., at nisi prius. We learn that on the trial he reserved the important point which arose for the consideration of the Court of Common Pleas, and that when it came on for discussion it was thought right to put it on the record in the shape of a bill of exceptions that it may be carried, if it should be thought proper, to the highest tribunal. We have now, after a very able argument on both sides, C to dispose of it in this court of error.

This is an action on what is usually termed a policy of life assurance, brought by the plaintiff, as a trustee for the Anchor Life Assurance Co., on a policy for £1,000 on the life of his late Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge. It may be conceded for the purpose of the present argument that the transactions between Mr. Wright and the office totally put an end to that interest which the Anchor D company had when the policy was effected and in respect of which it was effected, and that, at the time of the duke's death, and up to the commencement of the suit, the plaintiff had no interest whatever. This raises the very important question whether, under these circumstances, the assurance was void and nothing could be recovered thereon. If the court had thought some interest at the time of the duke's death was necessary to make the policy valid, the facts attending the keeping up of the policy would have undergone further discussion. There is the usual averment E in the declaration that at the time of the making of the policy and thence until the death of the duke, the Anchor Life Assurance Co. was interested in the life of the duke, and a plea that they were not interested mode et forma, which traverse makes it unnecessary to prove more than the interest at the time of making the policy if that interest was sufficient to make it valid in point of law. We are of F opinion that it was sufficient, and, but for Godsall v. Boldero (1), should have felt no doubt upon the subject.

The contract commonly called life assurance, when properly considered, is a mere contract to pay a certain sum of money on the death of a person in consideration of the due payment of a certain annuity for his life—the amount of the annuity, being calculated in the first instance according to the probable duration of the life; G when once fixed, it is constant and invariable. A stipulated amount of annuity is to be uniformly paid on one side, and the sum to be paid in the event of the death is always, except when bonuses have been given by prosperous offices, the same on the other. This species of insurance in no way resembles a contract of indemnity. A policy of insurance against fire and against marine risks are both properly contracts of indemnity—the insurer engaging to make good within certain H limited amounts the losses sustained by the assured in their buildings, ships, and effects. Policies on maritime risks were afterwards used improperly and made mere wagers on the happening of those perils. This practice was limited by the [repealed] Marine Insurance Act, 1745, and put an end to in all except a few cases, but, at common law, before this statute with respect to maritime risks and the Life Assurance Act, 1774, as to insurances on lives, it is perfectly clear that all I contracts for wager policies and wagers which were not contrary to the policy of the law, were legal contracts. So it is stated by the court in the report of Cousins v. Nantes (2), to have been solemnly determined in Lucena v. Craufurd (3), without even a difference of opinion among the judges. The contract, therefore, in this case to pay a fixed sum of £4,000 on the death of the Duke of Cambridge would have been unquestionably legal at common law if the plaintiff had had an interest therein or not, and the sole question is whether the policy was rendered illegal and void by the provisions of the Life Assurance Act, 1774.

A This depends upon its true construction. The statute recites

“that the making insurances on lives or other events wherein the assured shall have no interest hath introduced a mischievous kind of gaming”;

and, for the remedy thereof, it enacts that no insurance shall be made by anyone on the life or lives of any person or persons or any other events whatsoever wherein
 B the person or persons for whose use or benefit or on whose account such policy shall be made shall have no interest, or by way of gaming or wagering; and that every assurance made contrary to the true interest and meaning thereof shall be null and void to all intents and purposes whatsoever. As the Anchor Life Assurance Co. had unquestionably an interest in the continuance of the life of the Duke of Cambridge to the amount of £1,000 because they had bound themselves to pay a sum
 C of £1,000 to Mr. Wright on that event, the policy effected by them with the defendants was certainly legal and valid, and the plaintiff without the slightest doubt could have recovered the full amount if there were no other provision in the Act. This contract is good at common law, and certainly not avoided by s. 1 of the Life Assurance Act, 1774. This section, it is to be observed, does not provide for any particular amount of interest. According to it, if there was any interest, how-
 D ever small, the policy would not be avoided.

The question arises on s. 3 which is as follows :

“That in all cases where the insured has interest in such life or lives, event or events, no greater sum shall be recovered or received from the insurer or insurers than the amount or value of the interest of the insured in such life or lives, or other event or events.”

E What is the meaning of this provision? On the part of the plaintiff it is said that it means only that in all cases in which the party insuring has an interest when he effects the policy, his right to recover and receive is to be limited to that amount, otherwise, under colour of a small interest, a wagering policy might be made to a large amount, as it might if s. 1 stood alone. The right to recover, therefore, is
 F limited to the amount of the interest at the time of effecting the policy. Upon that value the assured must have the amount of premium calculated. If he states it truly, no difficulty can occur. He pays in the annuity for life the fair value of the sum payable on death. If he misrepresents by overrating the value of the interest, it is his own fault in paying more in the way of annuity than he ought, and he can recover only the true value of the interest in respect of which he effected the
 G policy, but that value he can recover. Thus the liability of the insurer becomes constant and uniform to pay an unvarying sum on the death of the cestui que vie in consideration of an unvarying and uniform premium paid by the insured. The bargain is fixed as to amount on both sides. This construction is effected by reading the word “hath” as referring to the time of effecting the policy. By s. 1 the assured is prohibited from effecting an insurance on a life or on an event
 H wherein he shall have no interest, that is, at the time of insuring, and then s. 3 requires that he shall recover only the interest that he hath. If he has an interest when the policy is made he is not wagering or gaming, and the prohibition of the statute does not apply to his case. Then s. 3 provided that no more than the amount or value of the interest should be insured. A question might have been raised whether, if the insurance had been for a larger amount, the whole would
 I not have been void, but the prohibition to recover or receive more than that amount obviates any difficulty on that head.

On the other hand, the defendants contend that the meaning of this clause is that the assured shall recover no more than the value of the interest which he has at the time of the recovery, or receive more than its value at the time of the receipt. The words must be altered materially to limit the sum to be recovered to the value at the time of the death, or, if payable at a time after death, then when the cause of action accrues. But there is the most serious objection to any of these constructions. It is, that the written contract, which, for the reasons given before, is not a wagering contract, but a valid one, permitted by the statute and very clear in its language, is, by this mode of construction, completely altered in its terms and effect. It is no longer a contract to pay a certain sum on the value of a then existing interest in the event of death, in consideration of a fixed annuity, calculated with reference to that sum, but a contract to pay, contrary to its express words, a varying sum, according to the alteration of the value of that interest at the time of the death, or the accrual of the cause of action, or the time of the verdict or execution; and yet the premium to be paid is fixed and calculated on an original fixed value and is unvarying, so that the assured is obliged to pay a certain premium every year, calculated on the value of his interest at the time of the policy, in order to have a right to recover an uncertain sum, namely, that which happens to be the value of the interest at the time of the death, or afterwards at the time of the verdict. He has not, therefore, a sum certain, which he stipulated for and bought with a certain annuity; but it may be a much less sum, or even none at all. This seems to us so contrary to justice, and fair dealing, and common honesty, that this construction cannot, we think, be put upon this section.

We should, therefore, have no hesitation, if the question were res integra, in putting the much more reasonable construction upon the statute that, if there is an interest at the time of the policy it is not a wagering policy, and the true value of that interest may be recovered in exact conformity with the words of the contract itself. The only effect of the statute is to make the assured value his interest at its true amount when he makes the contract. But it is said that Godsall v. Boldero (1) has concluded this question. Upon considering this case it is certain that LORD ELLENBOROUGH decided it upon the assumption that a life policy was in its nature a contract of indemnity, as policies in marine risks and against fire undoubtedly are, and that the action was in point of law founded on a supposed damnification occasioned by the death of the debtor existing at the time of the action brought, and his Lordship relied upon the decision of LORD MANSFIELD in Hamilton v. Mendes (4), that the plaintiff's demand was for an indemnity. LORD MANSFIELD was speaking of a policy against marine risks, which is in its terms a contract for indemnity only. But that is not of the nature of what is termed an insurance for life. It really is what it is on the face of it—a contract to pay a certain sum in the event of death. It is valid at common law; and, if it is made by a person having an interest in the duration of the life, is not prohibited by the Life Assurance Act, 1774. But, though we are quite satisfied that Godsall v. Boldero (1) was founded on a mistaken analogy and wrong, we should hesitate to overrule it, though sitting in a court of error, if it had been constantly approved and followed, and not questioned, though many opportunities had been offered to question it. It was stated that it had not been disputed in practice, and had been cited by several eminent judges as established law. The judgment itself was not, and could not, be questioned in a court of error, for one of the issues, nil debet, was found for the defendant. Since that case we know practically, and that circumstance is mentioned by some of the judges in the case hereinafter referred to, that insurance offices, generally speaking, have not availed themselves of the decision as they found it very injurious to their interests to do so. They have, therefore, generally speaking, paid the amount of their life insurances, so that the number of cases in which it could be questioned is probably very small indeed, and it may be truly said, instead of the decision of Godsall v. Boldero (1) being uniformly acquiesced in, it has been very uniformly disregarded. There is no case at law except Barber v. Morris (5), in which Godsall v. Boldero (1) was accidentally noticed as proving it to be necessary that the interest should continue till the death of the cestui que vie. It was proved in that case to be the practice of the particular office in which that assurance was made to pay the sums assured without inquiry as to the existence of an insurable interest, and on that account it was held that the policy, though in that case the interest had ceased, was a valuable policy, and the plaintiff could not recover on the ground that the defendant, the vendor of it, was guilty of fraudulent concealment in not disclosing that the interest had ceased. This was the point of

A the case; and, though there was a dictum of LORD TENTERDEN, that the payment of the sum insured could not be enforced, it was not at all necessary to the decision of the case.

The other cases cited on the argument in this case were cases in equity where the propriety of the decision in Godsall v. Boldero (1) did not come in question. The questions arose as to the right of the creditor and debtor, inter se, where the offices have paid the value of a policy; Humphrey v. Arabin (6); Henson v. Blackwell (7) before WIGRAM, V.-C., and Phillips v. Eastwood (8), a case in the time of SUGDEN, L.C., of Ireland, where the point decided was that a life policy, as a security for a debt, passed under a will bequeathing debts, in which the Lord Chancellor stated that the offices found it not for their benefit to act on the rigid rule of Godsall v. Boldero (1). In these cases, the different judges concerned in them do not dispute, some indeed appear to approve, of Godsall v. Boldero (1), but it was not material in any to controvert it; and the questions to be decided were quite independent of the authority of that case. We do not think we ought to feel ourselves bound, sitting in error, by the authority of this case, which itself could not be questioned by writ of error, when so few, if any, subsequent cases have arisen in which the soundness of the principle there relied upon could be made a subject of judicial inquiry, and in practice it may be said that it has been constantly disregarded. The judgment will, therefore, be reversed, and a venire de novo issue.

Venire de novo.

MORLEY v. ATTENBOROUGH

F [COURT OF EXCHEQUER (Pollock, C.B., Parke, Rolfe and Platt, BB.), May 11, 1848, February 17, 1849]

[Reported 3 Exch. 500; 18 L.J.Ex. 148; 12 L.T.O.S. 532;
13 J.P. 427; 13 Jur. 282; 154 E.R. 942]

G Pledge—Sale of forfeited pledge—No warranty of title by pawnee—Undertaking that pledge irredeemable and no defect of title known.

A pawnbroker who sells a chattel as a forfeited pledge merely undertakes that the subject of the sale is a pledge and irredeemable and that he is not cognisant of any defect of title to it. He does not warrant the title of the goods sold.

H Sale of Goods—Fraud on sale—Concealment of absence of title to goods sold—Concealment of defective quality.

Per Curiam: If the seller of goods knows that he has no title to them, or if he knows that the goods are of defective quality and he conceals either of those facts from the buyer, he is liable to the buyer as for a fraud.

Notes. By s. 12 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, a condition on the part of the seller that he has a right to sell the goods is implied in a contract of the sale of goods, rendering obsolete the main decision in this case, but the case is included in these reports on the points mentioned in the headnotes. By s. 14 of the Act certain warranties as to the fitness of the goods sold are specified.

Walker v. Mellor (1848), 17 L.J.Q.B. 103.

Rule Nisi obtained by the defendant to move to enter a nonsuit in an action in which the plaintiff alleged that the defendant had caused to be sold to him by auction a harp to which he (the defendant) had no title whereby the plaintiff had suffered damage through having to restore the harp to its rightful owner. H

At the trial, before PLATT, B., in 1847 it appeared that in 1839 a person of the name of Poley, having hired a harp of Messrs. Chappell, music-sellers, pledged it with the defendant, a pawnbroker, for £15 15s., on the terms that, if the sum advanced were not repaid within six months, the defendant should be at liberty to sell it. The defendant had no knowledge that the harp did not belong to Poley. The harp not having been redeemed at the stipulated time, the defendant, in 1845, sent it with other articles to be sold by public auction. The auctioneers were accustomed to have quarterly sales of unredeemed pledges of which the sale in question was one, and on those occasions they were in the habit of putting other lots into the sale. The sale extended over several days, and a general catalogue comprising the articles to be sold on each day stated on the title-page that the goods for sale consisted of I

with certain pawnbrokers, naming them, and among others the defendant, and that the lots without numbers were "other effects." The harp, which was numbered in the catalogue, was knocked down to the plaintiff for £15 15s., but no warranty of title was given. Messrs. Chappell, having afterwards discovered that
B the harp was in the plaintiff's possession, commenced an action against him for its recovery, whereupon the plaintiff gave up the harp to them, and paid the costs, for which, together with the price of the harp, the present action was brought. On behalf of the defendant it was objected, that there was no warranty of title, either express or implied, and that the plaintiff ought to be nonsuited. The learned judge directed a verdict for the plaintiff, reserving leave for the defendant to move
C to enter a nonsuit. A ruling having been obtained, Humfrey and Bovill for the plaintiff, showed cause against the rule.

Martin and Petersdorff for the defendant, supported the rule.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 17, 1849. PARKE, B., delivered the following judgment of the court.—

D This case was argued some time ago before the Lord Chief Baron, ROLFE, B., PLATT, B., and myself, and stood over for our consideration. The plaintiff brought an action of assumpsit, stating that in consideration that the plaintiff would buy a harp for a certain sum, the defendant promised that he, the defendant, had lawful right to sell it, and the breach assigned was that he had not. It appeared on the trial, before PLATT, B., that the defendant, who was a pawnbroker, had the harp
E pledged with him in the way of his business, and, the time having elapsed for its redemption and the pledge being unredeemed, he offered it for sale through certain auctioneers, who sold it to the plaintiff. It turned out that the harp had been pledged to the defendant by a person who had no title to it, and the real owner obliged the plaintiff to give it up after it had been delivered to him by the defendant. But of the want of title of the pawner to it the defendant was ignorant,
F and there was no express warranty. PLATT, B., directed a verdict for the plaintiff, reserving leave to move to enter a nonsuit. On showing cause the case was fully argued, and every authority bearing on the question whether there is an implied warranty of title in the contract of sale of an article, or in what circumstances there is a liability on the part of the vendor to make good a loss by defect of title was cited and commented upon on both sides.

G It is very remarkable that there should be any doubt, as that certainly is a question so likely to be of common occurrence, especially in this commercial country. Such a point, one would have thought, would not have admitted of any doubt. The bargain and sale of a specific chattel by our law (which differs in that respect from the civil law), undoubtedly transfers all the property the vendor has where nothing further remains to be done according to the intent of the parties to
H pass it. But it is made a question whether there is annexed by law to such a contract, which operates as a conveyance of the property, an implied agreement on the part of the vendor, that he has the ability to convey. With respect to executory contracts of purchase and sale, where the subject is unascertained and is afterwards to be conveyed, it would probably be implied that both parties meant that a good title to that subject should be transferred in the same manner as it
I would be implied under similar circumstances that a merchantable article was to be supplied. Unless goods, which the party could enjoy as his own, and make full use of, were delivered, the contract would not be performed. The purchaser could not be bound to accept if he discovered the defect of title before delivery, and, if he did, and the goods were recovered from him, he would not be bound to pay, or, having paid, he would be entitled to recover back the price as on a consideration which had failed.

But when there is a bargain and sale of a specific ascertained chattel which operates to transmit the property, and nothing is said about title, what is the legal effect of that contract? Does the contract necessarily import, unless the contrary be expressed, that the vendor has a good title? Or has it merely the effect of transferring such title as the vendor has? According to the Roman law (vide DOMAT, Book 1, tit. 2, s. 2, art. 3) and in France (CODE CIVIL, chap. 4, s. 1, art. 1603) and Scotland, and partially in America (1 Johns. Rep. 274; BROOM'S LEGAL MAXIMS, 628, where this subject is well discussed) there is always an implied contract that the vendor has the right to dispose of the subject which he sells (BELL ON SALE, 94); but the result of the older authorities is that there is by the law of England no warranty of title in the actual contract of sale any more than there is of quality. The rule of caveat emptor applies to both, but if the vendor knew that he had no title and concealed that fact, he was always held responsible to the purchaser as for a fraud in the same way as he is if he knew of the defective quality. This rule will be found in Co. Litt. 102, a, and 3 Co. Rep. 22 a; NOY'S MAXIMS, 42; FITZ-HERBERT'S NATURA BREVIVM, 94 c; Sprigwell v. Allen (1), cited by LITLEDALE, J., in Early v. Garret (2) (9 B. & C. at p. 932); and in Williamson v. Allison (3), referred to in the argument. The same principle applies to transfer by deed. LORD HALE says:

"Though the words 'assign, set over, and transfer,' do not amount to a covenant against an eign title, yet, as against the covenantor himself, it will amount to a covenant against all claiming under him":

Deering v. Farrington (4), which was an assignment of a chose in action.

It may be that, as in the earlier times the chief transactions of purchase and sale were in markets and fairs where the bona fide purchaser without notice obtained a good title as against all except the Crown (and afterwards a prosecutor to whom restitution is ordered by the statute 21 Hen. 8, c. 11 [relating the restitution of stolen goods], the common law did not annex a warranty to any contract of sale. Be that as it may, the older authorities are strong to show that there is no such warranty implied by law from the mere sale. In recent times a different notion appears to have been gaining ground: see note of the learned editor to Walker's Case (5), 3 Co. Rep. 22 a; and BLACKSTONE, J., says:

"In contracts for sale it is constantly understood that the seller undertakes that the commodity he sells is his own."

MR. WOODDESON, in his LECTURES, vol. 2, p. 415, goes so far as to assert that the rule of caveat emptor is exploded altogether which no authority warrants. At all times, however, the vendor was liable if there was a warranty in fact, and at an early period the affirming those goods to be his own by a vendor in possession appears to have been deemed equivalent to a warranty. LORD HOLT, in Medina v. Stoughton (6), says that

"where one in possession of a personal chattel sells it, the bare affirming it to be his own amounts to a warranty."

BULLER, J., in Pasley v. Freeman (7), disclaims any distinction between the effect of an affirmation when the vendor is in possession or not, treating it as equivalent to a warranty in both cases.

Some of the text writers drop the expression of "warranty" or "affirmation," and lay down in general terms, that if a man sells goods as his own, and the title is deficient, he is liable to make good the loss: 2 BLACKSTONE'S COMMENTARIES, 451; the commentator cites for that proposition CRO. JAC. 474 [Furnis v. Leicester (8)], and ROLLE'S ABRIDGMENT, 90, in both which cases there was an allegation that the vendor affirmed that he had a title, and, therefore, it would seem that the learned author treated the expression "selling as his own" as equivalent to an affirmation or warranty. So CHANCELLOR KENT [Chancellor of New York, 1814] in 2 KENT'S COMMENTARIES, 478, says:

"In every sale of a chattel, if the possession be in another, and there be no covenant or warranty of title, the rule of caveat emptor applies, and the party

- A buys at his peril; but if the seller has possession of the article, and he sells it as his own, and for a fair price, he is understood to warrant the title."

From the authorities in our law, to which may be added the opinion of TINDAL, C.J., in Ormrod v. Huth (9), it would seem that there is no implied warranty of title on the sale of goods, and that, if there be no fraud, a vendor is not liable for a bad title unless there is an express warranty, or an equivalent to it by declarations or conduct; and the question in each case where there is no warranty in express terms will be whether there are such circumstances as to be equivalent to such a warranty. Usage of trade, if proved as a matter of fact, would, of course, be sufficient to raise an inference of such an engagement, and without proof of such usage the very nature of the trade may be enough to lead to the conclusion that the person carrying it on must be understood to engage that the purchaser shall enjoy that which he buys as against all persons. It is, perhaps, with reference to such sales, or to executory contracts, that BLACKSTONE makes the statement above referred to.

- Similar questions occur in cases as to the quality of goods in which it is clear there is, by law, no implied warranty, yet, if goods are ordered of a tradesman, in the way of his trade, for a particular purpose, he may be considered as engaging that the goods supplied are reasonably fit for that purpose. We do not suppose that there would be any doubt, if the articles are bought in a shop professedly carried on for the sale of goods, that the shopkeeper must be considered as warranting that those who purchase will have a good title to keep the goods purchased. In such a case the vendor sells "as his own," and that is what is equivalent to a warranty of title. But in the case now under consideration, the defendant can be made responsible only as on a sale of a forfeited pledge eo nomine. Though the harp may not have been distinctly stated in the auctioneer's catalogue to be a forfeited pledge, yet the auctioneer had no authority from the defendant to sell it except as such. The defendant, therefore, cannot be taken to have sold it with a more extensive liability than such a sale would have imposed upon him, and the question is whether, on such a sale, accompanied with possession, there is any assertion of an absolute title to sell, or only an assertion that the article has been pledged with him and the time allowed for redemption has passed. On this question we are without any light from decided cases.

- In our judgment, it appears unreasonable to consider the pawnbroker, from the nature of his occupation, as undertaking anything more than that the subject of sale is a pledge and irredeemable and that he is not cognisant of any defect of title to it. By the statute law (see 1 Jas. 1, c. 21: repealed by Sale of Goods Act, 1893, s. 60), he gains no better title by a pledge than the pawnbroker had; and as the rule of the common law is that there is no implied warranty from the mere contract of sale itself, we think that where it is to be implied from the nature of the trade carried on the mode of carrying on the trade should be such as clearly to raise that inference. In this case we think it does not. The vendor must be considered as selling merely the right to the pledge which he himself had, and, therefore, we think the rule must be absolute.

- It may be that, though there is no implied warranty of title, so that the vendor would not be liable for a breach of it in unliquidated damages, yet the purchaser may recover back the purchase-money, as on a consideration that failed if it could be shown that it was the understanding of both parties that the bargain should be put an end to if the purchaser should not have a good title. But if there is no implied warranty of title, some circumstances must be shown to enable the plaintiff to recover for money had and received. This case was not made at the trial, and the only question is whether there is an implied warranty.

Rule absolute.

Sale of Goods—Contract—Written contract—Subject-matter of contract—Identification by extrinsic evidence.

When a specific thing is the subject of a written contract and it is doubtful what that specific thing is any fact may be given in evidence which is within the knowledge of both parties in order to identify it.

Accordingly, where a conversation was shown to have taken place between a buyer and a seller regarding the estimated quantity of the goods the subject-matter of the contract, Held: evidence of what was said during that conversation was admissible to prove to what the contract referred.

Appeal by the defendant from a decision of the Court of Queen's Bench on a rule nisi obtained by the plaintiffs for a verdict to be entered for them in the action.

The plaintiffs were sheep farmers in Scotland. The defendant, a wool dealer at Liverpool, employed one Stewart, who resided at Perth, to buy wool for him. On Sept. 5, 1857, Stewart wrote the following to the second plaintiff:

"Dear Sir,—I wrote you on the 1st instant enclosing letters from Mr. Longbottom [the defendant], and not having received your reply, I beg to state that

A I have heard from him today, and he desires me to offer you 'for your wool 16s. per stone,' delivered in Liverpool, less two months' discount, and as there is now so little between you, I hope to receive your acceptance of the above offer in due course.

“(Signed) WILLIAM STEWART.

“To A. M'Donald, jun.”

B To this letter the plaintiffs replied as follows :

“Dear Sir,—I yesterday received your favour, and in reply beg to say that I agree to your offer for the wool of 16s. per stone, less two months' discount at the rate of 5 per cent. for ready money.

“(Signed) A. MACDONALD.”

C The quantity of wool offered by the plaintiffs for acceptance was 2,505 stones, and it was rejected on the ground that it was a larger quantity than agreed upon. The plaintiffs sought to explain the term “your wool,” by giving evidence that in a conversation between one of the plaintiffs and Stewart the latter was informed that, besides their own clip of wool, the plaintiffs had bought the clips of four or five neighbouring farmers, whose names were mentioned, and that the whole quantity
D amounted to about 2,300 stones, 100 stones more or less, and that this was the wool upon which the negotiation proceeded and which had been delivered by them. The defendant contended that this evidence was inadmissible, and that the contract was so indefinite as to be void altogether, and, further, that, if admissible, it established a contract for 2,300 stones, 100 stones more or less, which was not fulfilled by an offer to deliver 2,505 stones. The learned judge at the trial,
E BYLES, J., was of opinion that the evidence was inadmissible, and that, without it, there was no sufficient contract, but received it subject to the objection. The jury assessed the damages at £825 16s. 3d., and a nonsuit was entered by the direction of the learned judge with liberty to the plaintiffs to move to enter the verdict for them for that amount. A rule nisi was, accordingly, obtained on their behalf.

Edward James and Brett showed cause against the rule.

F Monk and Kemplay supported the rule.

LORD CAMPBELL, C.J.—I am of opinion that the plaintiffs are entitled to have the verdict entered for them. It is clear from the letters that there was a contract between the parties. An offer was made and accepted, and the only question is as to the subject-matter of the contract. When a specific thing is the subject
G of a written contract and it is doubtful what that specific thing is any fact may be given in evidence which is within the knowledge of both parties in order to identify it. Applying that principle to this case, a conversation was shown to have taken place between Stewart, the agent of the defendant, and one of the plaintiffs as to what was the estimated quantity, the whole of which was clearly the subject of negotiation between them. Is there any difficulty in admitting in evidence what
H then passed between that plaintiff and Stewart? I think there is none. It is no addition to the contract, but only enables us to say to what the contract refers. It is said, if this be so, then the contract is limited to 2,300 stones of wool, 100 stones more or less. Not so, because there was no contract made till Sept. 5, and the letter of that date does not make it a condition that the quantity shall not exceed 2,300 stones by more than 100 stones. It is “for your wool,” tantum quan-
I tum. If the excess was so unreasonable as to make the contract void on the ground of misrepresentation, then the opinion of the jury should have been taken on that point.

WIGHTMAN, J.—The question is, What is meant by the term “your wool”? If there had been any conversation between the parties previous to the contract, one might suppose that it was some wool therein referred to. There can be no doubt that by “your wool” was meant the 2,300 stones, 100 stones more or less, mentioned by the plaintiffs to Stewart. I quite agree that the evidence of this conversation was admissible to show what was meant by "your wool," but the point on which I have the misfortune to differ from the rest of the court is, that while my learned brothers think that the effect of this is only to explain the words "your wool," I think it has the effect of specifying the quantity of wool sold, and that the quantity mentioned becomes an ingredient in the contract. It is as if the defendant had said in his letter: "You having represented that you have 2,300 stones of wool, 100 stones more or less, I agree to purchase that quantity." It is unnecessary to refer to the cases, but there are numerous decisions which show that such a contract is not fulfilled by an offer to deliver 2,505 stones. I, therefore, think that upon this ground the defendant is entitled to retain his verdict. A

ERLE, J.—I think this rule ought to be made absolute. I assume that the written contract must contain all the material terms of the contract, and I think that these letters do so. The defendant says: "I will buy your wool." It is the universal practice to admit parol evidence to identify the subject-matter of a contract. It is not contended that this contract is on the face of it void for uncertainty; parol evidence must, therefore, be admitted to show to what it refers. It is contended that, this being so, all that passed between the plaintiff and Stewart as to quantity must be considered as embodied in the contract. I cannot agree to this. B

It was only preliminary talk, which cannot alter or vary the contract, although it may explain to what it applies. Even if it is to be taken as embodied in the contract, I think it would still be a question which the defendant should have desired to be left to the jury, whether or no the excess was unreasonable. C

The defendant appealed to the Court of Exchequer Chamber. D

Kemplay for the plaintiffs was not called on to argue.

WILLIAMS, J.—We are all of opinion that the judgment of the court below should be affirmed. As to the main ground of the argument for the plaintiffs, none of us entertains any more doubt than the court below. We all think that the evidence was admissible. That evidence does not vary the written contract: it only identifies the subject-matter to which it refers. On the other point I felt at one time the same doubt as WIGHTMAN, J., did, although my learned brethren here feel no doubt upon it. It cannot be disputed that if, as a matter of fact, it could be proved that the treaty was on a condition that the wool should amount to a particular quantity, namely, 2,300 stones, 100 stones more or less, it would have been gross injustice to admit the oral evidence for the purpose of fixing the subject-matter of the contract and exclude it from fixing the particular quantity of that subject-matter, or to hold that an action lay against the defendant for refusing to accept that which he had never bargained for. But, upon the whole, I incline to the opinion of the rest of the court that the statement as to the quantity in the previous conversation was a mere expression of opinion by the plaintiffs, and not a material element in the contract by which the defendant bound himself to accept the wool. F

MARTIN, B.—I also think that the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench should be affirmed. The letters of Sept. 5 and 8 constitute a contract, which, in my opinion, would be a good contract at common law, if the Statute of Frauds had never existed. The ambiguity in the expression "your wool" would not prevent the contract from being a good one, and there is nothing in s. 17 of the Statute of Frauds [repealed by Sale of Goods Act, 1893, and substantially re-enacted by s. 4 (1) of that Act, s. 4 (1) itself being repealed by the Law Reform (Enforcement of Contracts) Act, 1954] to invalidate it. If the previous conversation had been the only evidence as to what was meant by the expression "your wool," I think that, as WIGHTMAN, J., suggested, it would have been a question whether the contract was not for the quantity mentioned at that conversation, viz., 2,300 stones, 100 stones more or less, and, if so, the tender of 2,542 stones would not have been a tender in conformity with the contract. But, looking at the letter of Aug. 26, in G

I

A which one of the plaintiffs speaks of a fresh parcel of wool which he had secured, and which he says "will go along with my other wool," I have no doubt that the defendant, in using the term "your wool," meant any wool that was then under the control of the plaintiff.

WILLES, J., and CHANNELL, B., concurred.

B BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion, upon three grounds. First, the expression "your wool" is the expression of the defendant, and should, therefore, be taken in the sense which is widest and most against him. Secondly, the ordinary rule is that a latent ambiguity, an ambiguity which is raised by extrinsic evidence, may be removed by extrinsic evidence. Thirdly, such evidence, to be admissible, must not vary, but apply, the contract, and that is the effect of the oral evidence in this case. As to the statement of quantity, I agree with MARTIN, B., that the precise quantity was not an element in the contract.

WILDE, B., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

G Administration of Estates—Loan to executor for purposes of estate—Personal debt of executor—Repayment claimed by lender from estate—Need to prove that executor would have been allowed sum in account with estate—Loan for purpose inconsistent with due administration—No charge on estate.

H Where a person lends money to an executor in order that he may apply it for the purposes of the testator's assets, this is a personal debt of the executor. If the lender claims repayment out of the testator's assets he must show that the executor himself would have been allowed that sum in taking the accounts of the testator's estate. If a person advances money to an executor confessedly for a purpose which, though relating to the testator's estate, is, to the lender's knowledge, inconsistent with the due administration of the trusts, he does not acquire any charge on the assets of the testator.

I Executor—Power to carry on business of testator—No directions in will—Power generally limited to winding-up—Completion of contract—Expenditure to improve mortgage security—Need for exercise of great care.

Per SIR JOHN ROMILLY, M.R.: The acts which an executor, in the absence of any directions contained in the will, can or ought to do to complete or render available the contract or property of a testator depend so much on the peculiar circumstances of each case that I find it difficult to state with distinctness a general principle applicable to all such cases. Some points, however, are settled. Thus it is clear that an executor cannot carry on the trade of the testator except for the mere purpose of winding it up, but the executor may, and in some cases is bound to, complete contracts entered into by his testator. If the testator has advanced money on the mortgage of a property which was originally an insufficient security or has become so by some subsequent accident, and the mortgagor applies to the executor for a further advance on the ground that the outlay of this further money would render the property sufficient to pay both sums, I know of no principle or decision which would preclude the executor from advancing such further sum out of the assets of the testator in order to effect this object. The expenditure of money to recover money either lost or endangered is a matter which requires very careful and grave consideration, and if the result shows that the transaction is such as only to create an additional loss, it is incumbent on the executor to prove that he used every means in his power to ascertain the chances of success and acted as a reasonable man would have done in similar circumstances with reference to his own property after he had obtained the best evidence on the subject.

Appeal from a decree of SIR JOHN ROMILLY, M.R., in an administration action.

On Mar. 26, 1850, Mrs. Hannah Hardisty, the testatrix, advanced £1,500 to a Mr. Fletcher upon the security of a steam-vessel called the Toward Castle. In the month of October following, Mrs. Hardisty, at Fletcher's request, agreed to permit the engines to be removed from the Toward Castle to a ship called the Engineer, on the terms of having a mortgage of that vessel and also of another called the Orion which was already mortgaged to another person. Accordingly, by a deed dated Oct. 30, 1850, Mr. Fletcher, for the consideration before stated, assigned the Orion to Mrs. Hardisty, subject to the prior mortgages upon it, and also covenanted to assign the Engineer as soon as the transfer of the machinery and other repairs which he then contemplated making to that ship were completed. Mrs. Hardisty was made a party to this deed, but she never executed it. The defendant Lister acted as the friend and adviser of Mrs. Hardisty in these transactions.

On Dec. 24, 1850, Mrs. Hardisty died. By her will she appointed Lister her sole executor, and made the plaintiffs, who were her sisters, her residuary legatees. Lister proved the will. The testatrix died possessed of little property beyond the principal sum due from Fletcher. At the time of the decease of the testatrix, Francis Lister was agent and manager of the Goole branch of the York City and County Bank, and in that character advanced the funds to customers of the bank on such terms as he thought fit. In the lifetime of Mrs. Hardisty, the Bank Quay Foundry Co. was employed by Mr. Fletcher to transfer the engines from the Toward Castle

A to the Engineer, and to make other repairs to that ship, on account of which he paid the company a sum of £443 a few days before the death of the testatrix. Early in 1851 the company refused to proceed further with the repairs, unless a further sum of £300 was paid to them. Fletcher being unable to pay this money, applied to Lister to advance it, which he did, as stated by him in his answer,

B "by a cheque drawn by me on account of Mrs. Hardisty on the banking company for the sum of £300, and the same is debited in the books of the banking company, in sundry persons' accounts, to Mrs. Hardisty's executors."

Mr. Fletcher subsequently required a further advance of £700 for the same purpose, which Lister proposed also to advance, and he (Lister) wrote to Mr. England, who acted as his solicitor in the transaction, a letter dated Mar. 15, 1851, as follows:

C "It is now decided that I, as Mrs. Hardisty's executor, should advance another £1,000 [i.e., the £300 and £700] to Mr. Thomas Fletcher, and take a mortgage on the Engineer for £2,500. I think it probable that the family will relieve me of it rather than allow me to sell, which, of course, I must do in the long run, to wind-up her [Mrs. Hardisty's] affairs, so that you will be good enough to prepare a mortgage to me for £2,500. The ship is to be ready in about a fortnight."

D The vessel was completed in April, 1851, when the Foundry company, in addition to the sums of £443 and £300 already paid, claimed a lien on it (the sum of £700 was not then paid to the Foundry company) for £1,598 4s. 5d. in respect of the repairs. Thereupon Mr. Lister made a compromise with the company, who agreed to accept the hull of the Toward Castle and the sum of £1,320, in full of their demands. Mr. Lister advanced this sum, according to his answer,

E "as being money in his hands belonging to the estate of Mrs. Hardisty, and, as her executor, to the said Bank Quay Foundry Co."

He said:

F "The said sum of £1,320 was procured by me by a cheque drawn by me on the said banking company, and signed as follows: 'Francis Lister, Hardisty's executor,' and the same was debited in the books of the said banking company, in sundry persons' account, as follows: 'Hardisty's executors, £1,320,' making altogether £1,620, for there was only £300 advanced before. The £700 forms in fact part of this. The transactions took place without any communication by me with the directors or any person having the management of the said banking company."

G It appeared from the evidence that the testatrix never had any account with the bank, nor had Mr. Lister opened any account there as her executor.

H By a deed of assignment, dated April 26, 1851, which recited the advance of the £1,500 by Mrs. Hardisty and the advance of the two sums of £300 and £1,320 by Lister, in his character of executor, Fletcher assigned the vessel, the Engineer, to Lister, to secure payment of these sums and interest. On May 5 the ship and the mortgage were registered. At the close of the year 1851 the directors of the bank inspected the accounts of the Goole branch, and, observing the two entries of the £300 and the £1,320, debited to Mrs. Hardisty's executor, made further inquiry, and were made acquainted with the facts stated. Thereupon the directors insisted upon Lister's depositing with, and transferring to them, the securities held by him in the vessel. This he did by an indenture dated Jan. 16, 1852, made by him of the first part, and Mr. Price and Mr. Meek, trustees of the bank, of the second part, whereby, after reciting the assignment of the Engineer by Fletcher to Lister and the registry; that the three sums of £1,500, £300 and £1,320 were due to Lister; and that Lister had applied to the banking company to lend him £1,620 in consideration of £1,620 by the trustees paid to Lister. Lister transferred and assigned to Price and Meek, their executors, administrators and assigns, the three sums of £1,500, £300 and £1,320, and all interest to become due in respect thereof, and also the steam-vessel called the Engineer and all the policies of insurance effected or to be effected thereon (subject to the equity of redemption therein), as security for the repayment of the said £1,620 and interest, with power to sell the vessel. Under this instrument the banking company caused the ship, the Engineer, to be sold for £1,150, which was paid to the banking company. The Orion had been previously sold by the prior mortgagee, and did not realise sufficient to pay what was due to him.

This suit was instituted by the residuary legatees against Lister and the banking company, to test the right of the company to retain the proceeds of the sale of the Toward Castle.

Roupell, Q.C., and Amphlett for the plaintiffs.

Follett, Q.C., and Robson for the defendant Lister.

Roundell Palmer, Q.C., and J. V. Prior for the banking company.

SIR JOHN ROMILLY, M.R.—This, in form, is an administration suit, but a question of considerable difficulty is raised between the plaintiffs, who are the residuary legatees of the testatrix, and the York City and County Bank, with reference to the claim of the company to have a first charge on the proceeds of the sale of a ship mortgaged to the testatrix, in respect of further advances made by the executor with moneys obtained from the bank. The plaintiffs deny the authority of the executor to obtain a loan from the bank for this purpose, and contend that it is a mere debt incurred personally by the executor to the bank which in no way affects the estate of the testatrix. The executor and the bank allege that he, as her legal personal representative, had authority to borrow money from the bank; that he did so; and that the money so obtained must be treated as advanced for the benefit of her estate, and as part of her estate.

The question to be determined is the effect of these transactions, and for this purpose, I think it material first to consider the effect of them as between the plaintiffs and the defendant Lister, without regard to the interests of the banking company, because, in my opinion, the rights of the banking company must in a great measure depend on the effect of these transactions as between Lister and his cestuis que trust. It is established by the evidence, in my opinion, that the testatrix consented to the transfer of the mortgage from the Toward Castle to the Engineer. If, therefore, the Engineer produced nothing after her decease, the loss would fall on her estate. It is also clear that the Foundry company, who repaired the ship and transferred the engines, had a lien on the vessel for the costs of such repairs, and that, except by discharging those costs, the vessel could not have been recovered, or the mortgage on it made available. It is also, in my opinion, equally clear, first, that Fletcher, by discharging these costs out of his own moneys, could not have defeated or prejudiced the mortgage he had covenanted to give to the testatrix; and that if he had borrowed money for that purpose from a stranger who had received notice of the testatrix's mortgages that person could not have obtained from Fletcher a priority over the testatrix. It follows, therefore, that Lister could not, by advancing his own moneys to Fletcher, have obtained such a priority, neither could he, as agent for the bank and by advancing moneys on account of the bank to Fletcher, have obtained for his principals such a priority, but this is not the way in which the advance was made, and the facts, as I have stated them, must be borne in mind in considering this matter.

It is contended on behalf of Lister, first, that in his character of executor he was entitled to advance the assets of the testatrix to make the mortgage available, and that, if he acted bona fide, the result cannot affect the question of breach of trust; and, secondly, that, if he was entitled to advance the assets of the testatrix for this purpose, he was equally entitled to borrow money for that purpose. This opens a question of great importance as regards the powers and liabilities of executors in discharge of the duties entrusted to and undertaken by them. The acts which an executor, in the absence of any directions contained in the will, can or ought to do for the purpose of completing or rendering available the contract or

- A property of the testatrix, depend so much on the peculiar circumstances of each case that I find it difficult to state with distinctness a general principle applicable to all such cases. Some points, however, are settled. Thus it is clear that an executor cannot carry on the trade of the testator except for the mere purpose of winding it up, but the executor may, and in some cases is bound to, complete contracts entered into by his testator, and the instance of a testator who had contracted to build a house, and died, having provided the materials, and half completed the work (Marshall v. Broadhurst (1)), was cited and relied on at the Bar, as an undoubted instance where the executor's duty would be to complete the imperfect work. In TOLLER ON EXECUTORS, 487, a case is mentioned where the testator, a wine cooper, had left a stock of wines, which could not have been advantageously sold unless the executor had purchased other wines for the purpose of refining the whole stock. That act was held not to constitute him a trader, but to have been done in the due discharge of his duty as executor. If a testator has advanced money on the mortgage of a property which was originally an insufficient security or has become so by some subsequent accident, and the mortgagor applies to the executor for a further advance on the ground that the outlay of this further money would render the property sufficient to pay both sums, I know of no principle or decision which would preclude the executor from advancing such further sum out of the assets of the testator in order to effect this object. It would be dangerous to lay down any rule which would prevent the executor from exercising a bona fide discretion in any such case, or even to charge him with a devastavit in case the result should disappoint his expectations, but if a loss should be the result, it appears to me to be a preliminary condition, before such an advance could be allowed to him, that he should have carefully investigated the probability of success before he advanced the money of his cestuis que trust for such a purpose. The expenditure of money to recover money either lost or endangered is a matter which requires very careful and grave consideration, and if the result shows that the transaction is such as only to create an additional loss, it is incumbent on the executor to prove that he used every means in his power to ascertain the chances of success and acted as a reasonable man would have done under similar circumstances with reference to his own property after he had obtained the best evidence on the subject.
- F

- To apply that rule to the present case, treating this suit as an ordinary suit for the administration of the testatrix's estate, and assuming that Lister had, out of her assets, advanced first £300, and then £1,320 for the purposes detailed in his answer and the evidence and that he now seeks to have these advances allowed to him in taking his accounts, I am of opinion that he did not take the precautions which were fitting and proper before he advanced these sums, and, if he had done so, and acted prudently, he would not have made these advances. In the case, therefore, which I have supposed, of Lister having in his hands assets belonging to the testatrix, I am of opinion that these advances could not have been allowed to him, but that he would be charged with that amount as a loss improperly occasioned by him to the estate. The case, however, becomes much stronger against him when it is considered that he borrowed money for this purpose, which is always a more dangerous proceeding than the laying out of money already existing. If the question had rested between the plaintiffs and the executor, and the interest of a third party had not been concerned, this point would have been immaterial, for no assets exist out of which Lister could seek for payment, and it could not be contended that the plaintiffs were personally liable to repay the advances made. The consideration of the point, however, has become important as affecting the rights of the banking company and the claim made by the plaintiffs against them; and I shall consider it, first, independently of the deed of Jan. 16, 1852, and then inquire how it is affected by that deed.
- I

The mode by which these sums were obtained by Lister in April, 1851, requires to be noticed. He was both the borrower and the lender. It is not denied that, as agent of the bank, he had the authority, as well as the power, to advance the moneys of the bank to such persons as he should think fit, and all facts known to him as executor were also known to him as agent of the bank and must bind the bank exactly in the same manner as if they had acted directly in the transaction with full knowledge of these facts. The circumstance of his being also executor does not, in my opinion, affect the transaction, and I look at it in exactly the same light as I should do if he had advanced the money to any other person who was the executor of the testatrix, and when he did so he knew all the facts and the purpose for which the money was advanced. It was, therefore, an advance by the agent of the banking company on behalf of the company to the executor of the testatrix without taking any security from him, made in order to enable the executor to lend the money to Fletcher, to be by him applied in discharging a lien which the ship-builders had on the ship which Fletcher had covenanted to assign to the testatrix as security for former advances, which mortgage would constitute the first charge on the vessel as soon as it was registered. If the agent of the bank and the executor had been distinct persons, and the money had been advanced by the agent on an assignment of the mortgage by the executor, though with knowledge of the purpose for which the executor had required the money, the case would have been wholly different, whatever might have been the rights of the cestuis que trust against the executor. But no such contract is made; the union of both characters in Lister would have rendered it difficult to make any contract of this kind, which would be legal and effectual. A contract requires two parties to it, and a man in one character can with difficulty contract with himself in another character. In this case it is not even alleged that the original advance was made on the security of the mortgage to the testatrix: probably Lister thought the vessel would be able to pay both charges. Whether this was so or not, all that occurs is the introduction of the two entries in the books of the bank, which entries I consider wholly inoperative for any purpose except to show the purpose for which Lister wanted and took the money. The fact I consider to be this. Lister advanced the money of the bank in his character of agent to Fletcher, and took an assignment of the ship in his name of executor to secure these advances, in addition to the prior mortgage of the testatrix. Even regarding it as a bona fide advance by the bank to the executor for the purpose for which it was applied, it could not, in my opinion, be allowed to the bank against the assets of the testatrix, though it might bind her assets, if it had been properly and beneficially applied for the purpose of her estate—that is, if the cestuis que trust had had the benefit of it.

The right of the bank is to stand in the place of the executor, and it is limited to his rights as against the assets of the testatrix. I have already stated my opinion that, in this case, the executor could not be allowed these sums against the assets of the testatrix. If a man, without taking any security, advances money to another who is an executor, and the executor informs the lender that he requires the money for the purposes of the testator's estate but in fact misapplies the money, that cannot bind the persons interested in the testator's estate, but constitutes simply a general debt from the borrower to the lender. In Downes v. Power (2) LORD MANNERS said:

“Whatever may have been the old decisions on this subject, it is now clearly established, that whoever will deal with an executor for the assets of the testator for a purpose perfectly inconsistent with the due administration of those assets, subjects himself to the consequences of a deceit.”

I think that the same observation applies to a person who advances money to an executor confessedly for a purpose, though relating to the testator's estate, which is perfectly inconsistent with the due administration of the trusts, and that he does not thereby acquire any charge on the assets of the testator. Where a person lends money to an executor in order that he may apply it for the purposes of the testator's assets, this is a personal debt of the executor. But if the lender claims repayment out of the testator's assets, it can only be in case he show that the

A executor himself would have been allowed that sum in taking the accounts of the testator's estate. This is, in my opinion, the case as it originally stood, and the original loan of the money does not therefore give the banking company any lien on any part of the assets of the testatrix.

I now come to the deed of January, 1852, which is, in form, an assignment of the three debts due from Fletcher, and of the ship, to secure the sum of £1,620, then for the first time advanced by the banking company. From what I have already stated it follows that, if this had been the real transaction, it might have constituted a good assignment of the property therein mentioned to secure that advance. But the real transaction is not expressed on the face of the deed. No money was then advanced by the bank; it was in truth only an attempt to secure the money already advanced upon no security at all, with full knowledge of all the facts, and by that means to obtain a priority over a prior mortgage of the testatrix. In my opinion, neither the testatrix's mortgage nor the interest of the residuary legatees are affected by this deed. It leaves the matter exactly as it stood before it was executed. The deeds and their recitals disclose fully all matters relative to the mortgage of the testatrix, and the subsequent advances of money by Lister, and if the prior transaction did not give the bank a charge on the testatrix's assets, or on the ship as a part of them, this deed did not, in my opinion, mend their position in this respect. In fact I consider this part of the case as coming within the principle of the decision in Wilson v. Wilson (3).

The short result is that the executor was not justified in making the advance to Fletcher out of any assets of the testatrix, that, such advance being made a charge upon the assets with the full knowledge of the testatrix's mortgage, it did not give the bank priority over it, or displace the prior charge of the testatrix, and, consequently, that the proceeds of the sale of the vessel are to be applied, in the first instance, in payment of what is due on the charge of the testatrix, then in payment of the debt due to the banking company, and, as the sale of the ship has not produced sufficient for that purpose, the banking company must pay the £1,150 into court to the credit of this cause, to be administered as part of the assets of the testatrix. I shall make the usual decree for an account against Lister, and that, in taking that account, no allowance is to be made to him in respect of the two sums of £300 and £1,320 obtained by him from the moneys of the bank, and I shall declare that the testatrix's estate is not liable to pay those sums. I shall stay all proceedings in the suit against the defendants who represent the bank, but, as this suit has, in my opinion, up to this point been occasioned by a contention on the part of the bank and of the defendant Lister, which cannot be sustained, they must pay the costs up to and including the hearing.

The defendants appealed.

Follett, Q.C., Palmer, Q.C., Robson and Hobhouse for the defendants.
Roupell, Q.C., and Amphlett for the plaintiffs.

H KNIGHT-BRUCE, L.J., said that this appeal was from a decree in a cause exhibiting too much unscrupulous conduct to be observed without regret and something more. The decree, by relieving the small estate of Mrs. Hardisty from two sums of £300 and £1,320, alleged to have been applied by the executor for its benefit and for that purpose to have been obtained from the York City and County Bank, and by restoring to it a sum of £1,150 which had been abstracted from it, had given it a chance of escape from annihilation. To this decree the executor and the other defendants, the officers of the bank, objected.

I The first question was whether the bank had a stronger right against the estate than their dismissed officer and present ally, Lister, could have, and this question must be answered in the negative. There had been instances in which a dishonest executor, by borrowing money in that character, had been able to make the lender a creditor upon the estate. But if, at the time of the loan and before parting with the money, the lender had notice of a breach of trust, or of an intention to misapply the money, he must stand and fall with the executor. This rule was not only founded upon justice, but was supported by the authority of Lord Eldon, and not by that great authority alone. Further, if a banking company employed an agent to carry on their business at a branch bank, and the agent lent money under questionable circumstances, as in the instance of a trustee borrowing money in that character, and the circumstances were known to the agent, the bank acquired no better title than their agent or than the trustee. Here, if the banking company were lenders to Mrs. Hardisty's executor, the executor borrowing and their agent lending were the same person. Lister had helped himself and his friend Mr. Fletcher first to £300 and then to £1,320, before June, 1851, nor had the alleged security of Jan. 16, 1852, any other foundation than these advances made so many months previously. Those sums were the £1,620 mentioned in that security and in the deed of April, 1852. For the purposes of the suit, as far as the sums of £300, £1,320, and £1,150 were concerned, Lister was the banking company, and the banking company was Lister. It was material to consider the conduct of Lister as to the removal of the machinery of the ship Toward Castle, which was made a security for £1,500 lent by the testatrix to Mr. Fletcher through him, and also as to the rash and heavy expense incurred in the mending of the ship Engineer in the years 1850 and 1851.

Having considered the facts and the documents, the manner in which they affected Lister, and the degree of credit due to the statement of Lister as a witness, the circumstance that Mrs. Hardisty was a party to the mortgage of the Toward Castle and not to that of the Orion, and the entire evidence, he (his Lordship) could not say he thought the court ought to believe that Mrs. Hardisty ever consented to relinquish the security upon the Toward Castle or agreed to the removal of the machinery, or to accept the security on the Orion and Engineer. It was clear, however, that the engines of the Toward Castle were removed with the knowledge and consent of Lister, who professed to act in the matter as Mrs. Hardisty's agent. It was also clear that Lister was aware of the contents of the will, and that he accepted the executorship with a knowledge of the facts as to the ships. No ground had been shown for believing that Mr. Fletcher was then insolvent or out of England, if he was ever insolvent or out of England. It was, therefore, the clear duty of Lister, with all dispatch, to prove the will, and to demand payment of the £1,500, or so much of that sum as was due to the estate, and to proceed against him personally in the usual way to recover it. Lister, however, had done no such thing, but had taken the unjustifiable course which had ended in the security of April, 1851. By such conduct he became personally liable to the estate—if not for the whole £1,500, at least for that part of it which belonged to her estate, and which was admitted to have been more than four-fifths. The estate accordingly, and, therefore, the plaintiffs, upon the security being taken, became entitled, in aid of Lister's liability, to a charge upon the ship Engineer and her machinery, a lien and charge preferable to that of the banking company under the mortgage of January, 1852, and to any charge in favour of Lister, or otherwise in respect of repairs and works on that or any other vessel or any machinery. The lien of the shipbuilders was satisfied in April, 1851, when the ship was parted with. This lien was not intended to be kept up, if it could be kept up. It was never transferred or revived, if it was intended to be, or could be transferred or revived. The notion of bringing the charge claimed by the bank upon an equality with the lien to which Mrs. Hardisty's estate was entitled was absurd, it being manifest that the executor had no right to lay out Mrs. Hardisty's assets in improving the ship Engineer. He had no apology or excuse of intending to benefit the estate of his testatrix, for the evidence showed that he thought of nothing but his own advantage, or of Mr. Fletcher's as connected with his own.

The result was, that, as between him and the plaintiffs, the purchase-money of the ship was money of the plaintiffs' or of Mrs. Hardisty's estate. It was not less so as between the plaintiffs and the banking company. The banking company could have no right to indemnify themselves by assisting Lister to commit a fraud upon the plaintiffs, whose trustee the banking company in fact knew him to be.

- A The Ship Registry Acts had nothing to do with the question; and no case of acquiescence had been established against the plaintiffs. The decree did no more than justice. The appellants must pay the costs of this more than unfounded appeal, and the banking company must also be charged with interest upon the sum of £1,150 from the time it was received by them.
- B TURNER, L.J., said that he was also of opinion that this appeal must be dismissed, and that the banking company could not stand in a better position with respect to Mrs. Hardisty's estate than Lister the executor. The bank had taken an assignment of securities, which upon the face of them appeared to belong to the estate of the testatrix, for securing an antecedent debt due to them from Lister, and neither upon principle nor upon authority could they claim any better right
- C than Lister himself had. The question was whether Lister was entitled to set up his own advances in priority to those of the testatrix. To make a case for this he must show that those advances were necessary and were made bona fide with a view to the benefit of the estate. Neither of those matters had been shown. [His LORDSHIP referred to certain parts of the evidence.] Counsel for the defendants had referred the court to Pennell v. Deffell (4). It was clear that the doctrine of that case could not be applied here in favour of the bank, for, in the first place,
- D the bank had treated the transaction as a loan from them to Lister, and taken the assignment of the securities on that ground; and if it were a case in which it was possible to apply the doctrine of following trust-moneys, the bank would be affected by the consequences of the act of Lister, who was their agent, in making these advances. In one respect the decree should have gone further than it did. Interest
- E at 4 per cent. should be allowed upon the £1,150 received by the bank. The defendants would pay the costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Will—"Ready money"—Balance at bank.

By his will a testator gave to trustees "the rest and residue of my ready money, securities for money, and moneys in the funds" to invest and to deal with the interest and capital as directed in the will.

- I Held: having regard to the other provisions of the will and construing the will according to the ordinary acceptation of language in the transactions of mankind, the words "ready money" included balances standing to the credit of the testator at his bankers.

Will—Construction—Construction of language according to ordinary acceptation in transactions of mankind.

In construing a will of personal property the terms used in the will are to be construed according to the ordinary acceptation in the transactions of mankind: per LORD LYNDBURST, L.C.

Will—"Goods, chattels, and effects"—Prima facie general and unlimited expressions as applied to personality—Application of ejusdem generis rule.

By his will a testator, after giving various pecuniary legacies and bequeathing the rest and residue of his ready money and securities to trustees for the benefit of his wife, gave and bequeathed to his wife "all my jewels, plate, linen, china, carriages, wines, and other goods, chattels, and effects whatsoever, as her own goods and chattels for ever."

Held, by KNIGHT-BRUCE, V.-C.: prima facie the words "goods, chattels, and effects" were general and unlimited expressions as applied to personality, and, in the absence of any intention to use them in any other sense being apparent in the will, the ejusdem generis rule was not applicable, and the effect of the words was sufficient to pass the residue of his property to his wife.

Will—Servants—Gift to servants—Claim of servant in service at time of codicil, but leaving it before testator's death.

A testator, by a codicil, bequeathed pecuniary legacies to named persons, who were described as having lived many years in his family, and then added: "to the other servants £500 each."

Held, by KNIGHT-BRUCE, V.-C.: a person who was in the testator's service at the date of the codicil, but who left it before his death, was entitled to a legacy of £500.

Appeal from part of a decree made by KNIGHT-BRUCE, V.-C., on a bill filed by the widow of the testator praying that the trusts of the will might be declared and carried into execution. C

The testator, Robert Parker, by his will bequeathed and devised as follows:

"I direct in the first place all my debts to be paid. I then give and bequeath to my dear and affectionate wife, Helen, £60,000, £3 per cent. consols, part of a larger sum standing in my name in the Bank of England. Also, I give and bequeath to Elizabeth, the widow of Charles Bedford Young, deceased, £10,000, part of the aforesaid £3 per cent. consols. Also, to Mary Ann Young, her daughter, £5,000, other part of my aforesaid £3 per cent. consols. Also, I give to Ariana, wife of — Aickin, Esq., formerly Ariana Shelley, £500. To my godson, John Shelley. £100. . . . Also, I give and bequeath to my dear brother-in-law, Sir Timothy Shelley, Bart., and Sir John Shelley Sidney, Bart., all the rest and residue of my ready money, securities for money, and moneys in the funds, in trust to invest the same in their joint names, and to pay to or permit and suffer my dear wife Helen, or her agent, for her use, to receive the dividends or interest of the same during her life, and after her decease for this further trust, to divide, transfer, and pay the said stocks and monies unto and amongst my cousins, Thomas Marchant, John Marchant, the children of my late cousin William Marchant, and the children of my late cousin Mary Knight—namely, one equal share to Thomas, one equal share to John, one equal share to the children of William, and the remaining share to the children of Mary Knight." D E F

As to the messuages, lands, tenements, and real estates, he disposed thereof as follows. He gave and devised unto the said Sir T. Shelley and Sir J. Sidney, and their heirs, all those his two-third parts, and all other his right and interest in and to all those messuages, lands, and tenements, situate at Ifield, in the county of Sussex; also in and to all that messuage, lands, and tenements in Charlewood, in the county of Surrey, with their and every of their appurtenances, either in the said or in any other parishes or places situate and called or known by the name of Westfield, or by whatever other name called or known; also, all that his manor, or royalty, messuages, and hereditaments and castle, situate at Otford, in the county of Kent, with the appurtenances; also, all that his messuage with the appurtenances at Chevington, in the county of Suffolk; also his farm and lands in Hargrave and Hasset, in Suffolk; also, in Hoo, in Kent, in Ifield, in the county of Sussex, in Charlewood, in Surrey; also, his house and premises in Catherine Place, Bath; and all other his messuages, lands, tenements, and hereditaments which might not be therein particularly described or mentioned, upon the following trusts: First, for the use of his said wife Helen, for her natural life, and after her decease to the use of the said Thomas Marchant and John Marchant, and the children of the said William Marchant and Mary Knight, in equal shares and proportions, as tenants in common. The testator then bequeathed as follows: G H I

"And I do further give and bequeath to my said wife all my jewels, plate, linen, china, carriages, wines, and other goods, chattels, and effects what-

A soever, as her own goods and chattels for ever. And I do hereby constitute and appoint my said wife sole executrix of this my will."

By a codicil the testator bequeathed as follows:

B "I give and bequeath to the following persons, who have lived many years in my family; viz., to Mrs. Down, £1,000; to Mr. Jones, £1,000; to Martha Isgrove, £1,000; to the other servants, £500 each. This writing I direct to be taken as a codicil to my will."

The testator died on Mar. 27, 1837. Thomas Marchant died in his lifetime. The bill was filed by the widow against the several other persons interested under the will and against the trustees, praying that the trusts of the will might be declared and carried into execution. In pursuance of the decree made in this cause in December, 1838, the master found that the testator was, at the time of his death, possessed of £22,891 15s. 7d. ready money, the greater part of which consisted of balances in the hands of two banking houses, and the residue of money in his dwelling-house, and in the hands of his agents. The master also found that the testator was, at the time of his will and of his death, seised of or well entitled to the estates mentioned in his will, all of which were freehold or copyhold, and stated that Ann Relfe, who had been in the testator's service at the date of his codicil, but had quitted it before the testator's death, had claimed a legacy of £500, under the bequest to "the other servants," which claim he had disallowed, but recommended it to the attention of the court.

Sir Charles Wetherell, Wilbraham and Lovat for the plaintiff.

Bethell and Boyle for the defendant John Marchant.

Cur. adv. vult.

Mar. 8, 1842. KNIGHT-BRUCE, V.-C., read the following judgment.—The questions in this case are upon the will and codicil, dated respectively in 1829 and 1830, of Robert Parker, who died in 1837. It may be convenient in the first place to dispose of the codicil by stating my opinion that the legacies given by it are general pecuniary legacies, payable in the ordinary way out of the general personal estate, and not otherwise, and that the legacy claimed by Ann Relfe under the bequest "to the other servants" of £500 each is due. She is admitted to have been within that description when the codicil was made, for the "many years' service" is not contended to have applied to "the other servants." She subsequently quitted the testator's service in his lifetime, did not return to it, and was, therefore, argued to have lost her legacy. The codicil does not, in express terms, annex to the gift the condition of continuing service. It has not been argued to be capable of extension to servants, if any, who subsequently to the codicil entered his service for the first time, though continuing in his service at his death. On the other hand, the circumstance that he has described the legatees by their employment and not by name does not, as I conceive, import that the employment and character must continue. Jones v. Henley (1), which was cited at the Bar, did not turn upon the same language as that now before me. I think that this disputed legacy ought to be paid—a conclusion probably agreeable to the civil law, for a law of ULPIAN, in the PANDECTS, lib. 34, tit. 5, art. 19, De rebus dubiis, provides thus:

"Si cognatis legatum sit, et hi cognati quidem esse desierint [this might be through emancipation], in civitate autem maneant, dicendum deberi legatum; cognati enim testamenti facti tempore fuerunt."

ULPIAN goes on to say :

"Certe si quis testamenti facti tempore cognatus non fuit, mortis autem tempore factus est per adrogationem, facilius legatum consequitur."

How far this latter position is one adopted by the English law it is unnecessary now to consider. The former is, I conceive, in conformity with our principles.

The first point upon the will that it may be right to mention is the question whether the testator has disposed of the beneficial interest in the general residue of his personal estate or has so far died intestate. This turns upon the meaning to be attributed to the words "goods, chattels, and effects," having regard to the position in which they are found in the will, and having regard, also, to the whole contents of the will. LORD COTTENHAM, in Saumarez v. Saumarez (2), expressed his assent, and I agree with him in assenting, to a general rule of construction as laid down or recognised by LORD ELDON in Church v. Mundy (3), thus (15 Ves. at p. 406) :

"It is much more safe to consider those subjects intended which the words describe, than to supply a purpose by conjecture; determining for the testator upon the more or less convenience with which that subject may be, which he has declared shall be, applied. The best rule of construction is that which takes the words to comprehend a subject that falls within their usual sense, unless there is something like declaration plain to the contrary."

The words "goods, chattels, and effects," which the bequest contended to be residuary contains, or any of them, are terms that, in their proper sense and nature, are sufficiently large to include and pass the absolute interest in the whole personal estate. But a will may be so worded as to show that, according to a reasonable construction of it, the testator must have intended to use those terms in a limited and restricted sense, and when this appears the intention so collected must have effect given to it. It is, however, incumbent on those who contend for the limited construction to show that a rational interpretation of the will requires a departure from that which ordinarily and prima facie is the sense and meaning of the words. Such I take to be in substance the rule to be collected from all the authorities, and to this test the gift in question must be subjected.

The testator, after directing the payment of his debts, and making bequests of stock and money to his wife and other persons (which exhaust all the ready money that he might have at his death, and at least all the securities for money and moneys in the funds that he had when he made his will), and disposing of his landed property (in which the wife takes a life interest, and which disposition of the landed property is asserted on one hand and denied on the other to have included his chattel leasehold property), concludes his will thus :

"And I do further give and bequeath to my said wife all my jewels, plate, linen, china, carriages, wines, and other goods, chattels, and effects whatsoever, as her own goods and chattels for ever."

That is the whole of the clause now in question. It is to be observed, first, that it does not contain any limitation in point of locality—any reference to place; secondly, that the larger and generic terms, "goods, chattels, and effects," follow the specific terms, "jewels, plate, linen, china, carriages, wines," and are the last-enumerated subjects of the gift; thirdly, that there is not, in any subsequent part of the will or in the codicil any disposition or expression denoting a belief in the testator's mind that there was anything not expressly given to some other person which the clause in question would not carry to the wife; and fourthly, that the gift to her, followed by her appointment to the sole executorship and by nothing else, is in that part of the will where, according to habit and custom, the disposition of the residue, if any, would be expected to be found.

These considerations, each of more or less importance in construing the instrument, are only met by a rule, certainly of frequent, but not of universal application, confining such a general term as "goods," "chattels," or "effects," following a

A particular enumeration of specified articles to things ejusdem generis with the articles specified. To this rule LORD ELDON alludes in Stuart v. Marquis of Bute (4) and Hotham v. Sutton (5), and its recognition is of frequent occurrence elsewhere in the books. That it is not of universal application is clearly shown by several authorities, of which some have been mentioned in the course of the argument. In Arnold v. Arnold (6), LORD COTTENHAM [then SIR CHARLES PEPYS, M.R.]

B thus expresses himself on the subject (2 My. & K. at pp. 372, 373):

C “The question, then, is, whether, assuming this to be the right construction, the expression ‘my wines and property in England,’ will not include every description of property found to be locally situate in this country, or whether there be any rule which necessarily limits that property to articles of the same kind with the subject-matter of the previous gift. That the mere enumeration of particular articles followed by a general bequest does not of necessity restrict the general bequest is obvious because, as has been stated, a testator often throws in such specific words, and then winds up the catalogue with some comprehensive expression for the very purpose of preventing the bequest from being so restricted. Clearly, therefore, in the ordinary case, the gift of the wines would not be limited by the occurrence of the subsequent word, ‘property,’ which, be it observed, is as large and comprehensive a term as can possibly be used. The question, then, remains, whether the limit, in point of place, imposed by the testator on the extent of the bequest, ought to make any difference; and I can find neither reason nor authority for holding that it should. Indeed, I have been unable to discover any instance in which the word ‘property’ has been confined to articles of the description before enumerated, unless where other expressions occurred, from which it was clear that the word was not there used in its ordinary sense.”

E SIR WILLIAM GRANT, in Campbell v. Prescott (7), thus expresses himself (15 Ves. at p. 507):

F “The next question is whether the surplus belongs to the next-of-kin or to the residuary legatees: that is, whether the latter takes it by the express disposition; . . . and I think they do so take. There is no case for the restrictive sense which the grandchildren put on the general words ‘all my effects whatsoever.’ LORD MANSFIELD says [in Hogan v. Jackson (24)] the word ‘effects’ is equivalent to property or worldly substance. The plaintiffs are, therefore, entitled to a decree.”

G And in Michell v. Michell (8), SIR JOHN LEACH, V.-C., says (5 Madd. at pp. 71, 72):

H “The word ‘effects,’ used simpliciter, will carry the whole personal estate, as a gift of ‘all my effects’ without more; but it is frequently used in a restrictive sense, meaning goods and moveables, as in the common expression of ‘furniture and effects.’ In every case, the court has to collect from the context the particular sense in which the testator has intended to use it. In Campbell v. Prescott (7), there were added to the word ‘effects,’ ‘of what nature or kind soever’; and this addition excluded its restrictive sense. And it appears to me, that the words which follow the word ‘effects’ in the present case, ‘that he shall die possessed of,’ lead to the same conclusion.”

I Acknowledging, as I do, the principles recognised in these three cases, and in Church v. Mundy (3), and recollecting particularly that prima facie the words “goods, chattels, and effects,” are general and unlimited expressions as applied to personalty, what judicial ground have I for saying that an intention to use them in any other sense is apparent on this will? Conceiving the general interpretation to be not only consistent with propriety of language and expression, but to be at least as probably conformable with the testator’s views and intentions to be collected from the whole will as any other construction, I consider myself not authorised to depart from it, and, therefore, not authorised to accede to the argument which contends against the wife's right to the residue. I declare it, accordingly, to belong to the plaintiff, her executor. A

Before leaving this part of the case, it may be remarked, that SIR WILLIAM GRANT's judgment in Rawlings v. Jennings (9), contains this passage (13 Ves. at p. 46):

"The second question arises on the widow's claim of the whole residue of the personal estate, as passing to her under the general word 'effects.' That claim cannot be sustained. Part of his property being particularly given to her afterwards, the word 'effects' must receive a more limited interpretation, and must be confined to articles ejusdem generis with those specified in the preceding part of the sentence, namely, household furniture." B

As the will in that case is stated in the report and in the registrar's book, the gift forming, apparently, the reason of the judgment as to the import of the word "effects" does not appear. The will, however, may have contained more than the report and the registrar's book show. Certainly there were bequests to various persons after the bequest to the wife of the "household furniture and effects." Perhaps, also, in that case the word "household" may be considered to have belonged to the word "effects" as much as to the word "furniture." C D

The next question is whether the plaintiff is right in contending that the testator's debts and the pecuniary legacies given by the will are payable, not in the ordinary course, but primarily or solely out of the "ready money, securities for money, and moneys in the funds." Here, also, the general rule, which in this instance is against the plaintiff's claim, must apply unless upon the will and codicil, or one of them, he can show a contrary intention manifested. The word "then" and the words "rest and residue" are said by him to manifest such an intention, and Choat v. Yeats (10) is cited in support of the proposition, which, I think, however, he does not as to the debts establish. The first passage of the will makes the real estate liable as equitable assets to the payment of all the debts, which otherwise it would not have been. The real estate, however, is not by the word "then" or otherwise charged primarily or pari passu with the personalty not specifically bequeathed, but is only made liable in case of necessity in its usual rank and order. So, as to the "ready money, securities for money, and moneys in the funds," of which the disposition is specific, or in the nature of a specific bequest. These the testator could not by law, as against his creditors, exempt from his debts. He could not give them except subject to his debts, and the word "then" appears to me to indicate that only or to show merely that, without meaning to disturb or vary the usual order of administration, he recognised the priority of his creditors over the objects of his bounty. As to the words "rest and residue," if they have any reference to the debts at all, I think that they do not carry the matter further. I find it, at least, impossible to say that the plaintiff has done more than bring this point into doubt, if he has done so much, and he must do more before he can ask the court to depart from a general rule. E F G H

My opinion, however, as to the pecuniary legacies given by the will is different. To these the specifically bequeathed personalty could not in any order under any circumstances be liable, unless made so by special provision for the purpose. The will, however, as I read it, recognises these legacies as matters of deduction from the ready money, securities for money, and money in the funds. If so, in what order and to what extent? Looking at the whole will, the particular part of it in which these legacies are found, and the language of the final bequest to the testator's wife, I am of opinion that there is to be found in the instrument an intention manifested that the "ready money, securities for money, and moneys in the funds," should be primarily, if not solely (the amounts, as I understand, render it immaterial whether primarily or solely), charged with these legacies, and I must declare accordingly. The lapsed share of the property thus charged must bear its portion, but no more than its portion, of the burthen. [But see now Adminis- I

A tration of Estates Act, 1925, s. 32, s. 33, Sch. 1: 9 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 718.]

The next question made is as to the meaning of the term "ready money." That the will refers to such ready money as there might be at the testator's death, and not merely to such ready money as he had at the date of the will is, I think, plain from the nature of the subject, and agreed on all hands. The contention has been whether certain sums mentioned in the master's report do or do not from their nature fall under the description of "ready money."

Upon the £116 12s. cash in the house, there has been and can be no question. Clearly, it is ready money. It is, I think, on the other hand, equally clear that the debts due to the testator at his death from his agents and other persons, however safe, and with whatsoever facility obtainable, were not included under that description, with the exception only of the two sums of £6,024 0s. 11d and £16,615 15s. 1d. The former of these is described in the report as the balance at the testator's death in the hands of Messrs. Hobhouse & Co., the testator's bankers at Bath. The latter is described in the report as the balance due to the testator at his death from Messrs. Child & Co., his bankers in London. The argument has proceeded on the basis that these two sums were ordinary bankers' balances on banking accounts of the usual description kept in the usual manner, that neither of them bore interest, and that in the customary mode it was competent to the testator at any moment to have drawn cheques payable to the bearer on demand for the whole. He had a residence at Bath, but it seems, none in London or its vicinity.

The main dispute on this part of the case has been whether these two sums are to be considered as "ready money." According to the decision in Carr v. Carr (11), they would have passed, or might have passed, under a bequest of debts due to the testator. That, I think, is not conclusive against their capacity of passing under a bequest of ready money.

Undoubtedly, an ordinary balance in a banker's hands is in a sense a debt due from him—certainly, he may be sued for it as for a debt. But it may be equally true that in a sense it is ready money, and, if that description may in general be justly held applicable to it, possible difficulties, not existing here, which may exist in other cases, as of a bequest in the same will of the debts due to the testator to one person and of his ready money to another without an explanatory context, or of interest being allowed by the banker, or of a contract that, unless upon a certain notice, the balance should not be reduced below an agreed amount, or of acceptances by the banker for the customer, not at maturity at the latter's death, or of drafts upon the banker, drawn by the customer, but not at maturity, not presented, or not paid, ought not to prevent the court from giving full effect, according to a fair interpretation of the will, to the language which the testator has used. The term "debt," however technically correct, is not colloquially or familiarly applied to a balance at a banking-house. No man talks of his banker in that character being indebted to him. Men, speaking of such a subject, say they have so much at their bankers' or so much in their bankers' hands—a mode of expression indicating virtual possession rather than that right to which the law applies the term chose in action. Again, a man having not enough in his purse or in his house to pay a tradesman's bill for which he is asked, but having a large balance at his bankers', says that he has not so much about him or that he has not so much in the house; he does not say that he has not so much ready money. Agreeing that this term is applicable to money in the purse or the house, I cannot agree that it is confined to money so placed. Money paid into a banking-house in the ordinary mode is so paid for the purpose of being not merely safe, but ready as well as safe—available upon the instant for any exigency or object which may arise. According to a definition of the word "bank" in a book of high character, a bank is "a place where money is laid up to be called for occasionally." It is true, that the deposit is one which the banker is not bound to return in specie, i.e., he satisfies the engagement if he has always ready for his customer a sum equal to the amount deposited. That, however, I think too thin and narrow a distinction to render the banker more in substance than a depository, though technically a debtor as well as a depository. A

I consider, therefore, these two balances as ready money—a conclusion at which, as it differs, though not necessarily from the decision, yet, from an opinion expressed in Carr v. Carr (11) by one of our greatest judges, I have arrived, not without feelings of embarrassment and distrust. But it is my unavoidable duty to express and act upon my own opinion in the present case, however slightly I may and must estimate it in comparison with that of a man such as SIR WILLIAM GRANT. B
I have the relief, certainly, of considering that the view which I take seems to be in accordance with the impression of two eminent judges—I mean SIR JOHN LEACH and LORD LANGDALE, M.R., and that the plaintiff has the right of bringing my judgment under the review of the Lord Chancellor. C

As to the testator's securities and funded property, in answer to an observation which I made during the argument, it was stated by the plaintiff's counsel that he claimed, as part of the residue, so much of them as subsequently to the will, or subsequently to the codicil at least, had been acquired by the testator. The point, however, was not much argued, and were it, in my judgment, incumbent on me to form and act upon an opinion respecting it, I should desire a further and full argument upon it. D
It appears, however, that throughout the cause, from its original commencement until after the further directions had been opened in this court, all the parties have proceeded under the impression that the testator, in bequeathing his securities for money and monies in the funds, meant to bequeath, and did bequeath, all such property of either description, as he might have at his death, and the decree takes the same view, for though it directs the master, in taking the account of the personal estate, to distinguish such part of the testator's estate as, at the respective times of making his will and of his death, consisted of leasehold property, yet the immediately succeeding sentence is thus: E

“And it is ordered, that the said master do also distinguish such part of the said testator's estate as at the time of his death consisted of ready money, securities for money, and moneys in the funds, from the other parts thereof” F

—a direction materially different from that respecting the leasehold estate, and though the master is authorised to state any circumstances specially on all or any of the inquiries, the decree does not direct him to find what securities for money, moneys in the funds, or funded property the testator had at the date of his will or of his codicil. The report, accordingly, though possibly furnishing that information indirectly as to securities for money, does not find or show what, if any, moneys in the funds or funded property the testator at either of those dates had. G
Certainly the decree declares the inquiries which it directs to be without prejudice to any question as to the construction of the will and codicil, but I must suppose, that had the court which pronounced it considered that the bequest of the testator's securities for money and moneys in the funds might, by possible construction, or ought to be, confined to such of those particulars as he had at the date of his will or of his codicil, the decree would not have contained merely the inquiries which it does. H
I must suppose that the court considered a full answer to those inquiries to be all that would be necessary to enable the estate to be administered on the further directions. In the circumstances, I do not consider it incumbent on me to open, or to treat as otherwise than settled, any question as to the construction of these words. But, in directing the estate to be administered, as for these reasons I do, upon the footing that the words “securities for money and moneys in the funds” mean all such securities for money and funded property as the testator had at his death, I desire to be understood as not declaring or intimating, and, indeed, as not having formed any opinion of my own, whether that is or is not the true construction of the will. I
It will, of course, be competent to the plaintiff, if so disposed, to have the decree of the Vice-Chancellor of England and my decree, or either of them, re-heard before the Lord Chancellor.

A In support of the construction as to the fund for paying the debts. and as to the meaning of the term "ready money," for which the plaintiff has contended, it was urged by counsel that a different construction, as matters stood when the will was made (the lapse having been a subsequent accident), would impute to the testator the intention in substance of leaving to his wife neither plate, nor jewels, nor residue of any kind. I may, however, in the first place, observe, that I very much agree with SIR THOMAS PLUMER, when, in Choat v. Yeats (10), he says (1 Jac. & W. at p. 104) :

"It is always the safest mode of construction to adhere to the words of the instrument, without considering either circumstances arising aliunde, or calculations that may be made as to the amount of the property, and of the consequences flowing from any particular interpretation."

C Secondly, I answer, that the plaintiff, if able to obtain, has not obtained for the court, and the court does not possess, more than partial and defective information respecting the amount and state of the testator's debts, property, and circumstances, at the date of his will, or at the date of his codicil. If the court could under any circumstances act, it has not here the means of acting on any notion of what the testator had or owed at either of those periods, or contemplated as the probable state of his affairs at his death.

The costs of the suit of all parties to the present time must be paid out of the residuary personal estate, except that so far as the costs have been increased by any shares of the property having been assigned or encumbered, that addition to the costs must fall wholly on the shares so assigned or encumbered respectively.

E It may be convenient to the Bar to mention that among the cases, besides those cited in the argument, at which I have looked, are these : Phillips v. Eastwood (12); Browne v. Groombridge (13); Hawley v. Cutts (14); Harcourt v. Morgan (15); Doe d. Evans v. Evans (16); Edwards v. Barnes (17); Jones v. Curry (18); Webb v. Honnor (19).

G

Cur. adv. vult.

April 22, 1843. LORD LYNDHURST, L.C., read the following judgment.—The first question raised by this appeal was whether or not, under the description "all the rest and residue of my ready money," two balances of £6,024 and £16,615, which at the time of the testator's death were standing to his credit at his banker's, passed.

H It is material for the consideration of that question to advert to the frame of the will. The testator divides his property into three classes: first, his ready money, securities for money, and money in the funds; secondly, his real property; thirdly, his jewels, plate, wine, carriages, and property of that description, goods, chattels, and effects. Nothing can be more marked than this division of the property, and it seems, therefore, to have been the intention of the testator, under the first head, namely, "all my ready money, securities for money, and money in the funds," to include money in whatever shape or form it might present itself.

I There is another view, also, that has struck me with respect to the construction of this will, which is this. The testator begins by directing his debts to be paid. He then gives very large legacies of stock. This is followed by a disposition of pecuniary legacies, to a very considerable amount, of £500 each to several persons, making in the whole a pecuniary disposition of many hundreds of pounds. Immediately after this pecuniary disposition he says, "All the rest and residue of my ready money I dispose of," so and so. He seems, therefore, to have considered that he had already disposed of a part of his ready money. That part of his ready money so disposed of was too large to be considered as money in the house, and he seems, therefore, to have considered that under the description of "ready money" some other fund must be included, and that fund could only have been the balance at his banker's. I think, therefore, on the frame of the will itself there is reason, and strong reason, to conclude that it was the intention of the testator that the money at his banker's should pass. A B

The question, therefore, is whether the terms he has used are sufficient for that purpose. In construing a will of personal property the terms that are used in the will are to be construed according to the ordinary acceptation of language in the transactions of mankind, and nobody can doubt that, in the ordinary use of language, money at a banker's would be considered as ready money. Everybody speaks of the sum which he has at his banker's as money: "my money at my banker's," is a usual mode of expression. And if it is money at the banker's, it is emphatically ready money because it is placed there for the purpose of being ready when occasion requires. It is received upon the understanding that it shall be so ready. If a man goes to his banker, the money is counted out to him on the table. If he sends an order for the money, it is counted out to his servant or the person in whose favour that order is made. I consider, therefore, that it is strictly ready money according to the ordinary acceptation of those terms among mankind. As it appears, therefore, for the reasons I have stated, to have been the intention of the testator that these sums should pass under this clause, if the terms which he has used are sufficient for that purpose, construing those terms according to the ordinary use of language in the transactions of mankind, I am of opinion that they would so pass. C D E

As to the authorities that have been cited, they have been so fully sifted and discussed at the Bar, that it is not necessary to enter very minutely into the consideration of them. The first was Carr v. Carr (11). In that case the testator bequeathed to the plaintiff all the debts that should be owing to him, and the question was whether, under the description of debts owing to him, the balance at his banker's would pass. SIR WILLIAM GRANT, after some hesitation, was of opinion that the balance at the banker's would pass under the description of a debt owing to the testator. He said, and I think he justly said, it is a debt, and may be recovered as a debt, and five or six years afterwards in the decision of Devaynes v. Noble (20), he held, on the same principle, that the balance at the banker's was a debt due to the party who deposited the money. The money is not to be returned in specie; the engagement is to be ready to pay an equal amount when called for: and on the same principle, in Sims v. Bond (21), the Court of Queen's Bench, quoting the authority of Devaynes v. Noble (20), decided that it was a loan—a debt. SIR WILLIAM GRANT, under these circumstances, there being a distinct disposition or bequest of debts owing to the testator, this being in point of law a debt, and there being nothing to restrain the operation of it or to show a contrary intention on the face of that will, decided, after some consideration, that the banker's balance would pass under the description of a debt, and nobody can question the correctness of that decision. In the course of his judgment he said it would not pass under the description of ready money. That was not necessary for the decision, although he founded an argument upon it, but it does not appear from anything that he stated upon that occasion, assuming the report to be correct, that, if there had been sufficient on the face of the will to manifest an intention that the balance at the banker's should pass under the description of ready money, he would not have given effect to it. F G H I

Those are the observations arising out of Carr v. Carr (11), but Vaisey v. Reynolds (22), as it appears to me, is directly in point. The circumstances were nearly similar—they were, at all events, similar in principle—to those of the present case. The testator bequeathed to his wife his book debts, his monies in hand, and his stock in trade. To his executors he bequeathed his money upon mortgage or other

A security, and money in the funds. SIR JOHN LEACH, upon a view of the will, was of opinion that it was the intention of the testator, under one or other of these descriptions, to dispose of everything that could be considered fairly as money. That was the ground and basis of his decision. In no sense, he said, could the balance at the banker's be considered as money on security, but, in a reasonable sense, it might be considered as money in hand for it was to be ready when called for. That case, therefore, is a distinct authority for the present decision, for I think there is no real difference between money in hand and ready money.

The remaining case was Taylor v. Taylor (23), before LORD LANGDALE, M.R., in which the question arose upon demurrer, and on the ground that a balance at a banker's would, in its ordinary acceptance, be considered as ready money, he decided that, in the will before him, it passed under that description.

C Counsel for the appellant suggested difficulties that might arise in particular cases by considering the words "ready money" in a will as embracing the testator's balance at his banker's. Those circumstances would deserve to be considered by the court for the purpose of forming a conclusion as to what was the intention of the testator in the particular case in which they might happen to exist. But in the present case there is no such difficulty. The sums in question were balances upon ordinary banking accounts. It does not appear that any interest was payable upon them, or that they were subject to any limitation, restriction, or condition of any description; nor does it appear that the sums, though large, were larger than the average sums usually kept at his banker's by this very wealthy individual. Therefore, it is one of the plainest cases that can be conceived of an ordinary deposit at a banker's, and, considering it as such, I am of opinion, for the reasons E I have already stated, that the judgment of the vice-chancellor was correct.

Appeal dismissed.

MACCARTHY v. YOUNG

G [COURT OF EXCHEQUER (Pollock, C.B., Bramwell, Channell and Wilde, BB.), June 22, 1860, January 11, 1861]

[Reported 6 H. & N. 329; 30 L.J.Ex. 227; 3 L.T. 785;
9 W.R. 439; 158 E.R. 136]

Bailment—Gratuitous bailment—Duty of care of bailor—Defect in article lent—Injury to servant of bailee—Liability of bailor.

H The defendant having contracted with one P. to pull down a wall belonging to him (the defendant) gratuitously allowed P. to use a scaffold which he (the defendant) had erected previously. One of the put-logs or cross-supports on which the planks of the scaffold rested was rotten, but there was no evidence that the defendant knew of this defect. The put-log gave way, and caused injury to the plaintiff, who was a labourer employed by P.

I Held: a gratuitous lender was not responsible to the borrower for injuries caused by defects in the chattel lent of which defects he was not aware; a servant of the borrower was in no better position than his master would have been; and, therefore, the defendant was not liable to the plaintiff.

Rule Nisi obtained by the defendant to enter the verdict in an action for damages for personal injuries.

The declaration charged the defendant with undertaking to erect a scaffold, and with having so negligently and carelessly done so that the plaintiff, who was lawfully working upon it, was exposed to unreasonable risk, and thrown to the ground and injured by the scaffold giving way. The defendant pleaded not guilty and that he did not undertake to erect the scaffold as alleged.

At the trial before WILDE, B., it was proved that the plaintiff, who was a labourer, was employed by one Portlock to pull down the party-wall of a house belonging to the defendant; that Portlock said: "There is the scaffold for you to go to work." The scaffold to which the remark applied was erected under the following circumstances. The defendant was a builder, and had purchased a house which he was about to pull down; he erected the scaffold in question for his own use, and did use it in pulling down the front and back walls of the house; and, on being called upon afterwards to pull down the party-wall, he was about to do so when Portlock, who was his carpenter, asked for the job, and, accordingly, the defendant entered into a written contract with him to pull down the party-wall for £18. The written contract contained no provision for the use of the scaffold already erected, nor was it in any way understood at the time of making such contract that Portlock was to have the use of the scaffold; but the defendant was aware of its being used when the wall came to be pulled down, and it might be taken that he allowed Portlock the use of it gratuitously. One of the put-logs, or cross-supports on which the planks of the scaffold rested, turned out to be rotten. There was no evidence that the defendant knew of this defect. The put-log gave way, and was the cause of the accident for which the action was brought. The plaintiff was thrown to the ground and injured. The jury found the defendant guilty of negligence in the original construction of the scaffold by reason of the defective put-log, and that the plaintiff's injury was caused by such negligence. A verdict was entered for the plaintiff for £50, the defendant having leave to move to enter the verdict for him. The defendant obtained a rule accordingly.

Montague Chambers, Q.C. (Tapping with him), for the plaintiff, showed cause against the rule.

T. Jones for the defendant, supported the rule.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 11, 1861. WILDE, B., delivered the following judgment of the court.—The question that has arisen for this court is whether the defendant is liable in any form of action to the plaintiff for what has occurred. The court is of opinion that no such liability exists. The scaffold in question was lent by the defendant without

A reward to Portlock, as a ladder, or any tool might have been, to assist him in completing the work he had undertaken to perform. The plaintiff was the servant of Portlock, and nothing more. So far as the relation of the parties is concerned, it is the case of a gratuitous lender for use, on the one hand, and the servant of the party to whom the article is lent on the other. In this relation of parties, and in the absence of all proof of knowledge by the lender of the defect which created the mischief, what are the obligations of the lender towards those to whom the article is lent, or by whom it is afterwards used?

When the case was argued it appeared to the court that the matter was of sufficient general interest and novelty to make it desirable that time should be taken to consider, maturely, the terms of the judgment they were prepared to give. Upon consulting the authorities, however, they find that the whole matter has been fully considered lately in the Court of Queen's Bench and an elaborate judgment delivered, in which we entirely concur. This makes it unnecessary to do more than to refer to the decision in Blakemore v. Bristol and Exeter Rail. Co. (1), which was an action for an injury by an insufficient crane lent by the defendant. The court laid down the rule of the lender's responsibility thus (8 E. & B. at pp. 1050, 1051):

D "It may, however, we think, be safely laid down, that the duties of the borrower and lender are in some degree correlative. The lender must be taken to lend for the purpose of a beneficial use by the borrower; the borrower, therefore, is not responsible for reasonable wear and tear; but he is for negligence, for misuse, for gross want of skill in the use; above all, for anything which may be qualified as legal fraud. So, on the other hand, as the lender lends for beneficial use, he must be responsible for the defects in the chattel with reference to the use for which he knows the loan is accepted, of which he is aware, and owing to which directly the borrower is injured."

E Again (ibid. at pp. 1051, 1052):

F "The principle laid down in Coggs v. Barnard (2), and followed by LORD KENYON, and BULLER, J., and by LORD TENTERDEN in the nisi prius cases cited in the note, 1 [SMITH'S] LEADING CASES (4th Edn.) 162, that a gratuitous agent or bailee may be responsible for gross negligence or great want of skill, gets rid of the objection that might be urged from want of consideration to the lender. By the necessarily implied purpose of the loan, a duty is contracted towards the borrower not to conceal from him those defects known to the lender, which may make the loan perilous or unprofitable to him."

G It is obvious that, upon the above principles, the defendant would not have been liable even to Portlock, to whom the scaffold was lent, if the accident had happened to him, inasmuch as the defendant was not aware of the defects in question, and, without deciding anything as to the position of the plaintiff, it is plain that at any rate he stands in no better position than Portlock would have done. The verdict must, therefore, be entered for the defendant.

Rule absolute.

Infant—Contract—Fraud—Liability after attaining majority.

An infant, however generally for his own sake protected by incapacity from binding himself by contract, may be doli capax, in a civil sense and for civil purposes, in the view of a court of equity, and may, therefore, commit a fraud for the consequence of which he may be made, after his majority, civilly answerable. But the notion of charging a man in equity after his majority on a purchase or sale or contract made during his minority merely because, without any false assertion by him, the other party believes he is not a minor on the ground that adults only can have such dealings is contrary to principle, is of dangerous consequence, and is not established by authority.

Bill for a declaration and a decree for the transfer of shares.

- C On June 7, 1842, the plaintiffs, Stikeman and Barry, acting as the brokers of the Rev. John Hoole, bought in the market, from Messrs. Ewart and Bell, 45 quarter-shares in the Leeds and Manchester Rail. Co. Messrs. Ewart and Bell were acting in the transaction as the London agents of Middleton and Barber, sharebrokers of Liverpool, and, on June 15, they paid the purchase-money for the 45 quarter-shares into Barclay & Co.'s bank to Middleton's credit, and received the certificate of the shares and a transfer (dated June 14) to Mr. Hoole, duly executed by John Kiddell Dawson, in whose name the shares were registered in the company's books. Ewart and Bell delivered the certificates and transfer to the plaintiffs, and received the purchase-money, of which they apprised Middleton and Barber. Some time after this the transfer was, with others, sent by the plaintiffs to their agents at Manchester who delivered them to the secretary of the company for the purpose of being registered in the name of Mr. Hoole. By a letter dated Sept. 12, 1842, the secretary informed Mr. Hoole that he had received notice from Mr. John Dawson, dated Liverpool, June 28, 1842, not to register any shares in the name of his son, J. K. Dawson, who was under the age of 21 years, and that previous to the receipt of such notice J. K. Dawson had been registered in the books of the company for the 45 quarter-shares, which it appeared Mr. Hoole had purchased. In consequence of the difficulties attending the completion of the purchase, the plaintiffs repaid Mr. Hoole his purchase-money, and took from him an assignment of all his interest in the shares. J. K. Dawson attained the age of 21 years on Sept. 14, 1842.

- E The present action was instituted against J. K. Dawson and his father J. Dawson, and Messrs. Middleton and Barber. The bill charged that the calls on account of sixteen new shares issued in respect of the 45 quarter-shares had been paid by the father, and also that the father and son combined to deprive the plaintiffs of the shares. The bill prayed that it might be referred to the master to inquire whether J. K. Dawson was an infant when he executed the transfer of June 14, 1842; and if he should find that J. K. Dawson was then an infant, that it might be declared that such execution was a fraud on Mr. Hoole and the plaintiffs, and that J. K. Dawson and all other persons claiming under him might be decreed to execute to the plaintiffs a valid transfer of the 45 quarter-shares and of the subsequently allotted shares, the plaintiffs offering to pay for the subsequently allotted shares; or, if the court should consider the plaintiffs not entitled to such transfer, that it might be declared that Middleton and Barber had been guilty of a fraud upon the plaintiffs and they might be decreed to place the plaintiffs in the same position as to the 45 quarter-shares and the allotted shares as they would have been in if the transfer to Mr. Hoole had been valid, the plaintiffs offering to pay all the calls on the shares since June 14, 1842.

- I Wigram and Malins for the plaintiffs.

Bacon and Eddis for the defendants, J. K. Dawson and J. Dawson.

Russell and J. Bailly for the defendants, Middleton and Barber.

Cur. adv. vult.

Mar. 5, 1847. KNIGHT-BRUCE, V.-C., delivered a judgment in which he said that on the evidence he must dismiss the bill as against Messrs. Middleton & Barber, and that it was not established that the conduct of Mr. J. Dawson, the father, had been in any respect fraudulent or unfair, and he continued: It has not been contended at the Bar for the plaintiffs that, on the ground of contract or other ground than that of fraud, the title of the shares of the younger Dawson can be affected in this suit. The plaintiffs' counsel have, in argument, properly put their case for relief against J. K. Dawson on the ground of fraud only. Did he, then, during his minority, commit, in respect of the matters in question, a fraud of such a nature as to render him now amenable to this jurisdiction, and so as to entitle the plaintiffs to relief on the ground of fraud? That is the simple point between him and the plaintiffs. The fraud imputed to him is not that of making a false assertion or any express misrepresentation at all. He made none. The fraud imputed to him is merely that of not disclosing the fact of his minority to Messrs. Middleton and Barber—I say to them, because he had not any dealings with the plaintiffs or Mr. Hoole, except so far, if at all, as the dealings or communications of Messrs. Ewart and Bell, and Messrs. Middleton and Barber, can be considered in any sense as his dealings and communications. If J. K. Dawson committed any fraud otherwise than upon his father, it must be taken to have been a fraud upon Messrs. Middleton and Barber; but the state of the record precludes me from considering them as accomplices of J. K. Dawson in a fraud upon the plaintiffs and Mr. Hoole, nor do I wish to be understood as suggesting that they were. Still, fraud and misrepresentation, if any, upon Messrs. Middleton and Barber, may have been of such a nature and attended by such consequences as to give the plaintiffs a title to complain of it effectually against them. Although the imputed fraud is that of not disclosing the fact of minority, yet it has been said by the plaintiffs' counsel that a fraudulent suppression or concealment may be, and sometimes is, equivalent civilly to a false assertion fraudulently made in express terms. To this proposition I accede. But they, moreover, say in effect that the dealings between J. K. Dawson and Middleton and Barber were such as from their nature could not bind an infant without fraud on his part; that it was his duty to apprise them of his minority; that he did not do so; that from the nature of the dealings his omission to do so was equivalent to a denial by him of the fact of the minority; and that it was a fraud on his part, for which, notwithstanding his minority at the time, he was answerable in equity after he had attained his majority. These are, in truth, the propositions to be tried between him and the plaintiffs, whom I assume, without deciding, to be the proper parties to raise them.

First, the proposition that the dealings between J. K. Dawson and Middleton and Barber were not of such a nature as to be capable of binding the infant without fraud on his part, is, I suppose, indisputably true. But, secondly, was it his duty, as the word is understood in a court of justice, not to enter upon those dealings without mentioning to them his true age? I will, for the present, assume it to have been so. It seems to involve an assumption, not only that the probable or certain fact of his minority, and likewise its material bearing upon the question of his responsibility were known to himself, but, moreover, the broker's ignorance of his minority. Such then being considered to have been his duty, did he commit any breach of it? Is such a breach proved against him? The plaintiffs must be understood as contending that it is proved against him on the ground that the burden of proof in this matter lies upon him, and the proof, as they say, is absolute. But did the burden of proof as to this lie upon him? Generally, it is true, the burden of proof lies upon the party who affirms, and not upon the party who denies. The rule is not unqualified or without exceptions. Neither criminality nor fraud is to be presumed; and though Williams v. East India Co. (1) may not go the whole length of establishing the point of the burden of proof lying upon the plaintiff, it may be thought not to be without a bearing upon the subject. The charge against J. K. Dawson is of the fraudulent omission to make any disclosure. I am not aware of any affirmative evidence against him in support of that charge.

Assuming it to be not incumbent upon the plaintiffs to advance material and very strong testimony in support of it, were they entitled to abstain altogether from adducing evidence? It is true that it may be said that a communication, if any, from J. K. Dawson to the brokers is a fact more peculiarly within his own know-

A ledge, of which the burden of proof is, therefore, cast upon him; and this may be so, but the fact itself, as already intimated, and indeed is obvious, is immaterial, unless it be taken that, independently of any communication from him, the brokers neither knew nor had notice he was a minor. The plaintiffs have, indeed, assumed throughout that, independently of any communication from J. K. Dawson, the brokers did not know and had no notice of his minority. But were they entitled to

B assume it? Is their ignorance of that minority to be presumed unless the contrary be shown? Qui cum alio contrahit vel est vel debet esse non ignarus conditionis ejus is a maxim of the civil law, as understood by the best commentators, that is, "An sit paterfamilias vel filius, familias, servus vel dominus." I am not satisfied that, as a general rule, the law of England dissents from that. Prima facie it appears less probable that a man should believe that which is not than that which

C is, in the absence of any false assertion. Assuming it possible, however, that there may be transactions in which the mere fact of a young man engaging himself may justify a belief in those with whom he deals that he is not a minor, I think the case is not so with regard to transactions of the nature which existed between the brokers in question and their unlucky customer. Adolescence is at least as much the age of gambling as any other.

D [HIS LORDSHIP reviewed the evidence, and continued:] Why is the court to conclude that the brokers, under the circumstances of such a case as this, did not know or believe the truth? Nor, perhaps, will it be out of place here to refer to the judgment of a distinguished judge in a well-known criminal case: R. v. Burdett (2). It is the language of LORD TENTERDEN, who says (4 B. & Ald. at pp. 161, 162):

E "A presumption of any fact is properly an inferring of that fact from other facts that are known; it is an act of reasoning, and much of human knowledge on all subjects is derived from this source. A fact must not be inferred without premises that will warrant the inference; but if no fact could thus be ascertained by inference in a court of law, very few offenders could be brought to punishment. In a great portion of trials, as they occur in practice, no direct

F proof that the party accused actually committed the crime, is or can be given; the man who is charged with theft is rarely seen to break the house or take the goods; and in cases of murder, it rarely happens that the eye of any witness sees the fatal blow struck, or the poisonous ingredients poured into the cup. In drawing an inference or conclusion from facts proved, regard must always be had to the nature of the particular case, and the facility that appears to be

G afforded either of explanation or contradiction. No person is to be required to explain or contradict until enough has been proved to warrant a reasonable and just conclusion against him in the absence of explanation or contradiction; but when such proof has been given, and the nature of the case is such as to admit of explanation or contradiction, if the conclusion to which the proof tends be untrue, and the accused offers no explanation or contradiction, can human

H reason do otherwise than adopt the conclusion to which the proof tends? The premises may lead more or less strongly to the conclusion, and care must be taken not to draw the conclusion hastily; but in matters that regard the conduct of men, the certainty of mathematical demonstration cannot be required or expected."

I Treating LORD TENTERDEN's observations as applicable to this case, in which, though civil, the charge is that that the minor was guilty of a fraud, it may be asked whether the facts proved between him and the plaintiffs do not, in the absence of explanation or contradiction, warrant a reasonable and just conclusion that the brokers were not unaware of the minority of their youthful-looking townsman, with whom they were in the daily habit of dealing—the son, moreover, of a merchant of the same town. I am not prepared to say that that did not warrant such a conclusion, and I repeat that the question of communication or no communication from him to them does not, as I conceive, become material, or arise until their ignorance of any such communication has been proved or assumed. As, however, it may be questionable whether it ought to be inserted between these parties that during the transaction in question, or any part of them, Messrs. Middleton and Barber thought J. K. Dawson under age, or had notice of his minority, I proceed to consider the plaintiffs' contention that on the assumption of the young man's acquaintance with his own minority, and with the law on the subject, and also of the brokers' belief during their dealings with him that he was not a minor, as well as his omission to communicate the fact to them that he was a minor, there was a fraud on his part, for which, notwithstanding his infancy at the time, he became, or was after his majority, and is, answerable in a court of equity.

This is, as I consider, a question of importance and general interest. The civil law defines dolum malum to be omnem calliditatem, fallaciam, machinationem ad circumveniendum, fallendum, decipiendum alterum adhibitam. Then ULPIAN (Dig. Lib. IV, Tit. iii, 13, 1; 14, 15):

"Item in causæ cognitione versari Labeo ait, ne in pupillum de dodo detur actio, nisi forte nomine hereditario conveniatur. Ego arbitror et ex suo dolo conveniendum, si proximus pubertati est maxime si locupletior ex hoc factus est."

The DIGEST proceeds:

"Quid enim, si impenetravit a procuratore petitoris, ut ab eo absolveretur: vel si de tutore mentitus, pecuniam accepit: vel alia similia admisit, quæ non magnam machinationem exigunt?"

Then ULPIAN:

"Sed et ex dolo tutoris, si factus est locupletior, puto in eum dandam actionem: sicut exceptio datur."

Unquestionably it is the law of England that an infant, however generally for his own sake protected by incapacity from binding himself by contract, may be deceived in a civil sense and for civil purposes, in the view of a court of equity (though I believe only when pubertati proximus), and not, I suppose, at so early an age as for criminal purposes, and may, therefore, commit a fraud for the consequence of which he may be made, after his majority, civilly answerable in equity. I am not speaking of cases in which infants are liable only, or who, if adults, are suable at law only in respect of acts done during infancy; but, as far as equity is concerned, the practical application of any rule or doctrine to which I have been referring must, not seldom, I conceive, be a matter of much difficulty or delicacy, and I agree with a learned author who says that:

"in what cases in particular courts of equity will thus exert themselves, it is not easy to determine, nor indeed is the jurisdiction of equity the only jurisdiction where difficulties on this subject have arisen, or may arise. Courts of law have not been free from them."

The capacity of infants to commit crime, their punishment for criminal offences, and their liability civilly for various wrongs not connected in any sense with contracts, as for instance, battery and slander, to say nothing of the clear right, in some circumstances, to maintain trover against them, are of universal recognition. But questions which have not been considered free from difficulty have arisen whether or how far persons are civilly liable at law for wrongs or such acts as, if they were the acts of adults, would be wrongs, if done during infancy, supposing them to be connected with contracts.

The case of embezzlement by a servant or an apprentice: Bristow v. Eastman (3); that of detinue in Mills v. Graham (4); and another in ROLLE'S ABRIDGMENT, title "Court de Admiraltie," with respect to an infant master of a ship, are instances of this kind, in which the objection of minority did not prevail, while in other instances, for example, Johnson v. Pye (5), it was ruled that an action of deceit would not lie by the false assertion of the defendant when an infant that he was of age. The case of Grove v. Neville, mentioned in Johnson v. Pye (5), of the

A assertion of an infant that a false jewel not belonging to him was a diamond and his own; the case of the infant innkeeper in ROLLE'S ABRIDGMENT, title "Actions sur Case," and in modern times, Jennings v. Rundall (6), a case of overriding a hired mare; Green v. Greenbank (7), a case of exchanging mares where the infant plaintiff warranted his mare to be sound, well knowing her to be unsound; are cases in which an objection of minority has prevailed. A case also in which an infant was plaintiff may be mentioned as tending much in the same direction, the plaintiff having recovered though her conduct, if not fraudulent, was very near it or like it. It is Scroggam v. Stewardson (8) (3 Keb. 369):

"In trespass by infant, by guardian, the defendant pleads that the plaintiff was above sixteen years old, and agreed for sixpence in hand that the defendant have licence to take two ounces of her hair, to which the plaintiff demurred; and, per curiam, it is no plea, for the infant cannot license, though she may agree with the barber to be trimmed. And judgment for the plaintiff."

The same case is somewhat differently given in BACON'S ABRIDGMENT:

"In trespass quare vi et armis insullum fecit, et totum crinem capitis ipsius Annæ abscidit, the defendant, as to all the trespass præter tonsuram crinis, pleads not guilty; and as to that pleads that the plaintiff was of the age of sixteen years, and for a certain sum of money licentiavit the defendant duas uncias crinis dictæ Annæ detondere et abscindere. And upon the demurrer to this plea the court held that the contract was absolutely void, and consequently the tonsure unlawful, and gave judgment accordingly for the plaintiff."

In those instances in which minors succeeded at law, could there have been interposition against them in equity, a jurisdiction generally at least equally considerate with courts of law in favour of infants? Fraud certainly is odious, and is to be repressed, but neither is protection to be withheld from the imbecility of youth. No allowance to be made for its exposure and obnoxiousness to influence, temptation, and seduction? For, especially in cases requiring legal knowledge, very young men may be seduced into the commission of fraud. LORD ELDON, in Jackson v. Hobhouse (9), with reference to the case of a married woman, who may also commit fraud, glances at the possibility of the husband compelling his wife to join him in a fraud, and may not some consideration be had for a boy taken in the toils of designing and experienced men of mature age? By the last sentence, I do not wish to be understood as deciding or as referring to the present matter, as to which, though I do not say that the whole account given, whether accurate or inaccurate, by the young man in his account of the commencement and progress and nature of the connection between him and Middleton and Barber is in evidence against the plaintiffs, yet I cannot but say that the bill might have been amended after the answer, and that with such an answer before the plaintiffs, they have only adduced the evidence which they have. The story told by the answer is in substance that this young man had unhappily committed himself so far as to abuse the confidence of his father to whom he was cash-keeper, and to misapply some sums not of very inconsiderable amount belonging to his father. The son was anxious to make good that loss, and in this way. Having met Mr. Cobb, clerk of Middleton and Barber, and afterwards Mr. Middleton, at the office of Mr. Surridge (through whom the defalcation took place), the young man was struck by Mr. Cobb representing that he had heard of the probability of large profits being derived from gambling (or, what is the same thing, speculating) in shares in public undertakings, and upon these representations, with a view to deliver himself from his difficulties, he engaged in a series of transactions which ended in a manner that scarcely required inspiration to foretell. If this statement is substantially true, so far as it agrees with Middleton and Barber's representation of the matter, if Mr. Rodrick's [a witness] description of the young man's personal appearance is substantially accurate, and if Middleton and Barber, knowing, as it was probable, they did, that the boy had a father living at Liverpool, allowed him to engage in such dealings, and to contract the debt without making a communication to the father, or asking a question of him (and no such communication appears to have been made), it may be difficult to account satisfactorily for the conduct of Middleton and Barber, and I think it as difficult to think it likely that they should have been defrauded by the lad. If the brokers and their adventurous young principal were not on equal terms, there appears little difficulty in the way of saying who was probably the weaker party. A

Apart, however, from any peculiarity of circumstances, the plaintiffs seem substantially to contend for not less than this general proposition—that, if a minor deals in a matter of contract with a person who, having no notice of his minority, does, without any representation to him on the subject, believe the minor to be of full age, the minor is, after majority at least, answerable in equity to that person for the contract or the consequence, or is liable to be compelled to restore him to his original position. Not referring, as I do not refer, to any case where the law permits infants to contract, or to any case where the point is purely legal, I am not aware that such a proposition is founded on principle, or supported by the authorities which bind the court. It seems to me full of danger and evil, as was said at law in a case which has been mentioned (Johnson v. Pye (5), 1 Sid. 258) where it was held that an action of deceit would not lie on the assertion of a minor that he was of full age; and there seems a great deal of practical good sense as well as good law in it. Clarke v. Copley (10), was clearly, I think, decided correctly; nor do I doubt that the decisions in Watts v. Creswell (11), and Savage v. Foster (12), were required by the peculiar circumstances of those cases. In the latter case Mr. and Mrs. Foster might have barred their title by a fine, and it was, I suppose, considered that she did not commit a fraud under the husband's influence. B

In Watts v. Creswell (11) the minor must be supposed to be considered as not having acted under his father's control, and in each of the cases the contract seems to have been of the most gross description—so gross as perhaps to have been obnoxious to criminal proceedings. LORD COWPER says, in Watts v. Creswell (11): "If he was made a party to the deed and sealed it, yet that would not bind him." Here, perhaps, it may not be quite out of place to remember LORD HARDWICKE's remarks on the difference between the disability of infants and married women, which he made in Hearle v. Greenbank (13). Of Eson v. Nicholas (14), decided by LORD KING, I may, perhaps, be allowed to say that the report in 2 Eq. Cas. Abr. 488, does not appear satisfactory. I venture to think that that case, as there stated, affords no sufficient foundation for the decree that was made, and I may possibly be permitted to say the same of the case as it appears in the registrar's book, which, however, does not give the pleadings nor show what the evidence was; nor probably without an examination of the proofs and pleadings is it possible to form a just opinion of LORD KING's decree, which gave no costs. I collect, therefore, that the lease was made three or four years before the defendant's majority, and that his age had not been misrepresented to the plaintiff, but was known from the beginning. Perhaps it might have been true that the defendant had fraudulently represented himself to the plaintiff as able to grant the lease, or that the defendant at or after his majority had received a fine or its value. Upon the decision in Cory v. Gertcken (15), and the doctrine in Overton v. Bannister (16), by two judges of great weight and consideration, I think it not necessary to express, and I do not intimate, any opinion. Each of them is distinguishable from the present case. By neither of them, nor by Ex parte Watson (17) and Belton v. Hodges (18), is it, as I conceive, rendered incumbent on me to give to the present plaintiffs their decree against J. K. Dawson. Ex parte Watson (17), the case in bankruptcy to which reference was particularly made in Belton v. Hodges (18), a case that occurred more than twenty years after in the Court of Common Pleas, is reported by MR. VESEY ex relatione. It is not very well done, though probably not inaccurately. I have read the original affidavits on which the petition was heard. By declining to supersede the commission LORD ELDON did not prevent the petitioner from disputing its validity at law, nor does there appear reason to suppose that LORD ELDON was asked or would have consented to interfere against the petitioner for the purpose of enforcing against him submission to the bankruptcy. C

- A Goode v. Harrison (19) may be thought a remarkable case; but, if not opposing, I am sure it does not support the plaintiffs' contention against the younger Dawson. If that action had been by an unpaid vendor for goods supplied in 1818, which was, I suppose, the date of the report, and not by a vendor of goods sold more than six months after the vendor's majority, the case being, in all other respects, as stated, could there have been judgment against Bennion at law? And
- B if there could not, would there have been any title to relief against him in equity? In my opinion, I repeat, the notion of charging a man in equity after his majority on a purchase, or sale, or contract, made during his minority, merely because, without any false assertion by him, the other party believes he is not a minor, and believes it on the ground that adults themselves can only have such dealings, is contrary to principle, and is of dangerous consequence, and is not established by authority.
- C There may be, indeed, a want of delicacy or propriety in the conduct of a young man of twenty buying a picture or a statue, on credit, without mentioning his age, but that can only be on the notion that such conduct is not prohibited. Laws cannot vindicate every deflexion from propriety, and it must be preferable that men of full age, in or out of trade, should sometimes suffer for acts of carelessness than that there should be given an obvious facility and plain encouragement
- D to minors to be their own destroyers and to others to make them their prey, which would be afforded by the rule that mutual silence, with an appearance of manhood, should expose a boy, on the ground of fraud, to be affected after his majority with the consequence of the most rash and foolish conduct, and the liability to restore money wasted in childish extravagance.

- In the cause now before the court, J. K. Dawson's legal title is sought to be taken
- E from him, on the ground of a sale during his infancy, in respect of which he has not received the purchase-money. There seems reason to believe that the purchase-money went into the hands of Middleton and Barber towards satisfying a pecuniary demand of great amount they alleged to have against him, but in respect of which it is possible, if not certain, that he could not have been sued; and any relief against Middleton and Barber cannot be given in this suit, constituted as it is.
- F Their right was and is to be dismissed from it. Upon the whole, if it be assumed that from the beginning to the end of the year 1842, Mr. Hoole and Ewart and Bell believed J. K. Dawson to be of full age (and there is no reason to suspect the contrary), the case is still not one in which, either on principle or on authority, the court ought, in my opinion, to pronounce that fraud has been committed by him, in respect of which relief in equity should be given against him. It follows that I
- G must think it unnecessary for the purposes of the question of relief to decide whether the father has any lien on the shares or any interest in them. Without determining that point, I conceive the bill ought to be dismissed against the Dawsons, with costs as to the father, without costs as to the son, and without prejudice to any action, or any other suit.

Bill dismissed.

DOWELL v. DEW AND ANOTHER

[VICE-CHANCELLOR'S COURT (Knight-Bruce, V.-C.), March 7, 8, 1842]

[Reported 1 Y. & C.Ch. Cas. 345; 12 L.J.Ch. 158; 62 E.R. 918]

[LORD CHANCELLOR'S COURT (Lord Lyndhurst, L.C.), June 7, 8, 12, 22, 1842, January 17, 1843]

[Reported 12 L.J.Ch. 164; 7 Jur. 117]

Contract—Conclusion—Contract signed by one party—Subsequently accepted and acted on by other party—Renewal of lease—Undertaking to grant new lease on expiration of existing lease—No new lease executed—Lessee continuing in occupation.

To establish the validity of an agreement, it is not necessary to show that it was binding on both parties at the time of its being made. It is sufficient if an agreement signed by one party be afterwards accepted and acted on by the other.

Accordingly, where a lessor signed and gave to the lessee at his request an undertaking to grant him a new lease on the expiration of the existing lease on the same terms and for the same period as the existing lease, and the lessee continued to occupy and cultivate the land after the end of the existing lease, but no lease was executed,

Held: there was an enforceable contract which, the lessor having died, was binding on her estate.

Landlord and Tenant—Agreement for lease—Renewal of existing lease—Power under settlement to lease in possession—Agreement made within reasonable time before expiration of old lease—Compliance with terms of power.

Under a settlement a lessor had power to lease in possession, but not in reversion. The lessor entered into an agreement between herself and the lessee a short period before the expiration of an existing lease for a renewal of the lease upon the same terms as before.

Held: the lapse of time between the agreement and the expiration of the old lease being in the circumstances of the case reasonable and the terms of the agreement being in compliance with the still subsisting power in the settlement, the agreement was valid and enforceable by the court.

Landlord and Tenant—Covenant—Covenant not to assign without consent—Breach—Waiver—Breach not continuing breach.

An assignment of a lease in breach of a covenant not to assign except by licence is not a continuing breach, but a breach committed once and for all, and, therefore, it can be waived by the acceptance by the landlord of the assignee as tenant.

Landlord and Tenant—Lease—Agricultural lease—Forfeiture—Lack of repair—Improper cultivation—Strict interpretation not to be put on covenants.

Per KNIGHT-BRUCE, V.-C.: It is a very old principle of law, on a claim by a landlord for the forfeiture of an agricultural lease, that unimportant matters of want of repair and of improper cultivation should be disregarded. In these cases the court must make reasonable allowance and not put too strict and precise an interpretation on the covenants relating to these matters. If the repairs and management of a farm were to be viewed in a strict and literal manner, there would be endless war between landlord and tenant.

Appeal from a decree made by KNIGHT-BRUCE, V.-C., on a bill for a declaration, specific performance of an agreement to grant a lease, and an injunction.

- By indentures of settlement, dated July 23 and 24, 1819, and made previously to the marriage of Thomas Tyringham Bernard and Sophia Charlotte, his wife, certain freehold estates, including the Clifford Court Farm, all of which were the property of Mrs. Bernard, were conveyed to the use of trustees for the separate use of Mrs. Bernard for her life, with remainder to trustees for a term of 150 years, with remainder to the use of Mr. Bernard for his life, with remainder to trustees to preserve, etc., with remainder to trustees for the term of 700 years, with remainder to the first son of the marriage in tail male, with divers remainders over. The trusts of the terms were for raising maintenance and portions for younger children. The settlement contained a proviso that it should be lawful for Sophia Charlotte, during her life, and after her decease for Thomas Tyringham Bernard during his life, and after the decease of the survivor of them, for the person or persons who under or by virtue of the limitations thereinbefore contained should for the time being be entitled to the first estate of freehold or inheritance in the said hereditaments, in case such persons should be of full age, but if not, then for the guardian or guardians of such persons, to demise or lease all or any part or parts of the hereditaments expressed to be thereby granted and released, with the appurtenances, for any term of years not exceeding 21 years in possession, but not reversion, remainder, or expectancy, or by way of future interest, and so that upon every such lease there should be reserved and made payable the best and most improved yearly rent that could be reasonably had for the same, without taking any sum of money or other thing by way of fine, premium, or foregift for the making thereof, and so that in every such lease there should be contained a condition of re-entry on the non-payment of the rent to be thereby reserved by the space of 21 days next after the same should become due and payable, and so that the lessee to whom such lease should be made should seal and deliver a counterpart of such lease, and so that no lessee should be authorised to commit waste or exempted from punishment for committing waste.

The marriage took effect, and there were children of the marriage, David William Bernard being the eldest son. By an indenture dated Feb. 8, 1823, and made between Sophia Charlotte Bernard, of the first part, Thomas Tyringham Bernard, of the second part, and William Dowell, of the third part, it was witnessed, that, in consideration of the rents thereafter reserved and the covenants thereafter contained on the part of the lessee, Sophia Charlotte Bernard, by virtue and in exercise of the power given to her for that purpose by the indenture of July 24, 1819, and of all other powers, etc., and with the privity and approbation of Thomas Tyringham Bernard, did demise, lease, and let, and Thomas Tyringham Bernard did let and confirm to William Dowell, his executors, and administrators, all that Clifford Court Farm, to hold the same, with the appurtenances, unto William Dowell, his executors and administrators, for the term of fourteen years, to be computed from Feb. 2 then instant, at the yearly rent of £525, deducting land-tax and a chief-rent of £15 per annum, provided always that if the rent should be unpaid for the space of 21 days, or if William Dowell, his executors, administrators, or assigns, should at any time or times during the continuance of the demise, assign, transfer, set over, underlet, or otherwise part with the indenture or the premises thereby demised, or any part thereof, except certain cottages with their appurtenances, to any person or persons whomsoever, without the special licence and consent of the person or persons for the time being entitled to the next and immediate reversion or remainder in the demised premises first had and obtained in writing under hand and seal, or if William Dowell, his executors, or administrators, occupiers of the demised premises, or any part thereof, except the said cottage, should at any time during the continuance of the demise commit any act or acts of bankruptcy wherein a valid commission or commissions of bankrupt should be sued and prosecuted, or if the then present lease or the tenant's term and interest in the demised premises or any part thereof should be taken or seised under or by virtue of any execution, or warrant, or process in the nature thereof, or should otherwise become legally assignable or saleable, without such consent as aforesaid, or if William Dowell, his executors, administrators, or assigns, should not in all things well and truly observe, perform, fulfil, and keep all and every the covenants, conditions, stipulations, and agreements therein expressed and contained on the lessee's part to be observed, performed, fulfilled, and kept, then or in any or either of the said cases, and at any time thereafter, it should be lawful for the person or persons for the time being entitled to such next and immediate reversion and remainder as aforesaid, into and upon the said demised premises or any part thereof, in the name of the whole, wholly to re-enter in forfeiture of the lease. The lease then contained covenants by the lessee for payment of rent and taxes, for the cultivation of the lands according to the custom of the country, and for keeping the premises in repair.

A William Dowell executed a counterpart of this lease, and entered into the occupation of the premises. He died on Mar. 15, 1832, having made his will, dated July 25, 1825, whereby he bequeathed all his farms and effects to his son John Dowell, whom he appointed sole executor of his will. John Dowell proved the will, and entered into possession and occupation of the premises. In 1832 Mr. Bernard, who was a partner in the house of Duckett, Morland & Co., became bankrupt with his co-partners. In 1835 John Dowell, in contemplation of his lease expiring, and with the intention, as stated by Mr. Bernard, who was examined as a witness for the plaintiff, of laying down part of the farm in grass, applied to Mr. and Mrs. Bernard for a renewal of the lease, upon which he received the following undertaking in writing, signed by Mr. and Mrs. Bernard, and dated July 27, 1835:

C "Mr. John Dowell, as you have expressed a wish to continue in the occupation of our farm at Clifford Court, we will undertake to grant you a lease on the same terms as the last, for a period of 14 years, when the present lease expires; and we hope you may live long enough to renew it at a future period."

D No new lease was executed in pursuance of this memorandum, but John Dowell continued in occupation of the premises beyond the expiration of the original lease, which took place on Feb. 2, 1837, and the death of Mrs. Bernard, which took place on May 15, 1837, until he relinquished such occupation in favour of his brother, the plaintiff, in July, 1837.

E In July, 1838, the assignees under Mr. Bernard's bankruptcy caused the life-interest of the bankrupt in the estates comprised in the settlement of July, 1819, to be put up to auction, when the defendant Dew was declared the purchaser. This purchase was completed by conveyance in May, 1839. In the particulars and conditions of sale which were circulated on the occasion of the auction the farm occupied by the plaintiff was described as being in his occupation under an agreement for a lease of 14 years from Feb. 2, 1837, at a rent of £525 per annum, from which land-tax was to be deducted, and subject, among other annual outgoings, to a chief rent of £15. In June, 1839, the defendant Dew served the plaintiff with notice to quit the farm. This the latter refused to do on the ground of having a good equitable title to the premises under the memorandum of July 27, 1835, which had been given to his brother. He, however, in order to strengthen his title, took a release from his brother, dated Aug. 29, 1839, of all his brother's interest in the farm under or by virtue of that memorandum. Ultimately, he filed G the present bill, to which David William Bernard was made a defendant, praying a declaration that the plaintiff was entitled to occupy the premises for the term of 14 years from Feb. 2, 1837, upon the terms contained in the lease, for the specific performance of the agreement of July, 1835, and for a perpetual injunction to restrain proceedings at law to recover the premises from the plaintiff.

H The defendant Dew, by his answer, insisted principally on the following points: (i) That the undertaking of July 27, 1835, did not amount to a contract as the same was merely voluntary, but that, even if it had been made for valuable consideration, it would have been inoperative, except as to the separate estate of Mrs. Bernard during the joint lives of herself and her husband, she being a married woman and her husband having become bankrupt; (ii) that the transfer of John Dowell's interest and the delivery of the possession of the premises by I him to the plaintiff were made without the consent in writing, or otherwise, of the assignees of Bernard, and without any subsequent confirmation on their part, and that, if such assignees had been under any obligation to grant a lease to John Dowell upon the terms mentioned in the undertaking of July, 1835, which the defendant submitted was not the case, such transfer and delivery were a direct violation of one of the covenants to be contained in such lease; (iii) that the rent of £525 was not the best and most improved yearly rent which could at the expiration of the lease of February, 1823, be had or gotten for the premises; (iv) that the plaintiff had not, since he had been in possession of the premises, duly kept the covenants of the lease of February, 1823, more particularly the covenants for repairs and good husbandry, according to the custom of the country; and (v) (in denial of allegations in the bill), that no sums of money had been expended by John Dowell on the farm since 1835, which would not have been expended by a tenant occupying merely from year to year. KNIGHT-BRUCE, V.-C.—The first question to be considered is whether the plaintiff's case fails on the ground of the coverture of Mrs. Bernard, who was a married woman when she signed the agreement in question, and during the remainder of her life. I think this circumstance not material as the case stands. She was tenant for her life, or for the joint lives of herself and her husband, for her separate use, with or without power of alienation, but with the power of leasing in question, which legally, at least, was not a power annexed to the life estate. [In any case this matter is of no practical importance now for, since the Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935, s. 1, a married woman has been capable of acquiring, holding, and disposing of, any property as if she were a feme sole.] C

It is then argued that there was no consideration for this agreement—that it was merely nudum pactum. It is not, however, considered requisite in this court that an agreement should at the time be binding on both parties. It is sufficient if an agreement signed by one party be afterwards accepted and acted on by the other. The agreement in this case was to demise for a certain rent to be paid, and under certain covenants to be entered into and performed. If Mrs. Bernard had died before the time at which a lease under the agreement could with propriety have been granted, the agreement possibly could never have been carried into effect. In point of fact, however, she did not do so. The old lease, the expiration of which was a preliminary to the commencement of the new demise, expired in February, 1837. Mrs. Bernard lived more than three months afterwards. The tenant under that agreement was in possession under the former lease at the date of the agreement, and continued in possession in that character up to the time of the expiration of the old lease. From that time his possession was only referable to the new agreement, and without laying too much stress on those acts done on the farm between the agreement and the death of Mrs. Bernard, which are proved to have been done solely with reference to the new agreement and by reason of it, it is sufficient to say that this agreement was in part performed by the continuance of the possession of the tenant after the expiration of the old lease until the death of Mrs. Bernard, and at the time of her death she was in a condition to enforce the performance of the agreement in equity against him by reason of that part performance. The continued possession was, it may be added, at no unimportant period of the year for a farmer, between Candlemas and the middle of May, at which period Mrs. Bernard's death happened. I think, therefore, that this forms no objection to the plaintiff's case. D E F G H

It is then said that the contract was future in its nature and the prohibition against reversionary leases and the authority of Harnett v. Yielding (1) are cited in support of that argument. To Harnett v. Yielding (1) I entirely accede. The decision there did not depend on the question of the agreement having been a fraud on the power, and would have been equally right if that ingredient had not formed part of the case, but even if that circumstance had been the main foundation of the decision, I should have thought the present case not affected by it. In Harnett v. Yielding (1) there were two agreements. The first was for renewal at any time on request during the life of the tenant for life; and the second, on which the bill seems mainly to have proceeded, was one, as I have always considered the report, utterly unintelligible in its nature. In the present case a lease for 14 years of a large farm was to expire at Candlemas, 1837. In the summer of 1835, it being obviously material to the tenant to know what he was to do both I

- A with respect to his mode of treating the farm and with respect to the disposition of himself and his capital after the expiration of the term, and it being equally material to the landlady to know how she was to stand with respect to her farm after the termination of the lease in February, 1837, the agreement was made for a renewed lease at the old rent after the expiration of the term. There is nothing to impeach the fairness of the agreement, and admitting, for the purpose of the
- B argument, the rent to have been sufficient in the spring of 1837 and the covenants proper, I do not see any rational ground upon which such a contract ought to fail. I think the lapse of time between the agreement and the expiration of the old lease nothing beyond that which is ordinary and reasonable. Therefore, supposing the rent and covenants sufficient, and supposing no act to have been done in material contravention of the settlement, but that all things in other respects had remained
- C the same, and that this bill had been a bill by John Dowell, the original tenant, no effectual resistance to the relief sought could, in my judgment, have been offered.

- [His LORDSHIP dealt with two questions of fact which do not call for report, and continued:] The next question is whether the lease which was agreed to be granted was conformable to the power. Of course, if it was not conformable to the power,
- D it would be useless and improper to grant any relief. It is another question how the court is to arrive at the conclusion whether it was or was not conformable to the power. I do not understand that the answer raises any issue with regard to the sufficiency of the covenants, and, therefore, for the purpose of this suit at present I must take it for granted that there is no such objection, not, however, meaning to preclude the landlord from raising any such question hereafter, if he
- E thinks fit. As to the rent, it is obvious that, in a case of difficulty, this is a question which, from its nature, cannot be very satisfactorily discussed and considered by a judge in equity without the assistance of a jury or the opportunity of seeing and hearing the witnesses. [His LORDSHIP, having discussed the evidence, said that he must send this matter to a jury.]

- We come next to consider whether the acts done have amounted to that which
- F would have been a forfeiture of the lease, if a lease had been granted. It is, of course, plain, if this court were satisfied that the lease, if granted, would have been forfeited by breaches of covenant, that it would be impossible to direct such a lease to be granted. It is another question how the court is to arrive at that satisfaction. Not to consume too much time in delivering the reasons which I feel it my duty, to some extent, to deliver on this part of the case, I may very
- G shortly dispose of one head of breaches of covenant—namely, the allegations of want of repairs and of improper cultivation. The evidence on the part of the plaintiff on this subject would, if unmet, be sufficient to show that the farm had been properly treated and conducted. On the other hand, there is strong evidence on the part of the landlord, going into more particulars, the other way. The observations, however, that I have made as to the danger and difficulty of deciding
- H in a court of equity finally on the notion which the court may entertain of the effect of conflicting written evidence as to the sufficiency of rent bear with much more strength on the question, whether this court is in a condition satisfactorily to decide on the repairs and management.

- An obvious observation is this, that, if the particulars of the repairs and management of a farm were to be viewed in a strict and literal manner, there would be
- I endless war throughout the country between landlord and tenant. No tenant could hold a farm in safety. It has been a very old principle of the law to disregard unimportant matters of waste. When LORD ELDON was in the Common Pleas an application, if I recollect right, was made to that court in an action of waste in which there was a verdict, I think with a farthing damages, to convert the judgment into a judgment for the defendant. LORD ELDON was very much struck with it, and at first objected, but he was satisfied by old authorities that that had always been the course. It is also a mode of viewing the subject which juries take still more largely—in some cases perhaps too largely, in others not unwholesomely for justice, for if, according to a literal interpretation of strict covenants, a tenant was to be ejected for a foul turnip-field, an unhinged gate, a broken shutter, or small matters of that description which frequently occur on the best-managed farms, there would scarcely be a lease in existence throughout the kingdom. It is necessary that in these cases juries and judges should make a reasonable allowance, and not put too strict and precise an interpretation on such covenants. There is the evidence of surveyors. When I began to read a catalogue of defects given by one at least of these gentlemen I was struck with its apparent bulk, but when I came to the conclusion of the list, I found that the summing-up was about £280. It is, however, not new. No man who has ever been a householder or landholder is a stranger to this kind of operation. An occupier of a house or a farm may be constantly laying out money upon it, allowing no seeming want of repair to go unremedied, fancying the property to be in the best order and condition, but let a surveyor be called in as to the state of repairs and a thick volume of defects in and out of the house will be the probable result. I do not, I confess, pay any very great attention to the list of dilapidations which is given by the surveyors here. That is, however, a matter which may most properly be submitted to a jury, and to a jury it must go. I feel myself utterly unable, on the evidence, to decide as to their extent, or materiality, or immateriality.

The only remaining question, I believe, is, as to the effect of the assignment without licence. It is said, and truly, that John Dowell agreed for a lease subject to the obligations of the old one, including a provision on pain of forfeiture against assignment except by licence under hand and seal; and that, without any licence in writing, he assigned to Thomas Dowell in the month of July, 1837. Such a breach, however, it is plain, may be waived. An underletting may or may not be what is called a continuing breach, on which, perhaps, all the authorities do not agree, but I apprehend an assignment is a breach once committed and for all. If, therefore, after the assignment to Thomas Dowell, Thomas Dowell was accepted as the tenant, that matter is waived. Am I to say that there is no evidence in this case that Thomas Dowell was accepted as tenant, and, therefore, that the breach in this respect has not been waived? In my opinion, there is very strong evidence that he was. It is said by Mr. Dew that the payment of rent to the assignees was after his equitable title had commenced. Whether it was or was not so, perhaps, does not very clearly appear, but Mr. Dew has received rent himself from this very man, and I have the assignees themselves, when advertising the estate for sale—the sale at which, or under which, Mr. Dew bought—describing Thomas Dowell as being in possession under this agreement. A judge and jury may take such a view of that matter as they may think just and right, but it is impossible that I can decide on this evidence that that breach has not been waived.

Accordingly, the learned vice-chancellor pronounced a decree declaring that the written undertaking, signed by Mr. and Mrs. Bernard, was a valid execution of the power contained in the marriage settlement, and that the circumstances of the transaction between the parties constituted an agreement which had been in part performed, and was capable of being enforced in a court of equity. He directed an action to be brought for the purpose of trying the questions whether the best rent had been reserved and whether there had been a waiver of the breach of the covenant not to assign. From this decision the defendant appealed.

Jan. 17, 1843. LORD LYNTHURST, L.C.—This was a bill filed by the plaintiff, Thomas Dowell, for the specific performance of an agreement for a lease, entered into by Mrs. Bernard under a power contained in her marriage settlement.

The first question in the case is as to the agreement. Mrs. Bernard had a life estate in the property for her sole and separate use, and a power to lease the premises in question for any term not exceeding twenty-one years, with the usual restrictions. Mrs. Bernard must, therefore, be considered with reference to this

A property as a feme sole, and there is, I think, no sufficient reason why her agreement to execute the power should not have the same effect as if she were unmarried—not, indeed, as to any remedy against her personally, but as to the estate in respect of which the power was to be exercised. It is true that SIR THOMAS PLUMER in Martin v. Mitchell (2) expressed some doubt on the point, but he abstained from deciding the question, and his reason, if we are to look at it according to the language of the report, would, as was justly observed, have applied equally to a case of defective execution of a power, whereas it has been long established that such a defective execution by a married woman would be supplied. Notwithstanding the doubts to which I have referred, I am of opinion, on principle, that such an agreement is binding on the estate, and may be enforced in a court of equity.

C It is objected, that there is in fact no agreement in this case; that the paper, called an agreement, was signed only by Mr. and Mrs. Bernard, and not by Dowell the tenant, and that there was no mutuality; but I think that there is sufficient evidence to show that this agreement was acted upon by Dowell, and that he continued in possession under it after the expiration of his lease. He states this expressly in his examination, and his mode of managing the farm, which does not depend on his evidence alone, strongly corroborates his testimony. Indeed, the very ground on which he made the application for a renewal, tends to the same conclusion. The agreement having been acted on by Dowell and he having continued in possession under it, this objection cannot prevail.

E It is further objected that this was an agreement for a reversionary lease, and that it is at variance with the power, which authorises only the granting of a lease in possession. But there was nothing, I conceive, in the terms of the power to prevent the party in whom it was vested from agreeing beforehand to grant a lease in possession when the proper time should arrive for that purpose. In fact, were it otherwise, an agreement entered into for such a purpose before the expiration of the existing lease would be invalid. An agreement of this nature is binding, and the execution of it may, I think, be enforced by the court if, as in the present case, the power is still subsisting at the expiration of the existing lease: Shannon v. Bradstreet (3). It is true, that, in this instance, the interval was considerable, but the reasons assigned for it appear to me satisfactory, namely, that it was material, in order to regulate the course of cultivation which was to be pursued in the subsequent year, that the tenant should know what he had to depend on in respect of the future.

G It is further contended, that the rent fixed on by the agreement is insufficient. If it was not the best and most improved yearly rent that could reasonably be obtained at the expiration of the former holding, the lease granted according to the agreement would not be a good execution of the power, and, whatever other remedy there might be on such an agreement, specific performance could not under such circumstances be enforced. Subject, therefore, to this question of fact as to the amount of the rent, I am of opinion that, if John Dowell had continued in possession under the agreement, his possession could not have been disturbed, and he might have enforced the granting of the renewed lease.

H The next objection is founded on the assignment without previous licence by John Dowell, the tenant, to his brother Thomas. If a lease had been granted in pursuance of the agreement and that lease had been assigned, it would have been a forfeiture, but such a forfeiture might have been waived. The question, however, remains to be decided whether, with reference to the object of the present suit, the same principle would apply to the agreement. It is clear that, if it were not for the clause against assigning without leave, the agreement would be binding, and might be enforced by Thomas Dowell the assignee. The same consequence would follow, notwithstanding the renewal of the lease had been previously obtained. The restraint is introduced for the benefit of the owner of the estate and he may dispense with it, if he thinks proper, either before or after the assignment. If he does so, the tenant is in the same situation as if there were no stipulation. This, therefore, is a question of fact, whether there has been in this case a waiver.

Then with respect to the rent, and the alleged breach of covenant with respect to the repairs, I have read the voluminous mass of evidence on these points, and, having had some experience as to questions of this kind, I feel satisfied that it would be impossible to come to a safe conclusion on these points merely on the written evidence and that an opportunity must be offered of sifting the truth by a viva voce examination, and by a cross-examination of the witnesses. The course pursued by the vice-chancellor in this respect was, in my opinion, proper and necessary. I think it, therefore, better to say nothing that might prejudice the question as to the impression which the evidence in its present shape has made on my mind, and for the same reason I abstain from saying anything on the effect of the evidence as to the waiver. I am, therefore, of opinion, that the decree on the whole case must be affirmed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitor—Solicitor to trustee—Sale by trustee of trust property under power—Purchase by solicitor—Validity.

Trustee—Sale of trust property—Incapacity to purchase property himself—Sale to agent—Validity.

B. was entitled to a reversionary interest under a will, which he charged with the payment of an annuity, the annuitant having a power of sale over the reversionary interest in the event of the annuity falling into arrear. The annuity having fallen into arrear, the administratrix of the annuitant employed a firm of solicitors to sell the reversionary interest, but, as the title to the annuity was defective, the solicitors procured the consent to the sale of B.'s personal representative. The reversionary interest was then sold to a nominee of the solicitors, it not being disclosed to the personal representative that the solicitors were the effective purchasers.

Held: (i) the solicitors were agents for the sale for the administratrix of the annuitant and B.'s personal representative, and as such could not, at least not without full explanation to the parties interested, become purchasers; (ii) even if the sale was by the administratrix of the annuitant alone, she was a trustee for the sale, and the solicitors, who were her agents, could not sell to themselves, any more than she could sell to herself; and, therefore, the sale was invalid.

- A Trustee—Power of sale—Exercise—Trustee for balance of purchase money—Incapacity to purchase property himself—Conflicting interests.

Per LORD COTTENHAM, L.C.—A party who proceeds under a power of sale is a trustee for that sale. He is not selling for himself, but for those to whom the property belongs. He is selling, it is true, under a power which enables him to pay himself in the first instance, but he is a trustee for the surplus and bound to account for it. The reason why a trustee is not permitted to purchase is because the court will not permit a man to have an interest adverse to and inconsistent with the duty which he owes to another, and, as a trustee for sale is bound to get the best price for property to be sold that he can, the court will not permit him to have an interest of his own adverse to the discharge of his duty to his cestui que trust. If he is the purchaser he is interested in getting the property at the lowest price he can.

- F Appeal from a decree of LORD COTTENHAM, L.C., reversing a decree of the Vice-Chancellor of England made on a petition presented under the Trustee Relief Act, 1847, directing the payment out to the appellants of a fund in court.

- W. M. Bloye, being entitled to one-fifth of the real and personal estate of Francis Bloye expectant on the death of R. Bloye, by indenture, dated April 6, 1840, in consideration of £600, granted an annuity to E. Pratt, secured on the reversionary interest. This indenture contained a power of sale by E. Pratt, her executors, administrators, or assigns on the annuity being in arrear for forty days. W. M. Bloye died on June 4, 1840, and by his will, of which his widow A. S. Bloye and another party were executors and trustees, after bequeathing a legacy of £200 to his wife, gave the residue of his property, in trust, for the benefit of his children. The annuitant, E. Pratt, died on Jan. 15, 1841, and on Sept. 19, 1846, the annuity having fallen into arrear, her administratrix, acting under the power contained in the indenture, put up the reversionary interest for sale, and the same was bought by Robert Barker for £900. In order to obviate difficulties in reference to the disposal of the purchase money, it had been found desirable, previously to the sale to obtain the concurrence of A. S. Hillman, formerly A. S. Bloye, and a formal consent in writing had accordingly, on Sept. 17, 1846, been procured from her by Messrs. Overton and Hughes, the solicitors who were conducting the sale on behalf of the representative of the annuitant. This consent, addressed to the auctioneer and signed by A. S. Hillman, was added to the conditions of sale, and was expressed in the following terms:

"I do hereby, as executrix of the will of my late husband, William Mitchell Bloye deceased, authorise you to sell the reversionary interest, referred to in this particular for not less than £900; and when sold, I do hereby agree, out of the purchase money and in consideration of the vendor Georgiana Woodman, administratrix of Elizabeth Pratt deceased the annuitant, consenting to the sale thereof at the said sum of £900, to redeem the annuity above referred to,

upon the understanding that the balance of the purchase money of the above-mentioned property, after payment of your and all other charges and expenses, be paid over to me as such executrix." A

At the time of the sale, A. S. Hillman had not proved her husband's will, but did so subsequently, Messrs. Overton and Hughes acting professionally on the occasion. The sale to R. Barker was not completed, in consequence of an objection to the title being taken, on the ground that the grant of the annuity was void for want of proper enrolment. B

In these circumstances, Messrs. Overton and Hughes determined to purchase the property on their own account for £900, and it was, by deed dated Nov. 27, 1846, of which due notice was given to the trustees of F. Bloye, conveyed to W. Lewis, who was in fact, a trustee for Messrs. Overton and Hughes. On Nov. 9, 1846, Messrs. Overton and Hughes enclosed to A. S. Hillman an account of the transaction, entitled, "Mrs. Hillman's account with Overton and Hughes." The trustees of F. Bloye having refused to pay to Lewis the share of W. M. Bloye in the trust estate on the ground of inadequacy of the consideration given, and having, on Feb. 2, 1849, under the provisions of the Trustees Relief Act, 1847, paid into court £1,770 1s. 9d. cash, being the share in question, Messrs. Overton and Hughes and W. Lewis, on Feb. 5, 1849, presented a petition, praying that the sum in court might be paid to Hughes. This petition, which was served on A. S. Hillman and the children of W. M. Bloye, having come on before the Vice-Chancellor of England on Mar. 2, 1849, it was then agreed that the matter should be argued as if A. S. Hillman and the children had presented a cross-petition in assertion of their title to the fund. His Honor thereupon made the order as prayed, and the fund (which then remained in cash) was received by Messrs. Overton and Hughes. A. S. Hillman and her children appealed. Affidavits were filed on both sides, the petitioners endeavouring to show, not only that an adequate consideration had been paid for the purchase, but also that A. S. Hillman had been a party to the transaction after a full explanation had been given to her of the matter. C D E

LORD COTTENHAM, L.C.—The vice-chancellor seems to have assumed, as far as I am enabled to learn what passed before him, that this question turned on its being a purchase of a reversionary interest, and, therefore, he proceeded to inquire into the price given. But the view which I take of this case makes it quite immaterial to consider that point. At the same time I cannot but observe that, if the rule be that a person purchasing a reversionary interest is bound to show he gave a fair price for it, the purchaser has, in the present instance, entirely failed in proving that proposition. I do not, however, deal with that question at all, and it is unnecessary I should, for, although I am dealing with the case of the purchase of a reversionary interest, yet, if it had been an interest in possession, the conclusion to which I have come would have been precisely the same. G H

The facts, except on one or two points where there is a degree of contradiction or obscurity remaining on the evidence, are very short and simple. A person being entitled to an interest in certain property (in fact it was a reversionary interest), grants an annuity, with a power of sale for the purpose of answering any arrears which might arise in the payment of the annuity; that party dies, and his interest is represented by a person who administered to his property. Of course the power of sale, being only for the purpose of paying what might be due on the annuity, if there was a surplus arising from the sale, it would belong to the grantor. The annuity being not a mortgage, but an incumbrance, the property was liable, in the first instance, to pay the charge, and, subject to such payment, the surplus belonged to the original owner. It is quite clear that, in the first instance, the intention was to sell under the power, because there was the power to sell, and the particulars and I

- A conditions of sale show, on the face of them that it was a sale intended to be carried into effect by virtue of that power. There is no question made, nor can there be any doubt upon the evidence, that Messrs. Overton and Hughes were the solicitors and agents for the purpose of effecting this sale on behalf of the annuitant or the party who represented the annuitant. Before, however, the sale actually took place it occurred to them that, if the personal representative of the grantor was to concur in the sale, it would probably very much facilitate the sale, and, accordingly a written memorandum was added to the conditions of sale by which the person entitled to be personal representative who afterwards became so (there described as the personal representative) agreed to join in the sale. That memorandum is very important, and, therefore, I will read its terms, which I think material for the consideration of the present case. [His LORDSHIP read the memorandum, see C p. 1093, ante]. This memorandum was procured from Mrs. Hillman by Messrs. Overton and Hughes, they being about to sell, and thinking it convenient (about which no complaint can be made) that the owner of the fund subject to the charge should join in the sale along with the encumbrancer who had the power to sell. Having got this memorandum, but Mrs. Hillman not being at that time the personal representative, they afterwards took steps for the purpose of investing her D with the character which she had assumed in authorising the sale. The sale which took place under the printed particulars, with the addition of the authority or agreement, was a sale of the whole interest, a sale of the property discharged, in fact, from the incumbrance. The grantor and grantee, or those who represented them, had agreed among themselves in what manner and proportions the fund was to be divided for the purpose of paying off the incumbrance, but as between the vendor and the purchaser it was a sale of the two interests by a joint authority given to the auctioneer through the intervention of Messrs. Overton and Hughes.

- E It is impossible to say that Messrs. Overton and Hughes were not agents for the sale. They were the agents for the sale, and the sale was with the joint authority of the two parties. It is not contended, nor can it for a moment be contended, that they, being agents for the sale, could become purchasers, at least not without F full explanation to the parties interested and putting them in full possession of the facts and the knowledge that they (the solicitors) were to become purchasers for themselves. I do not say to what extent parties so circumstanced, may or may not be permitted to deal with property where they know all the facts, but beyond all question, their agents and solicitors cannot surreptitiously, by which I mean without the knowledge of their principals, become purchasers: Woodhouse v. Meredith G (1).

- Then comes another question, which, looking at the case from a different point of view, would make it perfectly immaterial whether the conclusion to which I have thus come is correct or not. Supposing it to be a sale merely by the annuitant, nobody can dispute that the annuitant proceeded under the power of sale, but a party who proceeds under a power of sale is a trustee for that sale. He is not H selling for himself, but for those to whom the property belongs. He is selling, it is true, under a power which enables him to pay himself in the first instance, but he is a trustee for the surplus, and bound to account for it. If Messrs. Overton and Hughes were acting for the annuitant, the annuitant being a trustee for the sale, and not being able to purchase for herself, am I to hold that her attorney or agent can do it? If the principal is incapacitated, can the agent do that which the principal could not? The question arose (though I am not aware that it was the subject of decision), and was matter of observation by LORD ELDON in Downes v. Grazebrook (2). There LORD ELDON laid it down, not as a new proposition, but as a necessary result of the doctrine of the court, that an encumbrancer with a power of sale was in the first instance a trustee for sale, and, being such, was affected with all the disability of purchasing which any other trustee would be. That was the case there, and the only point calling for decision, but LORD ELDON alludes to the fact of the attorney purchasing, and asks the question (in a way in which those who are familiar with LORD ELDON's mode of putting a question may know what answer he would have given, if he had been called on to answer it) whether the attorney could do that which the principal could not; whether, if a party is incapacitated from purchasing, he can employ an agent to do that which he could not do himself; and whether that agent had a power to purchase which his principal had not whether, if that were so, it would not be the most absurd distinction in the world. The reason why a trustee is not permitted to purchase is because the court will not permit a man to have an interest adverse to and inconsistent with the duty which he owes to another, and, as a trustee for sale is bound to get the best price for property to be sold that he can, the court will not permit him to have an interest of his own adverse to the discharge of his duty to his cestui que trust. If he is the purchaser he is interested in getting the property at the lowest price he can, but, if he is acting bona fide for the owner of the property, his duty is to sell at the best price he can obtain, and the court will not permit a party to place himself in a situation in which his interest conflicts with his duty, for, taking mankind at large, it is not very safe to allow a man to put his private interest in conflict with the duty which he owes to another. This, then, is the rule. Practically, the agent is the party who is to conduct the sale, for in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred the principal takes no part in it. He directs the sale of the property, but the solicitor, the auctioneer, or the agent, is the party who is to conduct it, and on whose exertions the result of the sale depends. Therefore, to say that the principal is incapacitated, but that the agent is not, would be an absurd distinction, the reason remaining the same, and being as applicable to one as to the other. I am of opinion that it is clearly made out that the sale was on behalf of Mrs. Hillman, who was one of the vendors. But if that were not so, there is no question that the sale was on behalf and by direction of the annuitant, and that Messrs. Overton and Hughes were the solicitors and agents for that annuitant, and, as such, became ultimately the purchasers. The original purchaser objected to the title, and was desirous to be released from his bargain.

[His LORDSHIP commented on the circumstances under which Messrs. Overton and Hughes determined to become the purchasers of the property, but stated that these circumstances were not material to the merits of the case. He examined at some length, the evidence relating to Mrs. Hillman's concurrence in the sale, and to Messrs. Overton and Hughes having previously communicated to her all the particulars of the transaction, but considered that it did not establish the representations made by Messrs. Overton and Hughes. At the close of his observations, he adverted to the circumstance that the deed conveying the property to W. Lewis in no way recited the facts as they really existed, and continued:] I think I have stated quite enough to show that, according to my view, Messrs. Overton and Hughes were not in a situation to be purchasers, without fully communicating to the party all the circumstances of the sale, and the value of the property. The title of Messrs. Overton and Hughes is that of purchasers, though they were agents for the sale. I have already stated the reasons for which I disregard the statement made by them of Mrs. Hillman having been a party to the transaction after full explanation, and of having agreed to deal with them as purchasers, and when I look at the deed which they prepared and tendered to her for execution, it negatives the transaction altogether. If the transaction was as they represent it, there was no objection to Mrs. Hillman knowing they were to be the purchasers, and if they had prepared a deed reciting the real facts and had secured her concurrence, whatever title they might thus have obtained, their case would have been free from the imputation of suppression. Instead of doing this, they put on the face of the deed a transaction totally inconsistent with the facts. They represent another party as the purchaser for his own benefit, and carefully suppress all allusion to themselves as being interested in the purchase. When I look, therefore, to the deed, and to the evidence in the case, I consider the statement of approbation and concurrence on behalf of Mrs. Hillman as being entirely contrary to the fact.

We have thus the direct case of agents for a sale, solicitors employed for the purpose of sale, surreptitiously, clandestinely, and by concealment and misrepre-

A sentation of the facts, endeavouring to become purchasers for themselves and obtaining a conveyance to an assignee for themselves, that assignee being represented as the real purchaser. It is only necessary to state the proposition to show that such a transaction cannot, for a moment, be sustained in a court of equity, and if I had been able to collect these facts with that degree of certainty with which it is the duty of the court to ascertain them, before it disposes of property, and more especially where it has to make a decision which cannot but affect the conduct and character of those interested in it, many hours of the discussion might have been saved. I consider the case, therefore, is entirely made out as against these proposed purchasers, and I am bound to make such an order as I should have made, if there had been a bill filed to set aside the deed.

C [The order, so far as material, directed Overton & Hughes to repay into court the sum £1,757 16s. 8d. (the £1,770 1s. 9d. less certain costs).]

W. Lewis and Overton and Hughes appealed to the House of Lords. The case came before the House on Mar. 22 and 25, 1852, sub nom. LEWIS AND OTHERS v. HILLMAN AND OTHERS.

Stuart and Cairns for the appellants.

Bethell and Rogers for the respondents.

D LORD ST. LEONARDS, L.C., reviewed the facts, and said that their Lordships had been told that that was a fair transaction and that the order made in the court below was a harsh order. With that order he entirely concurred. He agreed that the deed was invalid and not worth the ink with which it was written. To a contract there must be two persons. Two minds were essential to constitute a contract. For a contract of the present sort there must be, not only a buyer but also a seller. On this occasion there was a buyer, no doubt, in one sense of the term, but there was no seller. Contract there was none, but contrivance there was, in order to obtain a good title from Mrs. Hillman, so as to give validity to the acts which had taken place to enable the appellants to complete the sale of the property.

F His LORDSHIP continued: I have been surprised, I confess, at this matter being pursued, when the rules of equity are so clear. No man in a court of equity is allowed himself to buy and sell the same property. He cannot sell to himself. Even in the case of a fair trustee, he cannot sell to himself. If he has the power or the trust to sell, he must have some one to deal with. Courts of equity do not allow a man to assume the double character of seller and purchaser, and it is necessary, in order to preserve the interests of persons entitled beneficially to property, to maintain that rule. But here is a case which goes infinitely beyond that. I should lay it down as a rule, my Lords, that ought never to be departed from, that, if an attorney or agent can show he is entitled to purchase, yet, if instead of openly purchasing, he purchases in the name of a trustee or agent, without disclosing the fact, no such purchase as that can stand for a single moment. Such a transaction, to stand, must be open and fair, and free from all objection. And if a man purchases, as these appellants purchased, by putting forward a clerk of his own, not as a clerk, not as an agent, but as an actual bona fide purchaser upon an absolute and independent contract, he does that which, the moment it is stated, renders the deed powerless for the purpose for which it was framed and executed, and the court will hold the parties responsible for everything that results from it. If, therefore, a bill had been filed, this contract had been attempted to be set up, and it had come before your Lordships, I cannot hesitate to say that you would have rescinded that contract, and thrown the whole costs of the proceeding upon the parties who had entered into it.

His LORDSHIP then dealt with a point of procedure under the Trustee Relief Act, 1847 (repealed by the Trustee Act, 1893), which does not now call for report.

Appeal dismissed.

MONYPENNY v. DERING

[COURT OF APPEAL IN CHANCERY (Lord St. Leonards, L.C.), July 17, 19, 20, 1852]

[Reported 2 De G.M. & G. 145; 22 L.J.Ch. 313; 19 L.T.O.S. 320;

17 Jur. 467; 42 E.R. 826]

Perpetuities—Will—Application of rule—Gift to unborn child of unborn child—Validity of gift over—Alternative independent limitations.

Will—Condition—Defeasance of vested estate on happening of event—Shifting of A estate if devisee becomes entitled to interest in possession in B estate—Operation of shifting clause.

Where an estate is given to an unborn person for life with remainder to the children of that unborn person in tail, the court may, in order to effectuate the testator's intention, create an estate tail in the first donee, contrary to the words of the will.

A gift to A. for life then to his issue and in default of issue generally of A. over, raises first, an estate tail, and secondly, creates a remainder over on that estate tail, the testator's intention being that the estate should not go over until there was a general failure of A.'s issue.

The court cannot by implication, or by the doctrine of cy-près, carry an estate to a class or portion of a class for whom the testator did not intend to provide; but for persons for whom the testator has shown an intention to provide the court can raise estates although in a different manner from that indicated by the testator.

The court will not hold a gift over, made in words comprising only one event, as made on two events, although it may consist reasonably of two branches, unless the testator has himself so expressed it.

J. M. devised "the Maytham Hall Estate" to trustees upon trust (inter alia) for P. M. for life, then in trust for the first son of the body of P. M. for life, "and from and immediately after his decease upon trust for the first son of the body of such first son, and the heirs male of his body, and in default of such issue upon trust for all and every other the son and sons of the body of P. M. severally and successively, according to their seniority of age, for the like interests and limitations as before directed respecting the first son and his issue, and in default of issue of the body of P. M. or in case of his not leaving any at his decease, upon trust for T. M. for life; and after his decease upon trust for T. G. M. the eldest son of T. M. for life, and after his decease upon trust for the first son of the body of T. G. M. and the heirs male of his body, and in default of issue of the body of T. G. M. upon trust for all and every other the son and sons of the body of T. M. for like estates," etc.; "and in failure of all such issue of the body of T. M. upon trust for him, his heirs and assigns, for ever," provided that if P. M. or T. M. "or either of them, their, or either of their issue, shall become entitled to the Joddrell estate then the trustees shall stand seised of my devised estates upon trust for the next person entitled thereto, under this my will, in the same manner as they would have done if the person so succeeding to the Joddrell estate were actually dead."

T. M. died after the date of the will, and the testator, by a codicil, declared that his trustees should stand seised of the devised estates upon trust for his [the testator's] wife for her life, and after her decease upon the trusts declared by his will subject to the declaration therein contained with reference to the Joddrell estate. P. M. had no children.

Held: (i) P. M. took an estate for life subject to the life estate of the testator's widow; and the limitation "to the first son of the body of such first son [of P. M.] and the heirs male of his body" was void for remoteness.

(ii) the gift over contained in the words "in default of issue of P. M. or in case of his not leaving any at his decease on trust for T. M." for life, did not

A depend on the previous void limitations, that is, it could be read as a gift over in the alternative, and was perfectly valid. Accordingly, T. G. M. "in default of issue of the body of P. M." took an estate for life, determinable on his becoming entitled to the Joddrell estate, and also a remainder in tail general after the estate tail of his eldest son.

B (iii) The eldest son of T. G. M. took a contingent remainder in tail male after the life estate of his father.

C J. devised "the Joddrell estate," to P. M. (subject to certain life estates) for life, with remainder to his sons and daughters in tail, with remainder to T. M. with like remainders to his sons and daughters in tail, with divers remainders over, provided "that if P. M. and T. M. or either of them, their, or either of their issue male or female, or any other son or sons of T. M." (who were provided for by the will), "hereafter to be born, or his, their, or any of issue male or female shall, at any time or times, be or become entitled to any estate of freehold, or inheritance in possession [in the Maytham Hall estate] or the greatest part of the same, . . . so as to be in the possession or in the actual receipt of the rents and profits thereof," then and in that case the estates devised by the will should shift.

D On the death of P. M. without issue these estates became vested in T. G. M. (the eldest son of T. M.). At the date of J.'s will, R. M. was entitled to the Maytham Hall estate; he devised it to J. M. who disentailed it, and under the limitations in his will (vide supra), it became vested in T. G. M.:

E Held: T. G. M. did succeed to the Joddrell estate in the sense contemplated by the testator, and the shifting clause operated.

Notes. In considering the effect of this decision it should be borne in mind that the rule in Whitby v. Mitchell (1890), 44 Ch.D. 85 (whereby, in respect of legal limitations of real estate, a remainder could not be limited to the children of an unborn person, as purchasers) was abolished by the Laws of Property Act, 1925, s. 161. Section 130 of the Act of 1925 should also be considered. So far, therefore, as this case depends on the rule in Whitby v. Mitchell it is obsolete, but it is still used as an authority on shifting clauses and the validity of limitations taking effect after limitations which are void.

Appeal from a decision of WIGRAM, V.-C.

Wigram, Rolt and C. Hall for the plaintiff, the eldest son of T. G. M.

Bethell, Malins, Willcock, Rogers, Faber, F. T. White, Browell, Borton and

C Bagshaw for the several parties interested.

July 19, 1852. LORD ST. LEONARDS, L.C.—As I entertain no doubt on the principal question in this case, I will at once dispose of that; with regard to the question arising on the shifting clauses obtained in these wills, I will postpone disposing of that until tomorrow. Both questions are of great importance.

- D James Monypenny seems to have had a great desire to provide only for the first son of the person to whom he gave one of the properties. It is given to the use of his nephew for life and then for the first son of the body of that nephew and the heirs male of the body of such first son. There he leaves off and, except that the reversion would fall into the general devise of a portion of the residue, an event that I cannot give him credit for being aware of, there would be no further disposition of that estate; it would not go to any person except the first son and the heirs male of his body; no other person is in any manner provided for; but that is different from the question which arises under the general gift.

The testator gives the legal fee to trustees who are to raise the debts, and then limits the estates in trust for his brother Phillips for life without impeachment of waste, then in trust for the first son of the body of Phillips for his life, and

- F “immediately after his decease to the first son of the body of such first son and the heirs male of his body; and in default of such issue in trust for all and every the son and sons of the body of my said brother Phillips Monypenny, severally and successively according to seniority of age for the like interests and limitations as I have before directed respecting the first son and his issue, and in default of issue of the body of my said brother Phillips Monypenny, or in
- G case of his not having any at his decease, upon trust for my said brother Thomas Monypenny for and during the term of his natural life without impeachment of waste, and from and immediately after his decease upon trust,”

- and so on. Stopping there and without including the gift over, if the issue had been born in the lifetime of the testator, those would have been valid devises; but Phillips Monypenny never had any issue, and the rule of law forbids you to raise successive estates by purchase to unborn children, that is, to an unborn child of an unborn child. There is, therefore, taking the limitations as they stand, a good life estate to Phillips and to his first unborn son, if he had one, and the remainder to the other sons and their issue would be absolutely void as being on too remote a contingency. Did the testator intend to provide for the other sons of the first son, beyond a first son? The gift is

- I “upon trust for the first son of the body of such first son, and the heirs male of his body, and in default of such issue, ”

not on trust for the second son, and every other the son and sons of the body of such first son, but on trust

“for all and every other the son and sons of the body of Phillips, severally and successively.”

So that, had he intended to provide for other sons of a person for whose first son he had provided, he knew perfectly well how to do so, for he has done it in clear and express words. As it stands, the whole would be void after the first life estate to the first unborn son; and can I, by construction or otherwise, raise estates to the other sons of that first son? It was argued that I might, on these grounds: First, by the doctrine of cy-près; secondly, by a particular construction of the will itself; and thirdly, on the rule which gives to a general intent a preference over a particular intent. A

The doctrine of cy-près, as I understand it, is nothing more than the giving effect to a general at the expense of a particular intent. It is this. Where there is a valid particular intent and a valid general intent and the former, in the opinion of the court, not effectuating all the intention of the testator, the court looks to his general intent and will effect that general intent at the sacrifice of the particular intent. But here you sacrifice nothing. In the case of a limitation where there is a good gift under a power to the objects of a limited estate, and an ulterior gift to children who are not objects, the court, if it can, will effectuate the further intention of the testator by giving to the parent himself an estate of inheritance through whom it will descend to his children. There you effectuate the general intent but at no expense of the particular, because there was no particular intent to which you could give validity. In the present case there is a limitation to an unborn son for life, with remainder to his unborn children for life; now you cannot give effect to that intent because you cannot give successive estates to an unborn person and to the issue of that unborn person; but were that limitation to be effected, it would be as a general intent and not at the sacrifice of any particular intent. B C D

The words of the will are, "And in default of issue of the body of Phillips, or in case of his not leaving any at his decease," then a gift over. That gift over would, by construction in an ordinary case, give an estate tail to Phillips himself. Some of Phillips's issue being provided for, and Phillips himself having a life estate, and then the estate being given over in default generally of issue of Phillips, the true construction would, I think, be that the testator intended to provide that that estate should not go over until there was a general default of the issue of Phillips, and if so, then there would be an estate tail general raised by those words, which would have a double operation; first of all, to raise an estate tail, and secondly, to create a remainder over on that estate tail. That construction would, according to A.-G. v. Sutton (1), leave the express limitations of the will to operate as they were directed. In that way, although in remainder, all the issue of Phillips could be provided for. The will then goes on, E F

"in trust for his brother Thomas for life, and immediately after his decease in trust for Thomas Gybbon, the eldest son of Thomas for life, and immediately after his death upon trust again for the first son of the body of the said Thomas Gybbon and the heirs male of his body [there he creates an estate tail] and in default of issue of the body of the said Thomas Gybbon upon trust for all and every other the son and sons of Thomas for the like estates, and on failure of all such issue of the body of Thomas upon trust for him in fee." G H

It is quite clear then that the limitation over in default of the issue of Thomas Gybbon would give Thomas an estate tail in remainder expectant on the estate tail to Thomas Gybbon, and in that way all the intention of the testator would be effected as to the issue of Thomas.

Looking at the whole frame of this will there is ground to suppose that the testator did fancy that he had provided for all the issue. But can that intention be effected by the rule of law? Some doubt was thrown out during the argument on Pitt v. Jackson (2). I have always held it to be law. I followed it in Stackpoole v. Stackpoole (3), and so did LORD ALVANLEY in Routledge v. Dorril (4). The clear doctrine is that where an estate is given to an unborn person for life, with remainder in tail to the children of that unborn person it shall be construed, in order to effectuate the intention, as an estate tail in the person to whom it is given for life, contrary to the words in the first part. Supposing, then, that the I

- A cy-près doctrine is not to be applied to the case before me, it must be on this ground and this ground only, that although the doctrine may be applied to cases where the intention of the testator is not by such application carried into effect because that intention was illegal, yet it must be so applied in favour of a class intended to be provided for by the testator. I apprehend the rule is this, that neither by implication nor by the doctrine of cy-près, can an estate be carried to
- B a class, or a portion of a class, for whom the testator never intended to provide. For persons for whom the testator did intend to provide, a different provision may indeed be made, as was done in Pitt v. Jackson (2). There the estate was intended to go to the children as purchasers as tenants in common but it was not within the power of the testator to give them that estate and the court, therefore, would not raise it, but it raised an estate which, although it would not go modo et
- C forma as the testator had provided, would go to all the class for whom he intended to provide.

As to Nicholl v. Nicholl (5), I am disposed to think that it is not open to the criticism which was made on it in this case in the Court of Exchequer, for it appears to me as if the court had seen on the whole of the will in Nicholl v. Nicholl (5) that the second son of the second son was only intended to be excluded

D in case the paternal estate devolved on him and that they also collected an intention to provide for everybody else. Accordingly we find that the second opinion which the judges gave was this :

"We are also of opinion that, in order to effectuate the general intent of the devisor, such second son will take an estate to him and the heirs male of his body, determinable on the accession of the paternal estate."

- E It is certainly a singular case and the construction put on the devise a very bold one; but I do not apprehend that the court meant to introduce or that they did, in fact, by the doctrine of cy-près introduce, any person or class of persons for whom the testator did not intend to provide. I think, therefore, that Nicholl v. Nicholl (5) is not an authority against the decision of the Court of Exchequer in the present
- F case. Applying the rule I have stated to the limitations now under consideration, I think that I am not at liberty to disregard the clear words of the testator which I am perfectly satisfied he meant to use according to their import, although he may possibly have also meant something else which he has not sufficiently expressed. Being clear that he meant both to give the estate to his brother Phillips for life and to the first son of his brother for life and to the first son of that first
- G son and the heirs male of his body, and also that he meant nothing to interfere with that disposition, I cannot by the doctrine of cy-près, include any limitations which would provide for the second and other sons of the first grandson, contrary to the words of the will. I am, therefore, of opinion that the doctrine does not enable me to give effect to any supposed intention of the testator beyond the clear expressions contained in his will.

- H I may here dispose of the third point submitted to me, namely, that I can give effect to the assumed intention by means of the doctrine of providing for the general intention at the sacrifice of the particular intention. There is no case that I am aware of that would enable me, on that doctrine, to cut down the clear estate in tail male given by this will to the first grandson. If the child had been born in the testator's lifetime neither I nor any other judge would have a right to say
- I that the testator might not give the estate to his brother for life, to his brother's first son for life, and to the first son of that son and the heirs male of his body. On the face of them the limitations are valid, they are also unambiguous and require no aid whatever from any rules of construction; and I cannot, therefore, on the ground of a general intention, affect them.

The question then arises whether I can in any other way, effectuate what is supposed to be the general intent. Immediately after the limitation just considered. the testator gives the estate,

"for all and every other the son and sons of the body of my said brother Phillips Monypenny severally and successively according to seniority of age for the like interests and limitations as I have before directed respecting the first son and his issue."

The words here are also express and plain and I do not see how I can, on the ground of a general intent, cut down this particular limitation and exclude the second and other sons of the brother Phillips Monypenny, to whom the testator has expressly given the estate on failure of the heirs male of the body of the first grandson. I had occasion to review the authorities on this point in Montgomery v. Montgomery (6), and I took great care in going through them to see what the rule really was. Although always willing to give effect to the general intention when I can do so without unreasonably and improperly destroying a particular intent, I there found myself bound to give effect to the particular intent which, though not embracing everything, embraced a great deal, and gave a proper legal operation to the will according to the expressed intention of the testator. By that rule I desire to abide, being ready to give effect to the general intent, and even to sacrifice to it a particular intent if requisite, but not doing so without an actual necessity.

It has also been argued here very ingeniously that wherever you find an estate tail given to the parent, either under an actual limitation which would admit of no difficulty, or by implication (as, for example, to A. and if he dies without issue to B., where an estate tail arises by implication from the gift over), if the preceding or following limitations in the will are to the children of that person, they may be rejected, and that it is utterly unimportant that successive estates are by these limitations attempted to be raised which would be void for perpetuity. I know of no such rule, and must deny that any such exists.

Two cases were, however, cited in support of the argument. One was Seaward v. Willock (7), in which there was nothing but the devise of successive estates for life, which were held to be void, the successive estates which were given were not followed by any other limitation; and I understand the argument with which I am now dealing to depend on what was said by LORD ELLENBOROUGH in delivering the judgment of the court. After holding the successive estates to be void, he cites various cases, and says:

"In all these cases expressions were used denoting an intention that the lands should continue in the descendants of the first taker as long as there were any, without specifying or marking what estates such descendants should take: but in this case the deviser has not used general terms, from whence an intent to give a descendable estate to the issue of the first devisee may be collected; but has in express terms narrowed the estates which the issue were to take to estates for life: and this, properly speaking, is not a case of a particular and a general intent, both of which cannot be effectuated, and where the one must give way to the other; but a case of single intent to create, as I have said, a succession of estates for life not warranted by law: we do not, therefore, feel ourselves warranted by any rules of construction to say that under this devise Thomas Southcomb, the bankrupt, took any greater estate than for his life."

I, however, think that this, so far from sustaining the argument, is rather the other way and tells against it. The other case referred to was Mortimer v. West (8), in which, although there were void estates for life, SHADWELL, V.-C., relied on a general gift over (whether properly or not I need not now consider); but it is no authority on which I can act for the general proposition which I do not think can be maintained.

I do not mean to say that if I could see a clear general intention to provide for the issue in a way in which effect could be given to it, and a superadded intention to provide for that issue in a manner not allowed by law, I might not, in such a case, reject that which was illegal, and give effect to that which was legal; and what now falls from me must not, therefore, be considered as an expression of opinion that cases may not exist in which a limitation to issue void for remoteness

A may not be properly rejected and the legal intention effectuated by giving an estate tail to the parent. I cannot, however, do this in the case before me: I cannot give the estate to the father in possession for that would clearly not effect the intention and I cannot give it to him in remainder expectant on the void estates, for that would immediately expose it to the same objection as the preceding estates and render it equally void with them.

B I now come to the argument raised on the question of construction simply. It is said that, if I could give to the first son of the body of the first son, that is, to the grandson, of Phillips Monypenny an estate tail, then the other estates would naturally follow under the actual gifts of the will. That is certainly the most reasonable construction that could be adopted of this will and one which would do less violence to the terms used than any other. If, therefore, I could adopt it, I would;

C but I cannot do so consistently with the words of the will; for, in the first place, I must not only introduce lines of issue for whom the testator has not provided but I must exclude and postpone lines of issue for whom he has expressly provided. I must not only introduce second and other sons of the first son but I must exclude, until they or all those so introduced are dead without issue, the second and other sons of Phillips Monypenny. This I am not at liberty to do. I am, therefore, of

D opinion as to the construction of this will, that I cannot give any other than the general legal construction to the limitations; the consequence of which is, that Phillips Monypenny took a good estate for life, and his first unborn son, if he had been born, would have taken a good estate for life, and that all the remainders over, so far as they are remainders over, are void and inoperative and cannot be considered as standing in the way of anybody who is entitled otherwise in this

This brings me to the clause containing the gift over and a very important question is certainly raised on that clause. After having provided for the unborn children and issue of unborn children of Phillips Monypenny, the testator says:

F "And in default of issue of the body of my said brother Phillips Monypenny, or in case of his not leaving any at his decease, upon trust for my said brother Thomas Monypenny for and during the term of his natural life," etc.

If this was a regular remainder, depending on the previous limitations, it would of course be open to the same objections as those limitations, and those limitations being void it could not take effect.

The law, as to this part of the case, stands in a peculiar position. Longhead v. Phelps (9) shows that where there are two clauses containing a gift over, the first being a good gift over on a particular event and the second being one which would be too remote and, therefore, void, advantage may be taken of the former without any notice being taken of the latter clause. The point did not arise in the case just mentioned on a gift over following any disposition illegal on account of perpetuity; but it did so arise in a very important case which was not cited, and which was very much canvassed both in this court and the courts of common law, Beard v. Wescott (10). There were in that case, successive life estates for terms of years to the testator's grandson and his unborn issue (as in Somerville v. Lethbridge (11)), which were clearly void beyond the first son, and then followed a disposition to this effect:

I "And in case there shall be no issue male of the same John James Beard (the testator's grandson), nor issue of such issue male at the time of his death, or in case there shall be such issue male at that time, and they shall all die before they shall respectively attain their respective ages of twenty-one years without lawful issue male," then the estate was to go over. The case was sent to the Court of Common Pleas, and they were of opinion (that part of the case is cited in a note to GILBERT ON USES, p. 270) that the several gifts after the gift to the unborn son of the grandson were void, but they were also of opinion that, if the event mentioned arose, the gift over would take effect, the event in question being within the legal limits of perpetuity. With this decision I could not agree and for this reason, that the testator never meant that the gift over should take effect unless the parties interested under the previous limitation if they had lived were capable themselves of taking, and that consequently the gift over must be void. Having had great difficulty in prevailing on Sir William Grant to send the case to the Court of Common pleas originally and that court having decided that the consideration I have just stated did not affect the validity of the gift over, I applied to and prevailed on LORD ELDON, L.C., to send a case to the Court of King's Bench. That court held that the gift over was void, not because it was not within the line of perpetuity but expressly on the ground I have adverted to, namely, that that limitation over was never intended by the testator to take effect, unless the persons whom he intended to take under the previous limitation would, if they had been alive, been capable of enjoying the estate and that he did not intend that the estate should wait for persons to take in a given event, where the person to take was actually in existence but could not take LORD ELDON affirmed that decision. This shows that where there are gifts over which are void for perpetuity, and there is a subsequent and independent clause on a gift over which is within the line of perpetuities, effect cannot be given to such a clause unless it will dovetail in and accord with previous limitations which are valid. This reasoning will apply to the case before me in this manner; if the gift in question can be read as a gift in the alternative, that in case there is no issue living at the death of the brother the estate is to go over, then effect may be given to it consistently with Beard v. Wescott (10), and every other authority, because the estate over would not be carried under the limitation at the expense of any person whom the testator intended to take, and no objection on this ground could consequently be raised.

The cases as to limitations over have also taken another shape. In Proctor v. Bishop of Bath and Wells (12), there was a disposition to the first son of Thomas Proctor who should be bred a clergyman and be in holy orders, and if Thomas Proctor should have no such son, then over: and there was no son. As the son could not take holy orders until the age of twenty-four, the limitation, taking it as it stood, was too remote; but it was argued, and it might be said reasonably that the limitation over embraced two events, namely, if no son was ever born, or that being born he did not take holy orders, and that the first was perfectly good. The court, however, held expressly that they could not divide the limitation, saying that they "were clearly of opinion that the first devise to the son of Thomas Proctor was void, from the uncertainty as to the time when such son, if he had any, might take orders; and that the devise over, as it depended on the same event, was also void; for the words of the will would not admit of the contingency being divided, as was the case in Longhead v. Phelps (9); and there was no instance in which a limitation, after a prior devise, which was void from the contingency being too remote, had been let in to take effect."

Thus the courts have gone at least to this extent, that they will not hold a gift over made in words comprising only one event as made on two events although, in point of fact, it may consist very reasonably of two branches, unless the testator has himself so expressed it. What is contended in the case before me is that I am to consider the words which at all events point to different events as pointing only to one event. There is no doubt that in the sense in which the words, "and in default of issue of the body," are generally used, they mean a failure of issue at any time which would, of course, embrace a failure of issue at any particular time; but then I find the testator, while using these words, also using words which embrace an event falling within them. I am, therefore, bound to consider that he did not use the general words in the sense in which the court would use them for if he did, the other clause would be insensible and inoperative. As, then, I have before refused to add to the words which he has used, so I refuse, and on the

A same solid ground as it appears to me, to strike out his words, and I feel myself bound to give effect to every word in the will, as far as the law will enable me to do so.

There is also another reason which on this part of the case is quite satisfactory to my mind. LORD HARDWICKE lays it down that it is utterly immaterial what words come first or what words come last in a will; that, in fact, there is no magic in words. I am clearly of opinion, therefore, that if there be ambiguity in the clause in question I am at perfect liberty to clear it up and to read the clause in this way, "And in case of his not leaving any issue at his decease or in default of his issue," meaning "if upon his death" (looking at an event which may soon be ascertained) "he shall leave no issue behind him, or if he do and at any period however remote that issue shall fail, I give the estate in such and such a way."

C There is nothing at all insensible in this; it may be expressing unnecessarily in the former branch of the clause that which would be included in the latter but it shows that, unlike Proctor v. Bishop of Bath and Wells (12), the testator has provided under two forms of expression for what he might have provided under one. I can hardly suppose any clause providing for an event which must happen, but may happen at different periods, that might not be read in the same way. It might be so read in Leake v. Robinson (13), and every other case. Nothing is so dangerous with regard to a man's will as to strike out words which admit of a reasonable interpretation; and I am clearly of opinion that effect must be given to this clause as an independent clause, and that the gifts over are perfectly valid.

I shall, therefore, affirm the decision of the court below, so far as it relates to the first question in the case; the other point I will, after looking into the materials before me, endeavour to dispose of tomorrow morning.

July 20, 1852. LORD ST. LEONARDS, L.C.—The case on the point which now remains to be disposed of is one of considerable difficulty and complication and I will now state the opinion which I have formed on it, after having given it that consideration which it ought to receive.

F By the will of Mrs. Jodrell, who died in 1775, the Jodrell estate was given to Mary Jefferson for life, then to her sons and daughters in tail, then to Sylvestra Monypenny for life and her sons and daughters in tail, then to Phillips Monypenny for life and his sons and daughters in like manner, and then to Thomas Monypenny for life and his sons and daughters in like manner; then there was the shifting clause that,

G "if the said Phillips Monypenny and Thomas Monypenny or either of them their or either of their issue male or female, or any other son or sons of the said James Monypenny, of Greenwich" (who are provided for by her will) "hereafter to be born or his their or any of their issue male or female, shall at any time or times be or become entitled to an estate of freehold or inheritance in possession of or in the messuages lands tenements and hereditaments in the said county of Kent now of or belonging to my cousin Robert Monypenny, Esq., of Rolvenden, elder brother of the aforesaid James Monypenny of Greenwich or the greatest part of the same messuages lands tenements and hereditaments, so as to be in the possession or in the actual receipt of the rents and profits thereof,"

H

I the estate was to shift over.

In regard, then, to the Jodrell estate, the shifting clause was to operate in case the parties named became entitled to the Maytham Hall estate. I very much doubt, looking at the limitations of the Maytham Hall estate at the time that this will was made and the subsequent acts in regard to that estate, whether that estate ever did become vested in a person claiming under the will of Mrs. Jodrell in a way to make her estate go over; but this is not important, as, strictly speaking, the question before me does not relate to the shifting of the Jodrell estate but to that of the Maytham Hall estate.

The Maytham Hall estate was settled after the death of the testator's widow to Phillips Monypenny for life, then to his first unborn son, then came the remainders void for perpetuity, and then the gift over, which has been held to be good. The shifting clause was in effect, that if the testator's brothers or either of them should become entitled to the Jodrell estate, then the next person entitled under the will should take as if the party so becoming entitled were dead. Phillips Monypenny came into possession of the Maytham Hall estate on the death of the testator's widow in 1826, having at that time an estate in remainder in the Jodrell estate. This, however, could not be held to be within the terms of the shifting clause, as the testator could never have intended that a mere accession to a life estate in remainder, which might never be enjoyed, should take away an estate in possession. In 1836, however, the event contemplated did happen when, on the death of Sylvestra Hutton, Phillips Monypenny took the Jodrell estate; and the Maytham Hall estate then went over, and it was to go over as if the party taking were dead. The effect, however, of what occurred would not be to carry the estate to Thomas Gybbon Monypenny because the death of Phillips Monypenny could not have done so; for if there had been a son of Phillips Monypenny, he would have taken it, and Thomas Gybbon Monypenny never could take unless Phillips Monypenny had died without issue living at his death, under the clause which has been sustained by the court. The consequence is, that Thomas Gybbon Monypenny did not, upon the estate going over, acquire an estate for life; but the estate remained in the trustees for whom I need not now inquire. Then, in 1837, Thomas Gybbon Monypenny, Phillips Monypenny and Sylvestra Hutton, joined in executing mutual cross conveyances; and I am clearly of opinion that these instruments are binding and effectually convey whatever estates the parties severally had in the property. Thomas Gybbon Monypenny also suffered a recovery of the Jodrell estate, Sylvestra Hutton and Phillips Monypenny joining in the deed making a tenant to the præcipe. Phillips Monypenny too suffered a recovery of the Maytham Hall estate (which has had no operation), under which he claimed the fee simple, and this recovery was recited in the deed by which Thomas Gybbon Monypenny conveyed to him in fee. The effect was, in my opinion, to pass whatever estate Thomas Gybbon Monypenny had, that is, as I have already explained, in consequence of the shifting clause, an estate for life contingent on the event which afterwards happened. This estate he was, I think, capable of transferring and did transfer by the conveyance of 1837 to Phillips Monypenny, and the parties who now claim under the will of Phillips Monypenny would no doubt be entitled to it.

Then comes this other question. When Phillips Monypenny died, Thomas Gybbon Monypenny became, as the court has already held, entitled to a life estate in the Maytham Hall estate, being also then in possession of the Jodrell estate; did the shifting clause in James Monypenny's will operate or not? One thing is here quite clear, that the conveyance by Thomas Gybbon Monypenny passing to Phillips Monypenny the life estate in contingency could not prevent that clause from operating; and I am also of opinion that its operation was not affected by the dealings by Thomas Gybbon Monypenny with the Jodrell estate. Those dealings left everything as it stood, except that the limited estate of inheritance which Thomas Gybbon Monypenny had was enlarged into an estate in fee. I think, therefore, that Thomas Gybbon Monypenny did succeed to the Jodrell estate in the sense in which the testator, James Monypenny, used the expression, and that his dealings with that estate did not prevent the shifting clause from operating. Looking to the words of the clause, they are no doubt ambiguous and might mean that there should be only one shifting. The testator uses the terms of "then and in that case and immediately upon such an event taking place," which certainly have a bearing towards the clause operating only once. However, on the other hand, the express declaration is, that if the said brothers or either of them their or either of their issue shall become entitled to the said estates, then the clause is to operate. I must suppose the testator to have known what the limitations of the Jodrell estate

A were and that it was settled on his brothers in succession, for he provides expressly for the two events, namely, of both brothers becoming entitled, or either of them becoming entitled; and, therefore, when he afterwards seems to confine the clause to but one event, the expression may be a little ambiguous but there is nothing really insensible or contradictory in it. I think, then, that the true construction is, that this clause is to operate toties quoties as regards the particular persons named,

B and, that being so, the consequence is that in the event which happened the person became entitled who would have taken if the person succeeding to the Jodrell estate had been then dead. If Thomas Gybbon Monypenny had been then dead, his son, the plaintiff, would have taken.

The case is exceedingly complicated, and open to very great difficulty; but it appears to me that the decision which has been come to in the court below is right.

Appeal dismissed.

MEEK v. KETTLEWELL

[LORD CHANCELLOR'S COURT (Lord Lyndhurst, L.C.), February 15, 23, 24, December 6, 1843]

[Reported 1 Ph. 342; 13 L.J.Ch. 28; 2 L.T.O.S. 205; 7 Jur. 1120;
41 E.R. 662]

Chose in Action—Assignment—Voluntary assignment—Assignment of expectant interest—Enforcement by court of equity.

F A testator bequeathed a sum of money to trustees in trust for his daughter for life, and in case she died without leaving issue, for her next-of-kin, exclusive of her husband. During the lifetime of the daughter, her mother, as presumptive next-of-kin, by a voluntary deed assigned her expectant interest in reversion to the husband. On the death of the daughter without leaving issue,

G Held: the assignment operated only as an agreement to assign, and, consequently, being voluntary, a court of equity would not enforce it.

Blakely v. Brady (1839), 2 Dr. & Wal. 311; 8 Digest (Repl.) 632, *297. F

Appeal by the plaintiff from a decree of WIGRAM, V.-C., reported 1 Hare, 464, dismissing the bill without costs.

John Kettlewell, by his will, dated Aug. 4, 1838, devised all his real estate to trustees, on trust to pay the rents, issues, and profits thereof to his daughter, Hannah Kettlewell, during her life, for her sole and separate use, and after her decease he directed that his said trustees should stand seised of his said real estate in trust for such child or children of his said daughter, living at her decease, as she should by will appoint, and in default of appointment in trust for such child or children in equal shares, and in default of such issue on such trusts as his daughter should by will appoint. And the testator bequeathed to the said trustees £11,000, on trust to place the same out at interest on government or real securities, and directed that they should stand possessed of the same, and the dividends and interest thereof on the same trusts, in favour and for the benefit of his said daughter and her children as were thereinbefore declared of his real estate, or as near thereto as the nature of the property, and the rules of law, would admit; but if his said daughter should have no child living at her decease, then as to £100 (part of the said £11,000), in trust for R. L. Dawson, and as to the residue of the said £11,000 in trust for the next-of-kin of the testator's said daughter Hannah (exclusive of a husband), in a course of distribution according to the statute. The testator appointed the same trustees the executors of his will. G

On Mar. 11, 1839, the testator died, leaving the defendant, Mary Kettlewell, his widow, and also the said Hannah, his daughter, surviving. The will was proved by the executors, and the £11,000 was duly invested in their names. On June 20, 1839, Hannah, the daughter, married the plaintiff, J. Meek, the younger. H

By an indenture, dated Sept. 10, 1839, and made between the defendant, Mary Kettlewell, of the first part, and the plaintiff, of the second part, reciting the will I

- A of the testator, and his death, and that the defendant, in the event of the death of the testator's daughter, without leaving issue her surviving, would become entitled to the residue of £11,000 as the next-of-kin of her daughter, and reciting that the defendant had contracted and agreed with the plaintiff to grant and assign the residue of the £11,000 to him, his executors, administrators, and assigns, it was witnessed, that, in pursuance of the said contract, and in consideration of the
- B natural love and affection of the defendant for the plaintiff, as the husband of her daughter, and in consideration also of 10s. by James Meek, the younger, to the defendant paid, the receipt whereof was thereby acknowledged, the defendant, Mary Kettlewell, granted, bargained, sold, assigned, transferred, and set over unto the plaintiff, his executors, administrators, and assigns, all that the said reversionary or expectant estate of her the defendant, of, in, and to the £11,000,
- C and of and in the interest and proceeds to grow due and payable for the same: and also the said £11,000 (after paying thereout the said £100), and every part thereof, and all interest and proceeds thereafter to grow due or become payable for the same, on trust, as to the said £100 (part of the said £11,000), for R. L. Dawson, according to the purport of the will—as to £3,000, other part of the said sum of £11,000, in trust for the defendant, her executors, administrators, or assigns, to
- D and for her and their own absolute use and benefit—and as to £7,900 (the residue of the said £11,000), in trust for the plaintiff himself, his executors, administrators, and assigns, to and for his and their own absolute use and benefit: and for the better enabling the plaintiff to receive and take the said money and premises, the defendant constituted him, his executors, administrators, and assigns, her attorney, and attorneys irrevocable, in her name to demand, receive, and take the said
- E premises of and from the said trustees, or whom else it should concern to pay or transfer the same, on the decease of the said Hannah, the daughter of the said testator, without issue her surviving; and then followed the usual power to the plaintiff to give effectual receipts for the moneys which he should receive, and the common covenants for good title, and for further assurance. On Dec. 21, 1839, the plaintiff signed a memorandum on the back of the indenture of Sept. 10, 1839, which was in the following words:

“Memorandum,—That I, the within-named James Meek, the younger, at the request of the within-named Mary Kettlewell, and upon condition that the will of my dear wife, Hannah, dated Aug. 23 last past, shall remain valid, unrevoked, unaltered, and uncanceled, at the time of my said dear wife's death, have agreed, and do hereby agree, to allow and pay to the said Mary Kettlewell the further sum of £3,000 out of the within-named sum of £7,900. Witness my hand, this Dec. 21, 1839.”

- On Jan. 7, 1840, Hannah, the plaintiff's wife, died without issue, and thereupon defendant, her mother, became under the limitation in the will entitled to the £11,000, subject to the payment of £100 to Dawson. The fund remained standing
- H in the names of the trustees, appointed by the testator. It did not appear that any notice had been given to the trustees, either of the assignment of Sept. 10, or of the subsequent endorsement thereon. The defendant, Mary Kettlewell, did not consent to the application of the fund according to the terms expressed by the assignment, or the memorandum; and the trustees declined to act in conformity with those instruments without her sanction. The bill was then filed against the
- I window and the trustees, praying that the performance of the trusts of the indenture of assignment might be decreed.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 6, 1843. LORD LYNTHURST, L.C.—This was an appeal from a decree of WIGRAM, V.-C. The question depends on the effect of the deed of assignment, of Sept. 10, 1839, executed by Mrs. Kettlewell, the defendant. At the date of the execution of that instrument her interest was this: In the event of her daughter dying in her lifetime without leaving issue, she would become entitled, under the trusts of her husband's will, to £11,000, subject to a small deduction, as the next-of-kin of her daughter. During the lifetime of her daughter she assigned this expectant interest to the plaintiff, in trust, as to a part of it, for herself, and as to the residue, in trust for the plaintiff for his own use and benefit. The daughter afterwards died without leaving issue, and the defendant, as the next-of-kin of her daughter, became entitled to the fund in question, which was in the hands of trustees under her late husband's will. The bill was filed against the widow and the trustees, to enforce the performance of the trusts of the deed of assignment.

It is not disputed that the assignment was purely voluntary. But the assignment of an expectancy, such as this is, cannot be supported unless made for a valuable consideration. If there is such a consideration a court of equity will give effect to it. Thus, in Grey v. Kentish (1), LORD HARDWICKE is reported to have said (1 Atk. at p. 280):

"A husband cannot assign in law a possibility of the wife, nor a possibility of his own; but this court will, notwithstanding, support such an assignment for a valuable consideration."

Again, in Chauncy v. Graydon (2), he says (2 Atk. at p. 621):

"Though in law a possibility is not assignable, yet in equity, where it is done for a valuable consideration, it has been held to be assignable."

The deed, therefore, being in this case merely voluntary, it was as an assignment altogether inoperative; and the only remaining question will be, whether, although void as an assignment, it is effectual as a declaration of trust. The residue is assigned to the plaintiff in trust for himself. There can be no difference between an assignment to the plaintiff in trust for himself and an assignment to him simply. The assignment fails, and with it the trust. If such an assignment be inoperative it does not convert the assignor into a trustee for the assignee. It has been repeatedly decided that where a gift is intended, as in the present case, and it is imperfect or ineffectual, this cannot be converted into a declaration of trust so as to make the donor a trustee for the donee.

The authorities are conclusive on this point. Antrobus v. Smith (3) and Edwards v. Jones (4) were cases of imperfect gifts. It was contended that the donors were trustees for the donees. But in both cases the court held that an incomplete gift would not operate as a declaration of trust. The judgment of SIR WILLIAM GRANT on this point, in Antrobus v. Smith (3), is conclusive in the reasoning. It is stated fully by LORD COTTENHAM in Edwards v. Jones (4), and it is unnecessary to repeat it. In Sloane v. Cadogan (5), which was so much relied on in the argument, Bromley Cadogan had a vested interest in the property assigned; he conveyed it by a voluntary deed to trustees in trust for the earl his father. SIR WILLIAM GRANT considered that a trust was thereby created, and on that his judgment was rested. It is obvious, however, that that case is distinguishable from the present, which is the assignment of a mere expectancy, that conveys no estate or interest to the assignee, although when made for a valuable consideration, which is wanting here, it would be supported in equity.

I am of opinion that the judgment of the vice-chancellor was correct, and that the appeal ought to be dismissed. The plaintiff must pay the costs.

Appeal dismissed.
